13 And if Luther is then rightly instructed, he may heartily recognize his error, and henceforth let his books go forth purely from such error anew, lest for the sake of a few errors the whole benefit of the evangelical harvest be put to shame. For many find it quite unjust and useless if, for the sake of a few human errors, even the things that are good and right should be condemned; but-

This is because even in Augustine's books one can find and read the answers of heretics full of impiety and blasphemy, written down by the notaries.

If Luther then still wanted to insist on what the arbiters would condemn, then one must of course resort to the most extreme means. Then no one will stand by Luther who has been overcome. And on the other hand, where he mends his ways, everything in Christendom will proceed with calmness in silence. And this will not detract at all from papal power or prestige, but will raise the suspicion of those who would perhaps pay less attention to the pope's judgment because he would seem to be pushing his own cause because of indulgences and his supreme sovereignty. On the contrary, his godliness will be praised by all that, for the sake of the truth of the Gospel and the peace of Christendom, he preferred to yield a little of his right.

(15) If anyone is not satisfied with this advice, the first thing to do is to refer the matter to the next council. Which, for many reasons, seems to be required by the fundamentally corrupt state of Christianity in many respects. For it does not seem appropriate or advisable that such an important matter should be taken up in such a way amidst the noise and unrest of the princely world affairs, and that it should be treated superficially, especially since everything looks quite dangerous, both among the Germans and the Spaniards, so that it does not seem advisable to give rise to new noise. First of all, it is right that at the new coronation of the emperor 2) everything should be cheerful and lively, and that it should not be marred and disturbed by such hateful things.

16 With this advice I did not want to anticipate anyone. For I have only opened my thoughts, which I consider most useful, out of an honest heart, especially since I have been requested to do so by the highest princes, both secular and ecclesiastical.

I wish that the evangelical truth may prevail and everything may be for the glory of Jesus Christ! Amen.

2) Carl V was crowned emperor at Aachen on October 22, 1520. According to this, this writing would have to be set before this time; however, Spalatin's manuscript offers instead: "Nor is it proper in any way that the imperial regiment of imperial majesty should be burdened with such a hasty beginning and be made unhappy. Incidentally, Spalatin's handwriting does not bear a date either. Förstemann has placed above it: "at the beginning of April 1521".

533. advice given by the Dominican prior in Augsburg, Johann Faber, to the Elector of Saxony at the Diet of Worms.

This writing is found according to Spalatin's manuscript in Försteinann's "Neues Urkundenbuch", p. 66. Seckendorf, nist. lib. I, p. 145, has translated it into Latin and Frick has retranslated it into German in the German Seckendorf, p. 323. We give it after Förstemann.

To My Most Gracious Lord, the Elector of Saxony 2c.

The Pope, the Roman Emperor, the kings of France, Hispania, England, Portugal, Hungary and Poland shall each appoint four excellent, highly learned men, and each prince of the Holy Roman Empire one. And what they speak and do of Doctor Martinu's writings shall be strong.

This trial was held against Arius, Sabellius, Nestorius 2c. and others; neither the pope nor anyone else was believed alone.

But the Roman emperors sometimes alone, sometimes together with the pope, called for the concilia together, and in the concilia it was always decided what was true or what was false, as the four first concilia indicate.

The named 1) have also not been cited and summoned to Rome, nor have they been condemned or sentenced to Rome, but in the concilia, as may now also happen.

The time and place shall be appointed as it is deemed best and most convenient by the Roman Emperor's Majesty and the Electors, so that it may be carried out without difficulty, with good security and with everyone's opportunity.

Perhaps it would be good to allow at least half a year for respite, or longer, so that learned men can examine all things well and completely, and nothing is done thoughtlessly. For this will be the cause of many things in common Christianity.

For we know what dangers there are on both sides: The rebellion of the Holy Roman Empire, perhaps through the cunning of the French; the danger to the clergy and the common people; the rejoicing of the enemies of the Roman Empire; the inducement to disobedience; the danger to some princes and perhaps also to the imperial majesty; the annoyance of the common people; the future of the French.

1) Seckendorf: Those accused of doctrinal error.

2) Thus Seckendorf.

Tyranny and rage, and the prohibition of publicly proclaiming and preaching the truth.

If it were now decreed that Doctor Martinus be heard at the appropriate time and place, perhaps all things would be arranged well and with God. And that this may happen, I ask God and will ask God forever.

The pope and his people should have patience this time, because there is danger.

In this no harm comes to the pope, but for the sake of the common peace of Christendom, because it cannot be ordered and decreed any better now.

However, the Imperial Majesty shall issue a mandate throughout the entire empire to both parties to refrain from disputing and writing until the matter is finally settled. 3)

534 Another objection raised shortly before this Imperial Diet and given to the Elector of Mainz, dated Nov. 2, 1520.

From Seckendorf's nist. lib. I, p. 145 k. In the Weimar Archives, Reg. <4, no. 43. Spalatin is said to have brought this concern from the Imperial Diet at Worms (Seckendorf I. c.); but our writing seems rather to be a letter from Faber about the advice he gave orally to the Elector of Mainz in Cologne.

This doctrine seems to be hard and difficult, because it has the reputation of bringing about great change in many things. If those in Rome, and those whom this teaching particularly attacks, do not change or improve themselves and their lives, not only will they not silence Brother Martin, but stone and wood will cry out. I do not like the way of proceeding against Martinus as a banished man, because it does not satisfy learned people, and the people are neither calmed nor satisfied by it. I would prefer that the pope and the imperial majesty appoint learned, God-fearing and impartial men, whose pronouncement both parties must accept, so that the matter would be handled with modesty on both sides. This is what seems good to me in regard to the teachings of Brother Martin, which I have given to the reverend Archbishop of Mainz in Cologne as an answer, when his reverends wished to know my opinion. Anno 1520, Nov. 2, Br. Joh. Faber, 4) ppa. manu subs.

3) Thus supplemented by Seckendorf.

4) At Seckendorf: Fabi.

Section Three of Chapter Seven.

How the cunning plots of the papists harmed them themselves, since the imperial order issued by them to hand over Luther's books to the authorities in all places and to force him to recant, not only caused the imperial estates to force the emperor to summon Luther personally to Worms and to interrogate him, but also caused a large number of complaints against the Roman See to be brought before the emperor.

A. About the written recantation of the Emperor by Chursachsen, which was proposed to Luther by the Papists, and how steadfastly Luther declares himself against it.

535 Luther's answer and explanation to Spalatin, who reported to Luther about the imperial order, titled March 19, 1521, that if he were to come to Worms only for the recantation, he would not want to appear, since he could also recant at Wittenberg if it were only a matter of that. But if the emperor wanted to demand that he be killed, he would appear, because he did not think to flee and leave the word in danger.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed by Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 313 5; by De Wette, vol. I, p. 574 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 113. In German translation in the Wittenberger (1569), vol. IX, p. 1035 (incomplete); in the Jenaer (1564), vol. I, p. 435; in the Altenburger, vol. I, p. 711 and in the Leipziger, vol. XVIII, p. 569. We have retranslated according to destlanger Briefwechsel, which provides the original.

Newly translated from the Latin.

His friend in the Lord, George Spalatin, the disciple of Christ, the pious and learned man.

JEsus.

Hail! I have received the articles I am to revoke, 1) dear Spalatin, and the instructions about the things I am to do. Do not doubt that I am not revoking anything.

1) These articles, which are all taken from Luther's "Babylonian Captivity" (St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIX, 4ff.) and "Grund und Ursach aller Artikel" 2c. (in this volume no. 448) are found in Förstemann's "Neues Urkundenbuch", Latin p. 44, German p. 46, but with several very gross errors. We note here after I see that they are not based on any other evidence than that I have written against the custom and usage of the church (which they invent). I will answer the Emperor Carl that if I have been summoned solely for the sake of recantation, I will not come, since it would be the same as if I had already come there and returned here. For I could also revoke here, if only I had to revoke.

By the way, if he would call me to be killed, and because of this answer consider me an enemy of the kingdom, I will offer to come. For I will not flee, if Christ is gracious to me, nor forsake the word in the midst of the battle. But I am quite sure that those bloodthirsty people will not rest until they have killed me. But I would wish that no one but the papists would be guilty of my blood, if only it were in my power. We have become pagans again, as we were before Christ: so even this exceedingly cunning Antichrist holds the kingdoms, the world, captive in his hand. May the will of the Lord be done. You advise, if you can, that they do not take part in the wicked assembly of the wicked. M. Jodocus Mörlin 2) says, he only a few: In the text p.44a, line 3 is to be read instead of Xs tanāsm: n6Mt. p. 445, line 2 v. u. is to be read instead of ynickyniä extrennirm 68t, 6^nu5u 6886: [niä^niä 6M8moäi 68t, r6sicÜ6N<la, 6886. p. 45 u, Z. 15 v. o. is to be read instead of ix>8i onUiOot: nnienic^no. P. 45 u, line 23 v. o. is to be read instead of in 66t6ri8: 6l6rioo8. P. 46, line 18 in the text is to be read instead of "vnguttich": ungodly. P.465, line 10 v.u. is to be read instead of "with": nit.

2) Ift. Jodocus Mörlin von Feldkirchen was professor of metaphysics in Wittenberg. After the death of D. Henning Göde, he was given the has given three guilders to all D. Hieronymus [Schurf] for writing fees, and he will also pay the other if it is necessary, if he only knew how much is still to be added, although he is penniless and even poor.

We have often dealt with the Hebrew lection, and according to our judgment, Aurogallus is sent to this professorship, whom you can propose to the most noble prince. There is nothing else with us. By the way, the Magnificat 1) is under press, I do not know when it will be completed. Fare well in the Lord, and greet those who are to be greeted. Wittenberg, Tuesday after Judica [March 19] 1521, the day on which I received your last letter.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

But I have not yet seen the Emperor's order 2).

536 Luther's letter to Elector Frederick of Saxony concerning the revocation of several articles. On or after January 19, 1519.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 1020; in the Jena edition (1564), vol. I, p. 432 b; in the Altenburg edition, vol. I, p. 651; in the Leipzig edition, vol. X VII, p. 568; in the Erlangen edition, vol. 53, p. 61 and in De Wette, vol. I, p. 575. That Luther sent this letter at the same time as the previous one has been generally assumed so far, therefore both De Wette and the Erlangen edition have the time determination: "probably from March 19, 1521". Also in the Wittenberg and Jena editions, our writing is placed in the year 1521 with the heading: "Antwort D. Mart. Luther to Duke Frederick, Elector of Saxony's writing (which does not exist, nor has it been possible to obtain it), in which S. C. F. G. requests that he revoke some articles by imperial majesty's order." But our writing does not belong to the Diet of Worms, but to the negotiations with Miltitz, and refers to

The parish of Westhausen, which had been terminated, was awarded to him. The official costs were significant and already on January 29, 1521, Luther had asked Spalatin to work toward a reduction of the same. The money matter in this letter will probably still refer to it.

1) St. Louis edition, vol. VII, 1272. Although it is accompanied by a note to Duke John Frederick dated March 10, 1521, it could not have gone out until the second half of August. Compare note 1. above.

2) This is the sequestration mandate of March 10, which commanded that all of Luther's writings, because condemned by the papal bull, be handed over to the authorities. Printed in Förstemann's "Neues Urkundenbuch", p. 61. It was posted on the church doors in Worms on March 26; publicly proclaimed on March 27.

the objection raised by Miltitz for the Elector, No. 277, and is to be assigned to January 1519. Luther answers here point by point to the same. It would be superfluous to provide evidence for this, since a mere inspection is completely convincing. -We had written down the foregoing when we saw from the Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 368 f., that we had been anticipated by Brieger in the correct determination of the time.

Jesus.

Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Sir! In order to serve E. C. F. G. humbly, I open my opinion and discretion on the articles and means indicated to me by E. C. F. G. to put down the difficult bargain between me and the Papal Indulgence.

2. first, I am willing to honor the Roman church in all humility, and prefer nothing to it, neither in heaven nor on earth, but only God Himself and His word; therefore I will gladly do a retraction, in which pieces my error is shown. For to revoke all pieces straight away may not be done.

3 Secondly, I would not only suffer, but also wish that I could never preach or teach. For in this I have neither desire nor love, neither good nor honor. For I also know well that God's word is not acceptable on earth. But I am still subject to God's commandments and will.

Thirdly, to have an unsuspicious judge in the matter is all my desire, and for me; for this I also call the most reverend in God 2c. Archbishop of Trier or Salzburg, or the noble Lord Philip 2c., Bishop of Freisingen and Naumburg. 3)

(5) Fourthly, I have long since been moved by the fact that nine cardinals with all their followers have not been able to prevail in the time of Pope Julii, and that emperors and kings have been humiliated many times; yet I have been strengthened again by the fact that I firmly believe that the Roman Church would not and would not suffer the clumsy and harmful sermons indicated by my disputation on indulgences, nor would it tolerate or handle them, nor would it allow the poor people of Christ to be seduced by the pretense of indulgences.

3) Compare No. 284, Jan. 19, 1519.

(6) It is also a bad miracle whether in our times one or two are suppressed in these last evil times, since we find that in the time of Arii the heretic, when the holy church was still new and pure, all bishops were driven out of their churches, and the heretics, with followers of the whole empire throughout the world, persecuted the one holy Athanasium. If God decrees such things in the Church at the same blessed time, it is no great wonder to me if I, a poor man, have to succumb. But the truth has remained there and will remain forever.

Fifth, the new decree on the matter of indulgences, 1) now issued in Rome, is almost strange to my eyes. First, that it imposes nothing new. Second, that it tells the old almost darkly and more incomprehensibly 2) than it has been told before in other decretal documents. Third, that it does not revoke the other papal laws on which I have based myself, and thus leaves the matter hanging in contradiction. Fourthly, and most importantly, it does not introduce, as all other laws do, any words of Scripture, teachers, or laws, or causes, but only establishes mere words, in which I am not heard at all, and nothing at all is taught in response to my letters and requests.

(8) And because the church is bound to give cause for her doctrine, as St. Peter [1 Ep. 3:15] teaches; and forbids divers things, that they should not be accepted, except they be tried, as St. Paul [1 Thess. 5:21] saith, I cannot acknowledge such decrees as a righteous and sufficient doctrine of the holy church, and must more obey God's commandments and prohibitions. Yet I do not want to reject them; but neither do I want to worship them.

9 I also fear, G. H., that because in our times the Scriptures and old teachers are coming forth again, and now one begins to ask in all the world, not what, but why this or that was said, whether I have already said such mere

If I took up my words and recanted, it would not only be untrustworthy, but also considered a mockery and a public dishonor of the Roman church. For what she says and does without reason will not be overtaken by my recantation.

I may tell E. F. G. on my conscience that I, all honor unregarded, would gladly recant, if only I would hear the cause of my error or its truth. Without which, if I ever have to recant, I will do it with words and say that I believe otherwise in my heart. But that will be a bad honor for them. Date in Wittenberg, Anno 1521.

3)

E. C. F. G.

menial servant

D. Martin Luther.

Luther's report to Wenceslaus Link, as the Elector wrote to him, that he, Luther, could well realize that the papists have not yet reached the place where they would like to be.

See Appendix, No. 60, § 2.

B. The Council of Estates on how to proceed with Luther.

538. advice, 4) how and what form to proceed with Luther. About March 2, 1521.

This document is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 1026; in the Jena edition (1564), vol. I, p. 432; in the Altenburg edition, vol. I, p. 615 and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVII, p. 567. It is a piece of a deliberation of the estates, which they handed over to the emperor. It is found in its entirety in Förstemann's "Neues Urkundenbuch", p. 57.

1. doctor Luther, on sufficient escort back and forth to his custody, heard by some scholars and those who understand the matter, who are to be ordered to do so, that they, the estates, understand, are to be asked, but that they are not to dispute with him in any way: whether he of the outgoing writings and articles against our holy Christian faith, which we and our forefathers have up to now held

1) No. 234 in this volume, from Nov. 9, 1518. On January 13, 1519, Luther, as he writes to Scheurl, had not yet seen the new Decretale, so this letter is later.

2) In the editions: "incomprehensible"; only the Jena one has our reading.

3) It seems that instead of XIX XXI has been set.

4) The Jena edition adds: "as can be seen".

confess and insist on it, or not?

(2) And if he revokes them, he shall be heard on other points and matters, and equity shall be decreed therein.

3. If, however, he were to answer and persist in all or some articles which are contrary to the Christian Church and our holy faith, and which we and our fathers and forefathers have hitherto believed and held: then all princes, princes, and other estates of the holy realm, next to and by the Roman imperial majesty, want to remain and adhere to their fathers' and forefathers' faith and articles of the Christian faith, without further dispute, 1) and to help apply the same faith, and then your imperial majesty shall therefore duly and urgently issue orders, mandates, and commands everywhere in the holy realm.

6. what complaints the imperial estates have lodged against the Roman See of Imperial Majesty.

539 The complaints of the Roman Empire and especially of the German nation, which were brought before the Emperor by princes and estates at the Diet of Worms in 1521.

At the time when these complaints were submitted, this paper was published in quarto under the following title, without any indication of time and place. It can be found in Kapp's "Nachlese", Theil III, p. 240. - Compare No. 722 with this publication.

The Complaints of the Holy. The complaints of the Holy Roman Empire and especially of the whole German nation, from the See of Rome and its attached royal power, at Worms on the day of the Council of the 1521st year, Roman Catholicism. May. by the princes, princes and sovereigns of the kingdom.

I>aA. Register of the contents of this püechAia none vnd beginning.

The Artikel so that the Bapst Germany beschwürt.

Bi Wie Weltliche sachen inn erster Rechtfertigung gen Romgezogen werden.

From the Conservators and Pontifical Judges

Bi

1) Sodie Wittenberger und dieJenaer . Förstemann: "anzaigen".

Of Papal Delegates and Commissaries. B ii Of diminution of the justice of Juris patronatus. Bii

From clergymen so to Rome, and dying on the way. Bii

How the spiritual dignitaries moved to Rome. Bii

How to Rome unsalaried persons are awarded benefices. Biii

Alte Priiilegia bey Krefften bleyben lassen. Biii Of annals, and their daily growth. Biii Of the new inventions and offices at Rome.

Biii

Of Commenden and Incorporation of the Prelature.

Biiii

Of the Regia of the Papal Cantzleyen. Biiii

Of servation pectorali, mentali, recourses, incorporation, vnion and concordata. Biii

Teutsch Pfründen zuuerleychen den Teutschen allain, die dann Residiern sollen. B iii

The sale of sinecures for future occupation. Biii

Of the stifts so soldered to the nobility allain. Ci Aiib Of the Babst's prevention in the election of the Prelature.

C i

Of dispensation and absolution of the pope. C i Of the challenges of the Curtisan. Ci

How vnter the seem familiarium vil pfründ angetast werden. Ci

Of indulgence and indulgence. C ii

Concerning the stationers. C ii

Of dispensation of incompatibilia and others.

Cii

That the Teutonic Order has been deprived of its hewser in Apulia and Sicilia. Cii

Also in Wälschen landen an ötlichen locaten entwört. Cii

How to obtain an ötlich Prelatur out of the bishop's court constraint. Ciii

How to make almost necessary the reform. Ciii

Complaints from the Archbishops, Bishops and Prelates from the Conseruators and Papal Judges. Ciii

How Divine Laymen are used as true persons of Gaystlicher Freyhait. C iii

When the suspected gays are caught in mischief, how they seek escape. Ciii

How the secular lygende guetter inn der gaystlichen hend kommen. Ciii

How ötlich gaistlichen layen güetter vnpillich an sich ziehen. Ciiii

How2) the bound zeyt erdacht, dem Praütigam Geldt absetzen. Ciii

2) In the old edition "Who". But in the text is our reading.

Aiii a How the bishop's secular office is to be taken over by the bishops. D i	How the evil spirit keeps itself completely safe in tabernacles, quarrels, and quarrels. Eii
Of Unskilled Officers and Judges D i	Of the evil play of the gaystliche with their servants. Eii
How the juden wucherdurchgaistlichegericht bekröfftiget wirt. Di	How to use the churchyard in the time and place of need. A
How they do not hold nor handle their royal reformation of the court. Di	How the Eastern gospels keep an unfair economy, and take scholars 2). Eiii
How sy mer gelts dann gaistliche puß dem sunder auflegen. Di	Of ordens-personen als Münch- und dergleichen Bettel-orden. Eiii
How to give new toes. D ii	How they induce the sick to deprive their rightful heirs of property. Eiii
How the benefices are forfeited to the unskilful, and how much is taken from them. D ii	Anna How the begging authorities are pressing a lot of money to Rome, and how the monasteries are complaining. Eiii
From stationers. Dii	The aim of the project is to reduce the number of monasteries in the region. Eiiii
How the gaystlichen Bann vmb vast gering sachen gebraucht wird. The	A piece of advice and a good look. Eiiii
Of interest demand of the hewser, so auf den Kirchhöffen steen. The	The first part of the book is devoted to the history of the church and its history. Eiiii
From the heavy absences of the parishes and other benefices. Diii	How the Layen vnpillig an gaistlich gericht gezogen werden. Eiiii
From coming or Einuerleybungen of the monasteries and other benefices. D iii	How to cause the secular ones to demand their subjects from the religious court. Eiiii
Of the interdict of the priesthood, and of the rejection of divine service. Diii	From vnphillich cost of the secular, which are drawn to the gaystlich court. Fi
The new endowed benefices are described in the following. Diii	How the poor people are dragged to court by the clerical servants. Fi
Von vnnotturfftigen Confirmation der Pfründen und others. Diii	How to take disgraceful cases to court. Fi
As they are from opffer der newen walfarten auch tail begeren. Diiii	How to bring secular matters from the Gothic court to the royal court. Fi
Of the costs, so one weights the churchyard. Diiii	How the various läyen, as willed persons, have practiced gaystlicher freyhait. Fii
Of subsidies and other burdens imposed on the monks. Diiii	How they do not handle or keep their reformation of the court. Fii
Aiiib How they demand money from monastery priests. Diiii	How often from vngründts Leymütz 3) because of erbare frawen beschwürt werden. Fii
How they have collected too many begging terms and sentences. Diiii	How the ecclesiastical judges seek a vnphillich interest from vermainten eesachen. Fii
How the monasteries of the Eastern kingdom give the nobility food for the night. Diiii	How they may take matters before secular judges for themselves alone. Fii
How to weyhet too much, and often unlearned priests. Egg	Aiiib How the judges of the courts do not want to deal with special lay matters. Fiii
How they make reformation and statutes of their liking, and yet do not keep them. A	How secular matters, as for lack of secular assistance, are brought before the court of justice. Fiii
Of the Sinodo, which is to be kept sacrilegiously. Eii
How the common people are burdened with blessings 1) and spiritual devices. Eii
How the common people are burdened with blessings 1) and spiritual tools. E ii
How the priests demand money from their parishioners for deduction. Eii
How you have to buy the churchyard for dead people. Eii

1) In our template: "begenckunsten".

2) As can be seen from the following text, "scholder" or "schulder" is a profit or levy from the game of dice, cards and the like.

3) That is, Leumunds.

How they intend to use the alleged misconduct of the secular courts. F iii How to punish women who perpetrate deadly fruit. Fiii

As for the rediscoveries made by the evil hands, they must also be removed by the official. Fiiiiii

How to tolerate the usurer for money's sake. Fiiiiii

How to punish death-beaters or other sinners twofold. Fiii

How the spiritual judges formally inquire, and investigate the sins. Fiiiiii

How the Judges cause the Layen to unpillary costs. G i

As many others, so in the spots, where the braced are, in the pann erclert. G i

How the sender rulers demand interest from the hewers. G i

How to require weeks of gelt from the handwercksleütten. Gii

From vnpiilliches Arrestiern der Gaistlichen Richter. Gii

How the poor can be persuaded to enter into a contract through the right to court costs, 1) and vilerlay. Gii How to use a freeman advocate or procurator in the courts of law. Gii

Bia How the sacraments are held before the poor for almost no reason. G iii How the missions are formally used. Giii A number of complaints by the German nation to the magistrate of Rome in merlay matters. G iii

The nomination, designation, and subrogation are to be discussed. To

From the papal graces that sy Aratlas sxxsetatinasgratias ex- pectatiuas call. Hiiii

From the Vrlauben and Licentien. Ji

Bib Articul damit bāpstliche Hayligkait Teutschland beschwerdt.

After the Roman Kays. May 2c. and other acts of the princes, rulers, and common sovereigns of the kingdom, whether or not, and what complaints by papal sovereigns and other sovereigns of the German nation are to be made, with the advice of the sovereigns and the good intentions of their kings. May. to be humbly accepted. His Her some in the eyl aufgeschriben, wre w danach volgt. First of all, concerning your papal mayoralty.

How worldly matters are drawn to Rome in the first instance.

Item. Our most holy father, the bishop, has the duty to call and summon several persons to Rome for the purpose of inheritance, pledges, and other such secular matters, so that they do not serve to diminish and violate the secular sovereignty. Therefore request Ewer Käys. May. May, ask the princes, lords and sovereigns of the kingdom to graciously help and obtain that no one, be he royal or secular, be cited to Rome for royal or secular matters in the first instance, but for his bishop or archbishop, or if he is secular, and the matter is secular, for his prince, lordship, or ordinary judge, where the defendant was seated, or otherwise the matter belongs to him.

From the Conservators vnnd Papal Judges.

Item. The ecclesiastical princes and prelates also receive from the papal authorities some biia asept or ecclesiastical prelates, their prelates and fifths, as judges of all their matters, of which they complain before them. Such judges they call Con- seruatores. Before them, they take secular persons, noble and noble, in all secular, forbidden matters, in which they have never been denied justice before the ordinary judges, and who therefore do not want to answer them, they banish, as there were many examples to be told. As a result, all secular persons, sovereigns and matters have been summoned to court, which would be of the highest party to them, so that then Kays. May. and other secular sovereigns in their secular courts is abortive and improper, and also openly contrary to the law of the land, which nevertheless clearly expresses that one should let the other be tried before his ordinary judge and court.

Of Papal Delegates, and Commissaries.

Item. The Papal Holiness also gives to the sovereigns, at their request, judicial delegates and commissaries, sovereign judges in the German lands, the power, whatever they may or may not want, to take up secular matters before the same judges and to banish them for this purpose, all for the purpose of aborting and impairing secular jurisdiction and sovereignty.

1) "solves" - cost; in our template: "solves"; immediately following "mye" - trouble.

From schmölerung of justice *Juris patroriatu*s.

Item. If, by reason of death, benefices which are the patronage of a princely or lay jurisdiction are terminated, the Papal Palace shall reserve the right to derogate from the same, and thereupon shall confer the benefices on the curtisans, or on any other person at his pleasure, so that the princely and secular judges shall be deprived of their right of presentation, and shall be deprived of their right of presentation, who shall say at the time: The prevention has taken place, so that whoever has given it away [rather give it away] shall go before. Whoever has the need to keep, if someone has obtained a mandate or other letters against it, that they should be considered without force and of no effect, as has happened up to now. In addition, if a curtisan makes the same benefices warlike, and thus survives his opponent, the papal authority shall then be entitled to revenge the same benefices with painted letters.

Of the Gaystlichen, so to Rome or on the way die.

Item. The Papal Authority shall decree and ordain, if a prince dies in Rome, or is departed from Rome on the way to death, whether or not he has been a member of his family and a relative of his service, that all his beneficia and officia, whether great or small, fall to be forfeited to the papal authority, whereupon the sovereign and secular patrons and feudal lords are deprived of their justice.

as well as for the sake of the royal dignitaries to Rome.

Item. What good benefices, as deans, cantors, or other dignitaries and officers, canonicals, vicarages, parishes 2c. If any of the above are lost, in mense ordinario, outside the city of Rome, the patrons of the church and of the world, who formerly had such benefices to lend and grant, shall lend and grant them to them, whether they have had such benefices or officia, or officiants of the pope or the cardinal, or whether anyone has retained recourse or access to them, that shall not be, and if letters or mandates are obtained against them, they shall also be considered as nothing.

B iii a How in Rome the benefices are often awarded to unskilled persons.

Item. The benefices of the German nation in Rome are given to some gunsmiths, hawkers, priests, donkeys, stalwarts, trabants, and other unskilled and unskilled persons, and at times to those who are not of German extraction. From this it follows that they do not provide their own foundations, and leave it to other needy, poor priests, who make do with little, and take much from them, to see to it that the poor laymen of every place are lacking in the provision of the law. The poor laymen of every place are also deprived of all consolation by their parish priests, and thus a yearly sum of money has been given to the poor people out of German lands, of which nothing will be returned to the German nation in eternity, nor will any thanks be paid. It would be fair for all born Germans to be granted the benefices of the German nation, and for them to reside there.

To have old privileges beleyben bey krefften.

Item. If papal authorities now, or other bishops before them, have granted privileges to anyone, be he royal or secular, to grant or grant some prerogatives, beneficia or officia, how then such privileges are to be held, the same shall not be denied by new findings, which are daily discovered, and an entry shall be made at that time. And if letters or mandates were obtained against it, that they should be considered as nothing.

From the annates.

In the beginning, how the German nation used the annals, which had been lost for many years, to benefit Christianity against the

The Pope has been given the right by the previous bailiffs to enforce, to burden, and to bring them into an exercise of his 1) and presumed rights. It has been proven that the subjects of the German principality must often make great efforts and help to destroy them and to cause no little harm to the German nation.

From daily growth of the annata.

Item. To the extent that such annuities are increased more and more, and not only to the archbishopric and bishopric, but also to abbeys, presbyteries, pastorates, parishes, and other ecclesiastical institutions.

1) This is: an exercise.

If, in recent years, ten ducats were given to the episcopal parishioners to redeem the episcopal pallium, they would demand one hundred ducats, and if they gave the advocates of the consistory pallium some two or four ducats, they would demand one thousand ducats with other additional ducats, so that, as 1) according to the old statutes, the courts of Menz, Cöllen, Saltzburg 2c. each is obliged to give ten thousand gülden for his pallium, and not more, he can still bring his pallium from Rome with xx or xxiiij thousand gülden.

From the new fiefdoms and offices in Rome.

Item. The confirmationes and pallia of the archbishops and bishops are also confirmed daily by the appointment of new officials at Rome, for which the ecclesiastical subjects must also give their assistance, which may be many, namely new Cubicularii, Scutiferi, Ribiste, Parcionarii, Paionarii and Caforati. And in particular, there is a new finding, so that a bishop does not have to pay his pallium in cash, but as a guarantor and self-borrower for the sum of money due, with the will of the bishop to pay it in a certain period of time. The same guarantors shall be excommunicated immediately, and they shall be discharged from this obligation at once, for which the bishop shall pay a special fee of iii. iiij. to the amount of D. Ducats. It is also said that this year the bishop's hailiwick has made a new order over the previous one, so that at B iiij a CL. or more mercenaries, called Caualoati 2), have to live on the depreciations of the bishop's benefices, waiting for the bishop's body, which the common bishops of the German nation must help to bear.

Of coming and incorporation of the prelatures.

Likewise, it is announced how many monasteries, convents, and other royal houses will be subject to the cardinals, bishops, and other prelatures, and (as they call it) will be commended, and also incorporated, so that royal, royal, and princely benefices will decline and come into future ruin, and the service will be diminished. or L. persons are contained in a monastery, they order the service with a clear charge, so that they may have more benefit from it.

1) In our prefix: "we wol".

2) In the old edition: Osnateati.

Rules of the Bäpstliche Tanntzeley.

The rules of the Cantzeley of Rome shall be established according to the laws of the Curtis, and shall often be changed, so that the ecclesiastical fiefs, especially of the German nation, may come into their Roman hands, and must be purchased from them, or be endowed with a pension, contrary to written law and equity.

From seruation pectorali, incntali, recourses, incorporation, union and (loncordata.

In such rules at Rome, his authority has not been established, but from day to day he has invented more and more new things, so that the German nation would be exhausted, and also deprived of its natural divine service, namely by reseruaciones pectorales, or mentales, generales, or speciales, Regressus, Incorporationes, Vnio- nes, etc., Concordats, of the German nation everywhere, against the spiritual rights and birthright.

The German prebend is to be granted to all Germans who are to reside in Germany.

Therefore, by and with such, almost all the fiefs of our nation, however small they may be, are drawn to Rome, given to and conferred upon poor, incompetent, unskilled fiefs, who are also ignorant of the German language, who do not possess the fief by themselves, and who do not present the fiefs with good lessons, manners, or customs, all of which are contrary to the established concordats, covenants, and the laws of the land.

From the sale of the benefices, also on future occupation.

Item. There is no doubt about it, not only the fiefs, as mentioned above, will be sold and transferred, but also the sum of money to be paid to the sovereign and secular lords of the fiefs at the end of the day, namely two or three thousand florins to each person on the fief, which are to be settled in the future, insured, maintained and reserved, and if they then bring the fiefs to and from them, they shall meet the ways and practices with permutation, reservation, surrogation 2c., If they are then returned to the patron or other ordinary lords of the fiefs, and if the fiefs are not completed in the bishop's month, nor are they due to him, he shall sell or give them to some merchants in writing, whether they will be free in the future to accept them, regardless of whether they were due to someone else.

Then Sant Anthony's message was all moved, and now come the holy Gaist, St. Huprecht, 8t. Cornelius, and 8t. Valentin 2c. 1) sent, by which the common people will be moved with diligence about their parchment.

Of Dispensation of Incompatidilia vnnd others.

Item. At Rome, at the request of the supplicating Germans, 2) prior to this, an inquiry shall be made among those who may have knowledge of the same matters, and the skill of the supplicants shall be investigated. Villerlay dispensationes, so that some bad and niders stand persons, who neither at the Leer, nor the gepurt gewirdiget, many parishes, many dignities, and other iuoompatidilia may possess. All others, and especially those of the knighthood and otherwise licensed persons, who preach to the Christians, and otherwise in the gaystlichait weyt better Fürsehung thünden, to great swearing.

How the German lords have been deprived of their land 3) and hewser in Apulia and Sicily.

How well the German Lords of Our Lady's Order of Prussia 2c. out of benevolent care and giving of the Roman Kay. and kings, of high lordly memory, also of the princes, graves, lords, and nobility for the laying out and control of several goods and uses in the kingdoms of Sicily and Apulia, as well as other western lands, which have been done in the past, so that they can be used against the unbelievers. The nobility, too, had more earthly maintenance, from which they had made villages and towns, and had possessed and held them for several hundred years. However, by papal decree, some cardinals and bishops, who are not German, have been given such a title and deprived of it, so that it is still in short supply, contrary to law and equity.

How the Teutonic Order was deprived of some of its hewers in the Wälschen Landen, and how they were made dangerous.

To this end, the Federal Council of the Common German Order of Venice has issued a special

1) In our original "Le." probably inadvertently instead of: "6te." Compare page Diia gegm the end (Col. 1748): "und anderer Botschafft 2c."

2) "on" - without.

3) "Polley" - Ballei, Comthurei.

The Order of the Holy Roman Emperor confirmed and confirmed the statutes of the Order in German. All of the statutes of the Order, which are to be kept in German, have been confirmed and confirmed by the previous bishops and Roman emperors, of high lordly memory. In the same way, the Roman Curtisans of the Teutonic Order have challenged the Hawser in Italy with papal bulls and commissions, as at Bononia 2c., and for this reason they have taken the right to enter Rome, which is no small disgrace to the same Order and the German nation, contrary to law and equity.

That the Teutonic Order of St. Benedict, 4) founded on them, is taken from them and given to the Cardinal of Lunnia 5) for a short time.

How to remove a number of prelatures from the bishop's court.

Item. The bishop is in the habit of expropriating some monasteries and of extracting from their bishops, as ordinary judges, jurisdiction and coercion, which is enforced by the empire, the assistance and imposition which the said bishops have hitherto imposed on their abbots, and for which reason the bishops are also obliged to render the Roman empire less service.

How seer not were ain reformation to make.

Because much condemnation of the poor Christian believers' souls arises, and because the German nation is highly and severely depleted in money, due to the daily struggle with the supreme head of the Church, it is considered necessary that a change and a common reformation take place, in order to prevent the destruction of our nation, for which reason we all thank E. Kay with the highest respect. Kay. May, to demand the same, and to graciously help.

Ciiib Beschwärnuß von den Ertzbischoffen, Bischoffen vnd Arelaten, allain von den Conservatorm vnd Bäpstlichen Richter.

Item. The princely princes and prelates also obtain from the papal authorities several offices, or ecclesiastical prelatures of their courts, or others, as judges of all their matters, of which they complain before them. Such judges shall be conserua-

4) Perhaps Sudiaeo near Rome, where there is a rich Benedictine monastery.

5) In No. 722 it says: "to the Cardinal Columna".

Before them, they will take secular persons, nobles and gentiles, in all secular matters, regardless of the fact that they are not lacking in secular, ordinary courts of law and justice; And those who for this reason do not want to answer themselves, let them be put into a temporary ban, as there were many examples to be told, so that (if it should take place) all secular persons would be held in high court and matters would be brought to the highest part of the court, so that neither Rom. Kay. May. nor other secular sovereigns leydllich. It is also publicly against the order of the court, which clearly states that one should let the other remain in law before his ordinary judge and court.

How a number of Layen, as true persons of the spiritual freedom, have been practicing.

Item. It also happens too often that some secular persons are or will be jurists, and yet they sit in secular courts, do other secular business, and for this purpose have two or more elders and elders' children. Such of them, for the sake of their entrustment, want to bring secular persons and matters to secular courts, and for this reason want to be accepted and not refused by the judges of the courts 2c. And if this were to happen, many of the subjects of the secular courts would be tempted to do so, and nothing less than to commit secular offences, since they could (if Ciiiia so wished) escape secular court jurisdiction and punishment, which would then be completely disgraceful and unacceptable to all secular authorities. But the bishops and prelates think no less of it.

When the suspected gays are caught in mischief, how they seek escape.

Item. If a person is accepted and held by the secular judges, he shall say that he has been proven guilty before the bishop, official and religious judges, but soon after he has been accepted by the secular authorities, If he has not worn the divine chastisement and tonsure, nor has he been found in this form, or if he has been proven to be so, and if he has not been let out within xxiii hours, or if he has been sent to them, they declare the bishops under banishment 2c., so that some of the more noble, evil to do vngescheucht moved. His letters, which are called litas formati, and so they in

When the religious authorities arrive, they are often left in the lurch without paying off or restitution for the damage they have done. This is why many outrages, enmities, and uprisings have arisen.

How the secular lygends come into the spiritual hands.

Item. After the royal state has been provided with constitution, statutes, and orders by the Council of Rome, that it is not to buy or to change the church's property, bona immobilia, or lay persons in a regular way, it is useful that the Roman Catholic Church has given the same statutes and orders to the seculars. May. has given the same statute and order to the seculars. Namely, that a secular may apply his legendary estates to the gaystliche Stand or keren, power. That even in cases of inheritance there may be a provision for this, then if there is to be a provision, it is possible that the secular estate may be bought up by the religious with the tenure, and that the secular may buy through this, and especially through the fief, which they take daily with money from the seculars, and also bring and obtain other claims to the secular goods, so that the secular status of the Holy Roman Empire is brought before the seculars, or the merer tayl.

How some gaystlichen Layen güetter vnbilllich an Sich ziehen.

Item, that at times the secular goods are sold to the churches and cloisters, are transferred and favoured, and are subject to the authorities, and are also charged with interest and taxes, after which they are drawn into the royal highness and protected, all of which the bishops and prelates have the right to do and do not punish.

How the bound tongue devised to pay the Preutigam gelt.

Item. If, after the Sunday of Septuagint, when the Alleluia is recited in the Holy Churches, a poor person wishes to have an open solitude and celebration of the Holy Sacrament of the Eucharist before the usual night of the barrel, which God Himself instituted and established, just as Cardinals, Bishops, priests, priests, priests and others of the royal state, who exemplify their ordination, do in the same time. Vite Sanctimonia are to be themselves (on) all scourge vnd punishment in public business vnd tentzen. Also those who hold and do for themselves: So

The poor people, if they want to have the Sacrament of the Holy Eucharist before Shrovetide, have to purchase it with money from the official or other holders of the priesthood, In this case, they want to make use of the royal law, which binds the poor, hurried, arbiter, and is otherwise not valid for the royal or secular.

Dia How to bring the bishops of the gaystliche secular inherited güetter to themselves edit.

Item. It has also happened several times that clerical persons have accepted hereditary benefactors, and if they have died by will, that the ordinary bishops have required me to tolerate their hereditary benefactors, which would also be embarrassing and unacceptable to the secular ones.

Of clumsy officials and judges.

Item. The offices of the priests of the church are often vandalized and mismanaged, and in some cases they are lewd persons, and the way in which they engage in open sins and defilement is found from daily experience, who are to engage in spiritual matters, are almost poisoned, and to this end, their goods are dreadfully damaged and spoiled, which the bishops and prelates shall take care to put an end to with justness and severity.

How Jewish usury is punished by the courts.

Item. How much it is evident and evidently known, 1) that the Jews in the high German lands are interfering with and abstaining from usury, by which they are greatly harming and destroying the poor Christians. In some places where Jews live, it is assumed that the secular authorities do not want to help these Jews with their usurious debts, or if they make usury their main good in the future with evil deeds and beliefs, that the Jews should appeal to the spiritual judge, and therefore bring such Christians under suspicion, and the same judges take the reason that the poor people who confess before them and swear that such debts are not usury, and the judges from their own use openly know that the Jews have committed one usurious act.

The poor, out of great need, may swear to their harm, over and over again, that judicial and all other help in this and such usurious hendels is highly condemned in the constitutional and secular laws, but permitted to them by their bishops and prelates.

How they do not hold or handle their royal reformation of the court.

Item. Not only are all the laws that have been established, but also the reformation that has been established in some of the courts is openly and in many cases overused, and in many cases it is laid down in a way that is repugnant to the law, and it is sought to be used against those who are not afraid of it. But against those who are guilty of the offense, they let up. And when those who are wronged or violated petition the ordinary bishops of the same court for an equitable remedy of the accusations, the same often concerns the meritorious provost, dean, chapter, and lord of the throne, against whom the ordinary bishop (whether or not he was otherwise authorized) is not allowed to take any equitable action on account of his obligation, which he had made at the time of his accusation.

How Sy mer geldts, dan gaystlich puß, impose the sinners.

Item. Just as the judges and officials of the courts should, for the sake of obvious sins, draw up all kinds of blackened penalties, so that it may be noted that they are all atoning for the salvation of souls, they nevertheless make them more difficult, that the Laymen buy them off from them with money, by which they then extort money from the people, and thus are parthey and judge to their own pleasure, which is against all law also permitted by their Metropolitan.

How to give some new toes. 2)

Item. If the Layen have not paid a large tithe from some properties for many years, they will be so harassed by the ecclesiastical court (in which they have no profit) that they will have to pay the tithe, or whatever is demanded of them, in consideration of whether they appeal to Rome, as they may not receive any payment.

1) "wayß" set by us instead of: "wayst".

2) "penetrates" put by us (after the content statement) instead of: "brings".

How the sinecures are denied to the unskilled, and how much money is taken from them.

Item. If the sovereigns in the secular high khaytens have parishes or other benefices to dispense with, they usually fill them with unskillful, unruly priests, or they are left with an absentee, and cut down to the closest possible extent. Also the parish courts and priesthoods are built up, and let them perish, since with all of them the current enjoyment of such priesthoods, and what they owe to God and the world, is left behind. Also so by the bishops and prelates gedult vnd gehandthabt.

From the stationers.

Item. It is also not a clear grievance of the common poor man, that some unlawful stationers, who call themselves the Holy Gayst, St. Anthonius, St. Valentine, and other messengers, yearly move in all towns, villages, and villages, and bring the people, as is openly known, from their money, in which they have their day, and ravish them with finds and desecrations. Also, to the end, the poor, simple people, who do not give you money otherwise, on pain and punishment of the saints, because they call themselves the bishopric, vnchristenlich vnnd ganzz ergerlich beträwen [begrudge], vnnwegen zu geben bewegen, which the bishops grant, and would not be [refuse].

How the royal ban is used for almost minor things.

And in sum. Although the judicial censures and penalties are imposed for the sake of the Christian order and faith, they are also in the lowest debts, which in many cases do not exceed three or fourteen kreuzers, and other worldly matters, and lastly, if the same main matters are decided and executed, also in respect of the costs and damages incurred thereon, which the procuratores shall then assign to them and retain for their enjoyment and remuneration. Also daily, and on remission, fulminated and pronounced, so that the blood of the poor secular, indecent laymen was sucked and completely drawn out. Also, out of the fear of such unwarranted banns, to be condemned to eternal perdition, and to be deprived of their ordinary courts. It would be necessary to put an end to such contradictory and unlawful abuse and unlawful excommunication, and for them to be admitted in matters for which they are admitted, and not to be taken otherwise, because it is seen that their metropolitans are not such to them, but that they have acted in this way.

From interest claim of the Hewser, so on the Airchhöffen fteen.

Item. Of the hewers standing on the churchyards, the poor, whose they are, must pay every year in many places, instead of the prelates, with interest, 1) at the ban, all those because the same hewers stand there. However, if the hewers are forfeited or canceled, the Send-Dechant shall not pay any less of the same money from the leren.

If they are not punished, they banish the poor and forbid them the Holy Sacrament for as long as it takes for money to be given, which is a great shame.

From the great absences of the parishes and other benefices.

The parishioners are also burdened with deadly chanting, spiritual counseling, baptism, and religious fees, as well as with the rendition of the sacraments and other matters, for which a great deal of money is required, by the parish priests and their vicars, vice-parish priests, chaplains, and parish companions, And the parishes, which are incorporated into the monasteries, also by other ecclesiastics and prelates, so highly located, pensioned, left, and translated with absenteeism, to which they are entitled, the dotem beneficii, the widem hoff 2) and tithe of the parishes, reserved to themselves. However, according to the statute of rights, they are obliged to reside themselves, so that many vicars and parish priests may not have their own custody, and may be subject to all the taxes, such as the sacrifice, the payment of wages, the sepulture, the occupation of the dead, the soul device, and the like. If they require sacraments from time to time, beyond their poor means, superfluous, and at times have to be content with the ban, which the bishops and prelates penalized.

Of the commendations or monasteries, and other benefices.

How many monasteries, convents, and other ecclesiastical benefices or houses may be granted to cardinals, bishops, and other prelates, and how they may be incorporated, but as a result the imperial and princely sees may fall and come to ruin, and the service of the gods may be lost.

1) "vergölten" - to tax.

2) Cf. Col. 1755.

If there are xl or l perD iii b sons in a monastery beforehand, they shall order the service of the gods with a clear list, so that they may derive more benefit from it 2c.

Of the Interdict of the Service of God and its Interpretation.

Item. If a religious person or priest is slain or otherwise injured, and is not heard, whether it is a necessary, or in other cases legally permitted, the state, district, or village shall be interdicted, and so long interdict, and no church service shall be held in the churches, until the deputy or councilor, mayor of the same district, accepts to do or dispose of the matter. And as much as their own ecclesiastical law may forbid that the debt of money or matters of money shall not be interdicted, it shall not be held, but shall be said to be due to disobedience, which shall be so much greater than it is due to minor matters. This interpretation, however contrary to the law, has hitherto been handled by the above-mentioned prelates.

The new endowed benefices are described in the following.

Item. Some bishops want to have the first grant when a new fief is endowed or erected, say that it suits them, and do not want to allow or confirm the endowment, unless it is granted by the founders and patrons, thus preventing much endowment and divine service.

Of vnnottdufftigen Confirmation der Pfründen vnd anders.

Item. They take over the people excessively, if something new, be it a fiefdom, brotherhood or anything else of the kind, is imposed. They do not want to confirm it, and although it does not require their confirmation, they have their statutes and other practices that it must all be confirmed, no matter how small it may be.

How they of Opffern of the new Wallfarten also tayl begeren 2c.

Item. In some boroughs, where there is an influx or a Hayligen walfart, the bishops or prelates want to have the third or at least the fourth penny, all of which is due to the fact that they are not justified by their royal law.

1) Here we have put "ee", which is "rather", instead of "es" in the old edition.

From expenses, so one weyhet the airchen.

Item. When they raise the churches and the poor, they burden the poor people with other costs, and they also want to have great hardship, especially the suffragan and the bishop.

Of Subsidies and Other Oaths Imposed on the Guerrals.

Item. The priests, if they invest their fiefs, and want to have something of it, as much as the fief has a year's income, are called Fructus primi anni, siue Primarii,

So that half of the benefit is demanded to the bishop, and the other half to the archbishop, or archpriest, in order to give the possession. Those who exceed their fiefs with subsidies and other taxes, if there are open and honest reasons, scilicet rationabiles et manifestes. In that case, the right to take subsidies shall be granted, and the priests shall not be allowed their necessary abstention, from which the priests, in turn, shall be forced to swear to the laymen in various ways and to give no sacrament for free, as it is then publicly stated on the day, simile. It is condemned that in the countryside and in the towns the mighty ones (who were supposed to do so) do not give the grain to the bakers enough, and then look through their fingers, and let the bakers bake and give according to their liking, so that the poor community and a whole country (God's mercy) is highly burdened, deprived, and spoiled.

How sy Gelt require from the monastery priests.

Item. If some of the young ladies of the monastery are governed by the priesthood, but are to be dismissed at will, and are not eternal, they will not let the bishop have them, and the monastery will give them several guilders.

How to collect too many pettel-örden terms 2) and etching.

Item. Thus the poor people of Munich are besieged with excessive beggars, and especially with the terminators whom the beggar orders have against their rules in the towns and villages, since there are often two, three, or four of them in a town or village, so that poor people who are honest, upright, and faithful to the law may be housed.

2) terminiren - to go out begging.

If the bishops have kept the children in good health, if they have weedy and poor children who cannot support themselves through weakness, if they have deprived them of their natural resources and help, and have given them elsewhere, the bishops will grant them this for a small annual sum of money.

How ettliche reyche Closter dem Adel NachtFütter zu geben waygern.

However, the monasteries, as the Benedictine Order, have been endowed by secular princes, graves, lords, and the nobility more than by royal ones, and have been daily endowed with benefits, not only to wait for the service of God in the churches, but also to pay the nobility, who have come to them from time to time, for their proper costs, food, and time. As then the gleychen Hospitalitet gistliche right to give from them the Christian believers, also impose. However, the church rulers often give them the supposed freedom not to give anyone food for the night, and they take some money for it, contrary to the old, praiseworthy custom and fairness.

how one too much and often vngelert, vngeschickt priest weyhet.

The archbishops also have too many poor persons, even those who have no certain understanding of their fiefdoms or all of their titles, who then sometimes, out of poverty, commit crimes against the church and the common people, thus despising the holy state and giving them a bad example. So through the bishop, [who] believes the six witnesses, who give information about the one who is to be confessed, say how he is worthy and righteous, whether their kayakers have seen or recognized the same here before ye, and thus do all this with one sign of the Christian statutes enough.

How they make reformation and statutes to their liking, and yet do not keep them.

Some bishops and prelates also make special presumptive reformation, statutes and laws for the sake of the ecclesiastical courts, which in some respects are contrary to common rights, and especially to all secular jurisdiction and authorities, and are almost harmful to their subjects, and if it is considered that the same reformation and law are to be applied to the secular priesthood, even against the secular priesthood, and that the secular priesthood is not legally obliged to accept them, then they shall, after

The courts themselves do not hold this in the right and proper sense. If the same Reformation is to be used to declare that before such officials and courts of law only spiritual matters, including open, wicked sins 1) and not haymical ones, are to be judged and dealt with, and in all of this not the money and the questus, but only our Lord Jesus Christ and the salvation of the blessed are to be sought. From open daily affairs, however, there is a complete contradiction in many things, as has been described in the above-mentioned articles by the spiritual judges with the abbreviation.

From the synodo to hold the gepürlichen.

Item. If the bishops themselves personally attended and held their synod and council with the assembly of their prelates and other ecclesiastical representatives, as they are required to do by ecclesiastical law, doubtful deficiencies would be much disputed.

The first part of the book is a book about the history of the church.

How the Capitels connect their bishops and prelates.

Item. The judges and the court the merit have the Thum lords, who are the head lords of the same court, such Capittel lords, and also the choir lords in the collegiate courts, to appoint as bishop's or his prelates, He has then committed himself to the utmost with oaths, and so obligated himself against them that he may not turn to them or to their appointed judges and officers their shameful intercession and action, nor may he punish them himself for their conviction.

When the suspected clergy are caught in mischief, how they seek escape.

E ii a Item. Wa ainer of the secular judges 2c., ut supra [Col. 1744^.

How to persuade the poor people with money for the sacrament.

It is also the vnderthanen with dead Besingknussen, ut supru sud titulo: Von grossen Absentz der Pfarren [Col. 1749^.

1) "geyebte" - practiced, that is, perpetrated.

How the common people are harassed with gifts and spiritual devices.

Item. That the parish priests and pastors shall charge their parishioners with the blessing of the holy sacraments, and shall make a special charge of their fall, to which the poor, who have celebrated the first, seventh, thirtieth, 2) and year of their sins, shall not be able to add the remembrance of their sins in the church, And they shall be obliged to perform the feast, and to give fourteen kreutzer of a sung mass, so that they themselves, on account of their benefices and endowments, are obliged to keep the feast, and thus to earn, and also take, two or three lions with one mass.

As the parish priests claim Gelt for jrer pfarrverwanten Abzug.

Item. If someone from one parish is buried in another parish, each parish priest shall charge his parishioner one gulden for a letter of permission, on which the parishioners must come to an agreement with their parish priests, and if the parishioners refuse to do so, the parish priests shall forbid them the sacrament.

Item. From this it appears that all sacraments are sold for money, and some must be missed for money.

Eüb / How one must buy the churchyard of some dead people.

If a man, and especially a layman, is found perishing, drowned, slain, or otherwise dead during the sacrament, even if it is not obvious that he died in mortal sin, the church law shall only withhold ecclesiastical burial in the case of a manifest, known sin of death. They do not want to bury the poor people who have died in such a way in the churchyard, if their wives, children or friends have made up with them beforehand.

How many absences spoil the foundations.

The other Beneficia vnd Altaria are so highly burdened with the absence that

1) "Seel Wärter" - pastor.

2) That is, the first and seventh day, and thirty masses for the Todtm. Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XXII, 773.

3) "Laß-" put by us instead of: "büß" according to the corresponding passage in No. 722, § 74.

4) In the old edition: "verragen", a misprint.

5) and other property may come to harm and waste, and not be kept in good order and condition.

How some clergymen keep themselves completely lazy, and also start quarrels and quarrels in tabernacles.

Item. That priests and other priests of the merchant class sit in tabernacles and innkeepers among the common people. Also, when they are in the tent, and when they are in the gaff, they use long knives and lay blades, they start a lot of violent quarrels and quarrels, which can lead to fights, and they use such methods that the poor people are wounded or blinded. 6) After that, the poor are banished, and brought to heavy cost and damage. Also, the poor so urge to get along with them of their case, and to buy out of the ban again.

From the wicked beyspill of the clergy with their servants.

E altem . That the pastors, vnd other gaist-

The priests of the city of Vienna have been given the task of keeping a house with unlawful wives and children, and of living a vile, repugnant life, which serves as a bad example for their parishioners, and they also become careless about it.

How to manage the airchamber at the beginning of the year.

Item. If two people hit or fight each other with fists or other weapons in a churchyard, so that one of them becomes a little indignant, some priests want to interdict them and no longer perform the usual service, until the church consecrates the churchyard again at great cost and expense.

How some clergymen keep unreasonable business, and take blame.

At times, the clergy also keep an open economy, and the like, in the churches of the place. But if they are lords, they or their servants, who are also priests, lay out annual dice, ball and carthorse money, take also the profit and scholars from it, say it belongs to them from the upper chapter. As much as the religious and secular law, also all the supreme authority forbid such things.

5) Cf. Col. 1749.

6) The text is not in order. Cf. No. 722,? 76.

Of order persons, as Münch and dergleychen begging authorities.

How the royal monasteries, as Benedictines, St. Bernards, Premonstratensians, and other authorities, daily bought and took possession of the lands of the Layen, and grew to considerable wealth, is evident, from which they then no longer and more highly ray or want to ray to other secular sovereigns the customary land service, burden, stewardship, or other burdens, or want to do, then as it happened in the old times, when they were poorer, also the service of God with them with the reading of the mass, and other, now much more slack, then it was, therefore the necessity was, that they or other clergymen would not be allowed to take over other worldly lyric goods in the purchase way, or through others on purchase for themselves.

And how well rich monasteries have been granted the merest tail by secular princes, and the nobility, more than by the clergy, ut supra sub titulo [Col. 1752]: As some royal monasteries 2c. with the appendix, so vndersteen themselves to get back some of the freedom granted by their princes, and write them publicly to their monastery door. As no one is to seek 1) night's lodging from them, they are pleased to do so, and thus they are asking for the confiscated property.

Item. Eß werden auch arme Leüt von den anderen Bettel-München 2c., sub titulo: Wie sy zu vil bettel-örden [Col. 1751].

A)s they persuade the Arabs to deprive their rightful heirs of the property.

The same terminators, as well as other priests who are with the sick, with whom they know money or good, persuade them with learned words that they will pay them much, since it would often be much cheaper for their poor heirs, children or other friends.

How the beggar-thieves bring much money to Rome. Also, the Junckfrawen summon the monasteries.

Because also from some mendicant authorities many things, and at times, in justification to Rome, so that the ordinaries, parish priests and laymen may hear 2) complained, and such justification on money may not be withheld.

Three of their generals, as it is said, have not been carded for any money. It is to be feared, and in some places 3) it has been proven that through the same begging authorities many monasteries of young women, in which there are not so few princes, counts, nobles, and citizens' children, are taking away the place where they alone have all the upper hand, with money, and are finding other ways to corrupt. Also to forbid them with a heard sentence with eternal punishment, to reveal such things to them, came others then to you.

To put an end to such complaints, and to come to an end for them, it is to be considered whether it was good, where the monasteries of Bettel-örden were situated in the one upper and lower courts, which were not provided with keepers and administrators by the same superior authority, but were all in the same superior jurisdiction, that these monasteries, and each of them in particular, were given two keepers, honorable and dapffers, by the same superior authority, who, in all their common accounts, were of their incomes and expenses, and also saw to it that the same monks did not unreasonably burden them, nor did they pay unnecessary tribute to the same monasteries, then, for such reasons, they did so without doubt, that the convents of the same monasteries would be daily observed in their customs, that they would certainly increase in number of persons, and that much more, so that their money would not come to Rome or to other inconvenient places, would be maintained.

[Ain advice and good look.] 4)

Thus, from among the ecclesiastical and secular princes and rulers, the lower committee has brought together all the superior articles, which are to be entered into by more than one secular state, and have variously put them into one order, and consider it necessary, therefore, if the necessity should be handled and decided, that this should be done by ecclesiastical and secular princes and rulers personally at the same time.

Since the secular sovereigns, who had been appointed to such a committee, considered it a great necessity, if the spiritual and secular sovereigns would not forget each other before the end of their time, that then the secular princes and sovereigns will all talk to each other about it and decide, that they will all be shunned from each other, so that there will be more justice and security.

1) "jnen" put by us instead of: "jren".
2) "hears"-hard.

3) Oertern" put by us instead of: "Oerten".
4) In our template, this heading is missing, which should be here according to the table of contents.

Of priests, officials, and other ecclesiastical judges and court personnel.

How the Layen vnbillich an Gaistlich Gericht ziehen werden.

Item. If the plaintiff is a cleric and the defendant is a cleric, the clerics may bring such cleric defendants before the cleric's court for any matter whatsoever, which is publicly against the law. Quia Actor tenetur sequi forum rei.

how the secular subjects are to be summoned to court for their debts to the church.

Item. The clergy also often take on the secular subjects for debts with clerical rights, and they are not allowed to get help from the secular authorities, and so they bring the poor people to a great extent into disgraceful banishment, as well as ruinous costs and damage.

how to cause the secular to demand their subordinates from the gospel court.

Item. In addition, there are several other cases, summonses and hearings in the church court against secular persons, irrespective of the fact that such church judges know beforehand openly and explicitly that they do not belong to them, and must subsequently reject them 2c. That then the secular defendants are also highly embarrassed if such matters are later, at the request of the defendant's secular superior, judged for secular court, is nevertheless of considerable harm to the same defendants, if they must therefore petition their secular superior, whom they may not then receive in sewing. If they have to request their secular superior, whom they cannot get into the sewer for this reason, to bring the writ and demand from them, and to send the summons to the ecclesiastical judge, whereupon they will be given a lot of time, assembly, costs, and punishment, and if such a plaintiff cannot find his secular superior soon, and brings the above-mentioned demand, and sends it to the ecclesiastical judge, he will send the summons 1) to the ecclesiastical court. For this reason, the judges of the church will not refuse me the secular matter, regardless of the reason.

From the Unfair Costs of Secular Matters, So an das gaistlich gericht gezogen werden.

Item. If a secular defendant is taken into custody by a court of law, and is therefore also retried and prosecuted at a later date, the plaintiff shall be liable for the costs of the proceedings. The criminal plaintiff's attorney, who has been duly summoned, demands that the defendant, who has been duly summoned, be summoned to appear before the court, and that he be given a trial and a hearing, until he has obtained a fair hearing in the court of justice, pay the costs of the proceedings that have been brought against him, or 2) wait for a probable ban and other charges to be added to the affliction, regardless of the fact that he who has been so officially summoned is required to pay his damages. But such contradiction of justice is practiced by the religious judges, therefore more and more unfair plaintiffs adhere to their courts, and thus take advantage of the people.

F i b How the poor people of the clergy are also dragged to clerical court.

Item. The clerics do not draw the layers in obberüerten and similar cases for the clerical judges on their own behalf, but rather their bailiffs, reeves, school teachers, servants, subordinates and servants are obliged to use such things as their sovereigns do.

How to take disgraceful things in the spiritual court.

Item. If it happens that religious persons have to sue Laymen for iniquities and words of disgrace, the religious judges have the right to be judges of the same matter, so that the answering party will also be tried by his ordinary judge.

How to bring secular matters from God's house to a spiritual court.

Item. The Officials accept that, in secular matters and between secular persons, in the case of loyalty and loyalty to the law, a physical or written obligation, proposition or promise is made, that, for this reason and for the sake of appearances, such secular matters are to be performed before them, and that, in the case of a legal dispute, they are to be settled.

2) In the old edition: "ober", probably a misprint.

1) "mahnung" put by us instead of "maynung" in the old edition, according to the corresponding passage in No. 722.

If this were to be the case, all secular representations and letters, which are usually made with the legal stipulation, obligation and commitment, would have to be discussed in the secular courts, and the secular courts would have to be held in vain, set in place, and also made in totum elusoria, which is nevertheless unacceptable to all secular supreme courts, and also contrary to law and equity. If, however, something should be permitted to the religious courts for the sake of the mainayde sworn to by the nobility, they may not become judges by virtue of the mainayde sworn to by the nobility, but the mainaydige persons allain vmb die Sünde Fiia des offentlichen Mainayds fürnehmen, vnd mit gaistlicher puß püssen, doch den weltlichen Richter, die den Mainayd mit peinlicher Strafe zu püssen haben, söllicher Straffnahme wegen ihrer Strafe vnabbrüchlich.

How a number of layers, as persons of faith, have exercised their religious freedom.

Item. Eß geschicht auch zu vilmalen, dass etliche geweychte Personen 2c., ut supra [Col. 1744[^].

How they do not handle or hold their reformation of the court.

Item. Es werden auch nit allain gemayne, beständige Recht 2c., ut supra [Col. 1747[^].

How to pay more money then to impose spiritual penance on sinners.

Item. How well the Judges 2c., ut supra [Col. 1747[^].

How often women are summoned for reasons of merit.

Item. If a man or woman is convicted of sin and vice before an official or religious court, she must, if she does not want to be judged guilty, purgate herself with her own blood and confess, if she has then proven herself guilty, 1) If she is found guilty, and if she is willing to give up her guilt, she must give two guilders for it, and one place of one guilders to the official or the court judge for one day's letter (which she is obliged to take). Therefore, the official and ecclesiastical judges shall also seek such an appropriate remedy for themselves.

If a woman is accused of a crime or sorcery by another out of anger or anger, and if she complains for the official, she must also apologize for it with her own name. Now everyone can appreciate that in this case a woman, whether she is guilty or not, must swear that if she wants to keep her worldly and temporal life otherwise, this will not result in the evil enjoyment of the money, but rather in a great deal of missing time. Et sic contra rationem impunita remanere delicta necessarium est.

How the spiritual judges seek a vnbillich interest, from vermaynten Ee things.

Item. If the man and the waif deal with each other for the sake of the marriage, they shall have one marriage between them. If one of them gives the other clothes, jewels or other things to keep, and if they are then divorced from the official because of the marriage, he shall have for his own interest what one of them has to give to the other, which is contrary to all rights and all authority.

As sy things that may also be taken before secular courts, allain drawing for itself.

Item. Although there may be many things that can be taken, judged and punished by the law of the religious or secular courts, many things happen when the secular judges, as they have the power to do so, challenge their secular judicial authority, that the secular judges will denounce such things to them in the ban, and so, if it should happen, the secular judges may take whatever they want from the secular courts and the supreme courts, whether or not E. Kay. Kay. Maj. and his secular members is to be judged by all means.

And as, according to 2), because of the law, open mainayd, breach, sorcery, and the like, gospel and secular sovereigns, whose ee [first] comes, ye at times belonged civilly to punish, vnd thus prevention has taken place, so vndersteen the

1) "Dennmals" set by us after No. 722, instead of: "mermals" in the old edition. - Likewise: "the same" immediately following instead of: "the same".

2) "after" put by us instead of: "yet".

The court has the right to impose such punishment against the law, which is then also highly disgraceful and not painful for the secular head of the court.

As the ecclesiastical judges do not want to know some special matters.

If a lawsuit is filed in a church court against a young woman, or for the sake of her children, or for the sake of a child, 1) or for the sake of a widow, whatever the case may be, they do not want to refer or reject such a lawsuit.

How secular matters can be brought before a religious court due to the lack of secular assistance.

If secular persons in secular matters apply to the secular judges for a summons and say that the secular authorities do not want to help them, he shall give notice of the proceedings, and before he does so he shall state in summary form how the law is to be administered or enforced, and if, on the grounds of the secular authorities or the defendant, the matter is referred and decided, the secular judge shall be given almost a short time, If in the same time the end of the case and its execution does not take place, the secular judge shall continue to bring the plaintiff to justice before him, which is almost inevitable, if a case is to be brought by the secular judge in three weeks, which often does not end before the secular judge in three or three years.

The judges also say how they may take legal action in such secular matters for themselves, if there is a lack of legal assistance from the secular authorities, and yet they do not want to tolerate a guest or a secular person suing them in secular matters, and if there is a lack of legal assistance from the secular judge, that he may apply to the secular supremacy for justice in the same way as the secular justice without difference in the law, as the secular should come to the aid of the secular, and against all odds.

How they intend to bring about coercion by means of a presumptive action by a secular court.

And it is not considered sufficient by many reasonable people to say how the ecclesiastical judges may justify themselves by drawing on the longstanding practice of quasi possession and the time-honored proscription in several places between the layers, when thereby Kay. Maj. and the Roman Rey. his

1) People's wages (?).

the highest is disqualified, deprived of, and averted from the jurisdiction and compulsion of the courts.

However, it is evidently right that against the high authority of the Pope and the Roman Emperor, no one may prescribe or claim a limitation of time, considering that he has used a great deal of time and military splendor.

How to punish women who bear deadly fruit.

Item. Since it sometimes happens that pregnant women and women in childbirth often give birth to dead fruit because of an accident or other malignant causes, and how well the mothers, who have suffered such a fate, If a great heartache happens to their children (as it is to be believed), and if they do not want to give any reason for such an accident, they will still be severely punished by the officials at this time.

Fiiiia As for some sins, the perpetrators who have plagued must also abort the officials.

It often happens, and at many ends, during Holy Lent and especially during the weeks of the martyrdom, that many people, both male and female, after having made confession of death and other cases reserved for the bishops, have to make an apparent penance, as is then customary, and how well these people make their penance public, so that they are not disgraced in the eyes of the world, they must nevertheless at times, after such an open penance, also give the officials a lot of money to pay off, and thus suffer two penalties for one death, and thus many men are highly punished, so that they must give the official more for punishment than for paying off the death of the borrowed friend.

How they tolerate usury and usurers for money's sake.

Item. If two sit in the vnee, the officials take the money, and let the ridden 2) thus remain in sin and disgrace, for the sake of a yearly interest. They do the same with usurers. 3) Because of this, they not only suffer damage to their temporal goods, but also harm God and their souls, and many other Christians are also harmed by this.

2) "die gerürt" == the said.

3) Something seems to be missing here. How it would like to be completed can be seen from No. 722, § 63.

Item. The officials allow a few further declarations, that people who do not know that their marriage is still alive or dead, may have a meeting with other persons, that they take Tollerantiam, or Tolleramus letters, in contempt of the Holy Sacrament of the Ee and Ergernus frummer Christen.

how to impose two punishments on death-beaters or other sinners.

F iii b Item. If some cathedral churches have a statute or a breach of it, they may not allow any death-witcher, so much as may be guilty of a death-witchery, to come to the sacraments or to be liable to them. It is then a matter that they, and one each in particular, get along with them, and on the Green Thorn Day have openly repented, considering whether the poor people have visited the holy place where Papal Indulgence is, since one may absolve them of such sins and episcopal cases, also be absolved, apparently have done penance there, and have the proper appearance. All this is done for the sake of their avarice and money, and thus the poor man is punished for one thing by the ecclesiastics twice, and at other times by the secular judges, against the common law and all written law.

How the spiritual judges inquire unformally and investigate the sins.

Item. They also do not hold their right in the proceedings, which are carried out ex officio, by the Inquisition, although these Inquisition proceedings are admitted in several great and important cases, and beforehand a common court of law, legem and fama against the Inquisitum is to be broken and proven according to the law. So that it may be obtained from honest, honorable and entirely suspicious people, not from frivolous or renegade ones, amen beginning and origin, and the accused shall be given a transcript of the alleged offense and objects together with a consideration that his protection would be brought against it. But all this will not be done, even if it is ordered, but the people who are ordered to do so will go into the towns, villages and villages and search for people who might be punishable. In this way, an honest person, man or woman, who is not credibly rumored to be there, is put to death by a lictor, and then publicly cited by the church court, and then proclaimed in the sermon hall, which sometimes causes great annoyance, reluctance and eternity between the people.

If they then come and appear, the officials want them to fill themselves with the means of their own aids of the alleged offences, sometimes with a number of compurgatorium, and according to the following, which should not be, unless the rumor and evil deed is first proven, According to the ecclesiastical law, if the person does not want to swear for a serious sin or other reasons, as it is found, he must agree with them, give money, and become wrong.

How the judges of the courts cause the laymen to take unfair actions.

Item. That in citationibus & monitoriis, or summonses and summonses, which are issued in the courts of law, the matter of the action is not measured, so that the cause of action can be understood sufficiently, whether such action belongs to the church court or not. From this follows: If the defendant therefore applies to his secular court, he must first request the court judge and find out what the complaint is, and if he is informed of this and finds out that the complaint belongs to the secular court, then he must first of all apply to the court judge for a remedy, which remedy is then immediately denied. If it is not so near to the time of the defendant that he, the defendant, may apply for a writ of summons. The judges of the courts shall set a short deadline by order of the court, so that they may precipitate and overrule the poor, and at times so quickly that the defendants may not be able to obtain the necessary relief between their estates, or thus obtain necessary counsel and assistance, And thus many poor innocent people come into a presumed ban, even large and noticeable, incurring considerable costs and damage, so that it is to be saved, which is then the secular sovereign's right, and its court authority has the right to noticeable abortions and disgraces.

as many others, so in the places, where the banished are, declared in the ban.

Item. In some places, other followers, ten, twelve, or more, who are not related to the matter at all, are summoned by banishment with the self-sacrificer 1) so that the officiants of his will may be followed by them, and the poor people may be relieved of their duties.

1) "selbssqcher", the one whom the matter actually concerns.

The banned persons have to make terms with them, or go on the way with their poor children, and become landlords, and no measure or difference is kept in this, as is the fortune of the poor people. Also, if you have participated in or had joint ventures with the banned self-interested persons unjustly or wantonly, they are not always obliged to chase them out of their villages for this reason, although they are forbidden to do so by their own spiritual law, that for pecuniary debt or pecuniary property, no interdict shall be made, yet it shall not be held, saying, that the disobedience, which shall be so much greater than it is due to lesser things, shall be covered with a reason.

How the Sendt lords demand unreasonable interest from the hewers.

Item. The sender-dechant also demands money from the inhabitants of towns and villages every year, and if this is not given to him, the poor people are banished and thus forced to give it, and it is necessary to ensure that the sender is kept in order to be punished and punished according to the law.

GiiaHow to wuchen geldt from the handt wercks people.

Item. They take such things in some places from millers, innkeepers, bakers, shoemakers, blacksmiths, blacksmiths, shepherds, 1) cowsherd, or other craftsmen for weeks of money; if they do not pay such things, they are banned from giving them.

Of the Arresting and Oppressing of the Judges of the Judiciary.

Item. In many places there is an abuse in daily practice], that, on one layman's request in secular matters, the judicial magistrate against the other layman's inhibition and violation letter is issued before the secular magistrate, not before him, but before the judicial magistrate, 2) If the opposing party then seeks to defend his lay judge, many writs will be filed against each other for this purpose, and when, after a lengthy legal process, the lay judge settles the matter before him by jury, the laymen must believe the writs, even if they do not have the right to do so.

In view of the great expenses and work that would be incurred in the appeal to Rome, as well as part of the same judges, they are daily relieved of many secular matters by Kay. May. The Supreme Court and its judicial power, contrary to law and equity.

How the poor can be persuaded to enter into a contract by force of law.

Item. The religious judge or official has against the poor single Layen to the right Advocaten, Procurator vnd Schreyber umbsonst. But the layman must transfer the right out of his bag. Consequently, the innocent may flee from the court with their hands and armies and enter into a legal contract, by which means they may also be brought to ruinous harm, provided that they are entirely innocent of any wrongdoing.

Giib How to use a Roman lawyer or procurator in many religious courts.

Item. The ecclesiastical judges wish that all parties who are to be heard in their courts do not use any other advocates or attorneys, except in the city in which such courts are held; they also often set too short a deadline, so that advocates from outside the army may not be brought in. And they apply the apparent causes, as if it happened to the right, for which these advocates or procuratores should be obligated, and yet it often happens for a repugnant reason, as one then finds publicly in the daily record, and so that these judges know how such advocates, who sit with them, must have great fear and awe of them, the judges, and their authorities, that they may not advise the parties to lawful defense and exception against the judges and other parties, who complain there, according to their need and have such action, also therefore the ecclesiastical prelates and others, who reside there, when they or theirs have to do with ecclesiastical law, any advocate or attorney fears to advise or speak to a foreigner against their need, if they have much night on their hands. And if someone does not want to confess to such misdemeanor or right of the advocate or procurator, it is the daily open finding, if very seldom an advocate or another so completely

1) "Schöflern", that is "shepherding", as results from comparison with No. 722, 8 65.

2) Also in No. 722, 866 hiev is the form "vollfahren".

3) "the on" put by us instead of: "on it".

It is found to be perfect and steadfast, that in all diligence in the application of the law neither right, hope, love nor sorrow is denied him, and great good fortune, if an attorney or procurator has such a case, that he does not save possible and his best efforts, how much more then, if he has to deal with the said right, and so that the parties may, in the course of time, be able to have the same attorney, or procurator, as the case may be, of the court of their choice, advocates, or counsel, and that the same advocates, according to the proper order of the court, would therefore do a special duty, as well as the other advocates or procurators who sit in the city where the court is held, and by doing so, one might be able to save oneself from a lot of trouble.

How the sacraments are held out to the poor for almost no reason.

Item. If someone owes a debt to the priest or the church at this time, and is unable to pay it due to poverty, and therefore asks for a reasonable amount of money, the sacraments will be held before him, and he will be asked how he should be taken before his secular judge according to the circumstances of the case, and how he should be fairly discussed there.

How the Sendt are used unformally.

Item. That the sender, who according to the statutes of the law is to be mounted once every several years, is now to be mounted and yoked every year in many places, so that the poor people can be protected and cared for. The sentence is also not kept as it is set up in church law, but the fines and penalties are all based on the cash money and the money paid.

Giiib Ettliche Beschwörung teutscher Nation von dem Stul zu Rom.

It is evident that the providence and disposition of the German nation's ecclesiastical 1) gifts and benefits, in accordance with the law of the land, are due to a bishop and ordinaries in his bishopric, and to the other bishops out of a different right. In the same way, the laymen in the cases, left to them in right, may also have jus patronatus, according to the following and in the other order, such provision and disposition, either out of neglect and negligence of the ordinaries, or out of order and by the deuolution,

1) "spiritual" put by us instead of: "spiritual".

2) those belonging to the archbishops and the bishopric, so that in accordance with the law the ordinaries shall grant the same benefits, and those who have the patronage shall present those who have agreed to do so. But bayden taylen, as mentioned, from gepürend right to prevent, of the Roman Curtisanen, Amptleutten vnd den Bäpsten daselbs vil jar Heer groß vil vnbillichs zugetragen ist.

First of all, in ancient times, the bishops, for the sake of their skill and merit, have sought out the ordinaries in the German nation to give them gifts of God for the sake of their skill and merit, From this the custom and the practice has been established that many persons have been provided with gifts and offerings from ordinaries on account of such requests, and from this it has followed that a great deal of autumnal baggage and offerings have been given to each ordinarius, to provide each ordinarius with one person in such a way that the ordinarius assumed that the subsequent bishops would not be satisfied with such a person, as mentioned, but for and on account of other persons, The law at Rome was also affected by this, and the matters were such that the reservations arose in a strange and manifold way, and at last the ordinaries' power and authority were completely destroyed and extinguished.

The first reservation had its origin in the city, when a person with a foundation died in Rome, his abandoned foundations fell to the bishop, according to the aforementioned petition, the following bequest and petition, with the same reservation, The ordinaries have been deprived of their rights, so that the bishops have called themselves lords of the benefices and benefices, as if they had perfect power and authority to act and dispose of them, among whom Bonifacius the viii. The law has been established, by which a great delay and damage is inflicted on the German nation, although this is against divine right, as well as the wills and desires that have established the benefices in German lands, as that the twelfth chapter of Prebendis in the fourth book of the Decretals, one of the most important of all. The second chapter of Prebendis, in the fourth book of the decree, contains a loud tyranny, which then has justified the reservation mentioned above.

Subsequently, another reservation has arisen, from the dignity vnd the same werds wegen, als

2) That is, of the Council.

The higher authority and dignity after the bishops in the thumbs, and the highest in collegiate churches, also in the conventual churches, surpassing the bishops in the thumbs, and the bishops in the conventual churches. The bishops have also reserved to them all ducats, and thus cut off the rights of amicability and discretion, so that the chapter and the convent have been deprived of their free time, so that they may no longer be able to exercise discretion.

The third reseration is when the prince reserters his prebend on account of a person, that is, on account of his office, his and the cardinal's servants, priests, and others, on which the rule of the Canntzeley is based, and for this reason the ordinaries' authority and power are drawn in, restricted, and almost completely suppressed. For this and other reasons, he has and will be taken to Rome for a court of law.

After such superfluous inventions, Pope Leo has made another addition, as above, concerning the place, the dignity, and the persons of whom the power and authority of the ordinaries is exhausted. So he also takes from them those on account of the time, and as he reserves to him the benefices, which become vacant within six months, according to law. Thus he will also set up future reseruations on account of the days or perhaps the hours, since with this all proper German authority will be suspended, and then, with great German nation aggravation, such reseruations will be tolerated.

Subsequently, such complaints have been conceived by the said Pope Boniface the viii. still more list, which is called [Affectio, and used in three ways. Firstly, on the grounds of the right to have an owner of a foundation touched, then, if the foundation in question is legally inherited by the death of the owner, it is further granted by the bishop to the ordinarius as a post-tribute.

On the other hand, on account of the Commenda, which is then also a gross invention, within the power of a dignity or trust, and to a title, either on account of the person, or on account of the fact that one would not otherwise be eligible, or on account of the fact that one who is to be in charge of another trust may not be appointed and conferred, may not be laid down, which is to have a commendation, be granted and conferred, just as if the retaining power were to be with him, and if it is conquered as a beneficium, and is again released, the commendation is neither extinguished nor expired, but is still to be conferred in the power of commendation by the bishop. Thus, the ordinarius may no longer come to his fiefdom. Therefore, such commenda shall be full of scandal.

Thirdly, fraud has been committed, if a person, in virtue of a gratuity, has an expectation 1) of a benefice, and accepts it, but has no supervision or commission over it. Thus the same prebend, as affected by the bishop, is forbidden to the ordinary. If one now 2) wants to advise and help the German nation, the shameful reseruptions, commenda, and affectiones must be stopped in all ways.

Furthermore, it should be noted that after the invention of the said reseruations, the practitioners in Rome have divided them into two according to 3) fictitious names. One is called the common one, the other the special reseruation, by the rule of the Roman Cantezey. Or if another has a prebend, and has married himself, or enters the order of the mint, or makes profession, or obtains a further reversion, or in other such cases, the same prebend shall be reserved to the bishop and reverted. Such reseruatio also allain, to withdraw the ordinaries their borne fiefdom with it, in will of the bishop hanget.

In addition to the above-mentioned cases, another trick is sought for the ordinaries and feudal lords of the benefices, so that the benefices and beneficia are retained and restored for every Roman person, and especially for the Waldens. Whether or not the annual use of the several thousand gülden is worthwhile, that is, if some servants and familiars of the Pope or the Cardinal live, their benefices and benefits, if they have passed away, are reserved to the Pope for the sabbatical of the feudal lords and ordinaries, and are also called "affectata".

The German nation has many rights that have arisen at the end of Rome, which have been settled in the place of payment with money, or else pension has been struck on it, and other additions to it, which they call R6Zr688U8, Accessus, vnnd Ingressus, be reserved Hib. From which has followed that the

The Pope has reserved and restored to those whom he owed a considerable sum of money in the German nation many benefices, benefices and dignities, up to a considerable sum of money. Therefore, the cardinals, chamberlains, treasuries, and other forests, the Germans on the Rhine, the Danube, the Wiser, the Elbe, and everything else that lies between and outside, are exhausted in money, all with irretrievable nightmares, damage, and ruin. And so

1) "Expentantien" put by us instead of: "Expectanten".

2) "nu" put by us instead of: "nit".

3) "after" put by us instead of: "yet".

Also that, if some skilful and suitable German benefices are obtained in Rome in the month of the bishop, the other owners will be justified at a low cost for a long time, and presumably they will certainly obtain and have them. So there is again a poem or gleyche restoration by a cardinal, a chamberlain, or another taken and obtained from the pope, by which the called German again a new justification to take forced, and since it is known that he has had to buy him favor with noticeable explanations, to obtain a papal declaration and explanation, so that such a pledge is understood among the mentioned restitution. This declaration was subsequently transferred by a papal decree to a different maynation, so that money was taken from different places, and the parties were thus made to suffer, that they were often branched off from such justifications, and put into the greatest poverty. To give such evil the cause to resist the king.

There is also another reseration, which is called mentalem, since the bishop has a foundation and benefit in his office (as is said), and the same reseration is the example. A pledge has been left, so that one named Peter, through the pope's hands, will be punished and procured, which then will not be paid, but Peter assumes to have spent his money, but there is a fraud in it, then with an appointed date, seal and seal, as if the bishop had reserved and reserved such venetianship and pledge in his mind, and after that (as can be assumed), but for money, one H ii to another, so that he first comes by his money and pledge.

There is also another way to bring the ordinaries and feudal lords of the benefices and benefices by their justice, conceived as by the union, and in such a way Peter, Thumbherr zu Wormbs, begeret ayner Dignitet or parish churches, makes the one to Rome, if it by surrender or death of the old owner becomes vacant, Vnion, due to the evil invention of the ordinaries or lords of the fief, may not come to his fief, then a contract, which they call Compositionem, with the bishop's dotaria described here, and in the form, is the foundation of annual money 1) xxiiii. Ducaten, then one pays the votario from such Vnion because of it 2) xxiiii Ducaten. If it is above that, then half the amount shall be paid.

1) "güld" - validity, levy, tax, pension.

2) "dar" put by us instead of: "der".

There is still another way, the way of the coadjutorship, which is taken with or without the consent of the one, 3) who owns the benefice or benefit, allain that one represents oneself with the votario. This way may well be opposed, if the order would be adopted that no one without the consent of the Ordinary shall be admitted to aynicherlay Coadjutorship, and that the Ordinary shall have the power to appoint and take 4) the Coadjutor.

To deprive the ordinaries and feudal lords of the benefices of their fiefs has been invented under this Pope Leo, If one possesses benefices, beneficia, or dignitaries, he shall give them up and resign them with words to one of his good friends, and yet in his history nothing shall be resigned, If he then takes in the same benefice or dignity, title, standing in the choir and capitulum, likewise all fruit in place of a pension reservation, and if he dies, the same his friend in force of such resignation accepts the same benefice or dignity, so that the Ordinary may no longer come to plundered fiefdom.

Now it is to be said of recourse, ingress, and exactions, so called by the practitioners at Rome, that the law of Kay. Law of service parkhaiten vnd Seruituten of the Leyplichen vnd verlayblichen things say, as söllichs in kaynem Ratt so well be used, as in Pfründen, gotsgaben, gistlichen things, however with a big vnbillichen interpretation of the right, therefore so is at Rome sought vnd to let, But at the end of the ordinaries and feudatories, that one with the will of the one who owns the benefice is allowed and permitted access, which they designate as above, to the same owner's benefices after his departure, but that one should get along with the bishop's dotaries about it.

Item. A person who has a sinecure, ceded, and relinquished a sinecure, out of such a relinquishment and cession to the ordinarius, shall not only receive a pension for it, but shall also, if it is relinquished, reserve the right of recourse, recourse, and recourse, all of which shall then be of recent invention, and out of invented names shall bear the merchantship of the sinecure upon him.

From the fact that it is infertile and unjustly established by law that the benefices are to be conferred on change, then by virtue of the said amendment, the bishop has forfeited the benefices for and for, and the ordinaries are to be conferred.

3) Instead of: "that the" we have put "deß, der".

4) "nemen" probably ----- nämen, that is, appoint.

and. The feudal lords may no longer come to the feudal estate.

Item. Pensions are paid on the foundations, so that the next owners must also pay, even if the first owner gives his bad will.

From the use and handling of the pension and its redemption, it is found that all the properties, and which are found houses and meren, are not less daily the benefices with it, than with half or third part of the income of the fruit, so that in God's gifts, benefices and dignitaries at Rome the largest merchant 1) is used.

So also under this bishop has arisen such a treaty for benefices and beneficiaries at Rome, that any German there may obtain any benefice, as far as he changes before the cunning of the superior date, 2) and wants to prevent such a reservation, he then asks for such a foundation before and on one's own name, and to settle with him for half the day of the fruit of the same foundation, which is paid annually from the pension, or which is paid with cash and not a little money.

Then it has been found, that so respectable persons of the German nation have applied for benefices, which have been obtained and impetrated, so have others and on behalf of the people with practice of the appointed date, designation and derogation of a rule, which is there against, and reports, that Jus patronatus has statute, it being then fact that much time may pass, in which gleychmäßiger weiß may be had from the day of the died off gepürend Kundschaftt, the same Pfründen vnd beneficien zu wegen pracht, dardurch die erste jren angehörten Fleiß, mye, kost vnd labor verlieren.

It has also been proven that many merchants, other foreigners, and also local Germans of lesser origin and art, live in Rome in great lust, and use the costs for it all from German lands, surpassing great princes and lords in their income, thus wasting the Holy Roman Empire. This and such cases are always countered with necessary advice, and in such a way that all reservations, affection, coadjutorship, influence, employment, and pensions, through the Waldens or other friends, and so not be sent to the Teutons, and be approved on the basis of the law.

The same shall not be allowed again in the German nation to benefices, benefices, dignitaries, or to the above-mentioned qualifications, or else the pension of the same, if they had been personal before, shall be put in perpetual tribute.

If the lord of the fief and the patron at Hnib of this gift of God shall offer and present one to the Ordinary, and the Ordinary shall lease and invest another thereupon, there shall be a subsequent surrender and resignation at Rome, with the consent of the patrons and the Ordinary, so that they may then bayd, the Ordinary and the patron, If he is indeed a priest, he will be deprived of his rights, so that he will never again be able to do so. Therefore, no surrender or resignation of any gifts to God should be permitted without the consent of the ordinaries and patrons, because this would deprive the Church of much income. So that everything may also take place in the donations, which may be surrendered and ceded according to the ability of the law.

From the nomination designations, and subrogation is to note:

Since the ordinaries' right to swear and to truck by the bishops has come to an end, the same ordinaries may have wanted to provide themselves with more freedoms, statutes, and rights out of necessity, If the bishops have received papal confirmation and confirmation of this, they have spent considerable money in Rome, and if they have letters about this, they believe that they can be sure that these will not be revoked or abrogated. If, however, the bishops have suspended and abrogated the old rights, which were also good, the same freedoms, statutes and powers, whether or not they have been sworn to, will be suspended and abrogated by derogation, as has then openly appeared before and now, not only in minor, but also in major benefits and dignities.

How then the bishops, by designation and derogation, do not abrogate all papal and imperial freedoms, praiseworthy and good, sworn statutes and statutes, but they also take away the foundations and beneficia fiefdoms and jus patronatus of the lays, and of the princes, and for this derogation they have often sought, used, and thus used all sorts of swift ways.

First. How well the Layen founded me benefices, and in the foundation and endowment

3) "abrogiret" put by us instead of: "obrogiret".

1) "Kaufmannschaft" set by us instead of: "Kaufmannschatz".
2) That is: reservations, reservationss mental.

The fiefdom and patronage are reserved for them and their heirs, but if the owners of the same fiefdoms at the bishop's court die and their fiefdoms become vacant, the bishops have taken their fiefdom and jus presentandi from the fiefdoms by derogation.

Secondly. However, on the grounds of the same benefices, the fiefdom and jus patronatus are to be renounced and derogated, since the same jus patronatus belongs together to the church and to the laymen.

Thirdly. They deny and derogate from such rights, if such a benefice is vacated, that one has not been named for it, or does not have the right to it, or is vacated by the statute of execution, or is otherwise turned over and devolved, 1) the feudal lord and patron is appointed and accepted, that he should be released from such and have a vacancy, which appointment should be made out of discretion, if he would be appointed such of his right 2).

Fourthly, the way has been found that the same benefices are taken away and derogated from in the second third, and therefore war and quarrels are aroused, and the patrons are deprived of their fiefdom.

Fifthly, the fiefdom and jus patronatus shall be taken away and derogated from, if they derive their justification from the grant or from the receipt of the prescription, provided that they have the rent and prescription for themselves.

The sixth, which is difficult to report, is that the fiefs have endowed benefices and beneficia, and out of simplicity they have decreed that, within the power of their fiefs, the jus patronatus should be endowed and presented to one of them by a prior or prioress, or by another dignified person, that the other month the bishop wants to have, and the one who has, so whether the benefice or the beneficium is vacated, the one who should have the jus presentandi in virtue of his endowment, is deprived of it, and against it neither will to perform, taken order, good won, and even so sworn, has no right.

From the Papal Graces, which sy call Grantias Expectatiuas.

It is to be noted that the ordinaries are to take the care to know, and also to indicate, who and which of such expectants 3) acquired and executed, so that good information is available

1) "eemalen" --- before.

2) Instead of "deployed," it should probably read "appalled."

3) "Expectantien" put by us instead of: "Expectanten".

The Council of the Italian Nation shall have the power to establish whether they were virtuous and skillful for the benefices and benefits for which they had such grace, then it shall be found out of such that the Walhen, Reuerendarii, Auditores, Camerdiener, Schreiber, officials, and other servants of the Babst of the Italian nation most of all stumble after benefices of the German nation, and trade with them, not that they are for or against these same benefices, but that they exhaust the money of the German nation in this case and make themselves revenged.

Therefore, many damaging preachings of such episcopal graces were taken, then, on the hope of the owners of the same benefices dying off, many such graces were gathered together. Therefore, much justification has arisen in Rome, and therefore many have been put into poverty; whoever now learns of such a matter must confess that such preaching should be stopped at once.

And in order to establish such rights, which arise from and out of such graces and graces, that is, if one in Rome, the Pope or a Cardinal N. is a describer, the other with means, the third on middle! The fourth noble, the fifth a priest, the sixth a doctor, the seventh not learned, he has his gratitude and first Jia processes, the one to a peer, which they call 4) ad Instar, the created, the vngeschöpfft, has Freyhait vnd Prorogation, the other came Prorogation, but the one with a right, so they call Perinde valere. The other, by means of a declaration, with such things, spends and wastes a lot of money, injures and damages the common property, and also exhausts all assets.

And because the ordinaries may well recognize suitable persons of their bishoprics, but in the same case a proper exception shall be sought, he shall have to consider and understand the necessity that an ordinarius shall have power and authority, for just cause, to dispense from two, It is not proper to dispense with two, which would not otherwise be dispensed with another, then to dispense with Rome, and to dispense with the right on grounds, except that it is not proper to conquer and have by the way of the union many benefices, which do not otherwise suffer to be held by one another.

Some of those who lived in Rome claimed that they personally owned the benefices they obtained, and not less, by the way of the union, more than three benefices, which they did not suffer to have in the past, were brought to their account, and therefore to many bishoprics, lords of the throne, and the church.

4) "call" put by us instead of: "nemen".

have other benefices, vicarages, and pensions. Hereupon, the German nation's emergency requires that the ordinaries, persons who have been found fit to rightly hold the benefices, to equalize the benefices and the gifts of God. Also, for this purpose, persons must be appointed, and others must have power and authority to serve as examples, so that the Holy Almsmen [not] is thus uselessly wasted.

The dispensation of death-row inmates should not be permitted in any way, unless the reason why they were given is first explained to the Ordinary.

The dispensation on account of those who have been urged not to take up nor to be promoted, then allain on account of the li blearning, must not be left, it then forbids.

The bishops are to learn this with their own persons, as is the case, and then to dispense with the same benefices as the bishops.

From the Vrlauben and Licentien.

No one should be given permission to transfer, resign, or exchange the benefices, although this is permitted daily, but it should be done with the consent of the Ordinary and Patrons, and not at Rome.

The permission should also be aborted, in which one is allowed to become a doctor in the form of a papal decree. Thus, if a student is deemed to be a doctor, he shall be interrogated and admitted to a high school and university by appointed doctors after learning about the place for several years, and therefore, if doctors are admitted by right or by choice, they shall all be admitted, and not those first mentioned, which are called bullatos.

One also gives permission to be ordained to the priesthood by any bishop. From this, it follows that unskilled and unskilled people come to benefices, which nevertheless must be allowed by the ordinaries before examination, and if they are sent, they must be allowed to do so.

Of the reserved cases, which they call casus reservatos, when the bishop reserves the right to the divine gifts. Thus, he also protects him from the princely, which is also embarrassing for the ordinaries.

Dispensation in the ii. vnd iii. degree SypJiia vnnd Magschaft, so far one represents oneself with the Datario to Rome, desgleychen Dispensation gaystlicher geuatterschaft, are admitted vn large gelt, so that two brothers successively one woman, and then two sisters successively one man, eelich beschlafen, öttlich

Because such a dispensation may be harmful, it is necessary that the ordinaries should have the power to make such a dispensation according to the law, and not to allow papal authorities or others in Rome to do so.

And since the Archbishops have confirmed and confirmed their bishops, Suffraganii, Aept, and Abbatissin in their bishoprics, and the Archbishops have confirmed and confirmed the Primates in Germania, it is still good that justice remains with the German nation, so that much money, which is sent daily to Rome, would be saved.

Of the justifications, the Basel Council has decreed and stipulated that no royal, secular, or other gifts of God are to be judged in Rome in the first instance. The last Lateran Council has also decreed that all gifts, until they are named, are to be judged in Rome. But this notwithstanding and disregarding, the ordinaries and parties shall be severely punished, and all benefices shall be justified in the first instance at Rome, and thus much grievance and loss shall be caused. To settle my appeal with money, in which much is accrued, and for many reasons is almost unacceptable.

It shall also be appealed to Rome from each city before the final day, and the same appeal shall be accepted by the city, which shall also be opposed*. Princes, counts, lords of the nobility, doctors and others, through the Auditores Camere, with their commissions, that each one is managed to appear in person, and no procurator will be admitted, therefore many things are due to the treasury at Rome, by which the Germans will be required to go to Rome and will be summoned with great expense, which, however, can no longer be afforded.

Therefore, it would be good that the first instance be left to the Ordinary, the second to the Archbishop, and the third to the Primates, so that the visitation would be stopped and the money would be kept in the German nation.

540. of an unnamed nine articles, in Latin, for the benefit of the German nation, on account of the complaints against the Roman Court, drafted.

From Kapp's "Nachlese," Part II. p. 435.

Translated into German.

1. for the special benefit of all Christendom and the churches of the German nation, and for the taxation of ailments, and for the provision of the churches with

It is beneficial for such people, who govern and build them at the same time, that the following is ordered and decreed by the most invincible and most noble Roman king, with the consent of the empire and the estates, and for its benefit and preservation.

2. first of all. First of all, that no foreigner who cannot perfectly preach, read or understand the German language to the people may attain a right or possession to the offices, benefices and dignities of the German nation, but be considered unfit for it, because even such benefits have not been established nor endowed in Germany for such persons. And that also no German, under pretext, as if a right of such had been ceded to him, can attain to such a right and possession of any dignity, office or benefices, which have only been thought of. And that, therefore, an end be put to the dalliance that is made with the French and foreigners about ecclesiastical benefices, and the simonean and other unlawful dealings be controlled, and that the benefices be granted only according to the canonical decree, without the least abortion, whereas none of the persons concerned can or should be allowed to possess them. And that the fruits of their income shall be confiscated by the Ordinary from those who let them have it, and shall be given to the Ordinary himself, until the benefit thus taken shall be received freely and unencumbered by him to whom the Ordinary has given it, and on the other hand he who has come to it in the manner aforesaid shall again be deposed and expelled from it by the very above-mentioned people who let him have it. However, the Ordinary shall also have the power to expel such a holder from his place and to testify, and to confer such Beneficium, which the expelled person possessed in this manner, to another.

3. secondly. Since today, because of the taxes (pensiones) and the many kinds of recourse of the Benefices of the German nation, Germany itself, which was formerly free, is now, as it were, more interest-bearing and valuable to the Welsh than it ever was in the time of the Romans: Therefore, so that Germany is not so exhausted, nor the Welsh tickle themselves that they can draw the money out of the Germans' pockets by their wit, it shall be commanded by the king (emperor) that henceforth the inhabitants of the German nation shall continue to pay such taxes to the Welsh and others who live outside Germany.

shall not pay, nor be required to do so. And that those who would pay such tax to the Welsh and others residing outside the nation shall be deprived of the possession of the benefices from which the tax is ordered or directed, and the fruits of such benefices shall be taken and withdrawn from them, until the benefices on which such taxes are due, have been granted to other competent persons who do not wish to pay such taxes by the Ordinary, who shall also grant them freely and without charge (or without such a burden), if the aforesaid of the Welsh interest people do not otherwise swear that they no longer wish to pay such interest or tax.

Thirdly. And since through unions, commissions, recourses, secret reservations in the heart or mind, in general or in particular, the ordinary power and authority is weakened, and the will of the founders is evidently overturned, also one generally desires other deaths, and promotes people whom one does not know well: Therefore, and because of other just causes that require such things for the benefit and tranquility of the German nation, it shall be decreed and commanded that henceforth no such commendations of the benefices and dignities, temporal or perpetual unions, cessions or recourses, nor any reservations, except those described as just, shall be permitted in the mind or heart, in general or in particular, but shall be rejected by all. And that under such pretext no benefice of the church, of whatever kind it may be, shall henceforth be obtained, or anyone allowed to possess it, or those who allow them to do so shall also be punished in the above-mentioned manner by confiscation of the income of their benefices; and that even the possessor, without prejudice to this, may still be deposed by the Ordinary, and the benefice which he thus receives may be given to another capable person quite freely and unencumbered.

Fourthly. That also henceforth known and capable people be appointed to the churches; and that the Ordinaries are not deprived of their ordinary power by any reservation, exception, union, incorporation, encroachment or recourse, unauthorized coadjutorial, or other merely sensible ways and means, and that, on the other hand, the annals are collected by the same Ordinaries for the use for which they are imposed, and that the Holy Roman Empire is accounted for by the same Ordinaries: It should be decreed that henceforth the same ordinaries, whatever the contrary usage or established bad habit may bring, shall collect the annals every month of January, March, May, July, August, and December,

1) According to the previous writing (Col. 1773), these are encumbrances, servitudes, of the benefices.

September, and November, all benefices, including the highest and higher dignities, and all canonships and prebends of the cathedral and collegiate churches in their cities and districts, shall be freely granted to competent clergymen of their cities and districts, and none other than he to whom they conferred such benefices, under any pretext of any pardon, even of the kind mentioned above, shall be allowed to possess the same, if they have granted such benefices, after they have been discharged, within six months from the time of their discharge; and that those whom they have otherwise left in possession of said benefits shall be deprived of the fruits of their benefits by the Ordinary, and such shall be applied to other uses granted, until the one to whom the Ordinary has granted it shall freely obtain such benefit taken, and on the other hand the one who has taken it wrongfully in the manner aforesaid shall be expelled and deposed from the same by the aforesaid people who have left him in possession.

Fifth. And that also the annoyances and damages, which arise from the possession of many not rhyming together 1) (Beneficien), which were attained by special liberty or dispensation, are controlled: Henceforth no one shall be able to obtain such multiple incongruous (Beneficia) by special grant of grace or dispensation, except for a good and efficient cause expressed in the letter of grace, examined by the Ordinaries, and certified and lawfully found by the same Ordinaries of each place where the Benefices are situated. Otherwise, the ordinaries themselves shall freely confer such benefices, which have been received by dispensation, on competent people.

Sixthly. Likewise, that also in the benefices over which the laity, also princes and nobles, have the jus patronatus, although such jus patronatus of the laity come to the clergy, according to the presumed will of the founders and benefactors, and according to the custom, and according to the custom that has been observed in such benefices from the time of their foundation and existence, and that no one can or should grant them otherwise, and that such right of patronage of the laity shall not be interfered with or abrogated, in part or in whole, due to any limitation or custom or due to death at the [Roman] court: and that all other grants and encroachments contrary thereto, as unjust and inequitable things, be resisted.

and they were not obeyed at all.

Seventh. Likewise, that because of the inordinate plagues and burdens of the parties, which have often been seen up to now, and the great expense of the litigants, no one may henceforth depart from the court of the Ordinary to any other, nor, by overruling the former, or before a final judgment (unless one finds himself aggrieved by another and appeals), may appeal from a definitive and irreparable judgment (a diffinitiva irreparabili). And that no one shall henceforth be brought before any ecclesiastical benefit or other secular matter other than before the ordinary judges; and that he who acts contrary thereto shall be condemned in fifty marks of silver, half to the credit of the treasury of the Ordinary, and half to the credit of the opposite party; that, nevertheless, he who acts contrary to this shall become legally and factually due, and that the appeal made otherwise than as aforesaid shall be held null and void and invalid, and that, consequently, the execution of the pronouncement or judgment made shall be continued, notwithstanding the appeal.

9th Eighth. Likewise, that no letter, writ, bull, or command, other than that issued and decreed in a common concilio (held in a place belonging to the nation, to which the nation is also summoned), shall be obeyed against the above-mentioned things, nor shall any conclusion, order, demand, reminder (or warning), procedure, sentence, or ban (which in some way has been pronounced, proclaimed, and pronounced in the Roman court by anyone, or in some way) bind or burden anyone in the least, so that he may be avoided by others or abhor others, or still to be pronounced and pronounced) should bind or burden anyone in the least, that he should be avoided by others or that he should shun and detest others, but that he who desires something else, as a disturber of the common peace and who thus annoys the church manifestly, should also be contradicted to his face, and on account of all the above-mentioned matters in the common concilio (to which the nation may refer for the above-mentioned handling, defense and assertion) should offer to stand and answer the law; Since, however, all and every one of the nation shall hold on the above-mentioned pieces, notwithstanding anything that may run contrary thereto or be brought forward against it.

Ninth. Nor need anyone be so brooding and so superstitious in conscience as to think that objectionable things, which the common law could not be ordered (in this case for the common good, and since the pope is so wicked and so indebted) by the temporal prince against the so depraved and base customs of the Roman court, by which the general state of the church is evidently vexed.

1) incomxÄtitiHium.

net. For such orders and statutes are justified by so many reasons and rights that there is not the slightest doubt that all this can be ordered and well decreed with the help and grace of God.

Section Four of Chapter Seven.

From the imperial citation to Luther to come to Worms in person under free, secure, imperial as well as electoral and princely escort, despite the fact that the papists had used every trick in the book to prevent Luther's inconvenient personal appearance before the emperor, whereupon Luther confidently began his journey.

What guile the papists used with Chursachfen, that the Elector should demand Luther only for himself privately for doublet, but Frederick the Wise was too clever for them.

541: A note that the imperial ministers sent to the Saxon ministers, demanding that Frederick, Elector of Saxony, summon Luther to Worms for himself, under imperial escort.

From Cyprian's "Useful Documents," vol. II, p. 211.

After the Keyserliche Majestät also Churfürsten und Stende have decided to let Luther come here and the Kay. May. Ine is to provide him with secure faith now and then, and for the sake of his actions and common talk he does not want to be forced to give up Kay. May. Ine is required by your May. letter here, so Kay. May. kindly request that my most gracious lord, Duke Frederick of Saxony, write to Luther that Kay. May. beger und bevelh sei, dass er auff das glait, so Jme die Kay. May. hereby sends to him, rises up and comes here 2c., that also his princely grace gives to the same Luther through his F. G. Land also one glait, and assigns to him Jmands, who with sambt der Kay. May. May. ambassadors with Luther here.

542 The draft of the electoral answer made by the electoral Saxon councillors, in which this wise gentleman rejects the above request with concise motives, is, by the way, requested, if Imperial Majesty, Electors, Princes and Estates themselves wanted to demand Luther with a given safe conduct to Worms, he, the Elector, and his brother, would also gladly lead him.

From Cyprian's "Useful Documents," Vol. I, p. 500.

On the slips of paper concerning Ro. Kl. Mt, our alln. Herr our gn. Lord the Elector of Saxony, concerning doctor Luther's requirement, is our subordinate concern, but has fallen upon our Lord's grace that his elector's grace should be followed by the opinion of our Lord. Lord's gracious pleasure, that his Electoral Grace should give the following opinion on the matter.

After I 1) have received a letter, which contains, because the Kay. My. also Churfürsten, surften und Stende have decided to let Luther come here, und das Kaysl. Ma. Ine should be provided with safe conduct here and there, and for the sake of his action and common cry it would not be proper that Kay. M. Ine by his May. letter. Thus Kay. May's noble request that I write to Luther that Kay. May be willing and able to respond to the request that Kay. May, and that I will also give the same Luther an escort through my country and order him to come here with all his belongings.

1) "me" put by us instead of: "we".

of the Kayserl. May. [1) to go here with Luther. As I was completely willing to show Kay. May. in the submissive obedience, but because your May. have decided to require the said Luther on your May., also princes, rulers and sovereigns in your May. name, and I have not taken upon myself to represent or answer for Luther's matters, but have left them to his own responsibility and command, as I have then written such things of myself at times, and although I have also asked May. May. not to do anything against Luther or to allow him to be heard beforehand, such a thing has nevertheless come about at Luther's request, and that I would like to prevent the truth, and whether Luther is mistaken in his writing, from coming to light. Should now D. Luther is required by me alone, I would like to consider many things, such as May. May, it would be difficult for me, where Luther would be entitled to something burdensome and disadvantageous on account of this, from which I might, as a matter of concern, arise an accusation that May. May will not grant me my hopes. For this reason, I ask you to refrain from such a request, and not to complain about it in my application. May. or princes, sovereigns and sovereigns shall require this Luther, then I will at the end, where my brother and I have joined. I will gladly let him go, so that he may get through to the place, if God wills it, without being judged,

B. Von Luthers Citation und freiern kaiserlichem churfürstlichen! und fürstlichem Geleit.

543 Emperor Carl V's citation to Martin Luther to appear at the Diet of Worms. Date Worms, the March 6, 1521.

There are said to be two originals of this writing, one in the Leipzig City Library, the other in the Wallenrodt Library in Königsberg, which came there after the death of Georg von Kunheim, Luther's son-in-law. The first print has the title: "Cythacio vnd geleyth Doctoris Martini 'Luthers ghen Wurms, vff den Reichstag vor König Caroll, vnd den stenden des Reichs: etlicher Büchlein die Ehr gemacht zu veranthworthen." In the collective editions: in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 106; in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 4331; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 652. These three editions contain only our writing, although the caption reads: "Kaiserlicher Majestät Citation und Geleitsbries "rc. Furthermore in the Leipziger,

1) Added by us.

Vol. XVII, p. 569 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 101. Also in Junker's "Ehren-Gedächtniß Luthers," p.50; in Müller's "Staats-Cabinet," Vol.VIII,p. 288; in Naumann's entalokus librorum mnmisriptom sts, p. 265; in "Erläutertes Preußen," vol. IV, p. 144; and in Wegner's äissrrntio de silvo sonäustu D. Nnrtno l'Autksro lVorumtinna sontl ad Imperators Oarolo V. Impstrato st srrvato. llsKiomonts 1698. the German original is translated into Latin and found in the Wittenberg (1551), tom. II, toi. 163d; in the Jena (1566), tom. II, toi. 4111) and in Goldast, sonst, impsrialss, tom. II, p. 142; in a different translation in Balan, monumsnta, p. 120. We give the text according to the Erlangen correspondence, which follows the Leipzig original.

Karl, von GOttes Gnaden erwählter römischer Kaiser, zu allen Zeiten Mehrer des Reichs 2c.

Honorable, dear, devout one! After we and the holy kingdom's estates, now assembled here, have undertaken and determined to receive information from you on account of the teachings and books that have gone out from you for some time, we have come to you and from then on again to your safe custody, ours and the kingdom's free, We have given you security and escort, which we send to you herewith, with the request that you will rise up favorably, so that in the twenty-first days, destined for such escort, you will certainly be here with us, and will not stay away, nor worry about any violence or injustice. For we want to handle you firmly in the above-mentioned escort, and finally rely on your future. And you do so our earnest opinion. Given in our and the kingdom's city of Worms, on the sixth day of the month of March. Anno 2c. XV^c and in the twenty-first year of our empire.

Carolus (L. S.)

Ad Mandatum domini Imperatoris
ppm.
Albertus Card. Mog.
Archicancellarius sspt. Nicias
Ziegl.

To the honorable, our dear, devout, Doctor Martin Luther, Augustinian Order. 2)

544. imperial letter of safe conduct for D. Martin Luther of March 6, 1521, and insinuated by the herald Luthern at Wittenberg, March 26, 1521.

The original of this letter is in the Wallenrodt Library in Königsberg. Printed in Wegners äissrr-ckatio äo salvo eonänotu, 1698; in Müller's "Staats- Cabinet," vol. VIII, p. 286; in "Erläutertes Preußen," p. 144; in Fabricius, Oontikol. I'utiioran., 1728, p. 79; in Lingke, "Luthers Reiseges." p. 80; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVII, p. 570 (as it says on the title: from the manuscript located in the Pauliner Bibliothek) and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 103. A Latin translation of this is also available in Oorctos, tust, reck. II. VoeuW, p. 32 and in Balans niourinaoiita, x>. 120, Ho. 46, from the Vota IVormao., col. 108, of the papal secret archives. We give the text according to the Erlangen correspondence.

2) About this honorable address Aleander was annoyed and Luther wondered about it. Cf. St. Louis Edition, Vol. XXII, 1922, No. 999.

We Charles the Fifth, by the Grace of God chosen Roman Emperor, at all times Merer of the Empire, in Germania, Hispania, both Sicily, Jherusalem, Famine, Dalmatia, Croatia 2c. Kunig. Archduke of Austria, and Duke of Burgundy, of Habsburg, of Flanders and of the Tyrol 2c., confess: when we required Martin Luther, of the Augustinian Order, for movable causes, we gave and promised him our and the Holy Empire's free security and escort against men, and we do so by imperial power knowingly in virtue of this letter. So that in one and twenty days, the next after the delivery of this letter, he shall come here to Wormbs, and there await our and the empire's action, and after that he shall and may move to his safe custody from there to Aries, unoffended and unhindered by us and all men. And thereupon we command all princes, ecclesiastics and seculars, prelates, counts, freemen, lords, knights, servants, captains, lieutenants, bailiffs, stewards, administrators, ambassadors, mayors, judges, councillors, citizens, municipalities, and otherwise all other of our and the realm's subjects and faithful, in whatever sovereignty, state or nature they may be, earnestly by this letter and will, that they provide such our and the kingdom's security and guidance to the mentioned Martin Luther steadily and firmly, also to accompany and guide him in his going and returning, and not to offend him against it nor to offend him, nor to allow anyone else to do so in any way, as dear to each one be our and the kingdom's severe disgrace and punishment to avoid. This is what we sincerely mean by this letter. Given in our and the kingdom's city of Wormbs on the sixth 1) day of March, after the birth of Christ XV C.

1) In the original "sexten", which will be the cause that in Müller (by reading the x in ten) the 16th of March is given as date.

and in the twenty-first, our kingdom of the Roman in the other, and of the others of all in the sixth.

mandatum äni.
Imperatoris pprn.
Vllisrtus Oaräinulik maZuntinus
88t.
Niclas Ziegler.

545: The escort letter of Elector Frederick and Duke John of Saxony. Date Worms, March 12, 1521.

This escort letter and the following two are first printed in "Die gancz Handlung szo mit dem Hochgelerte D. Martino Luther täglich die weyl er auff dem Keyserlichen Reychstag tzu Wormbs gewest, ergangen ist, auff kurztest begriffen. Item die geleytcz brieff D. M. gegeben, hyr yhnn auch begryffen seynt", 2 sheets in quarto. Without place and time. In the editions: in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 106b; in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 434 b; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 652 and in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p. 571. Also in Lingke, "Luthers Reiseges.", p. 81. We follow the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 110 f., which reproduces the original print.

By the Grace of God, We Frederick, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Landgrave of Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen. After the most noble prince and lord, Mr. Charles, elected Roman Emperor, at all times ruler of the Empire, in Hispania, both Sicily and Hierusalem a king, Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burundi, of Brabant 2c., Count of Habsburg, of Flanders, of Tyrol 2c. Our most gracious lord, the worthy, highly respected, our dear devout Em Martin Luther, Doctor of the Augustinian Order, is required here at this present Imperial Diet, and requests us to provide the same Doctor Luther at the end, as it is due and due to the highborn prince, our dear brother, Duke Johansen of Saxony 2c. and to us, with free, safe and secure escort to here, and again to his custody 2c. Since we then acknowledge to render submissive obedience to the Roman Emperor's Majesty in this and other matters, we confess on behalf of the above-mentioned our brother and ourselves against all men, that we, at the gracious request of the above-mentioned King, provide the above-mentioned Doctor Luther and those whom he will safely have with him, for such a journey to here and again to his custody, for our brother, ourselves and all of his family.

Love and our subjects and relatives and whom we are safely powerful, have given our strong, free, safe, vhelich 1) and safe escort. And hereby give him such in and by virtue of this letter. And thereupon to all and any of our brother's and our officials, castles, escorts, mayors, burgomasters, councillors of the cities and otherwise all others of ours our earnest request, hereby commanding to protect, handle and defend the more mentioned Doctor Luther and those whom he will have with him in such escort; also to assign someone to him at his request, so that he may come through and over all the more statly and securely, without difficulty, and not to do otherwise. This is our serious opinion. In witness whereof we have hereunto set our seal, and the same is given at Worms in the Imperial Diet, on the twelfth day of the month of March, Anno Domini 1521.

546: Duke George of Saxony's escort letter for Luther, dated Worms, March 8, 1521.

About the first printing of this writing, see No. 545. After that, it is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 106; in the Jena edition (1564), vol. I, p. 434; in the Altenburg edition, vol. I, p. 653; in the Leipziger, vol. XVII, p. 570; in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 109; in Müller's "EröffnetesStaats-Cabinet", vol. VIII, p. 294; in Richter, Oeuloul. I'utüer, p. 170; and Keil, "Luthers Lebensumstände," vol. II, p. 96. We follow the Erlangen correspondence.

We George, by the Grace of God Duke of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia, and Margrave of Meissen 2c., hereby inform all and any of our officials, administrators, bailiffs, escorts, bailiffs, mayors, judges, councils, municipalities, and other of our subjects and relatives that Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, has now required Doctor Martin Luther to come here at the present Imperial Diet. Since the same Luther will take his way partly through our principality, country and territories, we recommend to you and want you to support the said Doctor Martinum everywhere undiminished.

1) Carlstadt (Jäger, "Carlstadt", p. 325) explains "vhelich" by "sicher". In the next number, instead of "fehelich" in the original, in the Wittenberg and in the Jena edition is set: "one fahr".

and let him pass through and arrive without difficulty, and also appear conducive to this, so that he may travel safely and in wedlock 2) and arrive here all the sooner. This is our opinion and favor. Given at Worms, sealed under our back-printed secret. On the eighth day of the month of March, Anno dni 1521.

547: Letter from Landgrave Philip of Hesse escorting Luther on his return journey home from Worms. Worms, April 26, 1521.

About the first printing of this writing, see No. 545. After that, it is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), Vol.IX, p.113b; in the Jena edition (1564), Vol.I, p.449b; in the Altenburg edition, Vol.I, p.727.; inder Leipziger, vol.XVII, p.590; in Müller, "Staats-Cabinet", vol. VIII, p.295 and in Lingke "Luthers Reisegeschichte", p. 103. We follow the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 127.

We Philips von GOttes Gnaden Landgrave of Hesse, Count of Katzenelnbogen, of Dietz, of Ziegenhain and of Nidda 2c., confess and manifestly declare with this letter to males: When Doctor Martinus Luther departed again from this Imperial Diet and here from Worms, that we have given him for himself and all those whom he has with him our free, strong, secure and safe escort in and through our principality, county, dominion and territories for us and all those of ours whom we are dangerously powerful and who are obligated to do and not to do for our sake. And so we give it to him at present in and by virtue of this letter in all ends and places where we have to guide, also to command and to forbid, without danger. And in witness whereof, this letter is sealed with our knowingly annexed Secrete Ingesiegel. Given at Worms, on Friday after the Sunday Jubilate [April 26], and the birth of Christ our dear Lord five hundred and one and twentieth years.

C. Of the "papal bulla coenus domini" published around this time, in which D. Luther was once again condemned as an arch-heretic, and by which the pope again, as by the

2) Wittenberg and Jena: "one fahr".

The author of the first book, Luther, wanted to deter the emperor and the princes from having anything to do with Luther as an exile.

548. Pope Leo's X. Bulla domini, against D. Martin Luther and others, given at Rome at St. Peter's, March 28, or Maundy Thursday, 1521.

This bull appears from word to word in Luther's writing immediately below, which Walch has indented here because of the bull, although Luther's writing should have been among the controversial writings.

549 Luther's sharp and vehement writing about this bull, under the title: "Bulla coenae domini, that is, the Bulla vom Abendfressen des allerheiligsten Herrn, des Pabsts, verdeutscht durch D. M. Luther, to the most holy Roman See for the new year. His mouth is full of cursing, deceit and avarice, under his tongue is toil and labor. Psalmo 10", to which is appended an explanation of the 10th Psalm under the title: "Glossa of King David on these bulls". 1522.

In the Erlangen edition, five individual editions of this manuscript are listed, four of which belong to the year 1522, one to the year 1523, under the title we have placed above it. It is found in the Wittenberg edition (1554), vol. VII, p.317b; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p.44d; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 62; in the Leipzig, vol. XVIII, p. 1; in the Erlangen, 1st ed, Bd. 24, p. 165 and in the second edition, Bd. 24, p. 168. In the Jena edition, which Walch followed, a number of Luther's glosses are not among the chapters, but in the margin. Since Walch considered these to be marginal glosses of the Jena edition, he omitted them. We have now replaced this deficiency after the second edition of the Erlangen edition. ____

Martin Luther to the Most Holy See of Rome and its entire Parliament.

My grace and greeting before, most holy chair! Do not crack and break before this new greeting, in which I put my name first, and forget the kissing of the foot. Cause you will hear. It is now a new year, which you never knew before. I also need to talk to you more now than to think about and wait for the old year's custom. I thank thee, thou most gracious, tender, well-learned chair, instead of all the common-ner Christendom, beforehand of the German nation, that thou wouldst once open the eyes of thy grace and the shrine of thy mercy, and let us see the highly renowned and deeply feared and far hidden bulla of thy Lord's supper.

For after we have suffered so many bull-bearers, cardinals, legates, commissaries, sub-commissaries, archbishops, bishops, abbots, provosts, deans, deceased lords, priores, gardians, stationers, termiuriers, monastery messengers, monastery messengers, chapel messengers, altar messengers, bell messengers, tower messengers, and who could tell all the pack of such oppressors and slayers? The Rhine would hardly be enough to drown them all; and, if it lasted longer, the geese and the kukuk would also have to become bull-bearers and treasurers of indulgences, that is, legates and commissaries of the Most Holy See in Rome, so that the rust and the moths 2) do not spoil the treasure of indulgences, and Germany would become too rich, where it would remain locked in the shrine of the Most Holy See.

(3) Through such your most faithful apostles, a great and unmistakable desire has arisen for this most holy bull of the supper. For when we saw that all kinds of sins were forgiven for the sake of a penny or a good drink, before which the good fellows, the indulgence merchants, were merry and well merry, and whether someone had committed adultery, murder, robbery, betrayed country and people, strangled father and mother, 3) defiled sisters, yes, whether he had crucified Christ himself seven times, and his mother as well; This was such an easy daily sin, so lightly forgiven, sold, given away, and how one would have it, if only the beaten silver gave a cheerful look, and their pockets gleamed in a friendly way, that everyone wondered what kind of sins these would be, which were drawn out and reserved in the most holy bulla of the evening meal, that they alone could not wash away so much cloudburst and flood of sin of the un-

1) In the original and in the Wittenberger: "befürchte"; Jenaer: "fear".

2) Original: "matten".

3) Original: würget.

4) Original: Sindfluss.

The "indulgence" that was granted. No one could think of greater sins than those against God's commandment, all of which the indulgence consumed as the sun licks up the little snow. But this was the fault of the rude Germans, who do not know much about sin. For I will excuse the Most Holy See for not having revealed them until now; the Germans' lack of understanding was spared, so that such a great light did not blind their eyes.

4) But now that the desire has taken over, and is no longer deceitful, your old coming good right comes to measure, quiets the hearts finely, and lets go out this most holy bulla of the evening goblet, in which everyone now sees 1) how not without honest cause you have reserved such great sin.

Now I want to earn my keep for you; who knows, you might even give me a cardinal's hat, or a bishopric, or a good parish. It is time that I recognize my duty and help to spread this bull and make it common before everyone. Therefore, I will not only translate it, but also add a little gloss to it; and since no one is worthy of it, I will attribute it to you alone, and thus honor you for the new year.

6) But I will not spare you my great trouble, which I had to translate and gloss in it; so that, if you want to give me something, you will regard my trouble rightly, 2) and not just give a cardinal title without interest, as has happened to some; for I may not be a cardinal by title or by letter, it must bite badly with me, and be more there than in white canvas.

(7) For I tell thee, though it be made in the midst of the Latin country, yet it is as un-Latin as if it had been made by a scullion. But I do not consider this to have happened out of ignorance, as some say that there is nothing more unlearned and grosser on earth than popes, cardinals and bishops, and that it is also a great honor if such people can write in the least; just as it is a great honor if princes and great lords can write badly.

Scribes should be able to write; lords should be able to rule; so here also: students and pupils should be learned; pope, cardinal and bishops should wait for their thing.

8 But I think that was not your cause, but that it was proper to speak such Latin on a drunken evening, at the time when the tongue walks on stilts, and reason leads with half a sail. A painter who painted a fool and gave him the shape and color of a wise man would not be a masterpiece; but he is a master who paints a fool in the most foolish way. So also, because this is not only a bulla of the evening meal, but is also famous there, was to mean, where it would have some reputation, as if it were made on a sober morning, so the art would be wrong, and should not be called Bulla coenae, but Bulla jejunii, a bulla of the sober morning.

(9) But now you have kept yourself right, and everything comes from art, according to the saying of St. Paul, 1 Thess. 5:7: "Those who are drunk are drunk in the evening"; and as the Germans sing: Nächt z' Abend war ich trunken, da redt ich nach Gedanken. So you find my effort to make German Latin in non-Latin. I think I must also become drunk, so that I do not lack the art. The other effort is not less, that I strike out the sins, which are told in it, so that it also appears, how they went out on a drunken evening, and all sins, which are against God, are preferred.

(10) For you to be so hard on this bulla, and to have it read on Green Thursday, and yet not to remember the gospel all the year round, is not acceptable to me; for it is not fitting in any way that you should do anything that is proper to a sober morning, as there is the gospel.

(11) There is also the art of evening eating, for what should a drunkard do if he could not curse, maledict, and rage and rage in the most unreasonable manner, when other people should rest and sleep? So you also, on the day when Christ has given rest and peace to all the world, it is fitting for your evening meal that you open your mouth with confidence.

1) Original: see.

2) Original: to look at.

You curse, malign, rage, and rage against all the world as if you were mad and insane; as this bulla does. Everything goes according to the art and time, which you tender chair takes forward, and sends itself from him as it should.

But if I would do too little for him, [you] would have it good; I will improve it another time; New Year's Day ran away in a hurry, and I wanted to bring this gift with me. May you be protected by my favor and grace, you blessed, friendly, holy chair, amen.

Doctor Luther Privilegium to print this bull.

Whoever prints this bull and does not use large letters for the text, so that the holy bulla may be honored enough, shall know that he is guilty of the sins contained in this bulla, and that I have the order to absolve him by grace of the Most Holy See of Rome. But if anyone takes small letters, I will send him to Rome itself to the Most Holy See; for there is still a bulla which reserves such a case over this bulla. He dares his ebb.

The bull of the Lord's supper, the Pabst.

The first chapter.

Leo Bishop,^a) a servant^b) of all servants of God, in eternal remembrance of this history.

The Roman bishops, our ancestors, were accustomed to exercise the weapons of justice on this feast, according to the duty of the apostolic office,^c) to maintain the purity of Christian faith, and to preserve the unity of the same (which consists primarily in the adherence of the members to One Head Christ and His Governor)^d) and the holy fellowship of the faithful,^e)

a) Like a wolf a shepherd.

b) In the evening, when we are drunk, but in the morning it is called 4.60 dominos (lommarnimn, a lord of all lords.

c) Apostolic office here means cursing and killing soul. Merk, Christian faith purity means the Pabst's land and letters he wants to receive in this bull.

d) Christ is not enough for this.

e) Behold, bad boys can preserve holy people.

The other chapter.

Thus we follow^a) the old and common custom, and banish and maledict, on account of the Almighty God,^c) the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, and by force of the holy apostles Peter and Paul and also ours,^c) all kinds of heretics, the Gasarians, the Pateronians, the Poor of Lyon, the Arnoldists, the Sperouists,^d) the Passagirians, the Viglephists, the Hussites, the Fratricels of Opinion, and Martin Luther,^e) recently condemned by us for the same heresy, together with all his followers, and those who show him favor, so that he cannot be punished,^f) whoever they are, and all other heretics, as they are called, and all patrons, upholders and retainers of the same.

a) One blind man to another, One fool makes ten.

b) He who speaks John 3:17: "God did not send His Son to destroy the world, but to save it."

c) And I, said the dog, whether God's power would be too weak in the evening meal.

d) And not the papists, the pious, tender Christians, e) Deß gratias Grammartzy. 1)

f) It is now in the week of martyrdom, the flesh is not eaten.

[Glossa of the other chapter.] 2)

These heretics have done nothing against God, but have forfeited a much greater guilt, namely, they wanted to have the Holy Scriptures and God's Word, and pretended that poor sinners, the pope should be pious, and preach God's Word soberly, not drunkenly present the bulla of supper. This is such a great error that they would have justly deserved harsher punishment. But now the Most Holy See, out of special compassion, has mercy on them and casts them into the abyss of hell after their souls, burns them to powder in their bodies, maligns their names, and wipes out their honor, and takes away their goods, and is sorry for his great goodness that he cannot have a worse hell, fire, shame and damage.

But since he himself confesses that my heresy is equal to theirs, and I well know what I believe, I am obliged to thank thee once again, thou blessed chair, that thou hast united me with the people of the world.

1) "Grammartzh" ----- Ararid roerei, nice thanks.

2) These words are found in the margins of the Wittenberg and Jena editions instead of a caption to what follows until the end of this chapter.

len. And what shall I do for you in return? Well, that you see 1) my earnestness, I will leave you the cardinal's hat, and do not desire that you give me anything; I can well think that you represent himself. It is enough for me that my name is so gloriously proclaimed in Rome at the feast with the poor heretics, and is now being circulated in the world in the drunken evening bull.

You also say in the first chapter that the weapons of righteousness are such malediction and banishment, when St. Paul himself means weapons of light and weapons of righteousness: meekness, patience, kindness, chastity, 2 Cor. 6:6, 7. But that makes him speak of a sober morning; you do not unreasonably interpret that for a drunken evening, for raging and raving, and the same for the antagonism; for evening and morning are contrary to each other. You are truly an understanding chair!

The third chapter.

Item, we banish and denounce all sea robbers,^a) runners and robbers on the sea, especially those who run astray on our sea,^b) from the Silver Mountain to Terracyn, and rob, paralyze, kill the shipmen on it and rob them of their goods and possessions, have so far presumed and still presume, and all their keepers, and who do them counsel, help and favor.

a) "Sea robbers" and "robbers on the sea" find two things from the drunken evening when the tongue stutters.

b) Of the "sea of ours" Peter, our leader, says thus, Apost. 3:6: "Gold and silver I have not"; and Christ Luc. 22, 25, 26: "The rulers of the Gentiles rule over them; but ye shall not do so." But let a cartload of hay be taken out of the way of a drunken man, let Christ and St. Peter the Evening Eater be silent.

The fourth chapter.

Item, we banish and maledict all who set up new tariffs in their own lands, or demand the forbidden ones.

For we are lord also of all other temporal goods, according to the saying of Christ, Matt. 8:20: "The Son of man hath not where to lay his head."

The fifth chapter.

Item, we banish and maledict all falsifiers of the bulls or apostolic letters, and the letters of supplication, concerning grace or justice, which are recorded by the pope, or sub-chancellor, or their governors, or officers of the sub-chancellor of the Holy Roman Church, by order of the same pope; also those who record such letters of supplication in the name of the pope, or sub-chancellor, or their governors.

1) In the original: siehest.

But God's letters and scriptures may well be burned and condemned. Cause, because in such letters he interprets the scripture, which is due to him alone, as he boasts.

The sixth chapter.

Item, we banish and maledict all who bring horses, weapons, iron, woodwork and other forbidden things to the Saracens and Turks and other enemies of the Christian name, so that they may impugn the Christians.

What a serious thing it is about a drunken man who can eat all the Turks in one evening!

The seventh chapter.

Item, we banish and denounce all who hinder or interfere with those who bring food and other necessities to the Roman court,^a) or hinder and insult them so that they are not brought or brought to the Roman court,^b) also those who do or withhold such things, be they of what order, height, nature and status they want,^c) whether they are also excellent in episcopal, royal, royal-internal, or whatever dignities, be it spiritual or secular.

a) So that the belly does not pine away.

b) How can a drunken man be so evil!

c) Mark, how brightly the Scriptures are interpreted here; how could the pope err in such light?

The eighth chapter.

Item, we banish and malign all, who out of their own outrage rob, take, hold out, or where they do not have proper or commanded authority, out of wanton! ^a) to beat, paralyze or kill those who come to or leave the apostolic see, and those who reside in the same Roman court; also all who do or command such.

a) Without the pope, he may well set kings and bets on each other and bathe them in Christian blood.

The ninth chapter.

Item, we banish and denounce all who freely lame, wound, kill, see, imprison and detain the patriarchs, archbishops and bishops, and their trades.

But what about the other Christians? Each one thinks his best. See for yourself!

The tenth chapter.

Item, we banish and denounce all who, for the sake of their cause and business, beat, lame, or kill, or deprive of goods those who, by themselves or by another, or other persons, whether ecclesiastical or secular, run to the Roman court for the sake of their cause and business, and who execute and procure in the same court, and their business-dealers, preceptors, and procuratores, or also the interrogators or judges, ordered to the same cause and business. ^{a)} Also those who presume to forbid in case of severe punishment, set and command that the letters and commands of the apostolic see and its legates, messengers and certain judges, they concern mercy or right, and the judgments, which went over it, and other findings, trades and execution not be followed, if they do not have before their approval and favor. And that also the clerks and notaries shall not make public letters or vellums, about the above letters and execution; and if they are made, shall not hand them over to the part to which it is due.

Also those who, for the salvation of their souls^{b)} stubbornly presume to withdraw themselves from our and the Roman bishop's obedience, as it is at present, or escape in some way.

Anch those who are subject to the constraints of judgment or fruits, interest and income,^{c)} which belong to the ecclesiastical persons, for the sake of the churches, monasteries and other benefices which they have inside, and seize to themselves, or have without expressed leave of the Roman bishop means and under them, be it from whatever cause it may. ^{d)}

Also those, who do not fear to execute and procure such by themselves, or an external one, or others, straight or crookedly, or in the same council, assistance or a) And so the teaching of St. Paul is fulfilled. Let no one get involved in worldly business who wants to serve God; except for the drunken evening, the pope is well off.

They may be of whatever height,^{e)}) The first step is to make sure that the people of the country have the right to be in the right place.

b) There, there, that is the soul's journey!

c) It is about money, as the masters are about getting, d) And this is the gloss on the word of Christ, Matth.

5:40: "He that will righteousness with thee for his cloak, let him have his skirt also." Yes, come back tomorrow!

e) 2 Pet. 2:1, 10. "False teachers will come, maledicting and blaspheming majesties and kings, and despising rulers."

The eleventh chapter.

Item, we banish and malign all those who paralyze, wound, or kill, or drive, or attack, or rob the Rome runners and pilgrims who go to Rome for devotion or pilgrimage, and stay there or go from there; also all those who do help, advice, and favor.

The twelfth chapter.

Item, we banish and denounce all those, who by themselves, or by another, or by others, bring under themselves, by any title or color whatsoever, to or against^{a)}), or destroy or touch in the way of the enemy, or presumptuously take under itself, hold out, or rename, and touch in enemy's way, totally or in part, the city of Rome/) the kingdom of Sicily or Trinacria, the islands of Sardinia and Corsica, the land near Farum, the paternal inheritance of St. Peter in Thuscia, the heart of Sardinia and Corsica, the land of the Holy Roman Empire, the land of the Holy Roman Empire, the land of the Holy Roman Empire and the land of the Holy Roman Empire. Peter in Thuscia, the duchy of Spolet, the county of Venusyn and Sabyn, the margraviate of Ancon, Massa, Trebaria, Romandiol, Campaniä, and the land and care of the sea, which have especially taken us^{c)}) the Arnulfi, in addition our cities Bononien, Ferrer, Benevent, Perus, Avinien, the city Castel, Tudert and other cities, land and place and right, to the Roman church belonging^{d)}) and pending and responsible; also all those who give such favor, protection, sleeve and council to it.

a) Unless the Turk does not understand the bulla of the evening meal.

b) Behold, Peter, poor fisherman, where does Rome and such a kingdom come to you? Greetings, Peter, king of Sici. lia and fisherman of Bethsaida.

c) What harm a good strong lie to a drunkard, on a drunken evening, who may rob such land and measure it with lies!

d) That is woven a wall of paper, ruling the country and people asleep.

The thirteenth chapter.

Item, we banish and denounce all and any sub-chancellors and councils, both ordinary and special, of all kings and princes,^a) and chancelleries, councils and parliaments, as well as their common procuratores, or other secular princes, whether they were also in imperial, royal, ducal, or whatever dignities;^b) also archbishops, bishops, abbots, commendators, and their governors and officials, who by themselves, or another, or others, summon to themselves from our interrogators and commissaries (as they say) the things of all kinds of exception or other gratuities and apostolic letters, also concerning tithes, benefices, and other ecclesiastical matters, and from laymen the execution of letters of admonition, letters of charge, letters of interdict, letters of middle, letters of execution, and other apostolic letters,^c) concerning grace and law, which are issued by us and by the Camerier-Cardinal, and from the administrators of the apostolic chamber,^d) and from the interrogators and apostolic commissaries in the same matters have gone out at his time, and prevent their course, interrogation, person, chapter, convent, collegio, who want to carry out such matter, and are subject, as judges, to recognize the same, and to revoke or compel the counterpart, which they have obtained, and still obtain, by order, and to absolve from banishment and punishment those against whom such letters of prohibition have been issued.

a) Tub, tub, it wants to go out hot. The drunken man is angry.

b) He pretends not to blaspheme kings and princes, but bites their trades and offices.

c) The pope is concerned about letters.

e) The great whore of Babylonia.

The fourteenth chapter.

Item, we banish and denounce all who forbid, in whatever chastisement, whatever persons, in common or particular, that they should not order for execution any apostolic letter, even if it be a

The letter of summons and the letter of execution, which emanate from the aforementioned see and will emanate in its time, unless they have their or their princes' good pleasure and recognition. Also those who saw, imprisoned, and held out, or saw, imprisoned, and held out the notaries, executors, and sub-executors of the same letters, letters of admonition, letters of summons, letters of prohibition.

Also, those who, because of their office, or because of suggestions, whatever they may be, are dragged before them to their judgment seat, interrogation, court, council, or parliament, and against the order of the common law, have them dragged and procure, straight or crooked, whatever agility and color this may be, the ecclesiastical persons, chapter, convent, and collegia.

And we declare nothing less, and we condition, as we declare and condition this content, that the absolution, which we shall do this day, or else, also with all glory, shall in no way be bad, nothing shall be detrimental, nor shall it be detrimental to the above-mentioned sub-chancellors, councillors and procurators, and to the above-mentioned banned persons, unless they renounce all and any of the above-mentioned and all other rights, which have been granted by the apostolic chair, Councilors and Procurators, and the above-mentioned exiles, unless they renounce all and any of the above-mentioned and all other rights sought by the Apostolic See and the Holy Roman Church, and are still sought, as and where he may. And it shall not be prejudicial, whether by us or by the apostolic see anything is done contrary thereto, or as that is wont to be prejudicial, be it done or to be done, be it concealed or expressed. Nor any length of time, nor any of our patience or humility.

There shall be no objection to letters of privilege, letters of indulgence, apostolic letters, common and special, given to them, or to one of them, or to some of them, by the aforesaid See, of whatever order, rank, nature, dignity, or height they may be, whether they be (as has been said) in episcopal, royal, regal, or whatever dignity, ecclesiastical or secular, or whatever dignities, ecclesiastical or secular, whether also the form and content would be, that they would not be banished by apostolic letters, which do not do a full and clear report, from word to word, of such privileges and dignities, and of their order, place, name, surname.

All kinds of custom and usage, whether they are described or not, and everything that might be contrary to them, by which they might help themselves and protect themselves against these proceedings and judgments of ours, as if they were not included in them, shall not help either.

Of which judgments no one may be absolved by anyone, except by the Roman bishop, unless he is in mortal danger; but not even then, unless he is satisfied or gives sufficient assurance to stand by the commandment of the Holy Roman Church.

For this it shall not help whether he alleges confessional or all kinds of liberty, whether they are given by words, letters, or whatever scripture, whether it is also stated therein that the signature alone shall be sufficient, and whether therein are invented those unusual additions, that the right of the abrogating letters is stronger and more powerful than that of the abrogated ones, whether the same also abrogate all others beforehand, which are given by us, or by the above-mentioned see, or as they may be given henceforth, of whatever person, height, dignity, nature or status they may be, whether they are also (as has been said) in episcopal, royal, royal-internal, or whatever other dignities are excellent, both ecclesiastical and secular, men and women, chapters, colleges, convents, also the mendicant orders, and the hospitals of the knightships, brotherhoods and high schools.

But those who, contrary to the contents of this bull, do the good deed of absolution to such or to one or some of them, we condemn to the sentence of excommunication and punishment, and forbid them to preach, to read, to administer the sacrament, to hear confession, and declare and clarify to the same transgressors and despisers that we want to act much harder against them, both spiritually and secularly, after which we see that it will be necessary, and nevertheless everything that they have done with absolution, or otherwise, shall have no power nor force.

But that these our proceedings may be brought to the common conscience of all, we will cause to be pinned and hung up slips of paper, or Leaves to the gates of the church of the Prince of the Apostles and St. John Lateran at Rome, wherein they are held, which shall proclaim, as with their vocal outcry and public display, these proceedings, so that those who prosecute these proceedings may not pretend some excuse, or attract ignorance, as if they had not come before them, or had not known them. Since it is not credible that what is publicly proclaimed to all remains unknown to them.

But that these present Epistles, and all and every thing written therein, may be so much more widely known as to be revealed in many cities and places: we command in these writings the worthy brethren, patriarchs, primates, archbishops, bishops, and ordinaries in all places where they are, and in virtue of holy obedience, with stern commandment, that they, by themselves, or another, or others, read these epistles, after they have received it or have knowledge of it, at least once a year, or more times if they deem it necessary, to proclaim it gloriously in their churches when the greater part of the people gather there for worship, and that they bring it into the hearts of the believers in Christ, preaching and transfiguring it.

Therefore, let every man be forbidden to think that it behooves him to break this leaf of our ban, censure, abjuration, proclamation, transfiguration, revocation, linkage, prohibition, command and precept, or to resist it with unrighteous thirst. But if anyone dares to do so, let him know that he will run into the disgrace of Almighty God and His holy apostles Peter and Paul. Given at Rome, at St. Peter's, Anno MDXXL Quinto Kalen. Aprilis [March 28], Pontificatus nostri Anno nono.

Read by me

John's Arberium, Romanum Subdiaconum Apostolicum.

Martinus Luther.

I had will to continue joking with the drunkards, so the displeasure goes to me so close that the miserable, desperate people, pabst, cardinals, and whoever they are, the not only are they so insolent that they are allowed to pretend their drunken slobber and monkey fervor to the Christian people, but they also raise their poisonous blasphemous mouths to heaven, and draw on the highly praised name of the high divine majesty, and thereby malign the souls, which is, after all, vain blasphemy, so that I lose my laughter. What does this poisonous bull of blasphemy teach? Only anger, suffering, cursing, malice to body, goods and souls, the destruction of all the world for the sake of miserable temporal wealth. Call it the good of the holy church and St. Peter's inheritance that now St. Peter must be a duke of Ferrer and king of Sicily. What shall I say? It surpasses the infernal dragon's wickedness and his apostle's malice all word, sense and thought. I know of nothing more annoying to do than to ask each one to read the Bulla for himself, and yet see how all the letters rage and rage against Christian love, hope, faith, patience, meekness, poverty, etc., and still want to be feared. But I say this much about the Pabst's and this bull's dread: Whoever dies of dread shall be buried with farts.

But in order to do a service to the wretched papists, and to show them their idols, that they may see what they worship under the pope's mantle, let us strike it out a little.

On the first chapter Glossa.

St. Paul Tit. 1, 9. 11. teaches that false teachers should be shut up with scripture, and that a bishop should be powerful to punish the gainsayers with sound doctrine; and Peter 1. Ep. 3, 15. 16. says: "You should always be ready to speak in defense to all who demand from you a testimony of the hope you have, and this with fear and litter." Behold, these are words and phrases of the Holy Spirit. Now let all the papists say, whether this is held in this bulla? There is no litter, no fear, no letter of sound doctrine, no testimony, no protective speech, but only naked condemnation, banishment, malediction, cursing, raving and raging, as if he were a man possessed. Therefore, everyone can see the spirit from which this bulla

The people of the world are not the ones who are so unchristian that they strive against the teachings of the Holy Spirit.

If that were enough to protect the Christian faith, to silence it with violence or to defend it with malice, I would not know better Christians and bishops than the tyrants and murderers, or the wicked women and possessed people. So the pagans would not have done wrong to the martyrs, and the Jews would have crucified Christ. And with this I want to shut the mouths of the papists, who almost complain that I am mordant. To be biting is useful and necessary, that one punishes the hard heads; but I have never once blasphemed or maligned anyone, but always blasphemed and granted good. What do they say to their idol and abomination, who does nothing but blaspheme and curse? Why do they praise and honor him?

St. Paul did indeed denounce false teachers, Gal. 1, 8, but that was for the sake of the Gospel, to save God's honor. But where he was touched in that which was his, there he always denounced. But the pope, as this bulla unashamedly shows, does not deny anything else than that he wants to break off his wealth and power. For behold the arch-whoring face of this bulla: no one is banished for breaking marriage, harming his neighbor, blaspheming God, but, as the women and children howl, and avenge themselves with blasphemies and say: Yes, he takes this from me, does this to me 2c. Only what touches the pope himself is blasphemed; what touches God he does not remember. Is this not an impudent, thirsty presumption, thus publicly acting in the church against God's commandment, and yet pretending that one should be afraid of it, and accept it for right and good deed?

Therefore open your eyes, you blind and wretched papists, and see your idols, how they work against Christ, and how they do the devil's work. Christ says Matth. 5, 44. and Luc. 6, 27-29.: "Love your enemies, and do good to those who hate you; forgive those who abuse you, pray for those who do you evil. He that taketh away thy coat, let him have thy skirt also. He that smiteth thee on one cheek, let him have the other also. He that taketh thine own, fetch it not again." These words of Christ are so harshly commanded, that on the End of Matth. 5,49.] So he who hears these words of mine and does not do them is like a foolish man who builds his house on the sand" 2c. Although the great flat scholars of the high school of Paris have made advice and admonition out of it.

Now say, how does this bulla hold to these words? Christ says, "He that taketh away thy coat, let him have thy skirt also." The pope says: "Whoever takes a penny from me, let him be of the devil body and soul, a heretic, an apostate, and let all misfortune befall him. What is this but as if an angry whore said to him who takes a penny from her, "Let thunder and lightning strike you dead, and let all the devils take you? Behold, dear papists, your idol. Behold, such abominations must be read every year in Rome on the holy green Thursday; that is to teach and govern Christendom.

And although the Scriptures report some maledictions done by God, Christ, apostles and prophets, it is not proper for anyone to maledict if he wants to. Otherwise, what would be the use of the teaching that we should not maledict? Scripture maledicates what is contrary to the gospel, and yet extends its malediction no further than to the betterment of souls through bodily evils. But the pope paints through and through, body and soul, property and honor, friend and companion; seeks no improvement with it, but vain destruction, and speaks no more than: Give again, and leave me in peace, and let me bear no cross.

Therefore the example of the Scripture is not to be followed further, except in the things in which it maledicates; for thou wouldest say, The Scripture maledicates the gospel of the brethren; therefore I also will maledicate what I desire. As the asses of Paris speak: We will also condemn without cause or evidence, as the apostles wrote without evidence. No, not so, dear asses; if thou wilt follow the example of the Scriptures, follow it purely and simply, or else let it stand.

And even if the ass of Pari's lies were true, that Christ's word was only advice and well-meaning, nevertheless the pope should keep them, because he does not only want to be in the state of perfection, but also the head and the most distinguished in the same state.

Now the same class is obliged to keep them as a commandment, and not as a counsel. Therefore, as you direct, the pope is a blasphemmer, a maledict, a curser; and not only is he so, but he also teaches the same as if it were right and proper. O abomination! O abomnatio! it wants with you to the end, you overprotect it too high!

Let this be said to you papists in service to the first chapter, there you have your idol, the devil's larvae.

On the other chapter Glossa.

He banishes and maledicts on account of the Holy Trinity, God the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit. I ask, where did the command happen to him? Is it because of this, Matth. 16,19: "What you bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven"? Christ did not use it more than binding; and the infernal dragon's mouth of the pope maledicts and curses for binding. The binding is only an outward separation of those, who put themselves with sins into the malediction, to get them out again, so the most holy father pushes them in. This is called feeding the sheep!

Now the blessed name of the divine majesty is that which gladdens all hearts, in which we are blessed, baptized and saved. The great, poisonous blasphemmer uses this to malign, and frightens, kills, tortures the soul with it, so that one should become hostile to the name. If he were to throw the highly sacred name into a puddle of dung, or trample it underfoot, or otherwise blaspheme it, I would count him among other vile blasphemers. But now that he is the chief evil-doer of all the world, and the greatest enemy of God, as Paul proclaimed of him [2 Thess. 2:3], he must curse and abuse him. And yet shall be well done; call such weapons of righteousness, as all others confess that it is great sin, if they only curse with God's name; hold their peace if they should boast therein of His command. St. Peter said, 2 Petr. 2, 19: "They are children of malediction," namely, that they are worthy of malediction and can do nothing but malediction.

He saw, the chief hawk, that he was too weak for the kings and princes to steal their land and cities and obtain with the Sword, that is why avarice teaches him to turn to the Maledeien with God's name. There is fulfilled the word of St. Paul, Radix Omuium Malorum Avaritia, "Avarice is a root of all evil" [1 Tim. 6, 10.]. And see if these four Latin words with their first letters do not have the name Uoma all by the sending of the Holy Spirit, so that such evil should reign in Rome?

To the third chapter.

The sea robbers also have to take their turn; the noble man of war can fight, build, plant, protect, escort, and direct all things, only with cursing and malediction. If the lazy ass sits on his chair, such a great thing wants to rule only with curses. But who is the greatest sea robber and sea murderer, but the idol with his malediction, who catches, paralyzes and kills all souls. He has fallen on the temporal, physical good and being, therefore he can do nothing spiritually, but the contradiction. For temporal and spiritual cannot be provided for at the same time. Christ says: "You cannot serve mammon and God" [Matth. 6,24].

To the fourth chapter.

That is a little bit once, that he is putting new tariffs. That would be good, but what does the fool mix in that is foreign and does not concern him? Kings and emperors should take care of such things; the pope should wait for the gospel and see to it that no spiritual customs and burdensome new doctrine arise anywhere. But what does he do? He himself burdens the world with unspeakable laws, translates, robs, steals, takes, suckles from all bishoprics and monasteries with cloaks, annotations, reservations, letters of indulgence and with such innumerable tricks and deceptions, and presents himself as if he wanted to ward off new customs. Is this not a hateful, hostile, vexatious malice and mischievousness against the most holy See? who receives a spoon, and devours the house; ape us that we should fear and praise such things. I mean, that is, to coward the gnats, and to swallow a camel, as Christ says Matth. 23, 24. And even though it is unjust to raise new tariffs, should one for that reason

And shall they maledict them, and not amend them in some other way? Ah! What shall the lying, wicked chair of the devil do, but only lie, deceive, and do all deceit? Nothing good shall come out of the abomination.

To the fifth chapter.

No one shall ever forge the letters of the Holy See, that is, blasphemy, soul murder and world destruction. When will it be that he will also once counterfeit those who act against God's ten commandments? No, he must act against them himself; otherwise he would have to malign no one more than himself. Therefore, such monkeys and fools must be maledicted, so that only the avarice and the lies remain strong.

To the sixth chapter.

He told those who brought iron and wood to the Turks and the Saracens that he was serious about doing good for Christianity. But if he were Christ's governor, he would stand on his feet, go and preach the gospel to the Turk, risking life and limb. This would be a Christian way to fight the Turks and to increase and protect Christianity. For what is the use of fighting the Turk physically? What evil does the Turk do? He occupies land and rules in time. We have to suffer the same from the pope himself, who is taking our life and limb, which the Turk does not do. For this purpose, the Turk lets everyone remain in his faith. Neither does the pope, but forces all the world from the Christian faith to his devilish lies, so that the pope's regiment is ten times worse than the Turk's, of course, in body, goods and soul. And if Christ himself should not overthrow the final Christ, according to the Scriptures, and one ever wanted to exterminate the Turk, one would have to start with the pope.

To the seventh chapter.

These eight following chapters maltreat and bite impudently, just for the sake of the belly, like a dog for the sake of the leg. Nothing is sought there, except that the Holy See should eat, drink, walk idly, flaunt, lust, rule, rage, rave, lie,

I do not want to deceive, abuse, disgrace, seduce, and all evil may be handled safely and peacefully. There shall be nothing suffered, no evil, no piece of the cross, no emblem of Christ; that I no longer may nor can act the holy chair. Another one also tries his hand at it. What more I want to say, I command King David in the following psalm, where you will see that he has seen everything before, how the pope would lie, deceive, maledict, blaspheme God, devastate Christianity, and neither praise nor seek anything but his own, and what pleases his soul.

Glossa of King David on this bull, Psalm 10.

O Lord, why wilt thou depart so far away, and hide thyself in the times of adversity?

2. the wicked will be hopeful, and burn up the poor; they will fall to their wills what they only think of.

3. for the wicked praises what is according to the pleasure of his soul, and the covetous blasphemes and blasphemes God.

4. the wicked before his puffed up wrath asks for no one, even God is nothing before his vain will.

5 His doings are always anxious for the height. Thy judgment is from his face. He speaks boldly against all his enemies.

He says in his heart, "I will not waver; I will be without evil forever.

7 His mouth is full of cursing, deceit and avarice; under his tongue is toil and labor.

8. he sits in wait in the courts, within he kills the innocent, his eyes secretly look upon the poor heap.

(9) He lieth in wait, as a lion in his den; he lieth in wait to catch the poor man; he catcheth the poor man, when he hath drawn him into his net.

010 And he breaketh and bruiseth, and breaketh the poor heap with his violence.

011 He saith in his heart, God hath forgotten her, and hid his face. He no longer looks at her for and for.

Arise, Lord God, raise your hand, do not forget the poor.

013 How long shall the wicked blaspheme God, saying in his heart, Thou askest nothing of it?

014 Thou lookest on them: for thou art he that lookest on both the work and the raging, that it may be given into thy hand; and the poor company shall leave it unto thee, who art the helper of the fatherless.

15. break the arm of the wicked, and seek the wicked, and you will never find his ungodly nature.

016 The LORD is king for ever and ever: ye heathen shall perish out of his land.

17 Thou, O LORD, hast heard the desire of the poor; thou wilt prepare their heart, and thine ear shall be attentive.

018 That thou mayest judge the cause of the fatherless and the poor, that no man henceforth be afraid on the earth.

Interpretation.

Lord, why will you stand so far away and hide yourself in times of adversity?

For if God had not abandoned us for our ingratitude, it would not be possible for the final Christian to perform, let alone accomplish, such monstrosities in the church (as follows). Therefore, the prophet David points out the right reason and power of papal tyranny, without merit. As St. Paul also does in 2 Thess. 2,3. f. 7-10. The prophet marvels at the greatness of tyranny, that God can suffer it, and yet shows that it is our fault, and to act against it with pleas and cries.

This is now the first and highest part, by which the pope has arisen and committed the following abominations, that God has departed for our ingratitude, and not a little, but far away departed, and so completely abandoned in all the world that no word of God nor regiment has remained, but vain tyranny of papal laws. To this end he has hidden himself, so that he not only abandons us, but also cannot be found or asked for in the dreadful adversity. Indeed, there is no one who has asked. And though there have been some who have opposed him, to them he has not has let them perish, and has destroyed and condemned the truth together with them, as Daniel also says, that not only the people but also the truth has been destroyed; therefore it follows:

V. 2. the wicked is hopeful, and burns up the poor; they fall on their wills, what they only think of.

This had to follow, since God departed and left us, and did not resist. So we see that the pope of all things has lain above, has burned many Christians, by which he has become trustworthy, proud and secure, and has brought a terror into the world, that he does and lets freely according to all his will; also insolently puts in his decrees: no one may defend him, judge him, punish him, but he shall judge all the world. That is why they do everything they can think of with the utmost courage. This is the time of adversity, when Christ says Matth. 24, 21, that their like should not have been nor should be. The burning alone shows enough that the pope is the one this psalm is referring to. For this alone is his own punishment, since he rages with them, and the prophet also denounces them; to the heathen he gives the sword, in the previous psalm. The Christian church does not kill bodily, therefore let it be said whoever will; the fire tyrants may not be Christians, the work alone knows who they are.

V. 3. The wicked praises all that is according to the lusts of his soul, and the covetous blasphemes and blasphemes God.

No flatterer has ever attributed such great, high things to the pope that the pope would have been ashamed once and said: This is too much; but everything is confirmed and made articles of faith, and the same booklets are praised for being Christian. These are called pious, faithful children of the Holy Roman Church. This is because the pope cannot err, has all the rights in his heart, he is the head of all people on earth, an emperor of the world, who also commands the angels and has power in purgatory, and equal power with Christ, who may also act above, apart from, and against God's word and scripture, and the like, before which one's heart would burst into a thousand pieces, who only hears it.

not to mention to see. He himself praises all this in his decrees. All this is done by the remaining courage and hope that God will not prevent him.

Now everything is to be done for the sake of avarice, as he says here. What is the Pabst's regiment but pure avarice, the like of which has never been so experienced in any regiment of the world? This is the reason why it is said that the final Christian will find the treasures of the earth. I mean, he has found them, that there is not a penny left in the world that is not his.

Benediction is the blessing, in which the pope is powerful, and directs all things with; so that he also in the greeting of his bull, instead of divine grace, with which the apostles are used to greet, he needs a new, unashamedly applies the snot and slobber of his grace and apostolic benediction, and his benediction is held great. But underneath he devours the world with his avarice, and blasphemes God, because he does not use anything with his blessing, except lies and error, and what is useful to him; but what is divine and truth, because it must be against him, he does not use. So this blasphemy is that he uses God's name in his blasphemy, and calls divine that which is devilish; and so, for the sake of his avarice, he affirms with God's holy name a vain devilish nature, work, lies and error, makes all the world receive the lies as from God, and gives them to God, thinking that it is truth. O blasphemers and blasphemy! what a flood of sin is this in all the world!

V. 4. The wicked before his puffed-up wrath asks for no one; neither is God anything before his vain will.

We see this also in the pope, how he boasts, defies and puffs up in his bulls, how contemptuously he threatens kings, princes, bishops and all the world, as if they were little worms before him. And even if one holds God and God's word against him, it is a mockery before him, since it points to pure courage where he wants to go. There is no fear to act in God's words; it behooves him, he says, to interpret the Scriptures, one should confess to his interpretation. If not, hell is fourteen times hotter than if you go against God.

You have sinned against God; the wrath of these vipers is so high and puffed up beyond measure. He has no other care in all his laws, except that he may ascend upward and abide therein, as those who read it must confess.

Therefore, it is undoubtedly God's will that the Pope's letters have a different name from all the letters of the world, and are called bulls. Bulla is the name of a bubble on the water; yet it has the very quality of the pope, that it is miraculous. For it blows itself up, and comes from the rain: so the pope also boasts, praises and exalts himself, and boasts that he comes from the word of God, Matth. 16, 18.

For as the rain is unfruitful when it falls into the water, and makes only water bubbles, so also God's word, when it falls into such worldly hearts, makes only vain inflated hearts. Item, the bubble leads on the water, as if it should say: I am not water, but I rule and sail on the water; and yet there is nothing more fragile 1) in all creation. She has also closed her back to heaven, and below she is even open, as if she wanted to grasp all the water. So does the pope, does not want to be a man, but floats above all men, does not ask for God, and wants to devour all the world, and yet there is nothing more unfounded on earth than his tyranny.

And in this he does not ask for God's judgment, who, after all, threw Lucifer down from the Hinnacle because of such arrogance, and lets all the world know his judgment: "He who exalts himself shall be humbled" [Luc. 14:11]. But the judgment with all its examples is far from his eyes, yes, so far that he sets the contradiction for articles of faith, that the prophet is justly astonished. He freely attacks those who oppose him, is boldly against them, banishes and condemns them, is certain of his cause, and may put it for articles of faith; so he does not respect God's judgment at all, as this bulla alone sufficiently shows. His only concern is that people do not become heretics about him, that is, that he does not remain high. It is the nature of lies that they are fortified with worries and fears, because they stand on their own. But the truth is sure, lets God prevail, because it stands on God. Even so the liar is presumptuous, bold against his adversaries, but the truthful one defies God alone.

V. 5: His doings are always anxious for the height. Thy judgment is from his eyes, and he speaketh boldly against all his adversaries.

You will find almost no bulla or laws of the pope in which he does not declare how he is the supreme one, and how dangerous it is for the souls if they are not subject to him, that, just as a woman fears when she is to give birth, so the pope fears at all times that he may bring this fruit into the world, and that he may collect his highness from everyone; that [it] is also annoying to read, if it were true at the same time. Therefore, with this word the prophet has actually put his concern and melancholy in such! Trade troffen. For in Hebrew it reads: parturiunt, that is, his ways or works always give birth to the height; that is, all that he does is only that he bears himself with sorrow and anxiety, as a woman bears a child with pain.

V. 6 He says in his heart, "I will not waver, I will be without evil forever.

This is the certainty that the pope and papists boast of and rely on. For they say that the papacy is founded on the rock, since Christ says of Matth. 16, 18: "On the rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. On this they stand secure, saying that the Roman see shall remain, and neither kings nor emperors may move it. And this is true. But they do not know that such their security is proclaimed here and in more places, and that only the last day shall destroy the papacy. But God makes him sing: No evil will touch me, who will harm me? I sit on the rock, and I am sure that the holy Roman church will remain the head. Everything is full to overflowing, full of his spiritual right, and the Holy Spirit has just met everything beforehand.

1) In the original: "Brechtlichers" -precious; probably a misprint.

V. 7 His mouth is full of cursing, deceit and avarice; under his tongue is toil and labor.

The pope could not align nor maintain his tyranny with love and favor, because niemayd wanted to grant it to him. Thus he could not conquer her with the sword. But since he did not want to do without her, how could he do otherwise, but with cursing, malediction. How could he do otherwise than with cursing, maledictions, blasphemies, lies, and bells on the simple, pious hearts? You can see this clearly in this drunken bulla. Christ has kindly drawn the world to himself with benedictions and love; his governor throws them under himself with curses and maledictions. Recently: The Holy See can do nothing but curse, has never done anything with love, but everything with cursing and dread, so that the prophet says that his mouth is full of cursing.

In addition, everything he says, he teaches under God's name. For he teaches no gospel truth; therefore the prophet also rightly says, "that his mouth is full of deceit. Because he does not teach the gospel, but only his word, and yet pretends to the people for Christian truth, it is not only lies, but also deception. Deception is more than lying. Deceiving is when the lies are guessed at and come to pass, as happened to the Pabst's lies. Lying, however, can be missing: Deceiving is not missing. He is deceived who believes the liar.

Enough has been said above about the vain avarice of the priesthood. For that is why he curses, lies and trusts so furiously under God's name, that he is the supreme one, and brings all the world's goods, honor, body and soul under himself. Therefore it is rightly said, "His mouth is full of avarice." Look at this bulla, what the pope seeks with his full mouth.

But that is still the worst, that "under his tongue is toil and labor". Look at the tyranny of the pope, with which burden he weighs down the world, and presses on body and goods, but much more on the soul with his innumerable, infallible laws. He has rounded off all our goods, made so many erroneous things with laws of praying, confessing, fasting, celebrating, dressing, eating, drinking. How he alone has confused marriage! Recently, it is wondrous that he has not also forbidden farts in secret places; the world he has laid full, full, full of fearful, deadly, hellish cords. That is, "toil and labor under his tongue." See how just the prophet has recognized the pabst so long zn ago. Christ made us free and put a light burden on us, but this one puts all the devils on us, and does it with vain cursing, deceit and avarice. Behold, ingratitude, there you have your reward!

V. 8. He sits in wait in the courts, in secret he kills the innocent, his eyes hide on the poor heap.

Sitting" means teaching, or being a teacher, and the prophet wants to say: He sits down himself, throws up a chair, and makes himself the teacher of all the world. As we also see that the pope always puts on the word: the holy Roman chair, the apostolic chair; item: We are the master of all the world, the rule of faith, the fountain of all that is right, and the like dreadful thing much more, that now nothing is more famous nor meaner than the Roman chair. The prophet knew that such a name would arise, which is why he called it so long before.

But he does the sitting with "lurking in the forecourts". Here he separates the forecourt from the Sancto and Sancto Sanctorum, just as churches now have three parts, the choir, church, and churchyard. These are three different lives: the inner one, Sanctum Sanotorum, is the rightly believing being; the other one, Sanctum, is the being in good works, which God has commanded; but the court is the being of ceremonies and own works. Thus the prophet wants to say: The end-Christ with his unmistakable tyranny, does not teach faith, not good works; but only the outward glitter and pomp of self-invented works, as there are clothes, food, place, person; as we then see all this in the Papist teachings and life all too superfluous. That means: "sitting in courts", being a teacher of such jugglery.

But, because he pretends such for serious good, he deals with the souls, like the bailiffs with the birds. It is vain lurking and setting traps, since the souls saw themselves inside; they fall on it and think it is the right thing to do.

Beings. Behold, that is sitting on the trap in the forecourt, teaching and placing the souls in external, human laws and works.

Therefore it also follows, "that he kills the innocent in secret", that is, in the spirit. For no man sees how horribly the souls are strangled by him. On the outside it seems as if they do good and he teaches them right, but on the inside he destroys faith. For everything that comes out of baptism, when it grows up, falls into this snare and lurk. That is, the innocent secretly killed.

This is also, "that his eyes hide on the poor heap," that is, he lies in wait and sees how he will kill them, lest someone contradict him and reveal his lies. For many have begun to punish such a thing, and want to betray the traps, but they are suppressed by force, as follows:

V. 9: He lies in wait in secret, like a lion in his den; he lies in wait to catch the poor man; he catches the poor man when he draws him into his net.

This is all said about the teachings of the Pabst in the world, since he not only deceives, but also drives and forces people into the net of his teachings. Whoever does not want to enter his net must be a heretic; and there he lies in wait like a lion, through bishops, high schools, monasteries, and before that through heretic masters. These are the right holes, in which this lion lies and lurks, so that the gospel does not arise and the truth comes forth. He has a real lion's wrath in here. We also see how his bishops, priests and monks scream and rage in the pulpits, wanting to tear the rocks apart with malice, fight and fence, so that they draw the people into the Pabst's net and keep them. Where this does not help, they do as follows:

V. 10. And he breaks and bruises, and shatters the poor heap with his violence.

So the pope boasts; if his lion's wrath will not help, since he rages and rages, and cannot compel them with banishments and false terrors and traps, he also takes hold of them with worldly force; and those he cannot burn, he chases away, and brings them

Otherwise, it will be destroyed or hindered. Therefore here the prophet sets three pieces one after the other. First, where he can, he breaks, crushes and destroys him. If not, then he bends him, but imprisons him, or otherwise hinders and resists him as he can. And if not, he will cut him down, so that he cannot be of use to others; he will tear down those who follow him and listen to him, so that the word must fall. He has done this to many, especially to the Greeks and Bohemians and many others, with the help of secular princes. He also boasts of this in the last chapter of this bull.

V.11. For he says in his heart, "God has forgotten you and hidden his face. He no longer looks at her for or against.

This makes the final Christian bold and strengthens all his willpower, that God is far away and does not resist him. The stubborn fool interprets this as if God is with him on his side and he is doing well and right. Therefore he may conclude and judge: whom he condemns, God will never look upon. Thus it also happened that the pope destroyed many of them, especially Vigleph and Hus with their comrades. Then the papists boast, saying, "Behold, many have risen up against the Holy See; but how have they fared? they are distraught, destroyed with shame, and the Holy See remains.

Behold, the Spirit has declared all this of them before, for they are blinded, and do not see that their thing continues because God has departed, so that error may rule by force, as St. Paul also proclaimed. So now the papists must shout and sing: "God has forgotten you," they are eternally damned with shame, he will never recognize them; but we find the holy Christians. What shall we do to such an abomination? Shall we strike with fists? No, but to storm the devil's abomination with prayer, as follows:

V. 12. Lord, stand up! God, raise your hand, do not forget the poor.

GOD must break this tyranny alone, moved by our praying and crying; as also St. Paul says that Christ will be with

We will then see whether the glory of the papists will endure, that those who have told the truth to the Holy See will be destroyed with shame.

V. 13. How long shall the wicked blaspheme God, saying in his heart, Thou inquirest not after them?

There you see that blasphemy most corrupts the spirit, that the pope still boasts above all his abominations that he has done well, and has rightly condemned, driven out, burned and disturbed the poor. For this is blaspheming God and attributing to Him such high, great abominations. It is also most painful that we should not only see the innocent burned, condemned and disgraced, but also let the final Christ boast and praise himself of righteousness. This will break his neck, because he has come so high that he cannot come any higher. Therefore also the spirit becomes long, and says: How long shall the blasphemy last? Move God by the Most High, namely by His honors.

V. 14. You see them, for it is you who sees both the work and the raging, that it may be given into your hands, and the poor people may be given to you. You are the helper of the orphans.

What a fine little verse this is! He places vengeance in God's hands alone, and says: "It is not as the papists say, that you have forgotten us; yes, you look at us, and have never let us out of your sight, although it seems otherwise. For there is none that doeth as thou doest. But how do you do? Thou seest both the labor of the oppressed, what they must suffer at the hands of the tyrant, and also the raging of the tyrant against the poor, and judgest rightly. Therefore it shall be given into your hands to judge both of them justly. And because the poor man knows this, he abstains from revenge and impatience, lets it remain on you, puts it in your home, and waits to see what your hands will do. And he does this safely, because he knows that you are not the tyrant's but the orphan's helper. Not the murderers and burners, the papists, but the burned and killed thou wilt save.

V. 15. Break the arm of the wicked, and seek the wicked, and you will never find his ungodly nature.

That is: It does not cost you much effort, take away his power. But this is what you do: "Seek out his wickedness," that is, make it obvious, and it will fall from itself, so that nothing more will be found of it. There is no finer war against lies than to reveal them and let them be seen; then it is already over with them. Therefore the pope and his regiment must be disturbed, not with the sword, but with search and investigation, so that it may be found who the dear See is; as it has already begun, and God has begun to hear our prayer, amen.

V. 16. The LORD is King forever and ever; you Gentiles will perish from His land.

The pope does not believe this, but he will soon find out. There is no king nor lord over God's land, that is, over the church, but God alone; therefore, no doctrine shall rule there but his word. This verse says that there is an end to the fact that the pope has exalted himself as king over this land and has ruled with his word. They are pagans and not Christians, because they rule themselves and do not let Christ rule.

V. 17. You have heard the desire of the poor, O Lord; you have prepared their heart, your ear will listen.

That is, the time that thou hast stood afar off is ended; now shalt thou hear, and come near again; for thou hast prepared and prepared such hearts as shall pray, that thine ears may hearken: for it is thou that teachest and hearest prayer.

V. 18 That thou mayest judge the cause of the fatherless and the poor, that no man henceforth be afraid on the earth.

The verse sings of the last judgment, because it speaks that after the Pabst's disturbance and redemption of the poor no man shall be a tyrant and feared on earth anymore. This would not be possible if the world should stand longer after the pope; for the world cannot be without tyrants. And so it is true the prophet with the apostle, that Christ shall reverse with his future the holy Roman see. May God grant that it be done soon, amen.

I hope that when everyone sees how this psalm so evenly portrays the papacy, and the pope does the same as is said here, and no other regiment from the beginning of the world can be so even, everyone will realize that he does not have to wait for another final Christ. It is impossible that on earth there should be a worse regiment that kills more souls than the pope; I will be silent about the drudgery of the flesh. Therefore, only cry out and pray to God against the chief scoundrel of all God's enemies, until he comes and delivers us from him; we have the righteous one. Say Amen, whoever is a Christian.

D. Luther's journey to Worms, what he encountered on the way, and the cunning attempts of the Archbishop of Mainz, with which he, along with other papists, wanted to keep Luther beyond the set time of his safe conduct.

550 Luther's report of the attempts made by the archbishop at Mainz to deter him on the way and prevent him from coming to Worms, or at least not within the set time of the escort.

The entire historical narrative, which is scattered here according to the division made, is already in the 22nd volume of this collection, in the table speeches, Cap. 55, § 2, according to the relation of Cordatus. However, because this differs significantly from the one that is said to have taken place over the table at Eisleben in 1546, as Aurifaber reports, the latter is also included here. It is found in the first Eisleben part, p. 38; in the Altenburg edition, p. 733 and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVII, p. 587. The other pieces of this report, which have the same location, are numbers 555. 559. 560. 561. 568. 570. 573 and 578. Together they are also found in the Erlangen edition, vol. 64, p. 366, supposedly after the Jena edition, in which, by the way, our writing is not found. The locations given in the Erlangen edition are all wrong, because they do not refer to our writing, but to the "detailed description of Luther's action at the Diet of Worms" given in No. 592 in this volume, which was not included in the Erlangen edition. The incorrect references find reprinted from the old edition of Walch, Volume X V, p. 116 a, No. 592.

Because you desire me, the doctor said, that I should tell you how it happened to me at Worms, I will gladly do so, and show every opportunity so that you may know the reason for it and recount it if I were once dead.

First, Emperor Carol summoned me to the Imperial Diet and sent me an escort and a herald to accompany me to Worms. As we now come with each other to Weimar, since I received from Duke John 2c. 2c., the cry comes that Doctor Martinus is already condemned at Worms, and his books. And that would be true. In addition, the messengers under Allgen came to me, who were to post the imperial mandate in all cities, that D. Martinus was condemned by the emperor.

3rd Now the herald asked me and said: Doctor, do you want to leave? Then I answered, "Yes, regardless of the fact that I had been banished and that this had been publicized in all the cities, I still wanted to go away and keep the imperial escort. This was the first practice that the Bishop of Mainz exercised, by which he thought to prevent me from going to the Imperial Diet, and then to protest against me, as if I had disregarded the imperial escort and had been contumacious. As I now came to Oppenheim, and had only three days of escort, so much was practiced by the Bishop of Mainz that the Emperor sent his confessor, a Barefoot monk, called Glapion, and her Majesty's highest body chamberlain, Paul von Armbsdorf, to Franz von Sickingen in Ebernburg, and requested that he should demand Luther to come to him, so that her Imperial Majesty would order some of the guards there to deal with him. Upon this, Franz von Sickingen sent Martinum Bucerum with several advisors to meet him, with the offer that he would show him all loyalty. Then Bucer came to me, as Franz von Sickingen was a servant at that time, and wanted to persuade me to come to Franz von Sickingen in Ebernburg, because Glapion, the emperor's confessor, was supposed to talk to me there about several things. But I did not realize that the bishop of

1) Should probably mean: procediren.

Mainz that he should lead me around until the time of the escort was over before I came to Worms. Then I said to Bucer, "I will go away; if the emperor's confessor has something to say to me, he can well do so at Worms," and so I went away. This was the other practice that the bishop of Mainz lacked, and I learned later that he had done all this.

551 Myconius' report of the sermon that Luther preached on the way to Worms in the Augustinian monastery in Gotha, as well as of the illness that afflicted him in Eisenach and what else he encountered on the journey to Worms; also of his great heroism.

From Myconius List. Lei, p. 87.

Anno Domini tausend fünffhundert 1) und zwentzig war der grossen Reichs-Tag zu Worms, dahin war Lutherus durch den neuen Käyser Carolum auch citirt: und beleitet ihn einen Herold, von Wittenberg durch Erfurt, Gotha, Eisenach 2c. And when he preached a sermon in the Augustinian monastery in Gotha, where a good crowd was present, the devil tore some stones from the church gable, which was against the city wall, after the sermon: they had lain solidly for over 200 years, and have not been rebuilt to this day. Therefore, in 1532, the same monastery was made a parish of Gotha and a school.

At Eisenach, Luther became very ill, so that his life was in danger. But when he had a vein cut, and Johann Oßwald, debtor, then mayor of Gotha, gave him some noble water to drink, and he then passed away, he became better. He left the next day. When he went to a city, the people met him for the city and wanted to see the miracle man, who was so sinful, and who could again lay the pope and all the world, who again considered him a god. Some comforted him on the way very badly, that because so many cardinals and bishops were at the Diet in Worms, they would all burn him to powder, as happened to the priest in Costnitz. But to them Luther replied: "And if you made a fire that would burn between Wittenberg and Worms all the way to heaven, it would be burned to powder.

1) Here lacks: "one".
2) In Myconius: "the".

But because he was required, he would appear in the name of the Lord and step into the mouth of the behemoth between his great toes and confess Christ and let him rule.

Luther's sermon on Sunday Quasimodogeniti, April 7, 1521, preached on the road to Erfurt at the request of many.

It is in the 12th volume of the St. Louis edition; Col. 1386.

Luther's letter to Spalatin, from Frankfurt to Worms, that he had been ill on the way, but hoped to arrive with God in Worms. [April 14, 1521.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamtarchiv (with the inscription by Spalatin's hand: Dx Ovvsñuevul M. D. XXI); printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 314b; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 586 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 120. The time determination, which De Wette already has, results from the diary of Canonicus Wolffg. Königstein 1520-1548, edited by D. G. E. Seitz, Frankfurt 1876, p. 18. That the rubrication of this letter by Spalatin: ex Oppenheim is based on an oversight is clear from Luther's indication of the place: Francokurāiae. Thus, Spalatin's statement in the next number that Luther wrote him the well-known heroic word "from Oppenheim" is also based on the same oversight.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To his [friend] in the Lord, Magister Georg Spalatin, court preacher to the Duke of Saxony, who is to be highly honored in Christ.

JEsus.

Hail! We 3) are coming, my dear Spalatin, although Satan is trying to prevent me by more than one illness. For all the way from Eisenach to here I have been ill, and am still ill, in a way unknown to me until then. But I hear that also the mandate of Carls,

3) Namely Amsdorf, Peter Suaven, a Pomeranian nobleman who studied in Wittenberg, and the Augustinian monk Johann Petzensteiner. Schurs had been in Worms before.

4) This is the sequestration mandate of March 10, 1521, which was posted on the church doors in Worms on March 26 and publicly proclaimed on March 27. Printed in Förstemann's "Neues Urkundenbuch", p. 61, No. 18.

to frighten me, had been published. But Christ lives, and we will enter Worms, should all the gates of hell and the mighty ones who rule in the air oppose it? 1) I am sending you copies of the letters of the emperor. 2) It has not seemed good to me to write other letters before I have first seen what has to be done, so that we do not make Satan puffed up, whom rather to frighten and to despise is my firm intention. Therefore, provide an inn. Fare well. Frankfurt, 1521, Martin Luther.

Spalatin's Relation of Luther's Journey to Worms.

From Spalatin's Annals, p. 38.

In 1521, the year after Christ's birth, D. Martinus Luther was appointed by the Emperor on his Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Although the good man's books were forbidden and burned by the Emperor at the first Imperial Diet in Wurmb, he still appeared obediently on the citation sent by the Emperor, with such high Christian courage that he wrote to me, Spalatin, from Oppenheim in Wurmb: He wants to go to Wurmb, even if there were so many devils in the world, as there were always mirrors.

Luther's own account of his confident answer to Spalatin.

See No. 550.

As I am now not far from Worms, Spalatinus (who was outside with Duke Friderich, the Elector Blessed) sends me under his eyes, warns me not to enter, nor to put myself in such danger. But I told him again: "If there were as many devils in Worms as there are tiles on the roofs, nor would I be in such danger.

1) According to the report of the "Tischrede", Cap. 55, § 2. Luther spoke such words to the herald when he asked him if he still intended to go to Worms after the imperial edict against him had been publicly posted in many places. This may have actually happened before Luther wrote them to Spalatin.

2) Probably the documents reported in No. 543 and 544.

I wanted to go in, because I was fearless, I was not afraid of anything. God can make you so mad; I don't know if I would be so joyful now.

The litany of the Germans, which was made around that time, is still well arranged in Papal language, but nevertheless in and for the cause of Luther.

Between March 6 and April 16, 1521.

This writing appeared in Latin under the title: Idtarna Osmiarioruin, sivs suppleatio ad douro optiimiln IQÄxiinuin pro Oorwania, dadiin in oslekri <znnncinrn Oorinaniao nrko in die oinernni in Quart. The time: in dio oinornn, the 13th of February, is fingirt, because at that time it was not yet certain that Luther should come to Worms, while it says afterwards: "if he will arrive now soon in Worms". Therefore it will have to be put into the time assumed by us. It is found in Kapp's "Nachlese", Theil II, p. 500. In von der Hardts nutoAr. I^utksr., toro. III, p. 46, this writing is erroneously placed in the year 1520, but Spalatin has added the year 1521 in his own hand.

Translated from the Latin by Joh. Frick.

Litany, that is, humble prayer to the triune God, for Germany" held in a certain famous city in Germany on Ash Wednesday [February 13, 1521].

Kyrie, Eleison. Christe, Eleison. Kyrie, Eleison. Christe, hear the Germans.

Christ, hear the Germans.

HErr GOtt, Father in Heaven. Have mercy on the Germans.

Son of God, Savior of the world. Have mercy on the Germans.

God Holy Spirit. Have mercy on the Germans. Holy Trinity, some GOtt. Have mercy on the Germans.

Holy Mary, pray for the Germans.

Holy Mother of God,

Holy Virgin of all Virgins,

Saint Michael,

Saint Gabriel,

Saint Raphael, pray for the Germans.

All holy angels and archangels, pray for the Germans.

All holy orders of blessed spirits, pray for the Germans.

Saint John the Baptist, pray for the Germans.

All holy archfathers and prophets, pray for the Germans.

Saint Peter,
 Saint Paul, Saint Andrew, Saint
 James, Saint John, Saint Thomas
 (namely the twin, not Aquino's),
 Saint James, Saint Philip, Saint Bartholomew, Saint Matthew, Saint Simon, Saint Thaddeus, Saint
 Matthias, Saint Barnabas, Saint Lucas, Saint Marcus, / . please for the
 ~

Malice Inquisitor, and Silvester Prierias, the Pabst's very cunning fox-tail.

All holy monks (excluding the villains, of whom there are an infinite number) and hermits, pray for the Germans.

All holy priests and Levites (but you hardly meet one or the other these days), pray for the Germans.

Saint Mary Magdalene, Saint Agnes, Saint Lucia, Saint Cecilia, Saint Agatha, Saint Catharine, Saint Clara, Saint Elizabeth,

please for the Germans.

All holy apostles and evangelists, pray for the Germans.

All holy disciples of the Lord, pray for the Germans.

All holy innocents, pray for the Germans.

Saint Stephen, Saint

Lawrence, Saint

Vincent, Saint

Fabian, Saint

please for the Germans.

Sebastian, Saint

Blasius,

Saints John and Paul, pray for the Germans.

Saint Cosmas and Damianus, pray for the Germans.

Saints Gervasius and Prothasius, pray for the Germans.

All holy martyrs, pray for the Germans.

Saint Sylvester, Saint

Gregory, Saint

Martinus, Saint

Augustine, Saint

Ambrose, Saint Jerome,

> please for the Germans.

Saint Nicholas, Saint

Louis, Saint Julianus,

All holy bishops and confessors (of whom there were very few), pray for the Germans.

All holy Doctores (by calling them holy, M. N. Theologists are excluded from this), pray for the Germans.

Saint Benedict, please for the Germans.

Saint Franciscus, pray for your followers that they do not slander everyone.

Saint Anthony, pray for the Germans.

Saint Dominic, pray for all your monks, especially for Hoogstraten, the heretical

All holy virgins and widows, pray for the Germans.

All God's saints and holy ones, come to the aid of the Germans with your intercession.

Be merciful, spare the Germans, dear HERre GOtt.

Be gracious, hear the Germans, dear HERre GOtt.

Protect the Germans from all evil, dear Lord God.

Before all sins,

From your wrath and disfavor,

From a nasty quick death,

Before the pope's tyranny,

From the devil's and the Roman-minded cunning and deceit protect the Germans, dear Lord God.

Protect Alexander, dear Lord God, from hatred and envy and all evil intentions.

Before the papal indulgence,

Protect the Germans, dear Lord God, from all the monks' misbeliefs and customs.

Purify the Germans from the godless courtiers, dear
 HERre GOtt.

From the fornicating spirit help the Romans, dear
 HERre GOtt.

From lightning and thunderstorms,

Before eternal death,

From the false prophets (also called pseudo-theologians),

From those who come to us in sheep's clothing (but inside are ravening wolves, whore hunters and peelers in the skin), protect the Germans, dear
 HERre GOtt.

Protect the Germans, dear Lord God, from the terrible dread, bulls and banishing rays of the popes.

Before the insatiable avarice of the Roman-minded, close your chests, you Germans, and open your eyes.

For the sake of the living God, Aleander is up to no good.	will arrive, 1) protect and preserve from all Venetian poison.
From the sophists' mockery turn away our ears, dear Lord God.	Redeem the souls, which the scholastic theologians seduced by their mindless sermons, from hell again,
From all ungodly and heretical teaching purify the schools, dear Lord God.	To bring the scholastic teachers to the knowledge of the true God.
From the unspiritual questions save the theologians, dear HERre GOtt.	But lead those who have so far strayed from the path of truth onto the right path.
Free the minds of the great from all evil suspicion against Luther, dear Lord God.	Eradicate those godless theologians.
From all barbarism empty the chairs, dear HERre GOtt.	Push down the preachers who teach what is not proper from the preaching chair,
From the yoke of Roman rule free the Germans, dear HERre GOtt.	Pope Leo of the Tenth curb rage.
From the palliis to be solved by Rome help our bishops, dear HERre GOtt.	To keep the brave German knight, Ulrich von Hütten, M. Luther's trusted friend, steadfast in his good intentions and in the business he has taken on for M. Luther,
From the annals make Germany loose, dear HERre GOtt.	King Carl's confessor (Glapio), who is very repugnant to Mart. Luthern very much disliked, teaches him better.
From all rage help Aleander, dear HERre GOtt.	Do not let yourself, Lord Jesus Christ, once crucified, be crucified again by the godless Christians,
From evil and evil-minded robbers help Carl, dear Lord God.	Burn with fire the buildings of some divine scholars that have become whorehouses.
Through the mystery of your holy incarnation,	To allow the priests who defile themselves by illegitimate intercourse to become legitimate again, as before,
Through your future,	To free the Aleander from the madness,
Through your birth,	The apostolic nuncios, who act unjustly from all sides against the princes assembled at Worms against M. Luther, vigorously stir from above,
Through your baptism and holy fasting,	Martin Luthern, who had already been condemned once without cause of unheard-of things, revive in the Godly hearts.
Through your cross and suffering,	To the German princes now assembled at Worms, bestow your grace, peace and mercy.
Through your death and burial,	Prevent Carl, who does not yet have a mature understanding of the important points of faith, from making a hasty judgment,
Through your holy resurrection,	To show eternal goodness to all our benefactors, to redeem our souls from eternal damnation, to convince the Italians, Lombards and Romans that you are the true God,
Through your miraculous ascension,	Give and receive the fruits of the land,
Through the future of the Comforter of the Holy Spirit help the Germans, dear HERre GOtt.	Grant eternal rest to all who have died in the faith.
At the last judgment help the Germans, dear HERre GOtt.	And graciously hear us Germans.
We Germans ask you to hear us, to spare us,	Hear us, dear HERre GOtt.
You would be merciful to us Germans, bring us to true repentance.	Son of God, hear us, dear Lord God.
Govern and preserve your holy church (not the Roman one).
To keep the apostolic Lord (not the one who arrogates to himself dominion over the whole world) and all spiritual orders (of which there are none at all at present, since almost nothing is known about them as they were in use in the ancient Church) in the holy faith,
Give peace and true harmony to the common being and all Christian princes,
Fortify and sustain us Germans in your holy service,
Awaken in our hearts a desire for heaven,
Martin Luthern, the indisputable pillar of the Christian faith, when he now soon in Worms

1) This indicates the time of writing, namely between the citation (March 6) and Luther's arrival in Worms on April 16, 1521.

Lamb of God, who bear the sins of the world, have mercy on us.

Lamb of God, who bear the sins of the world, hear us.

Lamb of God, who bear the sins of the world, have mercy on us.

Christ, hear us,

Christe, hear us^

Kyrie, Eleison. Christe, Eleison. Kyrie, Eleison.

Our Father 2c. And lead us not into temptation.

Psalm.

Make haste, God, to save us Germans.

Lord, make haste to help us.

Those who take after the soul of us Germans must be ashamed and become disgraced.

They must return and be heard who wish us ill.

They must suddenly become ashamed who are shouting: There, there.

All Germans must rejoice and be glad who ask for Jesus Christ, the living Son of God, and who love your salvation and the freedom of Germany must always say: Praise be to Jesus.

But Luther is poor and miserable; God, make haste to him.

Lord, you are the helper and savior of the Germans; you our God, do not consume.

Glory to God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit 2c.

Prayer.

My God, save us Germans, your servants who trust in you.

Lord, be a strong fortress for us in the face of our Roman enemies.

Our enemy in Germany must not succeed, and the child of wickedness must strive in vain to harm us.

Lord, do not deal with us according to our sins, and do not forgive us according to our transgressions.

The Romans may always pray for their pope.

Let the Lord overthrow him from his harmful chair; let him crush his head; and let him who made himself God and Lord of the whole world be and remain Beelzebub forever, amen.

My God, help us Germans as we hope in you.

Lord, send us help from the Holy Place and strengthen us from Zion.

Lord, hear my prayer and let my cry come before you.

Prayer for the Roman Church.

Let us pray.

God, who is always gracious and merciful, listen to our prayer and hear us Germans, who humbly plead with you for the welfare of the Roman-minded: You will enlighten their hearts, take away blindness and ignorance from them, and convince them that after this life they have to wait for eternal punishment, and that they cannot possibly become blessed because of the indulgence and pompous nature that has broken out among them, which is flatly contrary to the teaching of the Gospel, so that they may honor, fear and love you all the more fervently. And so that this may be done, tear out and banish from their hearts all malice, vice, guile, deceit, ungodliness, abominations, heresies, blasphemies, damnable avarice, unnatural and more than animal lust, arrogance, simony and blind lust, according to which they would like to suck and exhaust all peoples under the sun. Let their tyranny, which they have let loose against us for so long and which has spread through all countries and nations, finally come to an end; but let them themselves, which all Germans heartily desire, be reconciled with you, so that they may learn to recognize the true God and Jesus Christ the Crucified, follow you, and through him become worthy to enjoy the unceasing joy of his most blessed vision for all eternity.

Prayer for the Emperor Carl.

Almighty and merciful God, grant your grace to our Emperor Carl, so that he, with sharpness (without listening to the flattery and ear-blowing of the Roman-minded and the Cardinals), may put an end to the disorderly, vain, lecherous and lustful nature, that is spreading widely in the church, for your glory, for the benefit of the preaching ministry and of all believing Christians, and that in your church, which has been in extreme decay for so many hundreds of years, a godly life may begin to be led again, according to the pattern of the ancients. Through our Lord Jesus 2c.

End of the litany.

Section Five of Chapter Seven.

It tells of Luther's arrival in Worms and his solemn interrogation before the imperial majesty and the imperial assembly, as well as of the malicious attempts of the papists to deprive Luther of safe conduct, even to kill him.

From Luther's arrival and public entry into the city of Worms.

557. letter from Veit Warbeck, canon of Altenburg, to Duke Johann of Saxony, on April 16, 1521, concerning Luther's arrival at Worms.

From Förstemann's "Neues Urkundenbuch," p. 68. With omission of the beginning and end at Seckendorf, Nist. lid. I, p. 152, in Latin, and likewise in the German Seckendorf, p. 346. We give the text according to Förstemann.

To the illustrious, highborn prince and lord, Mr. Johansen, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, my gracious lord. 1)

In S. F. G. selbs Handen.

Sublime, Highborn Prince, my poor prayer to God Almighty and submissive obedient services are ready to E. F. G. before. F. G. ready beforehand. Gracious Lord! I humbly inform you that Doctor Martinus arrived here in Worms today on a Saxon cart, together with a brother, 2) Niclas von Amsdorf, canon of Wittenberg, and a learned nobleman from Pomerania, called Schwofenius [Suaven]. In front of the chariot rode the skillful imperial Ernhold together with his servant, and led his clothes with the eagle on his arm. Behind the carriage rode the licentiate Jonas 3) of Nordhausen with his servant.

a servant. Many also rode out to meet him, namely from my most gracious lord's court He Bernhard von Hirschfeld, He Hans Schott, Albrecht von Lindenau, Schenk, with six horses, and many other servants of the princes. So he arrived here at ten o'clock, when they were eating. Nevertheless, more than two thousand people surrounded him until he reached his inn, in which he Friedrich Thun, he Philipp von Feilitzsch and Ulrich 4) von Pappenheim were ordered to lie, not far from my gracious lord at the inn "zum Schwan", where Duke Ludwig of Bavaria was located 2c. So I am told, great honor was done to him in the places in charge of my most gracious and gracious lord in Saxony 2c. He also preached in Erfurt, Gotha and Eisenach, and those from Erfurt met him on two roads and kept him honest. But in Leipzig they did not ask much about him, only the council gave him wine. As far as I am able, I will let E. F. G. know how things are going with him in the next message. However, E. F. G. did not omit to inform him of this, 2c. the Romanists did not receive any favor that he came, and were not a little frightened. For they had always hoped that he would stay away and not appear, so that they would have reason to proceed further against him. But the old God is still alive, he creates everything according to his divine will. I did not want to behave in the best way to E. F. G. in all submissiveness. I also entrust myself to F. F. G. as my gracious lord, in the hope that F. F. G. will graciously signify me. Dat. Worms, Tuesday after Misericordias Domini [April 16] in the year 2c. 1521.

E. F. G.

subordinate chaplain Veit Warbeck.

4) In the original "vtz", which Seckendorf correctly resolved by Illrious.

1) In the original this inscription is damaged and therefore in Förstemann with leaving gaps. But at the beginning "vnd leuchtigen" will not be read correctly. We have added the same.

2) That is, an Augustinian monk, namely Petzensteiner (see No.553), since the rule of the order required that an Augustinian should never walk or travel alone. This against Förstemann, who says: "Without doubt Luther's bodily brother is to be understood". Seckendorf correctly: Monachio.

3) Justus Jonas had joined the train in Erfurt.

Spalatin's account of Luther's arrival at Worms.

From Spalatin's p. 39.

Lutherus thus came in God's name to Wurmbis, Tuesday, after Misericordia Domini [16. April], with Mr. Justus Jonas, who was still a licentiate of law, and not yet a doctor of holy scripture nor provost of Wittenberg; although it was ready for the time being, and Peter von Schwafen, and witness to the Comptor of the Order of St. John, with whom Vtz von Pappenheim, the hereditary marshall of the empire, and Fridrich von Thun and Herr Philipp von Feilitzsch, both knights, also lay in residence.

559. Luther's own account of it.

See No. 550.

Now I entered Worms on an open little wagon in my cap; all the people came to the gaff and wanted to see the monk D. Martinum, and so I drove to Duke Frederick's inn, and Duke Frederick was also afraid that I was coming to Worms.

The bishop of Mainz would have done something else, because I should have come to Worms, and if I had been as fearful as he, I would not have come.

B. The discussion of the papists immediately after Luther's arrival. Luther's arrival, whether he should be given a safe conduct, and of their efforts with the emperor, as well as other cunning attempts to get him to do so.

560 Luther's relation, how the most secret imperial councillors, immediately after his arrival, when asked by the emperor how Luther's matter should be handled, advised him to put Luther aside. The imperial majesty, however, answered them most praiseworthy; whereby it is also reported how the princes of Palatinate and Brandenburg have clashed so sharply over this point that they have resorted to knives.

See No. 550.

When they had learned of this, my enemies, they had partly suggested to the resoinäenää Lää publioa that I should not be escorted. But the Count Palatine of the Rhine and Elector had opposed this, that I should be escorted, that and no other; he was also at odds with the Elector of Brandenburg, Margrave Joachim the Old, that they both took up knives.

The emperor had also ordered his most secret councilors, of whom there were eight or ten (among them D. Modo, Bishop of Palermo, Chancellor in Flanders), to deliberate, now that Luther had arrived, in what manner her Majesty should proceed with Luther; they replied: they had discussed the matter more extensively, and found no better counsel than that her Majesty should first set Luther aside and have him killed, and allege the example of Johann Hus, whom Emperor Sigismund might well have led to the Concilium in Costnitz, yet he was burned. Reason: because one was not obliged to give or keep a heretic a certain escort. But Emperor Carl had given this laudable answer: What one promises, one shall keep.

Luther's more distant account of how the Papal Nuncio Caracciolus at Worms had urged that he be burned, but Cochläus had offered to enter into a disputation with Luther if Luther would give him safe conduct, and how badly Cochläus was treated.

See No. 550.

Caracciolus stopped hard at Worms, they should burn me, but the Count Palatine and princes of Bavaria did not want to break the escort; it would also have turned into a riot.

den. Cocleus also came to me in Worms and wanted to dispute with me, and I alone was to recite the escort. But Vollrat von Watzdorff would soon have given him the escort, so that blood would have run over his head if he had not been resisted.

562. Ulrich von Hütten's letter to Marinus Caraccioli, in which he criticized him for his
The people of the country are called upon to leave Germany.

This letter is found in the Latin Wittenberg edition (1551), toin. II, fol. 176 b.

Translated into German.

Ulrich von Hütten, knight, wishes Marinus Caraccioli, Roman envoy, to do right.

1 I did not believe, Marinus Caraccioli, those who praised you with all their might as an honest man, when you were in Mainz two years ago. For I had never heard that a good envoy had ever been sent here from the city of Rome. But I would not have thought that you would be so boldly wicked that in the midst of this great assembly of princes and people in Germany, where the cause of freedom is being fought and Roman injustice is being denounced more strongly than ever, you still dare to carry on your haggling and to go in for theft, robbery and drudgery. For what else is there to think or say, since at the time when we Germans are working in earnest to shake off the yoke, you are collecting and extorting money from nowhere but from ourselves, so that you can fight against us? We cry out against your cruel and abominable tyranny, resist violence, reject rule, do not want to accept power, sigh for freedom, and act so firmly and steadfastly in this that it has long been thought that you are now hated enough by the common people and have been called evil. But you (Caracciole), as if this did not concern you at all, always continue in your wicked hucksterism as surely as ever, and forgive the sins of some for money, but allow others to sin for a named sum of money. You demand money for marriages from the young people in Germany. You let yourselves be deprived of the human and divine right, of what is permitted and respectable, of everything.

buy. Faith, religion, right and wrong you offer for sale, take gold and silver against the laws, and extort money from our poor in an ungodly way. O outrageous insolence! 2c.

And soon after

(3) Neither the present state of things nor the change of times, which you must pay close attention to, frightens you from such a beginning. For how could I believe that you could have turned either to shame, of which you Romans have nothing, or to the fear of God, whose existence you do not believe? Behold, the righteous legate, the only pious envoy of the pope of all, whom the Roman courtiers have so praised to me with great pomp and ostentation! What should you not have subjected yourselves to exceedingly ungodly acts, if you had lived in the times when in Germany no voice, not even sighs, were free? when against your wickedness no one dared to protest or even to look askance? How could you have acted there, since now, when we hope for the best and things are not at all bad for us, you dare to seek profit so miserly, in such an immoderate way, and in our fatherland here, before all the eyes of the people who are rushing to freedom from all sides, to confiscate our fortune 1) and to drag the money away from here?

You do not even secretly pursue this shameful profit, nor do you think of covering your shame in any way. That is why I could not believe it for a long time when I was told that you had demanded 300 gold florins from someone who wanted to marry the woman whose godfather he was. When he, both because he despised you for being stingy and because he saw that such a deal of yours was most unjust and had been made against all law and honor and the laws of Christ, he would have offered eight. You would have answered: "For eight gold florins you would not speak a word, let alone spoil seal and letter. But shortly after that I heard more and more. Only because of one piece you answer me: What right or fairness is it that he who has taken a wife, whose son he once led to confirmation, should pay 70 guilders? And yet you insisted so stubbornly that when he offered you only 10, you told him to pack himself away before your eyes, as if he were unpleasant to look at, because he thought so little of your antics.

1) Instead of confiscari we have assumed conūsors.

How dear you have not sold the freedom to eat all winter long! For whom have you granted the use of butter without money, or of milk and eggs, since you yourselves eat the flesh of four-footed animals and birds without distinction? But I interpret this as a kind of fate of the Christian people, that they could have been heard in such a way that they did not see that if something should not be eaten, unless the pope had allowed it beforehand, it would at least never be proper to buy it with money.

6 But this is your outrageous insolence, that you do what people of understanding could not suffer at any time, in these turbulent times, when everyone is striving for a change. Could your fierce desires not have lasted until this Diet was over? which is being held primarily to make Germany free again, so that you can no longer rob, cheat and steal here, and so that those to whom it belongs to rule the world are no longer interest-bearing for the city of Rome. Let the corrupt customs which you have brought from there be abolished, and the consciences of the people be freed, so that the truth may come to light, the gospel may resound in the ears of the common people, and the popes' statutes may be banished beyond Africa and India, so that the bulls may not plague Germany henceforth, and they may remain as far away from us as the legal disputes from the city of Rome which may arise over our ecclesiastical authorities. In short, that the Germans be free and true Christians 2c.

And soon after

7 You caught the opportunity and persuaded the young prince [Carl] a little, since he did not yet know what was due to him or in what state he would be. He gave in, he conceded. But what will he do when he learns afterwards what all German emperors have learned before, that the Roman bishops do not keep their word, and neither bind themselves to covenants nor promises, nor comply with treaties? What will he do when (as will certainly happen) he is cunningly deceived by you, deceived with lies and deceit, shamefully and ungodly deceived and cheated? Will he not then realize that we have given good counsel in vain, but you have carried out your cunning and deceit for so great a reward? But, O how wretched he is, if he does not already realize that he is being deceived, since you act so openly, and do not go further into your traps. Yes, wretched he is, if he, deceived by you, so that he cannot return other than to his greatest detriment. For this I worry, and therefore warn him in times. But now he does not hear, for you have held the ears that belonged to me; you have occupied and taken them. But they will be open once for a best counsel; wanted only GOD, before suffered harm. For no sirens are heard by shipmen with such danger, as the Roman caresses by the Christian princes.

(8) This I say to you, Marine, and command it: Stop perverting the mind of the pious youth; stop having the head of the princes and the people of the Germans as a mockery. Or do you hope that you can be tolerated here any longer, since you not only plunder us but also make us worse? Yes, I tell you, get out of here and leave at once. For although Germany, with its great damage, already knows that no honest orator or legate will be sent from Rome, it has nevertheless experienced this in you in particular. So much is lacking that it should suffer this forever that I rather believe it will avenge this on you before you take it into your heads to guard against it. You will well know what great misdeeds have come from you among the people. You see that they point at you with their fingers and wave over you. You see and realize clearly that we can no longer contain our pain and frustration. After being out of our minds for too long, we are now becoming wise again. Since we have been charmed with miraculous things for so many years, our eyes have now opened. Let, you villains, your ungodly thievery, your shameful robbery, your drudgery and unjust judgments stand. We have tolerated this for so long.

The darkness that you once covered over our eyes has departed from us. The gospel is preached, the truth is taught, your laws are no longer valid, the Roman vain things are mocked. One hopes for freedom. Do not think that you will continue to have as your prey those who have no desire for injustice. Henceforth you will not be allowed to corrupt the morals, to strangle the consciences, to turn the minds. Your power has been stopped. And if you do not put away your fair of exceedingly trivial things, if you, as another Verres, do not cease to sweep away (verrers) the money from here and to open your mouths after our goods, then you will certainly burden yourselves with a great misfortune 2c.

And soon after

I will break through to Carl's ears, which have been blocked for so long, yes, break through. He will, he will finally hear my good advice and turn against your will to the one who advises what necessity requires. I will speak before him of your glorious deeds and your most sacredly led mission. I will tell what you have sought here, what you are found to be. I want to say that all of you, as much as you have been sent here, you envoys of the Roman bishops, have been traitors to Germany, oppressors of this nation, and violators of all law and all equity for several centuries now. That is what I want to say, and you will have nothing to say against it. Therefore, pack yourselves from here, pack yourselves. What are you delaying, wicked one? Why are you hesitating, the worst thief of all those who have ever stolen here, the worst robber, the worst cheat, the worst rogue? Know that this is a most salutary warning for you, and also the last!

Some rhymes written on Joh. Cochläus at Worms.

From Kapp's "Nachlese," Part II, p. 494.

Rhyme translated into German by M. A. Tittel.

O thou mad brood of snails, 1) Who does evil to Luther. Who is called the pattern of fools, A race of sluggish spirit!
That gives rise to poetry, And pushes the horns away, Since only mud and drool are, Since a foot finds to tread (stomp), Which one cheaply calls peelers. Nor from mad fools separates, Which one counts with to hypocrites. Whose envy torments Luther. A sex that misses itself, If it is impudent and blasphemous, Luther is fallen by them, That yet stupidly (great) bounces back.
And much sooner a rough cow, And what one finds of donkeys, Can run them down, Than Lutherum, Löffelmann. 2)

1) Ooeülea from Oooülaeo. (Walch.)

2) In Lat.: Limius Oooülasns. But one need not bind oneself so much to the words. Luther calls him

C. Von Ulrichs von Hütten Ennunterungsschreiben an Luther, und von dm Briefen, die er sowohl an den Kaiser Carl als auch an die zu Worms versammelten Geistlichkeit Luthers wegen hat.

564 Ulrich von Hütten wrote two beautiful letters of encouragement to Luther, so that he would not lose heart in the certain hope of divine support, but would continue to fight joyfully for the cause of Christ. From Ebernburg, April 17 and 20, 1521

Two single prints of these letters have appeared, one at Wittenberg in octavo under the title: vuuu all Martiuuiri opistolao Illriei ud Hütten, the other under the same title in quarto, without indication of time and place. A copy is in Spalatin's manuscript at Weimar, Lls. Kpolutini, toi. 419 a. Printed in the Latin Wittenberg edition (1551), toin. II, toi. 175; in Burkhard's oonnent. de llutteni tatis ao ineritis, Theil II, p. 210 and in the works of Hutten edited by Wagenseil, von Münch and von Böcking. According to the latter edition, these letters are reproduced in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 123, but the first letter with the wrong date "April 18, 1521" instead of: April 17.

Translated into German.

a. First letter.

To Martin Luther, the unconquerable theologian and evangelist, my holy friend.

May the Lord hear you in the day of trouble! The name of the God of Jacob protect you! He send thee help from the holy place, and strengthen thee out of Zion. He will give you what your heart desires and confirm all your requests! May he grant all your requests and hear you from his holy heaven, in the strength of his right hand [Ps. 20:2, 3, 5, 7]. For what else shall I wish you, most worthy Luther, my dear venerable father, at this time? Be confident and undaunted [Jos. 1:6]. You see what kind of game is being played against you and what kind of door is being opened. You must never doubt me. If you remain steadfast, I will cling to you until my last breath.

otherwise, from cochlouri, snot spoon. And a spoon man, who has honed his trunk more to drink and eat than to speak anything clever, can also rhyme with this fchlammy snail and monkey species. (Walch.)

002 Many dogs have compassed thee round about, and the company of the wicked have gathered themselves about thee. They have opened their mouths against you like ravening and roaring lions [Ps. 22:17, 14]. They are glad and rejoice over you who pursue you 1) [Ps. 40:17], but the Lord takes care of you [Ps. 40:18] and will repay the arrogant. He will help you against the wicked and stand by you against the wicked. He will repay them for their wrongdoing and destroy them in their wickedness [Ps. 94:2, 16, 23]. So it will certainly happen, so, my Luther. For God, the just and strong judge, can no longer remain silent about such great wickedness.

3) Fight bravely for Christ, and do not give way to the evils, but face them with confidence. 2) Suffer as a good fighter for Jesus (2 Tim. 2,3), that you may awaken the gift of God that is in you, 3) and be sure that he in whom you have believed will be able to preserve your salvation until that day (2 Tim. 1, 12). I also want to be brave; but the difference between our two intentions is that mine is human, but yours is much more perfect and already depends entirely on divine things. If God wanted, I could see with what kind of eyes those 4) look at you, what kind of faces they make, how they pull together their eyebrows. I imagine all kinds of terrible things, and I believe that I am not wrong; but I hope that it is time for the Lord of hosts to cleanse the vineyard that the wild sows have rooted up and the wild beasts have destroyed [Ps. 80:14]. So much recently in greatest concern for you. Christ keep you! From Ebernburg, April 17, 1521, in haste. 5)

Ulrich von Hütten.

b. Second letter.

Martin Luther, the invincible theologian and evangelist, his friend,

Hail in Christ, the Savior! Who will stand with me against the wicked? Who will stand by me against the wicked? [Ps. 94:16.] My Savior Christ, heavenly Father and Holy Spirit!

1) Huts here has taken yuasrsntks in this meaning.

2) Vir^Λ. ^sn. lib. VI, v. 95: In N6 esckk malis, contra anäsntio ito.

3) The Erlanger Briefw. has äonniin in the text here, but the note: "Is äonurn to be read? cf. 2 Tim. 1, 6."

4) "those" at the Reichstag.

5) Bucer delivered this letter to Luther on April 18, and then immediately returned to Ebernburg.

What do I hear? What horrible things? Is the fury itself no fury compared to their hostile madness. I see that swords and bows, arrows and guns are needed to resist the rage of evil spirits. 6) But you, dearest father, be confident and undaunted. Do not be overthrown. They may scream, roar and rage; give these monstrous beasts the middle finger. More and more I see that every good thing is favorable to you. You will not lack defenders, and you will never lack avengers. 7)

(2) As to what you write, that you have been dealt with secretly, it is not for us to advise you. For we have no doubt that you will choose what will be best and insist on it. Many have come to me, and out of zeal, concerned for you, have spoken thus: If only he did not waver! If only he would answer steadfastly! If only he would not let himself be struck down by any terror! I have always answered to this: You would be a Luther. And I have also met it. For I see that you have answered in such a way that we will not lack. But persevere to the end. May Christ help that the wicked, to their great sorrow, find you so. The caution of my friends, who fear that I would dare something too great, compels me to hold still, otherwise I would have rushed some mob to the walls [of Worms] for those with the hats. But in a little while I must be released; when I am released, you will see that I too will serve in this way the spirit that God has awakened in me. 8) I sincerely desire to see you; love urges me to do so. Tell us about all your things and conditions, and farewell. 9) We have Franz [von Sickingen] fervently on our side. The rest is written to Spalatin. Again, farewell. Before you leave, would you like to see Franz; he wishes that very much. I hear that they will release you in a short time, a certain emperor writes to me. Christ keep you. From Ebernburg, April 20, 1521, in haste, without having read it over.

Ulrich von Hutten.

6) This sentence is missing in the Wittenberg.

7) Instead of this sentence, the Wittenberg edition reads: For the thing which you do is not yours, but that of him to whom the Lord said, Sit at my right hand 2c.

8) This sentence is missing in the Wittenberg.

9) The following to the date is missing in the Wittenberg".

565 Ulrich von Hütten's letter to Emperor Carl the Fifth, in which he emphatically presents to him the great oppressions of Germany by the Roman court and its courtiers, and humbly requests that he not be so taken in by the papal side, and that he paternally ensure general peace, but especially that he hear the innocently accused Luther, who is ready to take responsibility with such joy of conscience, and that his apologies take place.

April 1, 1521.

This letter is found in the Latin Wittenberg edition (1551), tom. II, col. 182. We have given the title of a German translation at No. 594.

Translated into German.

To the unconquerable and pious Emperor Carl V, Ulrich von Hütten wishes Heil!

If you, O emperor, had decided of your own free will to suffer some great and special harm for the common good of Germany, or to put yourselves in obvious danger, we Germans, according to our love for you, would certainly prevent you from doing so with all our might. For we would grieve that we should be helped with your harm or the slightest disadvantage for you. But how much more is it fitting to do this, since you, deceived by error, are going to your doom to our great harm and immense misfortune for the common being! For what else is there in Luther's cause but the oppression of our liberty and the fall of your state, and the desecration of your sovereignty? For this reason, I think, all of us must earnestly endeavor to prevent you from hastening to such a great ruin for the common people and yourselves, and to bring it about, with exhortations, warnings, and also with petitions and entreaties, that you will take such a decision, which will be respectful both to your race and to your high dignity. Not that I think anything is done by you out of evil mind or opinion, but because between a well-meaning conscience and exceedingly harmful motives you cannot discern what you should resolve and do.

2 Therefore, at least for a while, chase the priests away from you, who are not at all suitable to be bothered with in these times, partly because it is known that this kind of people never did your ancestors, the Roman emperors, any good.

partly because we really see that they are now advising exceedingly harmful things. For what could happen to you that is more unjust than what they say, if you, since you have accused Luther, do not give him any room for responsibility? and what greater misfortune and worse example could befall us than if a defender of common freedom were punished? And yet they are pushing you with all their might so that both may happen. Yes, they say that they have already forced an edict upon you by which the world is forbidden to read his books, and even his life is endangered, to great general sorrow; first, because we see that the freedom that is now reemerging is thereby opposed by a great obstacle; second, as it is said, that the unruly people have proposed this burden for him through their council, not because they thought of promoting the common good, but because they only want to exercise their revenge.

What is it to you, then, that the bishops' private hatred should concern you, in this assembly, when the princes and peoples of Germany have come together, to deal with common matters? Has this state ever rendered such services to the common good that the most necessary matters are left undone, and only the questions of the clergy are dealt with? However, even if this should be the case, I still think that because they desire things that are quite unreasonable and highly detrimental to this realm and to all of Christendom, they should not be allowed to do so.

They accuse Luther and cry out about him as a heretic, but they do not see what hard accusations these are. They complain and shout, but in such a way that they want to have him condemned by you unheard, and they lie in your ears with all their might that you should not let him come to any responsibility. Has Germany ever seen anything more unjust? Has it ever experienced greater shame? Not to hear a man accused of such a great crime, when he asks for it; and not to suffer him to apologize or to answer to what is put before him, when he so ardently begs for it? My skin shudders and I tremble and am horrified at the mere thought of such a thing, which is contrary to all ancient usage, custom, law, justice and religion.

5 For if Luther were not the man who restored the evangelical truth, which had not been practiced for so long, and preached it with the utmost diligence and earnestness, who distributed your sovereignty against those who made it contemptible, he would not have been the man who had preached it in the first place.

If a man who has committed a crime is not given room to answer for it, it is not possible according to any law or legislation that one who has committed a crime should not be given room to answer for it. For even murderers are not deprived of their defense. And there is no crime in the world so great that it should not be brought to trial rather than punished.

(6) Therefore it comes about that you see all honest hearts in all classes in disquiet. For as far as Germany goes, there are certainly no pious people who do not take this matter very much to heart. They are astonished at the unusual thing; they are surprised at the unheard-of, unbelievable news; they are almost beside themselves when they consider such an extraordinarily atrocious, despicable, wicked, ungodly thing. Some also show by grumbling and indignation how badly they are disposed to it.

Only the idle priests are exempt from this, and they complain against Luther because he has written and spoken against their statutes, against their excessive power, against their indulgence and dissolute life, for Christ's teachings, for the freedom of the fatherland and for good morals. For they murmur that their gain is destroyed, and their leisurely life interrupted, and their tyranny subdued. Because they interpret this differently, the opinion prevails almost everywhere that all of Luther's teachings contain the worst heresy. Therefore, Pope Leo has sent these envoys from the city of Rome, who, with the help of the bishops and cardinals, are to prevent this innovation from arising for them, and that the authors of such a movement are soon suppressed and subdued unheard, unsworn, unreprieved, and without knowledge of the matter.

8 On the other hand, all pious and brave men, who are an ornament to you at home and your strength outwardly, whose counsel in time of peace and whose power in war can be useful to you, unanimously desire that nothing be done contrary to the laws, contrary to law and usage. Therefore, you must now come to the decision whether you would rather strike before the head those who have always been accustomed to put themselves in danger for their emperors, and are still more than willing to do so, or whether you would prefer to please those who, if you were not happy now, would soon leave you; and whether you would rather harm those who have to protect your kingdoms and lives than deprive them of their completely dishonorable pleasure, who, when you are in the slightest distress, neither help you nor help you.

We know how to give advice. For what do the adversaries seek with Luther's condemnation other than their good life?

9 Therefore look to those whom you can regard as faithful companions in all danger, and make them your friends, and bind them to you with benevolence and gentleness, which can be both an honorable comfort to you in peace and a firm protection in war. But let go of those who are inexperienced and impatient not only in wars but also in all important deliberations, and who can help you nothing in adversity but can only harm you in happiness and prosperity. But these you have now, when everything is well around you, closely associated with you, and they cling to you as loyal friends, but if the tide should turn only a little, and misfortune should break in, you would soon see them running despondently from you as shameful turncoats and renegades. For they are used to be only companions of fortune, and even then not at all faithful.

(10) I could prove with examples, which are not far-fetched, into what misfortune these people have often plunged our princes before, into whose friendship they had crept just as flatteringly as these now, and show how such people's manner and habit should be reasonably suspicious to us.

(11) For if there were nothing else, should it not be considered that, since they are under the Roman Pontiff and are bound to him by oath, they cultivate the friendship of the emperors only to the extent that it is right for him, and do not get involved in anything from which they cannot wriggle again if he calls them back and withdraws them? They often speak and do many things here to please him; indeed, they advise you to do nothing that they do not recognize as good and useful for him. You would see this clearly in their actions now, if they had not taken over your whole mind beforehand. But think better of it. Rip such a great pledge out of the hands of the wrongful owners and give it back to those whose property it should be.

(12) In saying this, I do no injustice to the holy bishops and priests. For if they are such people, they will not want to deal with matters that do not concern them. For they have to take care of the churches, and their office is to benefit everyone with warnings, exhortations and teachings, to harm no one, and to diligently see that no soul is lost through error; which they cannot do if they are at the same time involved in the affairs of the kingdoms. But the exceedingly proud and lecherous people only take the episcopal

They are eager to take on the dignity, but they do not want to carry the burden; they seek the benefit, but they flee the burden; they pursue the profit, but they shun the work. And since they defiantly boast of their title and name, and enrich themselves with money and fortune, they nevertheless leave their work and office behind in such a way that we see that they completely despise what they are.

(13) Then you, O emperor, must also see to it that you do not incur some blame in this matter. For you must leave them to their official duties and not drag them from spiritual to worldly matters, but rather, if they fall into other matters, direct them back to their own and stop them. But as things stand now, you must consult brave men and not allow yourselves to be abused by such weaklings and opulent people. If they are of any use, it seems most unreasonable that Germany should be governed according to their will. For they are generally devoted to pleasure, and indulge in laziness and sloth; in important deliberations little can be done with them. That is why they take and give everything to pure lasciviousness, and although they pretend to be godly on the outside, they are secretly full of all shame and evil deeds. But if they are pious and righteous, as they should be, you owe them honor and respect, but not riches and dominions. And if you give them these, you do wrong, because they are thereby led away from their office.

But there is another thing behind it. You will not retain the love of Germany (which is now very great toward you and which you must try to win more and more) if you do not let it go. You could have noticed how recently people everywhere have become very sad, since they saw you surrounded by so many, not brave war heroes, but by those with the hats and a large crowd of priests at your first entry up the Rhine. For they thought they were seeing something quite unusual and of which they had not been aware, and that the honor and respectability of the German nation would be forfeited immediately and right at the beginning. Nothing was more sensitive to them than this. And since they had heard Aleander's highly improper request soon after, many were about to do something worthy of them, and they would have submitted to it if it had not been beyond doubt to them that you yourselves would be moved by this impropriety.

15 Therefore, you must certainly see both what you allow the Roman Pontiff to do against us and what you allow the Roman Pontiff to do against us.

and what kind of opinion you will get from the people. Remember that you are now taking your first steps, and take care how you start things right, and what hope you give for the future. But you must prevent the Roman companions from usurping our rights, but you must not allow or help them to put a harder yoke on the neck of this nation. Do you want to put him, who tried to prevent you from becoming emperors as much as he could, above the emperors? Yes, do you want to give him the power to rule yourselves? Do you want to cede so much of your sovereignty to anyone, let alone to him who has so clearly shown how he is disposed against you? And you, who are supposed to rule over all, do you want to make yourselves servants to anyone? Where then is the promise you made so beautifully to the princes who chose you as emperor, that you would seek to restore much that had been snatched from the empire? Fulfill at last what Germany expects on account of your promise, and do not let us fall into despair, as if no justice could be hoped for in the future; do not stand in your own way, and do not bring misfortune upon yourselves of your own free will. You have enough misfortune to fear from fate; do not bring upon yourselves the most miserable misfortunes, and do not bring gloom upon yourselves.

According to the love we bear you, we ask that you maintain the majesty in the kingdom and do not betray yourselves to those who trample your majesty underfoot. And if this cannot be preserved, we implore for the sake of your welfare that you at least have mercy on us and do not expose the whole nation, so many noble estates, so many brave men, whose freedom you should seek to preserve, but not to promote their servitude, to the greatest shame at the same time as you. We have been greatly disgraced in various ways in recent years; do not let this happen to you, that you want to serve those over whom you can and should rule, and in such a way that you at the same time impose the utmost servitude on us. For how has Germany been so guilty that it should perish with you and not for you? Lead us rather into obvious danger; lead us into fire and sword; let all nations rise up against us, all peoples break forth, all people's weapons strike at us, so that in danger we rather let it depend on brave resistance, than that we so pusillanimous, so unmanly, without weapons and deathblow, like women, subject and serve.

1) Instead of st in the Wittenberg, read uisi.

It was hoped that you would remove the Roman yoke from us and tear down the tyranny of the popes. God grant that what follows may be better than the beginning! For although fear has not yet risen to the highest level, there cannot yet be any real confidence in such humiliation, since such a great emperor, the king of so many nations, is so willing to serve that he cannot be forced to do so. For only believe that the Germans would have seen it sooner if someone had found you weaker in the quarrel and had overcome you, that he had forced you to accept unreasonable peace conditions, than that they now see that you have been sent here by two very bad legates from the city (Rome) with extremely imperious orders, with exceedingly imperious orders, that you concede everything, refuse nothing, so that the foreigners despise us, because they see that we are so unfit to rule over others that we allow ourselves the most abject servitude.

18 Your grandfather was criticized for allowing the scribes too much and having too many of them at his court. What will people say of you, who have so many lords and masters, when cardinals with their hats and bishops with their caps swarm around you, since the latter still retained his prestige among his own, however powerful they were.

19 But it would seem that the friendship recently made with the pope would be for the common good, for these Romans have at last once kept faith with those with whom they have made treaties. They may have kept such treaties once, but should you not also think of the Florentine kind, you could still be charmed, especially since they have already been caught in fraud two or three times? But what kind of friendship is this with one who gives a law according to which he owns yours and subjects you to it, so that no equality remains in the least? For how these things of yours have been received by the people, it is not necessary to tell at length. You have already been able to notice by many manifold and clear testimonies that such alliances with those people are not at all dear to us, that we rather have a horror and abhorrence of them, and will never be satisfied with them as long as they take such liberties here, which cannot be permitted by free people. How many such treaties has Maximilia nus with them, which he often raised again when they expired; and yet, shortly before his death, he testified: that none of the popes, who in his time had been some thirty years after each other, had kept faith with him.

20 But you imagine better things. It may be. I suppose that he would keep everything that has been agreed between you, but it is neither an honor for you nor a suffering for Germany that you should buy peace at this price. For you not only grant him the empire, Italy and Rome, the seat of the imperium, but also consent to his plundering Germany as often as he pleases. Nor do you refuse to pay him money for the annuities or to buy the palliæ. Yes, you allow a fair to be held here with bulls, and allow the Roman courtiers not only to live but also to rule. Shall a friendship made at such a price, a peace made on such terms, be accepted as being for the common good? Thus say they (say you) who are my counselors. I know well that they say it. For in order to enter into such things and to advise, the priests have made themselves about you and have taken you over completely. For they are pleased to let all the Roman knaves go, lest, if they were controlled, their turn should come at last to them also.

(21) But you, how can you excuse yourselves that you torture with edicts those who godly counsel you and want to lead you into better ways (only to help those your friends in all their seeking), and soon after that you intend to punish them with eight and death? For this is what they boast of, and it is contained in your edict. Therefore they wish for happiness, as if Luther were already suppressed, and threaten me with the most terrible things. Whatever you may intend in it, I will not cease to care for your preservation, if you have nothing but my destruction in mind. I will also try to pull you back from the fall against your will, to protect you from the downfall and to save you from the ruin. With me it may go, as God and my fate wants!

22 But I think that at present it depends a lot on how Luther is treated by you, not only because it is extremely shameful to condemn an innocent man, but also because I do not know whether a worse example than this can be given if he is condemned innocently. For who will advise you freely?

When you not only get no thanks for useful advice, but even punishment? The time will come when you will gladly give much for such a counselor. And you must not think that few care for him. For although you do not see many who are pressing this matter with you, you should know that because the Germans always advise their cause with deeds rather than words, that Luther's welfare is very dear to everyone's heart, and now many are grumbling about the fact that you could be induced to announce this edict. And what more do you want to expect from those who talk a lot, from whose sighs and sadness you already see what they want? And even if this were not the case, you should not deprive anyone, let alone one who stands up for your highness, of the right to answer.

(23) If you still have any doubts about the matter, this should teach you what a matter it is that his enemies are so eager to seek his condemnation from you, and this should show you how their consciences must be, since they take such great pleasure in the fact that he should be in trouble; for which reason they also rejoice about the omitted edict everywhere without any secret, and publicly reveal their meaning. For would they pursue the matter so diligently with you if they knew that their accusation was of such a nature that you would have to be satisfied with it even if the defendant were also to answer? And do you not see, then, that they do not ask you both for a proper court to punish a guilty man, and that they aim at violence by which you should suppress an innocent man, desiring this with the highest zeal, that you should not let Luther come or answer his cause, or answer what is brought before him, or that he may clear himself of the crimes laid against him? But would they also have such joy over this edict, if there were something good in them?

(24) Oh, get rid of that perverse generation of yours, which has nothing human about it at all, but fights against the pious with pure rage and fury, in order to have the vices free! And all this in such a way that you (for whose honor and respect we have to take care) are also involved in such disgrace and dishonor. Away with such people!

(25) Let the Romans also leave completely, who have not come here to either make friends with the pope for you, or to otherwise promote the common good, but to help you.

We are only here as idle spectators, spying out all our words and deeds so that they may be carried to Rome. Since the cautious Leo knew that there was danger, he sent you these pawns, which he could easily muck out, two arch-peelers, full of evil plots; one, an exceedingly cunning hypocrite; the other, a daring and baseless villain, but both without good reputation or any virtue and modesty. And they have thought it their duty to act wickedly, wickedly, unjustly, and unjustly in everything with you. And nothing else has been found in them up to now. But what they seek, they have decided, when flattery and cunning do not bear fruit, to drive through with terror and threats. Aleander recently confessed this clearly, and we are to let such people, who carry out such dealings, escape from here with impunity? You almost want to let it happen,' as you can see.

But believe for sure that there are still people in Germany who, even if they have to give you a push for a while 1) (which will always be useful afterwards), intend to do something praiseworthy and glorious. And these, together with all pious people, now ask and implore you with me that you let yourselves be turned away from evil and harmful error, and from such harmful counselors, and that, when you see how Germany is now, and how the people are minded, you incline to those who advise you what is useful and honest, and who, if it is necessary, want to and can carry out the counsel with action.

27 That you also listen carefully to Luther, and do not repel such a man, whom, even if he were guilty, you could well give the wish of so many good and righteous people, from the law and from the laws to which he resorts. For even if he shies away from them, he should still be heard, how much more now that he wants to defend his cause with such joy of conscience. For even if he were suspected by everyone, he should not be denied permission to purify himself. Much more, since all good people know and are aware of his honesty, and since he is accused only by a very few who resent him because of his virtue, you must not allow anything that goes against the laws, the old custom, and common usage. We ask you this for the sake of your imperial promise.

28. and because one knows well what is more about

1) That is, if you had to do something that would be annoying to Emperor Carl.

If Luther's cause hangs in the balance, believe that all of Germany is kneeling at your feet, pleading and beseeching you with tears, and calling upon your mercy, pity and help, so that you will save and preserve it, help it back to its right, free it from servitude and rid it of tyranny. For the sake of the most glorious memory of those who formerly suffered servitude under the Romans, masters of the whole world, do not allow us to be subject to the female softlings. April 1, 1521.

566 Ulrich von Hütten's letter to the clergy assembled at Worms, in which he reproaches them with great frankness for their enmity against the evangelical truth and their vicious life, and exhorts them to reform.

This letter is found in the Latin Wittenberg edition (1551), tom. II, col. 178.

Translated into German.

Ulrich von Hutten, Knight, wishes the Cardinals, Aebts, Bishops, Provosts, and the entire assembly of priests who now challenge Luther and the cause of truth and freedom at Worms, that they repent and mend their ways!

If it were because of your wicked intrigues, because of which one can no longer walk safely among the people, I would have wanted to preach what I am writing here heartily and with a good conscience into your ears. But because I now see that you suppress the law by force and trample the laws to the ground, I do not want to appear present, but I do not want to withhold my opinion and testimony of truth from you. And how could I refrain from doing so, since I am firmly resolved to stand by the right, even if I have to die, and to fight to my last breath for the freedom of the fatherland against the oppressors and tyrants.

2 And not only when my turn comes (whom you are now saving to I do not know what new misfortune), but also especially now that I see that Martin Luther, who is so pious and blameless that he could not be rebuked even by you enemies to this day, and who is a preacher of truth and faithful steward of the evangelical doctrine, is being dragged around by you with violence and injustice,

I will be tormented and martyred. Since you are quite fine opponents against me, who, because you do not dare to do anything with thorough scriptural truth and scriptural testimonies, or other good and reasonable reasons, you exchange the shield and seize the Greeks' banner, that is, you take recourse to evil plots, arm yourselves with cunning and trickery, and intend to attack us with edicts by a completely new, unheard-of way of fighting. O a new, unheard-of thing, which is suitable for nothing less than your office and profession!

What need have you of compulsion and force, since you are fighting such a battle in which no one need be compelled? Or what need have you of the emperors' letters and charters, since you have so much holy and irrevocable Scripture to defend yourselves? But you have raised your authority even above the laws and ordinances of Christ, and now you want to win not with the testimony of Scripture, but merely with the prestige of your majesty. For you are bishops and priests, and represent Christ's place here. Therefore, you may not be resisted, nor may anything be said against you, nor even thought. For you also submit yourselves to our consciences, and whatever you write or say shall be regarded as holy and sacred. No reason nor witnesses shall be valid against it. You must be heard, you must be followed, you may lead wherever you want.

4 But we will not follow you any further, since you no longer follow Christ. For if you were to follow him, you would be deprived of riches, wealth, ambition, and indulgence, and you would bear his cross. But because you have departed from him, we will not join you as long as you remain away from him. For that we should not be led into error by blind teachers, a better apostle, Paul, warned us long before, when he commanded that we should follow him and his like, who can be an example of life to us, but not follow those who walk evil, the enemies of the cross; Which end, saith he, is damnation, to whom the belly is their god, and their glory is put to shame, because they are earthly minded; for the walk of the apostles (who are in truth) is in heaven [Phil. 3, 18-20.].

(5) And how aptly the apostle pictured you as a prophet, and set your life before the eyes and hearts of all! Or do you not realize that this is said of you, since you are aware of such a life? and all know and see that you walk according to nothing else but well-being?

You hate the cross of Christ because you avoid everything that is hard and difficult, and never tolerate anything unpleasant for Christ, but live your lives in all softness, idleness and well-being. But how should you want to suffer violence, since righteousness is unpleasant to you? or how should you hear words of reproach, since you cannot bear the sound of truth? Indeed, how should you suffer beatings, torture and death for the sake of Christ, since, if you are only awakened from sleep or your pleasure is disturbed in something, you start a war over it?

(6) Therefore, according to the holy prophet's unbreakable saying and prophecy, damnation must come upon you as your end. For you worship your God, the belly, seek your glory in shame, and since you have no walk in heaven, and expect nothing less than Christ, you turn all your cares and thoughts to earthly things.

7 And although you are such people, you presume to rule over laws and customs. And although everything is quite disorderly and confused with you, you still want to lead the rule, and indeed in such a way that one can not appeal to you. Where are the patient people who can bear this? But you, when will you, since so much unrestraint in wrongdoing and shameful deeds have been committed. Will you be moderate in this? Will you not stop once? Will you ask for nothing? respect no one? I am sure that such security will not bring you any good. For if you do not respect such mischief and are not ashamed of your shame in front of anyone, will you not be afraid of God's eyes, which are always watching over you? and will you not fear the punishment that awaits such deeds? You live in such a way that no one would like to let a chaste wife enter your houses, and yet you want to rule the common people! Can we suffer their rule, whose company we flee?

8. see further, how you have nothing at all of Christ and the apostles about you, and yet call your state spiritual, you who are such carnal men that you drive every rational thought far away from you out of lust for the pleasures of this world, and seek nothing else than what can help your rule, wealth, to get on its feet. But you know how to attain wealth through all cunning and disloyalty, and that to no other end than that you get back even worse what you have gained badly, by striving after nothing so much as that you fill your insatiable gullet, completely given over to indulgence, inclined to laziness, and frozen in the most shameful idleness, so that one would rather call this a tavern or drinking house than a church.

(9) And yet you are not yet satisfied with all this, but still think to put the city of Rome itself right upon our necks; a yoke heavier than men could bear, and more shameful than men should bear, as if there were no savior of liberty anywhere, nor should there be, or as if we had become such cowardly wimps against you that we would never accuse you of error or urge you to amend.

(10) Take a good look at yourselves and consider your deeds; you will certainly realize that it could not possibly come otherwise than that the least of you will finally take the highest liberties against you in this life of yours. Namely, that you may have money only, not for necessity, but superfluous for opulence and indulgence; that you may live in pleasure, and arrange delights deliciously, and that everything may serve your insatiable avarice, everything be turned to your craving for honor, everything be subject to your desires; so that, I say, you alone may carry out everywhere everything according to your desire: for this the benefit of all must be harmed, the need of all must be broken, and none must keep what is his. Finally, for your cause to stand, the gospel must perish. Who has such an insensitive neck, and is so accustomed to the yoke, that he would not shake it off in the face of such a heap of your knavery, especially when a good opportunity is now offered him? or when men do not want it, and there is neither wit nor understanding left anywhere, will not Christ finally stand by his own?

(11) Shall men recognize you as being in the place of the apostles, since you have nothing of their kind? Shall they call you clerics 1) whom God has chosen as the best, to whom he says: I am your portion, since you do nothing less, think nothing less, than what is apostolic and belongs to clerics? yes, since no one lives more perversely than you, no one believes less that there is a God, no one does right and wrong, and mixes and confuses everything that is holy and unholy? For who would trust you even in matters of money, since you are in the habit of saying that it is church profit when something is obtained by fraud.

1) elsrieos from zcAH/rox, the loos, those chosen by GOD.

and cunning, by violence and iniquity, and all know that the Roman Pontiff also easily releases from an oath?

Therefore, either let yourselves be taken for what your life indicates, or prove in your work, life and deeds, 1) what you want to be called. And then, if the deeds will agree, you shall know that you are priests and not lords, servants of God and not rulers of the world. Your good is heavenly, not earthly. For if you have anything other than the Lord, the Lord will no longer be your portion, nor will you be clergy. In this way you are not at all now. For you do everything wrong and disorderly, since you live on our alms and eat our paternal inheritance unworthily, without any thanks, with contempt for God and man. So dear have we bought tyranny that knaves have been exalted. Before, the people of the world revered the sanctity of the clergy; now we must fear their power and wealth.

But you do not preach the gospel yourselves, nor do you let others preach it, except with great caution, because you fear that you might be touched by a swarm; and to Luther, who has told you the truth, you seek to bring destruction. The rest of us, who out of good knowledge contradict your tyranny, you intend to remove from the way. What is to become of it at last? What kind of evils will you not give rise to? If you were still explaining God's commandments to us and preaching the gospel, but in the meantime lived as you do now, we would murmur and say: Why don't you live like that yourselves? But now, if you could do it right away, you are ashamed to teach us, and yet you are not ashamed to live in the worst way. Why do you still arrogate to yourselves the name of priests and bishops, and want to be taken for clergymen? Can anything be more evil than these names and your life and performance?

(14) Finally, if you want to defy the majesty of the honorary offices, put on the perfection of life, that you boast not of the titles of bishops, but of their burdens. For how long will you reap our bodily goods, since in the meantime you sow us nothing of the spiritual? Do you want to live on our money forever, and even cultivate your shameful life with it? When Paul preached the gospel to the Thessalonians, he worked day and night, so that he would not be a burden to them.

He testifies, as if giving an account of his life, that his exhortation was not made out of deceit, impurity, or deceitfulness; neither did he, in preaching the gospel, seek to please men, but Gods: therefore he had no money or vain ambition in himself, and looked only to instruct and supply them with wholesome doctrines and statutes. Do you do any of these things? And since you know that you do not do such things, but are of quite a different nature and set up, yet you dare to take the place of the apostles, and under such a name arrogate to yourselves rights and liberty which no commonwealth could suffer! You want everything to be free against all, but nothing against you. When will you cease from such sacrilege? When will you put an end to such raving?

Pack yourselves away from the purest springs, you unclean swine! Troll out to the sanctuary, you cursed merchants! Do not touch the holy altar with hands so often defiled. For what has the Lord Christ to do with you, who have become servants of unrighteous mammon? You are after the flesh, and therefore respect only what is carnal. This requires spiritual people who are spiritually minded. What have you to do with our parents' alms, which they donated to the poor of Christ and took from us, their heirs, so that it would go to the churches? Why do you abuse what has been given for godly use, for eating and drinking, fornication, splendor and court, while many pious and godly souls suffer hunger? For what purpose have ye all abounded in splendor and revelry, while they that are better than ye, and ought to be in this place, perish for want and frost? Why do you waste and squander the money of the church, which should be distributed to the poor, in carousing, splurging, and other most wicked wickednesses?

16. Do you want to condemn Luther, the invincible preacher of the divine word, while you have no capable man who could awaken the faith of Christ through teaching or exhortation? You who feast in idleness and commit all frivolity, do you want to put difficulties in the way of him who works with all his strength and most diligently in the vineyard of God? Yes, because you see that he produces fruit, you want to oppress him with iniquity! Thus, you lazy and useless people of an

You envy his diligence and effort. Yes, you persecute him because he teaches the truth, which you have thrown behind your backs, and instead of it you have introduced the popes' statutes, all trivial things, but which bring you all serious things (because they serve for profit). And now, after you have taken up his blameless teachings with new lies, you want to destroy and ruin the teacher himself, who is aware of the best merit, out of envy against his virtue and annoyance over the profit you have been deprived of. For you are afraid that, if the gospel were to come back into pregnancy, your power would fall. For since he teaches temperance and wants us to live pure and holy, and his teaching is already received everywhere, you, who are used to boasting and superfluity, fornication and shameful deeds, and who are drowned in them, realize that danger is coming for you. As indeed must happen. That is why you have had his books, which are full of all good instruction, burned here and there, and forbid the human race to read them, and make your heart's thoughts clear, as you would have it that the Germans would not have a skilful man, and that all virtue would fall and perish.

(17) Where is such a gentle man who should not be enraged at such an abominable wrong? What else have you refrained from wickedness? Since the light of truth has long been darkened and Christ's teaching obscured, this divine light has appeared; will you dim it? These are the shepherds of the Christian people to me! who, when they should pray that the word of God may run and be praised, try to prevent and desecrate it. May the Savior Christ look in from heaven, and judge, and at last bring about that such new, such outrageous insolence and impudence may come upon the heads of those who have devised it!

(18) But to you, the anointed and consecrated, no one dares to lay a hand. For while you distort the words of Christ and the prestige of the holy Scriptures with a beautiful pretext for your protection, and the shield of your mischief and mischievousness, and since you are nowhere concerned about religion, but everywhere about your own profit, you draw the whole religion to yourselves, and place yourselves most insolently and boldly at the head of the whole of Christendom. For you are no longer ashamed to say or do anything.

019 But your deceit shall not prosper you for ever, neither shall your cunning help you for ever.

And perhaps the cause is already wavering in a very dangerous way. You know this very well and see that others also notice how much you fear for your cause. For you show by deed enough that, as long as the documents of truth and faith remain unharmed, your tyranny cannot stand. Therefore I wonder how you could have hoped that you would succeed. Did you not think of God's saying: Heaven and earth and everything will pass away, but Christ's words will not pass away? Therefore, as much as you can, you will never succumb to us. We have Christ as our foundation, and therefore we firmly believe that we are safe from any fall.

20 But we would gladly hold you in high honor, if you worked among us and presented us to the Lord. But since we see you only carousing, whoring, and doing nothing but foolishness, and do nothing in a serious way, should we allow you to judge about faith, of which you have nothing, or about religion, which you do not acknowledge by any work? By what magic art do you think you can so deceive us that we do not even wake up? Paul commands and asks through Jesus Christ that we withdraw ourselves from everyone who walks disorderly; and he also wants Timothy to avoid those who think that godliness is a trade. Since this is clearly before your eyes and resounds in your ears, you still hope that we will never get out of the servitude into which we have fallen. And you think it should always be like this, that we eat the bread of grace among you, in which you are extremely nonsensical people and completely insane in mind and spirit. For do you not see that such things can be moved, but not taken away? For you may shake them, but you can never completely overthrow them. But who can believe that your things will last? For he who can see, though you still hope, yet you stand in fearful dread.

(21) Therefore cease to hold before our eyes a fear so utterly trifling, and desist from terrifying us. We know whom we must not do violence to, and before whom we must show reverence or shun their majesty. We also know what is owed to right priests of God; and how this does not mean at all to offend religion, or to profane the sanctuary, if one uses unworthy people, who are not only without virtue, but also by

I am bold to say that none of you is a bishop, for you have all bought the bishopric, and none of you is worthy of the bishopric. For because you have once aroused my bile, I venture to say that none of you is a bishop, for you have all bought the bishopric, and it has not raised any among you his worthiness, but gold to his baton. You have valued the free grace according to money, and therefore you have no grace and are not bishops.

(22) Even if you had not been involved in this money transaction, and had become bishops only by the laying on of hands, your life is not in accordance with it, and we do not see the works of bishops in you, because you do not comply with what Paul, the blameless instructor of this profession, requires of bishops and priests. For he wants them to be blameless and irreproachable, vigilant, sober, humble, stewards of God, hospitable, diligent in all good works, temperate, godly, righteous, able to teach, keeping above true and sound doctrine, That they may be mighty to exhort by sound doctrine, and to convict the gainsayers, not obstinate, not angry, not contentious, not winebibbers, nor seek shameful gain, nor be covetous, nor have a good report, and not even the suspicion of any evil fall upon them. For he also wants people to have a good opinion of them and not to subject them to blasphemy. And so that you may see how he does not want to suffer evil manners in the bishops, he also demands a righteous and innocent life from their family. If he were to examine the bishops of today, would he tolerate the corrupt way of life in you, since he himself wants the bishops' children and servants to be of blameless morals?

(23) Therefore think how you will know yourselves, and cease from forcing the judgment of the people, and from frightening us, that, though you do not in the least perform the office of bishops, yet we should honor you more than is due to proper bishops. But hear Christ, that if ye shall be guided by his doctrine, ye may also preside over us with fruit. And that ye may be truly holy, not only in name, but also in deed, 1) Forsake the corruptible goods of the world, live moderately here, and let your treasure be in heaven. Instead of the courageous will and good life begin to mourn; instead of insolent and wild

Instead of intemperance, learn fasting and sobriety; instead of cruelty, learn mercy; instead of an evil conscience, learn a pure heart; instead of restlessness and turmoil, learn peace; and finally, learn not to strive softly for good life and good days, but to bear hard burdens freshly, to tolerate insults from others, but not to expel them first.

(24) When you begin to be such people, the glorious names will also be yours: Salt of the earth, light of the world, and the like. Then we will call you fruitful branches of that vine, and grant you the right to loose and bind here, that it may be loose and bound in heaven also. For then we shall not see, as now, that ye seek honor from men, but give it to God, or that ye overbear your brother in trade, or oppress him through envy, but walk faithfully in love, admonishing him, and caring for him with doctrine. Therefore, you will not be unbearable because of robbery, as you are now, but you will be popular and pleasing to all through kindness, service and good deeds. For then it will be seen that you do not harm many, but benefit all.

(25) Seek after such things; let this be your purpose in life. For why do you boast about vain titles and think that it is enough for you to be honored by empty names? This is judged by life and deeds. But you must know, according to Paul's teaching, how to walk in the house of God, which is the church of God, a pillar and foundation of truth. For when he prepares a bishop, he says: "Make an effort to show God a righteous and blameless worker, who rightly divides the word of truth" [2 Tim. 2, 15]. And: "Pursue righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness. Fight the good fight of faith" [1 Tim. 6, 11. f.]. And again, be an example of believers in word, in walk, in love, in spirit, in faith, in purity [Titus 2:7].

But what does he say about himself? [Gal. 1, 10: "If I were still pleasing to men (he says), I would not be Christ's servant." Likewise, how does John speak? [I John 2:16. "If any man love the world, in him is not the love of the Father. For all that is in the world, as the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the life of hope, is not of the Father, but is of the world." But do not seek (as Jerome warns) the gain of the world in knighthood.

1) dsatl. Lsatitucko vestra was the title of bishops.

Christ. But prove yourselves in such a manner as bishops, that ye be not for a burden, but for a profit; and, as he saith, not that ye be filled, but that we be not left empty, for whom ye must lay up all things, even life, after the example of the right shepherd, who laid down his life for his sheep, and gave you an example to follow.

(27) But why do I bring this up in vain before you, carnal men, who do not accept that which is of the Spirit of God? When I consider this, I cannot help but believe that the dangerous times have come, of which Paul, the seer who never deceived, proclaimed [2 Tim. 3, 2-5.]: "There will be men who think of themselves stingy, boastful, hopeful, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, ungrateful, unspiritual, disruptive, unforgiving, abusers, unchaste, wild, unkind, traitors, sacrilegious, puffed up, who love pleasure more than God, who have the appearance of a godly nature, but deny its power." From these words you see quite clearly 1) what kind of people he has described in advance, who would be a hindrance to faith and religion. Or do you not recognize your life and nature as in a mirror?

28. But as he foretold that you would begin the most wicked pieces, and therefore would have to be shunned, so he also foresaw the outcome of this with the same prophetic spirit. For, he says [2 Tim. 3, 8. f.], "in like manner as Jannes and Jambres resisted Mosi, so do these also resist the truth; they are men of broken senses, unfit to believe! But they will not persevere, for their foolishness will be revealed to everyone, just as that one was. And that is why I have often reminded you that such all-too-cruel insolence and intemperate tyranny will finally and inevitably lead you to destruction. For everyone already sees and recognizes that your boldness, born of deceit and mischievousness, is getting infinitely out of hand, and that with the greatest injustice you are taken for leaders, who should improve others with the example of life, and yet are for the most part notorious for lewdness and the most shameful immorality.

29 But there you have devised the deceitful counsel that no man may bring anything against your morals. That is why you first attacked Luther; if he should be condemned, you certainly hope to be condemned with me.

to become active. But it is quite different with me. For I even hope for victory, not to mention that I should despair of my salvation. But who shall believe of you that you will open the way of virtue, since you close it before the truth? But it will not remain hidden, but will emerge, even against your will, as you can already see with your eyes and grasp it with your hands, that even the stones and sticks themselves, if we were silent, would proclaim it 2c.

And soon after that further:

(30) Did it slip your mind because of intoxication and drunkenness that, when I had recently given you a mild admonition, you immediately shouted against me that I had blown the war trumpet? So unfamiliar was the thing to you, and so unreasonable did it seem to you. That is why you had no hesitation to accuse that mathematician at a respectable meeting as a kind of desecrator of your majesty, because he had caught you in a bird's net, which I don't know who wanted to draw. You are such delicate gentlemen, who are quite sensitive and do not want to suffer the least injustice. You should not be described, not painted, nor somehow depicted in stone. If the least is done, it shall be a crime to death.

(31) And since you want to preserve this, you nevertheless live so exceedingly dissolutely and shamefully that, as you yourselves must judge, you must perish. First you ate away what was on the outside; now you have even come to our marrow. The Christian people will no longer tolerate such oppression, which torments the church of God, because in many places they already call you a ruin of their fortune, a corruption of morals and a plague of life. But you, puffed up by more than Pharisaic conceit and pride (as if what is given to everyone's heart and senses, as it were, could be overcome by any stubbornness), do not stop threatening and inflicting death, and if you knew anything else worse, on Luther, who paves the way for truth and therefore becomes immensely popular with every kind of people, in the grimmest and most terrible way.

(32) Suppose he had erred, though that is the least of your griefs, whether a man believe or speak wrongly or rightly, and you would never have taken up the matter if it had not concerned your power and indulgence; but suppose he had erred, should you therefore rush against him hostilely, as against an enemy, or should you not be against him?

1) Instead of odLeurs in the Wittenberger will read non 06seure.

should you have admonished him lovingly as a brother? But where (as long as you were involved in the matter) was the slightest trace of love to be seen in you? Where could a pure heart and an honest mind be perceived in you? Did you not go straight to him and do everything without any reason? Did you not, in order to condemn him innocently, bring against him many things that you had invented and lied against him? Have you not cunningly sought to cut him down and put him on one side to please the Roman pope? Do you not still, since so many honorable people speak against it, deal with the fact that he is condemned unheard, unproven, without accusation and witnesses by the Emperor Carl and declared guilty?

Verily, excellent teachers of life, who treat others with all honesty and gentleness! Is this what it means to be a bishop or a Christian? When others afflicted us, you should comfort us. How it goes against it so wrongly! From whom one should hope all good, they do us all kinds of evil, and offend, afflict and torment us. Shall I not say to you, then, with Ambrose, a saintly and respectable pious man: You have an empty name, but abominable misdeeds; high honor, but shameful life; a godly estate, but ungodly works; a spiritual robe, but unspiritual conduct; a high echelon, but nasty missteps. In the church you have a higher chair, but your conscience is found the lower; you pretend to a deaf voice, but you have a dog-like mind; you show a sheep's coat, but have wolfish cruelty, so that one would say to you with the prophet [Isa. 29:13.], "This people honors me with their lips, but their heart is far from me."

(34) Should not this also rhyme with you? Or is there a measure of what might be said of your life and conduct from the very certain and unmistakable Scriptures? But this will go in one ear and out the other, like everything before. You are so absorbed in Luther that you neither see nor hear before him. This is what envy has done, this is what fury has blinded you, this is what anger has made you completely senseless. Even if I were to overlook everything else about you, the torture you have devised for good heads would be quite unbearable. For what is more base than that one banishes good heads? to burn books? to dampen the sciences? to kill the Scriptures? Will you then also give us the consolation of study and the

Take the fruit of the fruit of the womb? Will you forbid us to speak together and be friendly with each other? You immoderately 1) fierce and barbaric people! If you said this in front of the mob and sewed it among the people, then you would have to 2c.

And soon after:

(35) Now you are in the ears of the emperor, who has filled you with wicked doctrines and exceedingly impious and unholy suggestions, and you have already wrung from him an edict condemning our cause in advance.

But rage, and use your fortune, and spare no one with words and deeds, as you think fit; rage, storm, push, ravage, throw to the ground, and tread under foot, and go forth all fierce and senseless! The time will finally come for us, too. But beware, since you are already the rulers of the youthful emperor, where you are leading such a noble heart astray, since you will infallibly have to give an account to God of all such doings one day. One knows well how he is minded, and how he has long resisted the exceedingly unjust desire. But tired by much persistence, even compelled by threats (for you have become so bold!), he finally, partly to get rid of the complaint, partly to avert the danger, granted and gave what he could not give, and even if he could, he should not give it.

37 You rejoice over this, wish each other happiness, and triumph as if Babylon had been conquered, while we are not greatly distressed about this, as little as about what you still threaten further, as misery, banishment and death; all worthy rewards (as it seems to you) for the fighters of freedom. For even if you bring it about that he cruelly executes the raised eight, and takes away our property, fatherland, even our lives, you still have to fear many things for yourselves, both in the meantime and in the future. 2c.

And soon after:

(38) Learn, you mortal men, in the midst of the most beautiful glimpses of your happiness, to fear its changing form. It cannot last long, which so blindly submits. But perhaps God wills it so that you bring about your own destruction sooner than others intend to inflict it on you: and you yourselves give cause to persecute you sooner than others seek it. 2c.

1) Instead of extremae in the Wittenberg, read "extrem".

And soon after:

But I warn you again, because happiness is now too abundant for you to think that it could change, and to keep your desires and wills in check. You have now reached the highest. You must now no longer think of growth, but henceforth only of the fall. For all who stand high can easily fall. Do not then let your ambition go too far; set a measure and a goal for your money ambition, and let the indulgence decrease. For where will it finally go with such covetousness? Where will the money ambition have limits? Will you not once go into yourselves and think, not where you want to go, but from where you have come? Turn back to the right way, turn back also from your error; if you still can, improve yourselves! It has always been better to go back than to run dangerously forward. Be not enemies of the pious, but avengers of the wicked. Serve others, do not desire to have more and more for yourselves. Act in such a way that we can expect medicine from you, but do not have to fear poison. Control your desires, follow reason, 1) and stop cheating and mischievousness. Those who have been blind for many years will not always have the staar. You see that the air of freedom is blowing, and people, out of frustration with the present, long for a change of the present state.

40 If you consider this, it will be very beneficial for you. But if you continue to defy your good fortune and persistently pursue Luther as before, you will also bring your fate upon yourselves at the same time (for I seem to foresee what will happen). But remember that the avenging eye of God always looks at the lower things and that the judgment hovers over you from above. Know that through the condemnation of an innocent man you will at the same time lose your heads.

D. What high chiefs and other distinguished persons and deputies from the Diet of Worms have been present.

567: List of the princes, bishops, lords, counts and embassies who attended the Diet of Worms.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 1036; in the Jena edition (1564), vol. I, p. 4376; in the Altenburg edition, vol. I, p. 716; and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVII, p. 571.

1) Wittenberger: nationl instead of: rationi.

Roman Imperial and Christian Royal Majesty in Hispania, Sicily and Jerusalem 2c., Emperor Carol the Fifth.

Archbishop Albrecht of Mainz and Magdeburg, Elector 2c, Cardinal.

Archbishop Hermann of Cologne, Elector.

Archbishop Reinhardt 2) of Trier, Elector.

Count Palatine Ludwig beim Rhein, Elector.

Duke Frederick of Saxony, Elector 2c.

Margrave Joachim zu Brandenburg, Elector.

Archduke Ferdinand zu Oesterreich, Imperial Majesty's brother.

Duke Frederick of Bavaria.

Duke Henry of Bavaria.

Duke Wolfgang of Bavaria.

Duke Hans zu Bayern, zum Hundsruock.

Duke Wilhelm of Bavaria.

Duke Ludwig of Bavaria.

Duke Hans of Saxony 2c.

Duke George of Saxony 2c.

Duke Bugslau 3) of Pomerania.

Duke George of Pomerania.

The Landgrave of Leuchtenberg.

Duke Ludwig zu Bayern, zum Hundsruock, the Younger.

Duke John Frederick of Saxony 2c.

Duke Hans of Saxony, the Younger.

Margrave Joachim the Younger of Brandenburg.

Margrave Casimirus of Brandenburg.

Margrave Hans of Brandenburg.

Duke Erich of Brunswick 2c.

Duke Henry of Brunswick the Younger 2c.

Duke William of Brunswick 2c.

Duke Otto of Brunswick and Lüneburg.

Duke Philip of Brunswick, to the Grubenhagen.

Margrave Philip of Baden.

Duke Christiern of Holstein.

Duke Albrecht of Mechelburg.

Count and Prince Hans von Anhalt.

Duke Hans of Walachey.

Count and Prince Wolfgang zu Anhalt.

Count Wolfgang, Prince of Henneberg.

Count Bertold, Prince of Henneberg.

The Duke of Alba.

The son of the Duke of Alba.

But a son of the Duke of Alba.

Duke Sfortia of Milan, Duke Maximilianus of Milan's brother.

Count Georg von Württemberg und Mimpelgarten, Duke Ulrich von Württemberg's brother.

2) Otherwise he is called Reichard or Richard.

3) This is Bogislav.

Margrave William of Arsthot, of Croy, Lord of Stifers.

Landgrave Philip of Hesse.

The Count of Giving, the brother of the Duke of Sophoy.

Duke Henry of Mechelburg.

Count Wilhelm von Henneberg.

Margrave Ernst of Baden.

Archbishop Christoph of Bremen 2c., Administrator at Verden, Duke of Brunswick and Lüneburg.

Archbishop Matthes of Salzburg, otherwise called Burck, Cardinal.

Bishop Matthes of Wallas, the Swiss Cardinal.

Bishop George of Bamberg.

Bishop Conrad of Würzburg.

Bishop George of Speier.

Bishop William of Strasbourg.

Bishop Hans of Hildesheim, Duke of Engern, and Westphalia.

Bishop Erhard of Liège.

Bishop Ernst of Passau.

Bishop Franciscus of Minden, Duke of Brunswick.

Bishop Louis of Tud.

Bishop Peter von Trieft.

Bishop Peter of Palent.

The Archbishop of Panorm.

Margrave Frederick of Brandenburg, Provost of Würzburg Cathedral.

Duke Henry of Bavaria, Provost of the Cathedral of Mainz and Aach.

Mr. Jerome, Bishop of Brandenburg 2c.

The Bishop of Augsburg.

The Bishop of Trent.

The Bishop of Camerack, Margrave of Arsthot.

The Bishop of Worms.

Then Lord William of Croy, Cardinal, Archbishop of Toled, Primate in the Kingdom of Castile, Bishop of Camerack, Abbot of Affliaen, Abbot of Hohenberg, and Coadjutor on St. Peter's Mountain in Gend, blessed, who came with Imperial Majesty to Worms, died there on Thursday after the Three King's Days. May God have mercy on him and on all the souls of the faithful.

The provost of Cologne, a duke of Lauenburg, the bishops of Hildesheim and Münster brother.

The abbot of Weißenburg, Mr. Rhüdiger.

Mr. Hartmann von Kirchberg, Abbot of Fulda. The Abbot of St. Gall.

The Abbot of Morbach.

The Duke of Cleve.

The bishop of Almeria of Hispania, Her

Ferdinand's personal physician, who also died and was buried in Worms.

The Pabst's message Marinus Caracciolus, the birth a nobleman from Neapolis.

The King of Hungary Message.

The King of France Embassy.

The King of England's message, Mr. Cutbertus Tunstallus.

The King of Denmark Message.

The King of Melice Message.

The Venetian message, a Cornarius, and following a Contarenus.

The message of the Duke of Urbin.

The Marquis of Mantua's message.

A count of Eisenberg near Hesse.

A Count von Witzstein.

But a Count von Witzstein.

A Count of Büren.

Count Franciscus of Waldeck.

A Count of Being.

Count William of Neuenaar.

A Count of Westerburg.

A gentleman from Meseritz.

Imperial Majesty Grand Master.

Count Hoyer von Mansfeld.

Count Heinrich von Nassau 2c.

Count Wilhelm von Nassau.

Count Philipp of Solms.

Count Otto von Solms.

Count Heinrich zu Schwarzburg zu Arnstedt.

Count Heinrich von Schwarzburg zu Sondershausen.

Count Helferich of Helfenstein.

Count Ludwig von Helfenstein.

A Count of Schwarzburg, canon of Cologne.

Count Adam of Reichlingen.

A Count of Waldeck near Hesse.

The Count of Leisneck.

The Count of Honstein.

Count Philip of Reineck.

Count George von Wertheim.

The cathedral dean of Cologne, a sovereign and lord of Plauen.

Count Florius of Isselstein.

The Count of Titonibus.

A count of Hainau.

Mr. Christoph von Eitzingen, Mr. Michaelis von Eitzingen's son, who almost resembles [the] Roman Imperial Majesty and is of one age and one size.

Mr. Wolf von Schönburg.

Mr. Vladislav from Swiwo 2c.

A count of Nogarolis of Vicenz.

A Count of the Hoie.

A Count of Barbey.

But a Count of Barbey.
 Count Philip of Mansfeld.
 Count Heinrich von Nassau. 1)
 Count Wilhelm von Nassau.
 Count Philip of Nassau.
 A Rhine grass.
 But a Rheingraf.
 A Count of Leiningen.
 But a Count of Leiningen.
 A Count of Schaumburg.
 A count of Eisenberg, by the of Trier.
 A count of Pitscht.
 Count Gumprecht of Neuenaar.
 Count Günther von Schwarzburg.
 A count of Eisenberg, also near Trier.
 Count Albrecht of Mansfeld.
 A Count of Wettich.
 But a Count von Wettich.
 Count Siegmund von Gleichen.
 Count Ernst von Gleichen.
 A Count of Stone.
 Mr. Heinrich Reuß, Lord of Plauen and Cranchfeld.
 A Count of Rennenberg.
 Anarus, Lord of Wildenfels.
 But Mr. Anarus von Wildenfels.
 A Count of Neuengarten.
 A Count of Honstein near Brandenburg.
 Count Heinrich von Schwarzburg, Count Balthasar's son.
 A count of Zollern.
 Schenk Friedrich von Limburg, died here.
 But a Schenk von Limburg, his son.
 Count George of Henneberg.
 A Count of Ortenberg.
 Count Hans von Canusch 2c.
 Count Siegmund von Luppken.
 But a Count von Luppken.
 Count Georg von Montfurt.
 Count Hans von Montfurt.
 Count Hauge of Montfurt.
 A Count of Castel.
 A count of Oberstem.
 A Count of Sultz.
 A Count of Königstein.
 Count Bernhard von Eberstein.
 Count Michel von Wertheim.
 Count Wilhelm von Eberstein.
 Count George of Königstein.
 Count Christoph von Eberstein.
 The Lord of Rogendorff.
 Mr. Johann Hannart, 2) Burgrave of Lambeck.

1) This and the following have been mentioned before.
 2) The Wittenberg offers: "Hannart", the Jena: "Jannart".

Count Hans von Hardeck.
 Mr. Cyprian von Serentein 2c.
 An Ungnad.
 But an Ungnad.
 A young Count of Nassau, with Count Henry of Nassau the Rich.
 The Count of Frankenpan.
 A Count of Werden.
 Mr. Maximilian von Siebenbergen 2c.
 A baron von Zimmern.
 A Count von Bleß.
 The Count of Reppin.
 Count Hans von Eppstein.
 Count Boto von Stolberg.
 But a Count of Stolberg.
 But a Count of Stolberg.
 A Count or Lord of Wertich, 3) of the Archbishop of Cologne 2c. Brother.
 Mr. Hans von Schwarzenburg, the elder.
 Mr. Hans von Schwarzenburg, the younger, the elder's son.
 A gentleman from Degenberg.
 A gentleman from Losenstein.
 But a gentleman from Losenstein.
 Cologne.
 Worms.
 Augsburg.
 Nuremberg.
 Erfurt.
 Oppenheim.
 Weissenburg.
 Lübeck.
 Goslar.
 Esslingen.

E. Luther's standing and interrogation before the Roman Emperor and the entire Imperial Assembly.

1. from the first audience.

Luther's report of the official at Trier, Johann von Eck, public address to him in the imperial assembly, together with Luther's answer, and what Schurf said there; how furthermore, after the first audience was over and before the beginning of the other, many of the nobility visited him in his inn, and what they said to him.

See No. 550.

3) The Jena has on the edge: Widda.

After a few days I was summoned to the imperial council before the emperor and all the princes, at six o'clock in the evening. Then D. Eck, chancellor of the bishop of Trier, spoke on behalf of the empire and said: Martine, do you confess that these books are yours? Now all my books lay one after the other on a bench. Where they might have gotten them, I did not know; I would have soon said yes. But D. Hieronymus Schürf shouted loudly in the kingdom's council: Legentur tituli librorum, and when one read the titles, the books were all mine. Then I said: "Most gracious emperor and most gracious princes and lords, the matter is important and great, I cannot give an answer from the books this time; I ask that I be given time to consider it. This was done, and immediately the kingdom's council disintegrated.

In the meantime, many of the nobility came to my inn and said, "Doctor, how are things? They say they want to burn you, but that doesn't have to happen, they would all have to perish with you. That would also have happened.

Spalatin's report of the first audience, which also states that Prince Frederick had first thought that the emperor's confessor, Glapio, would address Luther.

From Spalatin's Dark, p. 39.

The following Wednesday [April 16], Käy. Maj. summoned them, the princes, princes and sovereigns of the empire, between four and five hearings to the palace or the bishop's court, where chap. Mat. Now it went on until evening, and although Duke Frederick of Saxony, Elector, considered it to be so, Käyr. Mat. Confessor would have used the word, it has nevertheless been confessed to Doctor Johan Ecken, Official of Tryer, who has first asked Doctor Martinus in a great pressure and consequence: whether he confesses to the books that were issued in his name. 1) Secondly, whether he wanted to recant or not? Then Doctor Martinus, by appointment of Doctor Hieronymi Schurff, asked about the means of the books. As the official of Tryer has read some book titles, from a book printed in Basel, Doctor Martinus has agreed to this.

1) The brackets are here, as in many other places in old prints, instead of the speech marks.

and asked, since this was the most important thing in heaven and on earth, that he be given a consideration, with a humble request to do his answer, if you want. For Christ himself said: "Whoever reproaches me before men, I will also reproach myself before God, my Father, and all his angels and saints. The official said to Tryer: "Although His Majesty does not owe him to do so, as this grace is unworthy of him, he does not want to be a part of it. Mat. as the benevolent emperor and lord, have allowed him to take his consideration, and on the following day at the same hour to give his answer.

2. from the second public audience.

570 Luther's own account of the official's repeated address to him at Trier, and what he answered, how this other audience finally proceeded, and what happened when Luther was led home by two of them.

See No. 550.

When I was called back to the kingdom's council, there was a large number of people in the hall, because everyone wanted to hear my answer, and there were many burning torches up there, because it was night. I was not at all accustomed to the hustle and bustle. But when I was called to speak, I started and said: "Most gracious emperor, most gracious princes, princes and lords! The books that have been presented to me are mine, and there are some books among them that are textbooks that interpret the holy scriptures; I confess that they are mine, and they are righteous, good books, and there is nothing evil in them.

The others are quarreling books, since I quarreled with the pope and adversaries; if there would be something evil inside, I could well change that.

The third are books in which I only dispute about Christian doctrine; these are only Disputations. These two kinds of books, namely the textbooks and disputations, would be good and right if I wanted to stay over them, as God would have it.

So while I was talking, they asked me to repeat it again with latei-

But I was sweating a lot, and I was very hot because of the commotion, and that I was even standing among the princes. But Herr Friedrich von Thun said to me: "If you cannot do it, that is enough, Herr Doctor. But I repeated all my words in Latin; this pleased Duke Friederich, the Elector, exceedingly.

When I had said this, they let me go, and two were given to me to lead and accompany me. Then there was a commotion: the noblemen shouted whether I was being led away captive, but I said that they were only escorting me. So I returned to my hostel and did not return to the kingdom's council.

Spalatin's report of this other Audimz.

From Spalatin's Annules, p. 41.

On the following cathedral day [April 17], Doctor Martinus Widerumb appeared, after four hours, in a great throng in the Palatinate before the Royal Court. Mal. and the princes and sovereigns of the empire, and gave his answer first in Latin, then in German. After that, Kayr. Mat. and the princes, through the Official of Tryer, urged him to make a contradiction. For this, Doctor Martinus humbly asked, because he could not contradict with God and a good conscience.

In the end, the official of Tryer said that if he did not object, Kay. Mat. and the princes and sovereigns of the empire would decide what they should do against such a kezer. To this Doctor Martinus replied: God help me, for I cannot contradict him. And so he went back to the inn, so courageous, confident and happy in the Lord, that he told Spalatin before others and me: if he had a thousand heads, he would rather have them all taken from him than contradict him.

F. What the Emperor, at the instigation of the papists, communicates to the imperial estates as his resolution after this public interrogation of Luther.

572 Emperor Carl V's personal rescript to the princes and estates of the empire, in which he announces to them his resolution against D. Mart. Luther and his doctrines and exhorts them to follow him. April 19, 1521.

This document is found in Latin in Lünig's spie, eeelesiust., Theil I, p. 379 and in Goldast's eonstit. imp., vol. II, p. 142.

Translated into German by M. A. Tittel.

It is well known to you that I am descended from the Christian emperors of the German nation, from the Catholic kings in Spain, from the archdukes in Austria and the dukes in Burgundy, all of whom have shown themselves faithful to the last breath of the Roman Church and have always been brave defenders of the Catholic faith, of the holy ceremonies, conclusions, statutes and godly customs for the salvation of souls. Who, in their death, as it were by natural impulse and by a right of inheritance, handed over and bequeathed to us the holy Catholic statutes, of which we have now spoken, into our hands from theirs, so that we follow in their footsteps and also leave our lives over them. And we, as the righteous successors of our ancestors, have lived in such a way by God's help until this day. Therefore, we remain firmly resolved to protect and safeguard everything that both our forefathers and I have held until now; but especially that which my forefathers concluded both at the Costnitz and in other spiritual meetings (synods).

2. But since it is evident that only a few brothers are mistaken and allow themselves to be deceived by their own delusions, which are otherwise in conflict with the opinion of all Christendom, both of those who lived a thousand years before us and of those who are still alive today; and there is so much underneath that all Christians must have been mistaken up to now: I am determined to stake all my kingdoms, empire, dominions, friends, body, blood, and life and soul on it, so that this ungodly undertaking does not spread any further, because it is likely to bring great disgrace to me and you, especially to you, who are the excellent or highly famous German nation, to whom it is a special reputation, honor and privilege, a true grace, that we are called and praised lovers of justice and protectors of the Catholic faith. If, therefore, not only heresy, but even the slightest suspicion of heresy or diminution of the Christian name were to linger in the minds of men at this time, it would be an eternal disgrace and reproach to our descendants.

Since we all heard Luther's stubborn answer yesterday, I open my thoughts to you: that I am sorry that I stood so long to proceed against this man and his false teachings, and that I do not want to hear him in anything else, whatever he may bring forward. I have therefore ordered that he be brought home immediately in accordance with the order, and that he be careful, in accordance with the public escort, not to preach publicly anywhere, nor to continue to present his false teachings to the people, nor to cause any further noise or disturbance through him. For, as I have said, I have firmly decided to proceed against him as an obvious heretic, and therefore request of you that you decide in this matter what is due to true Christians and what you have promised to do. Written by his own hand on April 19, 1521 .

G. Of a repeated interrogation of Luther before some princes, who, after having asked for an extension of his license, made another attempt, albeit in vain, to bring Luther to recant, not publicly, but privately.

Luther's own account of the interrogation before several princes, of the conference with the deputies from Trier, and of the last private interview with the Elector at Trier.

See No. 550.

After that I was summoned to two small special committees. In one was the Bishop of Trier, Margrave Joachim, and Duke George, and others. But Doctor Uhe [Vehus], the chancellor of Baden, talked to me for a long time, wanted to persuade me to report the whole matter to the emperor and the estates of the empire, and told me thirteen reasons why I should do it, and said a lot about the authority of the church and other aversions.

Now there were some who wanted to teach me how I should answer. But Friederich Thun said: It is not necessary, he will speak well.

I told him these articles one after the other on my fingers; although I was unaccustomed to jurisprudence and court oratory, I still refuted them all, and said: I could suffer everything, the pope, princes, item, the power of the church, and would do everything only what I should; only from the holy scripture I could not depart, there I could forgive nothing of it; because it would not be mine, but of our Lord God. Then the margrave said, "Doctor, as I understand you correctly, is this your opinion that you cannot depart from the holy scriptures? Then I said: Yes, I stand by it. Then they let me go away again, and they also went away from each other.

After a few days, they sent Doctor Vehus and Doctor Peutingen to me, and let me continue to act with them. But Duke Frederick did not want me to deal with them alone; he sent his advisors to me, Doctor Philipp and Friederich von Thun, who were at the plot. The two doctors had a well-considered oration with me, tried on me what they could, I should hand over my books and cause to the emperor and prince. But I said: I would like to be under the emperor's power, but I could not leave the writing. But when they continued, I said, "This is my opinion in a nutshell: Before I wanted to hand over my cause to the emperor, I wanted to recite the escort.

Then Friederich von Thun said, "That is enough and highly offered; he became angry with the two, did not want to listen any longer, and went away. But Doctor Philip remained there; then they continued to ask me to do it. But I said, "I don't want to do it; I'll put it to you myself, if the emperor should be a judge of my cause, what would not happen? How could I protect or handle myself, or defend my cause, if I had given the Holy Scriptures out of my fist? The emperor has too many bishops who have already condemned me. And so nothing was done.

Not long after, the Bishop of Trier sent for me again, talked to me alone and said: Dear Doctor, my Doctores tell me you will be satisfied with what the Emperor will say in your matter; thought he wanted to catch me soon. But I said, "My lord, I can suffer anything, but I cannot hand over the holy scriptures. The bishop said: "My doctors told me much differently; how could I have passed so badly if I had soon gone to the emperor and reported it to him! But how do you think, doctor, that the matter should be dealt with?"

There I had no other advice than Gamaliel gives in Actis Cap. 5, 38. 39.: one should let the thing go for itself; if it were from men, it would not stand long; but if it were from God, trust, they will not be able to suppress the teaching.

This action, and especially the fact that the priests were so lax about it, greatly annoyed Duke Frederick, as a wise and prudent prince; and after I had been in Worms a fortnight, I left again and was caught on the way. So it happened without my thoughts. The fault is not mine, but theirs. They wanted to go through with their heads and thought they could not fall; the devil also guarded it, the Pabst's regiment, and wanted to defend it, but Christ made a hole in it. For the devil also knows well that he must let himself be visited by Christ, and has now often experienced this.

Section Six of Chapter Seven.

Of Luther's fearless and confident courage before and at the Diet of Worms; how fervently and devoutly he had prayed there, and how the faithful God had publicly honored this faithful confessor of his, after he had not been ashamed of his word and gospel, but had publicly honored Christ by the unashamed confession of his truth, and had also publicly honored him again by the joyful shouting of the people who had frequently gathered at his return to his quarters.

A. Of Luther's undaunted courage and devout prayer.

574 Luther's excellent answer to Spalatin when the Elector of Saxony had Spalatin ask him whether he wanted to go to Worms if the Emperor's order was given? Wittenberg, Dec. 21, 1520.

The original of this letter is found in the Oo6. Ootüan. 122, col. 15 and thereafter in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 196; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 534 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 23. German twice in Walch, namely here and vol. XXI, 735. We follow the Erlanger Briefwechsel.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To the learned and pious man, Georg Spalatin, princely Saxon court preacher, his friend in the Lord!

Hail! Both from Allstädt 1) I have the copies of the letters, and from Kindelbrück 2) I received your letter today,

1) in Saxony-Weimar, where this letter also went.

2) in the administrative district of Erfurt, in the former Thuringian district.

in which you request that I answer what I will do if I am called by Emperor Carl, 3) without danger to the Gospel and public truth, because you see that the adversaries are doing everything to hasten this deal.

But I, if I should be called, will, as much as I care for myself, let myself be brought there sick, if I could not come in health. For one must not doubt that I will be called by the Lord when the emperor calls me. Furthermore, if they should pursue the matter by force, as is probable (for they do not let me be called because they wanted to be instructed), then the matter must be ordered to the Lord. For he who preserved the three men in the furnace of fire of the king of Babylon [Dan. 3:23 ff] is still alive and reigning. If he will not preserve, it is a small thing for my head, if it is compared with Christ, who was subjected to the highest shame and the most severe punishment.

3) Compare the correspondence between Emperor Carl V and Prince Frederick, No. 520 to No. 524 in this volume.

The gospel has been killed to the annoyance of all and the destruction of many. For here there is no need to consider any danger, any welfare, but rather to see to it that we do not expose the gospel we have once begun to the ridicule of the wicked, and give the adversaries cause to boast against us, that we dare not confess what we have taught, and fear to shed our blood for it. May Christ, according to his mercy, avert such cowardice in us and such boasting in them, amen.

Although it must be so [Ps. 2, 1. 2.] that the kings of the land and the lords contend with one another and rage with the nations and the people against the Lord and his anointed, yet the Spirit teaches in the same Psalm [Ps. 2, 12.] that it will be well with those who trust in him. And not only this, but [Ps. 2:4] the Lord will also laugh at them and mock them. It is certainly not up to us to determine whether my life or my death will be more or less dangerous for the gospel and the common welfare. You know that the truth of God is a rock of astonishment [Isa. 8, 14], which is set for the fall and resurrection of many in Israel [Luc. 2, 34].

For our care, however, the only task left now is to ask the Lord that Carl's government not stain its first works with my blood or anyone else's, in order to protect godlessness, and I would rather (as I have often said) perish at the hands of the Romans alone, so that he and his would not be involved in this matter. You know what misery came upon Emperor Sigismund after Hus was killed, that nothing happily came to him after that, that he died without descendants, and after that also the son of his daughter, Ladislan, perished, and in one generation his name was erased, but his wife Barbara became a stain for queens, 1).

1) Sigismund left only one daughter Elisabeth, married to Emperor Albrecht II, whose son Ladislaus Posthumus, King of Hungary and Bohemia, died on November 23, 1457 without descendants. About the dissolute life of the second wife Barbara, Countess and other things, which I believe you know. But if it must come to pass that I too shall be delivered not only to the popes, but also to the Gentiles, let the will of the Lord be done, amen.

Behold, there you have my counsel and my mind. You may expect everything from me, but not that I will flee or recant. I will not flee, much less recant; in this may the Lord Jesus strengthen me. For I could do neither without danger to God's salvation and the salvation of many. I will send back the copies and in due time I will send the letter to the prince 2) as you have prescribed in the copy. I have hitherto meant that all that is mine should be brought to this court as soon as possible by the hands of others; therefore take now as much as is printed. For the German is now printed after the Latin. 3) Fare well and be strong in the Lord. Wittenberg on the day of St. Thomas the Martyr (as many believe) [Dec. 21], 1520.
Martin Luther.

575 Luther's letter to the Elector Frederick of Saxony, in which he offers to appear in Worms under safe escort at the Emperor's command. January 25, 1521.

This letter is found in Latin in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 301 and in the Wittenberg edition (1551), toru. II, toi. 1628; in German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 1018; in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 3968; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 612; in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p. 566; in the Erlangen, vol. 53, p. 56; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 548; and in Müller's Staatscabinet, Theil VIII, p. 281. The German letter (which is probably the original) is found, as Seckendorf, 8i "t. 8ut8, li8.1, x>. 148, § 90, handwritten in the archives at Weimar in ^etis 6ornitiuruln IVornmat.,Dit. Handlung mit D. Martin Luthern, toi. 13.

To the most illustrious, highborn Prince and Lord, Lord Frederick, Duke of Saxony, Elector and Vicar of the Holy Roman Empire, Landgrave of Thuringia, Margrave of Meissen, my most gracious Lord and Patron.

von Cillh, compare Aschbach, Kaiser Sigismund, vol. II, 379; IV, 391. (Erl. Briefw.)

2) This is the next number.

3) The text: "Grund und Ursach aller Artikel" 2c., in this volume No. 448.

JEsus.

Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Lord! E. Churf. Gn. is my poor prayer and humble service 1) always in obedience before.

2nd Most gracious Sir, E. C. F. G.'s gracious indication of what Roman Imperial and Hispanic Royal Majesty, my most gracious Lord, concerns and thinks in my matter, I have heard everywhere with humble thanks and favor; which graces against Imperial Majesty and E. C. F. G. I am grateful for. Maj. and E. C. F. G. I thank most humbly. And I am heartily pleased that Imperial Maj. Maj. wants to take to His Imperial Majesty the matter which, God willing, is God's, common Christianity's, and the whole German nation's, and not some man's, much less my own. Maj.

Therefore, I am once again, as I have always done before, according to my manifold requests, and especially the one that has gone out in print before, 2) whose copy E. C. F. G. I hereby send, humbly obliged to do and leave everything that I may do with God and Christian honor, or to do and leave with honorable and Christian and frugal causes of the holy divine Scripture.

4 Therefore, with all humility, requesting E. C. F. G. to take action against the Roman Emperor. Majesty. Most humbly request that I be graciously provided with sufficient assurance and free safe conduct from all violence, of which I have to take notice, and to order that the matter be referred to pious, learned, understanding, unsuspicious and Christian men, spiritual and secular, who are well grounded in the Bible, and have and know understanding and discernment of the divine and human laws and commandments, together to diligently interrogate me, are commanded, for God's sake, to do no violence against me until I am found to be unchristian and unjust; as a secular head of holy Christendom, that my adversaries, the popes, have in the meantime been freed from their raging and un-

Christian actions against me, with burning of my books, and grim reenactments (conatibus == reenactments) after my body, honor, salvation, life and blessedness, although unheard and unconquered; 3) and if I had done something against this, for the salvation of the divine evangelical truth rather than of my own vain and unworthy person, or if I were urged and caused to do something for this, I would be graciously excused from such necessary opposition, and to have myself in gracious protection and command to save the divine word, also to be most gracious and gracious lords. 4) Lords; as then to the aforementioned Imperial Maj. Maj. and E. C. F. G., I am committed to this and all other Christian imperial and princely virtues and graces. Virtue and Graces, as to my most gracious and gracious Lords.

5. For in humble obedience I am prepared, if I obtain sufficient assurance and a free escort to and from my custody, to appear at the next Imperial Diet at Worms before equal, learned, pious and unsuspicious judges, and with the help of the Almighty to so show myself and answer for myself, that only men shall know in truth that I have hitherto done nothing out of free, thoughtless, disorderly will and for the sake of temporal and worldly honor and use, but everything that I have written and taught, according to my conscience, oath and duties, as a poor teacher of the Holy Scriptures, to the praise of God. Scripture, to the praise of God, to the salvation and blessedness of common Christendom, for the benefit of the entire German nation, for the eradication of dangerous abuses and superstitions, and for the unification of all holy Christendom, from so many endless, innumerable, unchristian and damnable tyrannical diminishment, burdening, and blasphemy, 5).

3) In all German editions: "ihres rabenden 2c. Vornehmen ... abstellen". According to the Latin, instead of "abstellen" it would read: "abstehen"; u suo proposito uesistant - abstehen von ihrem Vornehmen. Since this seems to us to be the correct reading, we have put it into the text.

4) "gn." is to be resolved by: gnädigster, and refers to the Churfürst; the "allergnädigster" goes to the emperor.

5) All these "nouns" are plural in Latin.

1) In Latin this is given by the plural: liumiliu otкоиu.

2) No. 433 in this volume.

6. ew. C. F. G. together with the Roman Imperial Majesty. Maj. have a Christian eye and understanding of the highly distressed state of the whole of Christendom; that is I, Imperial Maj. Maj. and E. C. F. G., through divine clemency and grace, with my poor prayer to God, always, as the poor subject Capellan, in all humility owe and willing. Date Wittenberg, on the day Conversionis 8. ?auli [25. Jan.], in the thousand five hundred and one and twentieth year.

Ew. C. F. G. obedient subject
Capellan, Martinus Luther.

Luther's earnest prayer, which he made at the Diet of Worms.

This prayer is found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. X, 1420.

B. What honor Luther received at Warm.

577 Spalatin's account of how Luther received such great or greater honor at Worms than one of the princes, but how Elector Frederick had been immensely astonished at Luther's great courage.

From Spalatin's p. 48.

It is certain that God honored the Doctor Martinum at the Diet of Wurmb's in such a way that he was much more admired and respected than all princes and lords. Thus, it was one and all days in his hostel, as long as he was in the city of Wurmb's.

So I, Spalatinus, above other graves and lords, saw myself with him in his hostel Landgrauen Philipps zcu Heßen, Hertzog Wilhelm von Braunnswig vnd Count Wilhelm zcu Henneberg.

My most gracious Lord Duke Frederick of Saxony, Elector Lo., highly praiseworthy and of blessed memory, was so astonished by the Christian courageous answer of Doctor Martinus before Kay. Mat. and the sovereigns of the realm in Latin and German, that his Elector. His Grace sent for me, Spalatin, in Doctor Martinus' hostel before his supper, and how his Electorate wants to take water, and how his Grace wants to take water, and how his Electorate wants to take water, and how his Electorate wants to take water. They beckoned me to follow them into their chamber, and as I entered, his Electors said to me, with the water, that they would take it. Grace said to me, with great astonishment: "What has the priest, Doctor Martinus, said before the Emperor and all the princes and rulers of the empire in Latin and German? He is much to my liking; and so I was graciously allowed to go back to Doctor Martinus.

578 Luther's report of the visit of the Landgrave of Hesse and his conversation with him.

See No. 550.

The Landgrave of Hesse first came to me in Worms; but he was not yet on my side, and came riding into the courtyard, went to me in my chamber, wanted to see me. But he was still very young and said: "Dear Doctor, how are you? I answered, "Sir, I hope it will be all right. Then he said, "I hear, Doctor, that you teach that when a man grows old and can no longer perform his wife's duty as a wife, then the wife may take another husband. But I laughed too, and said: Oh no, my lord, your princely grace should not speak so. But he soon left me again, gave me his hand and said: "If you are right, Doctor, God help you.

Section Seven of Chapter Seven.

Luther's dismissal from Worms and his return journey under the imperial escort, and what happened on the way.

Of Lucher's farewell, which the emperor had issued through two deputies.

579 Spalatin's report of how Luther had predicted his departure from Worms, and the emperor had given him his farewell through two deputies, the official of Trier, D. Joh. Eck, and the imperial secretary, Maximilian Transsilvanus, with the order to travel home within 21 days, but henceforth not to preach, teach, or write, and what Luther had said in response.

From Spalatin's Annalss, p. 46.

So Doctor Martinus left the archbishop in Tryer, and went next to Hanssen von Minquitz, knight, who was lying dead in a crane in Wurmbs, and as he, after faithful Christian consolation, wanted to leave him, he blessed him with other words, such as: I will leave again tomorrow. Then I grabbed him by the cap he was still wearing and said, "Doctor, you are a good man to say you will leave tomorrow. But you have no final farewell. Then he, the good priest, said to me: You will see, I will leave tomorrow. So he went back to his hostel, and his companions and his company, until of course Johann Petzensteinner, of Nurmberg, also an Augustinian, had gone from him to look around in the city of Wurmbs, who perhaps also suspected that they had not long been to Wurmbs' hostel. And of course not much three hours after the conversation with the archbishop came to Tryer because of Kay. Mat. above-mentioned official to Tryer, Doctor Johann Eck and next to him. Her Maximilian Transiluanus, Kay. Mat. secretary, as a notary, and others, and spoke these words in the lateen, that Kay. Mat, princes and rulers of the Holy Roman Empire had graciously sought to soften him in many ways. But because nothing has helped, he is to return to his guard, and should be forgiven until one and twenty days after the death of Kay. Mat., with the appendix: that he shall go to the no longer be allowed to preach, learn, or write. However, some of Doctor Martinus Luther's assistants came back. Shortly thereafter, as he had not long since turned away from them to the other rooms of his hostel, Doctor Martinus gave this Christian answer in Latin, the Romans. Kaye. Mat, princes, rulers and sovereigns of the holy kingdom have so graciously heard him, and have so graciously given him their glide, for which he, as the most humble and faithful chaplain, expresses his most humble and faithful thanks. He also wants to have nothing reserved for him, neither alive nor dead, nor disgraced, but only to freely practice and confess God's word.

Such answer hett im Kay. Mat. Council, secretary, and servant, also appointed by Emperor Maximilian, so well that after that Mr. Johann Stabius, only a noble man, also known to Doctor Martino, praised so highly that he was allowed to say to me, Spalatin, and others about Wurmbs: That he thought that Maximilian Transiluanus had said such a farewell, and that Doctor Martinus' final thanks and answer was much better than Doctor Martinus himself had said.

B. Luther's letters to the emperor and the imperial estates sent back when the imperial herald accompanying him was dispatched.

58V. D. Martin Luther's letter to Emperor Carl V, after his departure from Worms, sent back from Friedberg, April 28, 1521, in which he first of all repeats everything that happened at Worms recently, then states concise reasons why God's Word does not submit to human judgment, furthermore thanks him humbly for the escort he was given, and asks that the Emperor not let him be oppressed, suffer violence, and be condemned by his opponents.

Luther wrote this letter in Latin, and according to Seidemann in De Wette, vol. VI, p. 21, the original is in the possession of the canon D. T. G. Keil in Leipzig. Magnifying glasses on the address by Spalatin's hand: "1521. Die-.

This letter was not handed over to the emperor because there was not one among such a large number of great people who could have handed it over. Handwritten it is in the 60a. Solan. ii. 122, toi. 18.17. The first printing has the title: Xä. On. Eurolnni V. Anstrlnrn Imp. 6a68.

äoetoris Martini OntiEri, AnZnstinianiani Epistoia, post abitioneni 6X eonventn linperiaii M'ormiaciae M. D. XXI. In qnarr 86nt6ntiarn etiam Oieetoridns Orincipidus, 6t reiignis iinpsrö oräiniftns iline scripsit, 86<l Oassari latins 6t oräinidns Mrmani66. One sheet in quarto without location. Sodann in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 316; in the Wittenberg edition (1561), torn. II, toi. 168 d; in De Wette vol. I, p. 589 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 129. A German translation of this letter is found in the Weimar archives in Spalatin's handwriting, which is said to have been made by Luther himself (so Förstemann "Neues Urkundenbuch", p. 76 and Seidemann-De Wette, vol. VI, p. 20) or perhaps by Spalatin (so the Erl. Briefw., vol. III, p. 129). It seems to us that Spalatin provided the translation of this letter made by Luther himself for the purpose of addressing it also to the princes, princes and estates of the empire, with the necessary changes in title, in order to adapt it to the emperor as recipient. Both letters (the next one and this one) are almost word for word identical, so that Förstemann did not consider it necessary to print the following letter separately, but added it to this one in note form. The variants are mostly insignificant and do not affect the meaning. In another very good and accurate translation, this letter is found in the German Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. II3d; in the Jena edition (1564), vol. I, p. 449d; in the Altenburg edition, vol. I, p. 727; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVII, p. 590 and in Walch. We consider a reproduction of Förstemann's text superfluous because of the great similarity of the same with the next following number, and reproduce the above-mentioned translation with the necessary improvements according to the first printing, which is reproduced in the Erlanger Briefwechsel 1. 6.

Translated from Latin.

To the most noble and invincible lord, Carl V, elected Roman Emperor, always Major of the Empire (Caesari Augusto), King of Spain, both Sicily and Jerusalem 2c, Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy 2c, his most gracious lord.

Jesus.

1. grace and peace with all subjection, through Christ our Lord. Most glorious and invincible Emperor, most gracious Lord! After E. kais. Maj. has ordered me with a public safe conduct to Worms to inquire my mind about the booklets that have gone out publicly in my name, and in all humility before E. kais. Maj. and the entire empire there.

seemed to be: as if E. kais. Majesty has held it against me in particular and had it indicated whether I recognized the aforementioned booklets as mine? And whether I wanted to revoke them, or persist in them, or not?

2. But I, since I recognized them as mine (as long as nothing of my adversaries or misleaders had been changed or altered in them), have humbly indicated in all reverence that I would be of a mind, after having kept and confirmed my little books with clear and public testimonies of the holy Scriptures, that it would not be proper for me, nor would it be right for me to deny God's word, and thus to revoke my little books; and have therefore humbly asked E. kais. Maj. would in no way permit that I be urged to such a revocation, but rather that my booklets, either by E. Majesty himself, or others, whoever they may be, even the very least (who could), and that the errors, which some claim to be in them, be punished and rebuked with divine, evangelical and prophetic writings; Also, out of a Christian spirit, I have humbly offered that, if I were convicted of any error, I would recant everything and be the first to throw my little books into the fire, burn them, and trample them underfoot.

But about all this I was asked and encouraged to answer simply, clearly and explicitly, whether I wanted to recant or not? To this I again most humbly said: Because my conscience would be decided and imprisoned by the holy scripture, which I have put on and introduced in my little books, I could not recant anything without better instruction.

Then some princes, princes and other estates of the empire negotiated with me that I wanted to submit my booklets to your imperial majesty and the imperial estates' knowledge and judgment and make them available; which the chancellor of Baden and Doctor Peutingen diligently sought from me, and in which they labored and worked hard. But I offered myself as before, if I would only be instructed otherwise by divine scripture or public causes, I would gladly yield.

Finally, I wanted to put and trust some extracted articles to the knowledge of a general concilii. But I, as one who has always and with all diligence, humbly, willingly and ready to do and suffer everything that would always be possible for me, could not attain this some (which is, after all, a Christian request), that God's word would remain free and unbound to me, and that I would submit my little books to E. kais. Maj. and the imperial estates in such a way, or also to trust the decision 1) of a council, that nothing contrary to the Gospel of God would be either subjected by me or defined and recognized by them. This is what the whole deal was and is based on.

For God, who is a proclaimer of hearts, is my witness that I am completely willing and ready in all submissiveness to please and be obedient to your imperial majesty, whether by life or death, by honor or disgrace, by gain or loss. For so I have often offered myself, that I still offer myself, and do not except anything, but only God's word, in which not only man lives, as Christ says Matth. 4, 4, but which also the angels desire to behold, 1 Petr. 1, 12. The same, because it is above all things, should also be completely free and indeed unbound in everything, as St. Paul teaches [2 Tim. 2, 9], and it is never in my will nor in the will of some men to subjugate it and put it in danger, no matter how great, numerous, learned and holy men may be.

7. so that St. Paul, Gal. 1, 8. may also freely say publicly, without all shyness, and repeat twice: "If we also, or an angel from heaven, preach the gospel to you, other than what we have preached to you, let him be accursed"; and David says [Ps. 146, 3.]: "Do not rely on princes, they are men, they cannot help." Nor can anyone subject himself, as Solomon says [Proverbs 28:26], "Whoever relies on his heart, he is a fool," and Jeremiah Cap. 17:5: "Cursed is the man that trusteth in men."

For in temporal matters, which do not concern God's word and the eternal heavenly goods, one owes it to the other to believe and trust, because there is no harm in submission, danger and loss of blessedness, since these must be abandoned in the end. But in God's word and eternal goods, God does not suffer such danger that a man should subject himself to them and make a mighty home for himself. For He wants all men and everything to be subject to Him, as He alone has the honor and glory that He is true, yes, the truth itself, but all men are liars and false, as St. Paul, Rom. 3, 4, excellently deals with.

9 And this is not unreasonable. For the same faith, submission and humility is actually the right worship and adoration, which, as St. Augustine says in the first book of the Enchiridion 2), should not be shown to any creature. For this reason, St. Paul considers neither the angels, nor himself, nor without a doubt any saint, whether in heaven or on earth, worthy of such faith and trust, even cursed. Nor would they suffer it, much less desire it. For to trust a man in such a way in matters concerning eternal bliss is nothing other than to give the creature the honor that is actually and solely due to God.

(10) Therefore, I most humbly request that Your Imperial Majesty not think that this reservation of the word of God comes from an evil suspicion, nor understand it ungraciously. For it is taken from the aforementioned sayings of the Holy Scriptures, to which all creatures should give way in good conscience. St. Augustine says that the prestige of the Scriptures is greater than all men's understanding can grasp and comprehend.

(11) For that my mind and trust in Your Imperial Majesty is righteous and pure, the latter can well notice and understand from the fact that I am under Your Imperial Majesty.

1) The old translator offers: "also without Oerterung eines Concilii", thus seems to have read sine etiam Concilii Nctcrminations instead of: sive etiam Concilii deterininutioni. The former reading is really found in the Wittenberg edition. Our reading is in Förstemann 1. c.

2) There seems to be a wrong citation here (Erl. Briefw.).

I have obediently appeared in the presence of your Imperial Majesty's escort, and have not worried or feared anything, although I knew that my books had been burned by the adversaries, and in the meantime a mandate against me and my books had gone out publicly under your Imperial Majesty's name, and has been posted in many places, which would not have unreasonably deterred a poor monk and drawn him back, where I would not have provided and still fail to provide all good to God Almighty, to your Imperial Majesty and to the estates of the realm.

12. Although I have not been able to obtain by any means that my books would be refuted by the Holy Scriptures, and I am forced to walk away from them unconquered, and the whole deal, as I have said, has been and is based on the fact that the erroneous articles that are supposed to be in my books, as they speak of them, have not been wanted, nor can they be proven, or published with the Holy Scriptures, nor have they been put off or promised that my books should be examined and discussed according to God's Word: Nevertheless, I thank your Imperial Majesty in the most humble manner that they have kept the public escort to Worms for me, and have promised to keep it until I am safely in my custody.

(13) And once again, for the sake of Christ, I most humbly ask your Imperial Majesty not to let the adversaries suppress me, nor to suffer violence and condemn me, because I have now offered myself so often, as is proper and fitting for a Christian and obedient person. For I am still quite willing and ready, under your imperial majesty's escort, to present myself before unsuspicious, learned, free and impartial judges, secular or ecclesiastical, by your imperial majesty, by the estates of the realm, by the Concilia, by the Doctores, or whoever else may or will, to instruct me, and to submit my books and teachings to all with pleasure, to tolerate and accept their examination, knowledge, and judgment, nothing excepted, but only the public, clear, and free word of God, which shall be just above all, and shall remain the judge of all men.

14 Therefore, I also ask most humbly, not for my person alone, as I am an unworthy, despised person, but in the name of all of Christendom, which has also moved me to send back this writing. For I would like with all my heart that Your Imperial Majesty, the whole Empire, and the noble, high-souled German nation be advised in the very best way, and that all be blessed in God's grace, with all welfare. So far, I have sought nothing but God's glory, common and everyone's welfare and bliss, and have not considered my own benefit in this, not even yet; God grant, the adversaries condemn me or not. For since Christ, my Lord, prayed for his enemies on the cross [Luc. 23, 34.], much more should I be diligent, ask and plead for your majesty, for the whole kingdom, and for my most beloved 1) overlords, and the whole German nation, my dear fatherland, to whom I pledge all good, according to my trust, with joy and confidence in Christ, my Lord.

15 I hereby entrust myself to the protection and protection of your imperial majesty, which God the Lord graciously and blessedly governs, guides and sustains us, amen. Given at Friedburg, on Sunday Cantate [April 28] Anno 1521.

Your Imperial Majesty's most subservient bitter Martinus Luther.

581 Martin Luther's letter to the princes and estates of the empire, sent back from Friedberg after his departure from Worms, April 28, 1521.

This letter is, as already mentioned in the previous number, a translation by Luther himself of the letter to the emperor, which he also addressed in German to the princes, princes and estates. This letter is handwritten, by Spalatin's hand, in the Weimar archives, and is subsequently published by Förstemann in his "neue Urkundenbuche", p. 76 ff. first in the form of notes to the letter to the emperor. The first print was published in Wittenberg by Johannes Grünenberg under the title: "Copia ainer Missiue, so D. M. Luther after his abscheydt zu Wormbs tzuruck an die Churfürsten, Fürsten, vn Stede des heylligen Römischm Reichs daselbest versam- let geschriben hat." At the end: "Geben zu Fridburgk" 2c. 1 sheet in quarto, in the title border a convoluted 4. 6. Without indication of the place. After that, a large number of reprints (nine are given in the Erlangen correspondence), three of which have at the end: "Fridberg in der Wetteraw." Three other editions, one of which bears the printer's mark of Martin Landsberg in Leipzig, have at the end: "Freyburg in Meyssen"; a Basel edition has at the end: "Frygburg"; a Low German translation has at the end: "Fridborch". Furthermore, this letter is printed together with "Handlung so mit doc- tor Martin Luther Vff dem Keyßerlichen Reichs tag zu Worms ergangen ist" 2c. in three different editions, one Basel and (presumably) one Strasbourg and one Augsburg. In the Gefimmt editions: in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 115 (not 113, as De Wette and after him the Erlangen angebm); in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 452; in the Altenburger, vol. I, p. 729 (not 727); in the Leipziger, vol. XVII, p. 593 (not 590); in De Wette, vol. I, p. 594; in the Erlanger, vol. 53, p. 66 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 137. In Latin Uebersetzung in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 319 b and in the Wittenberg edition (1551), tom. II, fol. 170. - On June 10, 1521, Luther wrote to Spalatin: Excusas IsZi msas Uterus aa oraines iraperii aatas in reeessu IN6O, 86-l IL6ndc>8U8 (I have read in print the letter addressed to the estates of the empire on my return, but full of errors). The Erlanger Briefwechsel says Vol. III, p. 135: "This letter was printed without Luther's knowledge and inaccurately, about which he complains in the letter to Spalatin of June 10." Nevertheless, the Erlanger Briefwechsel reproduces the text of the first printing that aroused Luther's discontent, without caring in the least about Spalatin's manuscript found in Förstemann i.e.. This text, however, is nothing better than the one reproduced in the editions according to other prints until then. Luther's criticism undoubtedly refers to the first printing, which is not only "inaccurate", but "full of errors". In the same, as can be seen from our notes, there are such things as: "to provide for him" instead of "to set in motion"; "to move" instead of "to commit"; "on it" instead of "may"; "wölch" instead of "because I"; "to deny" instead of "to embarrass" [refute! 2c., and so that the nonsense resulting from such readings would not be all too great, has then been changed in the text with the greatest arbitrariness. We give the text after Förstemann, although the gathering of the notes and the text was a very arduous work.

1) Wittenberger, Aurifaber and De Wette: edurissimis; Erl. Briefw.: elarissünis.

To the most reverend and most worthy in GOD, most illustrious, most noble, most highborn Electors, Princes, Archbishops and Bishops, venerable Prelates, noble and well-born Counts, strict, honorable Knighthoods and Nobles, and all other Estates of the Holy Roman Empire, now assembled at the Imperial Diet at Worms, my most gracious, gracious and favorable Lords.

JEsus. 1)

Most gracious, gracious and favorable lords! Your electoral, princely and other graces and benefits are always preceded by my submissive prayer and service.

2nd Most gracious, gracious and favorable gentlemen! After Imperial Maj. Maj. has summoned me to your free, safe and strict escort to Worms, to receive from me information about my books that have gone out in my name, I have appeared as the most submissive chaplain before Imperial Maj. Maj. and the estates of the Holy Roman Empire in obedience.

3 Thus, Imperial Majesty has firstly ordered me to indicate whether I want to confess to the books in question and withdraw them or insist on them. Maj. first of all ordered me to indicate whether I had confessed to the books I had touched and wanted to revoke them, or whether I wanted to insist on them or not. I have, after a humble confession of the books that I have made, and which have not been altered by my detractors or in other ways, and which have been changed to my detriment, allowed myself to be humbly questioned: Because I have affirmed my writings with the clear, loud word of God, it is most burdensome to me, also unreasonable and impossible, to deny God's word, and to revoke such my books in such a way.

4. and humbly requesting that Imperial Maj. Maj. will not allow me to enter into any such contradiction, but will inspect my writings and books, by himself or by others, even the fewest who are able, and prove the errors that are to be found in them by divine, prophetic and evangelical writings; with Christian inheritance, if I were proven to have erred, I would revoke all errors and be the first to throw my books into the fire and trample on them with my feet.

(5) To which I am requested to give a short, correct answer, whether I want to recant or to remain on my decision? Therefore, I answered again humbly: because my conscience is bound by such divine Scripture as I keep in my books, I cannot recant in any way without instruction from the holy divine Scripture.

1) "JEsus" is missing in the first printing, but is in Spalatin's manuscript; on the other hand, the preceding address is missing in Spalatin.

(6) Consequently, several princes, princes, and some of the estates of the Holy Roman Empire have acted with me, saying that I should and wanted to put my books on the authority of the Emperor and the estates of the Holy Roman Empire. Maj. and the estates of the Holy Roman Empire; as the Chancellor of Baden and Doctor Peutingier of Augsburg also objected to me. So I offered myself again, as before: where I would be instructed by divine scripture or bright and clear causes.

7. finally, that I should trust some articles, drawn from my books, to the judgment of a council; and I have been willing at all times and in all ways in submission to do and leave everything that is possible for me; it has finally come to a head only because I have not been able to raise this Christian standard, that God's word would be free and unbound, and that I have placed my books on Imperial Majesty and the Holy Empire and Estates or on a future council's judgment and determination, so that nothing contrary to the holy word of God would come from me in them. Maj. and the Holy Roman Empire and Estates, or a future council's recognition, judgment and determination, so that nothing contrary to the Holy Word of God would be given by me therein, or decided, spoken and recognized by them.

8 For God, who searches all hearts [1 Chron. 29, 9], is my witness that the Emperor's Majesty, the King, is the one who has the power to rule the world. Majesty. I am completely willing and resolved to render obedience in all things, whether living or dying, doing or not doing, honor or dishonor, good or harm; I have also offered myself to do so many times, and offer myself again, reserving nothing but the holy word of God, in which not only man's eternal life (as Christ says in Matth. 4, 4.), but also the joy and delight of angels [1 Petr. 1, 12.], which should and must be free and unrestrained over all things, as St. Paul teaches [2 Tim. 2, 9.], and is not in any man's power to enter into it, 1) or to put into drive 2) however great, much, learned 3) and holy they may always be, that also St. Paul Gal. 1, 8. may twice call out and cry out: 4) "If even one angel from heaven, or even we ourselves, would teach you otherwise, let it be forfeited"; and David in the Psalter [Ps. 146:3.], "Ye shall not trust in princes, in the children of men, in whom is not salvation."

(9) Neither should anyone trust in himself, as Solomon says: "He is a fool who trusts in his own heart," and Jeremiah Cap. 17, 5: "Let him be destroyed who trusts in a man."

(10) For in temporal matters, which do not concern God's word and eternal things, we are obliged to trust in one another, considering that the same things, which we must let go of, are harmless to salvation. But in God's word and eternal things, God cannot suffer us to trust or consider freely in one or many men, but only in Himself, who alone has and should have the honor and name of being true and the truth Himself, but all men are vain, as St. Paul masterfully introduces in Romans 3:4. And this is right, for such trust and worship is the right worship and the true service of God, as St. Augustine teaches, which should not be offered to any creature.

For this reason, St. Paul does not want any angel from heaven, not even himself, nor without a doubt any saint in heaven or on earth to be considered worthy of such trust or to be regarded as such. Nor would any saint tolerate, much less desire, to trust a man in things pertaining to eternal blessedness, which is nothing other than making an idol out of creatures and placing them in God's own right glory.

For this reason, I humbly request that Your Electoral, Princely Grace and Favor will not understand such a reservation on my part in disgrace, or as having arisen [from] evil distrust, but rather from the above-mentioned Scripture, which everyone is obligated to obey. For my submissive trust and strong confidence in Imperial Maj. Maj. and Your Electoral and Princely) Graces and Favors, may be easily gauged from this, that I, at Imperial Maj. Maj.'s request and escort; although my books had previously been burned by my patrons, and

1) In the first printing: "move" instead of: "begeben" in Spalatin's handwriting.

2) In the first print: "to provide for him" instead of: "to set in motion".

3) Förstemann: "vilgelert". Our reading is according to the Latin.

4) Thus Spalatin's handwriting. In the first printing: "darauf zweimal rüst und gesagt".

including 1) a mandate against me and my writings, in imperial name. Maj. name, posted on many ends, which should have driven back such a poor monk, if my heart was not set on God, Imperial Maj. Maj., E. churfürstlichen and princely graces and benefits, and the whole realm, had provided and still fails to provide all graces and benefits submissively.

Because I 2) have not been able to find a way to publish my writings through the divine word, 3) and thus have had to resign, and the only defect has been that one has not wanted to prove or publish the erroneous articles that should be in my books with divine writings, nor allow, grant, or put me off and promise that my books should be investigated and recognized on the basis of the holy word of God, I nevertheless offer Imperial Majesty E. C. F. and other graces and favors my most humble thanks to their gracious granting and free, secure, and punishing of the Holy Spirit. Maj., E. C. F. and other graces and favors most humbly thank you for your gracious grant and free, secure, punctual escort, which you held for me in Worms, and which you have graciously offered to hold in my custody until further notice.

14 And once again, for the sake of God, it is my most humble request to E. C. F. Gnaden und Gunsten that E. C. und F. Gnaden und Gunsten will graciously request me against Kais. Maj. graciously forbid that their Imperial Maj. Maj. will not allow me to be raped, persecuted and condemned by my abnegators beyond my manifold previous and present subservient and Christian entreaties, for I am once again obliged in subservience, upon Imperial Maj. Maj. sufficient assurance to appear before unsuspicious, impartial, learned, ecclesiastical and secular judges, by Imperial Maj. Maj., the Empire, the Conciliation, the Doctors, or whoever is able or willing to do so, to have me instructed, to submit my doctrine and books to everyone, and to suffer and accept knowledge, nothing excluded, but only the holy, free and clear Word of God, which shall hover above and remain judge of all men.

(15) Therefore, not only for my own sake (in which nothing is at stake), but for the sake of the salvation of common Christendom, I humbly beg; which has also caused me to send back this humbly written letter of mine. For I would like from the bottom of my heart that Kais. Maj., the Holy Roman Empire and the entire German nation would be helped, and they would be blessed in God's grace, which I have hitherto sought next to God's honor and the common blessedness of all Christendom, and nothing at all mine, and seek again, even if I were condemned by my detractors.

16 For since Christ, my Lord and God, prayed for His enemies on the cross [Luc. 23,34.], how much more do I pray for Imperial Maj. Maj., E. C. F. graces and favors, and the whole holy empire, my most beloved lords, authorities and German nation, to whom I pledge myself of all graces beforehand, on previous and present Christian inheritance, humbly and consolingly, I should care, pray and ask.

17. order me hereby in E. C. F. Graces and Favors in all obedience, which E. C. F. Graces and Favors the Almighty God, for our salvation and comfort, graciously command us all, Amen. Given at Friedburg, on Sunday Cantate, in the year 1521.

E. churfürstlichen, princely graces and favors subservient chaplain
Martinus Luther.

C. Luther's sermons on his way back from Worms at the request of good friends, although against the imperial order, and the students' uproar against the clergy in Erfurt.

582 Luther's report to Spalatin, how he had preached publicly on the return journey, when, at Hersfeld, at the request of the abbot, who did him immense honor, although he reminded the abbot that he could easily lose his abbey by doing so; also at Eisenach, although the pastor protested against it before a notary and witnesses.

1) under it" - meanwhile.

2) In the first printing: "Wölch" instead of: "Weil ich" in Spalatin.

3) In the first printing: "verleugnen" instead of: "verlegen".

Luther's report in the same letter about how the students in Erfurt stormed the houses of some priests at night out of displeasure that the dean of the Severistift, a zealous pope, had publicly led M. Draco away from the choir under the pretext that he was under ban because he, along with others, had gone to meet Luther on his arrival in Erfurt.

See Appendix, No. 68, § 2.

A piece of a letter from Luther to Melanchthon in which he testifies to his serious displeasure with it. Around the middle of May 1521.

This letter, which Luther wrote from the Wartburg, is found in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 329 with the remark that this fragment was found in Spalatin's library; further in Ströbel - Ranner, p. 15; in De Wette, Vol. II, p. 7 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 158.

Newly translated from the Latin.

I hear that in Erfurt violence is being carried out against the houses of the priests; I am surprised that the council allows it and looks through its fingers, and that our Lang is silent about it. For although it is good that those ungodly people who do not desist are kept in check, such a manner brings disgrace to our Gospel and causes it to be rightly rejected. I would write to Lang, but cannot yet. For such a show of favor by people against us is very annoying to me, for we see clearly from it that we are not yet worthy servants of his word before God, and that Satan mocks and laughs at our nobility. Oh, how I fear that it might be the fig tree in the likeness, of which Matthew 21 1) predicts that it will only bud before the day of judgment, but will not bear fruit. It is true, but it is only leaves and words, because we do not do as we teach.

1) Rather, Luc. 13, 6. ff.

Section Eight of Chapter Seven.

The first part of the book is a description of the sharp edict of Worms, which was written after Luther's departure, as well as that of many princes and rulers, at the instigation of the bloodthirsty papists, and which was published to the great displeasure of many imperial estates, and by which Luther was put under guardianship.

A. From the outgoing sharp edict itself.

585 Emperor Carl V's Edict against Luther's Books and Doctrine, His Followers, Abstainers and Successors 2c. Worms, May 8, 1521.

This edict is found in Walch's old edition twice in the 15th volume, namely here, and once again printed in full in the writing "Zwei kaiserliche uneinige und widerwärtige Gebote den Luther betreffend" (mit Luthers Glossen), Col. 2715 ff. (in this volume no. 747, in Walch by printing error 647). Likewise duplicated in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 118d and p. 190 d; in the Jena edition (1564), vol. I, p. 456 and vol. II (1585), p. 399 d; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 736 and vol. II, p. 762 and in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p. 596 and vol. XIX, p. 303. We leave this document here and refer to no. 747.

586 In the same year, Emperor Carl V issued an order to the University of Vienna to burn D. Mattin Lntner's books. Given at Worms, November 25, 1521.

This writing is found, with the indication: "verdeutscht," in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 123; in the Jena edition (1564), vol. I. Bl. 555; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 924 and in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p. 602, also in Lünig's spioil. eecües. eontm. II, x. 252.

Carol by God's grace elected Roman Emperor, all-time ruler of the Empire 2c.

1st Worthy, devout, dear faithful! Although we are not displeased that we have noted from your letter that you have in our honor the execution or execution of the papal bull, against Brother Martin Luther's books, until you could find out what our mind and opinion was in it, and what we had decided and decreed for that reason: Nevertheless, it would have been agreeable to us if, after the lawful promulgation of the bull in question (as your letter from the meeting of the Faculty of Theology in your university, which has the merit of having happened), you too would have given us your consent,) you also ordered the above-described books, which are a tinder and cause of great discord, rebellion, sedition and danger in the Church of God, to be burned with due fire, and reminded and admonished the people of God to beware of them most diligently. This could have been done by you with good advice and reason, even without anyone's risk or harm. For first of all, as often as the faith is dealt with, it behooves the Roman bishop and the Holy Apostolic See to judge and pass judgment; consequently, it is not in accordance with the truth that you should not have heard long ago that both of the aforementioned books in our Netherlands, Burgundy, also in Cologne, Trier, Mainz and other places in German lands, have been destroyed by papal authority and by our decree or command with public and due fire.

Finally, since your university or high school has always been a fruitful mother not only of the very best doctrine, but also of Christian godliness, you could easily have recognized and noticed that Luther's and other Lutheran writings are contrary to Christian love and customs, which grew upon us from our forefathers and ancestors, and that they have already aroused a great deal of evil in the Church of God, and (one should strive against this) would bring and cause even more trouble. However, since we believe that such delay on your part is only due to the fact that you have shown us (the founders and protectors of your university's forefathers) due honor, we praise such your mind and your loyalty towards us.

(3) But because we consider that it will be very good, useful, and beneficial that this pestilential fruit of the Lutheran heresy be eradicated, we earnestly command you, and will that this letter of ours be read in a common congregation or assembly of your university, and that Luther's books against the pope and papal see, as well as other honorable persons, disreputable pamphlets be condemned and forbidden to be proclaimed, and with the ordinary order kept, as in such matters.

The law provides that the person who is to be burned in a public fire is to keep the fire.

You will do your duty, and it will be a pleasant thing for us. For we want you and all others to know that we are willing, by virtue of the imperial dignity, and also by our nature, to use all our goods and assets, and also to work with the utmost diligence, so that the holy papal see and the entire Christian church will not suffer any harm, damage or harm in our reign, but will flourish, increase and be strengthened in the greatest peace, harmony, tranquility and unity. That we have graciously wished to inform you, so that you, informed of our will and mind, may know now and in the future what you should do in this or similar matters. Given in our imperial city of Worms 2c. on the 25th day of November, Anno 1521. of our empire, the Roman of the other, but of the others of all in the sixth. 1)

Carolus.

By the order of imperial and Christian majesty.

Maximilianus Transylvanus.

To the worthy, our dear devotees and faithful, N.
Rector, Magisters and Doctors of our University of Vienna.

B. Of the displeasure and displeasure that some great people have testified about this sharpness used against Luther.

587. letter of the knight Joh. von Rechenberg, Silesian Oberamtsdirector, to the Elector of Saxony, in which he inquires whether it is true that such a decree, of which he has enclosed a printed copy, was made at Worms with the unanimous consent of the estates. August 31, 1521.

From Cyprian's "Useful Documents," vol. II, p. 252.

Illuminator, Highborn Elector, Most Gracious Lord, my entire willing dignity to your Electorate beforehand. Lord Elector, I have recently heard how the Imperial Majesty has issued a serious edict against D. Martin Lutter and his followers through Germania, and how they are required to do so through

1) In the editions: "im Fünfften," which, as can be seen by comparison with the edict, is not correct. See No. 747.

The Elector's Grace of Brandenburg has been publicized and carried out in the manner stated in an open publication, as well as in such a royal edict and proclamation. The same shall be done by the common council of the kingdom, so that it may be possible for the people who adhere to this law to have a shocking trial, because it is my wish and that of the Christians to know about this case. Hirwegen ych Ewer Kursürsthtlichen Gnoden dinstlichs Sfleis wyl gebettenn habenn, ewer Kurfürstliche G. wollen mich gedochter Keyserlichenn Majest. commiſion, nebenn der eyntrechtigenn foxwylligunge der sthtennde des reychs, durch ewr Kurfürstliche Gn. I have decided on what I would like to keep as a matter of course for the authorities of the kingdom, not to stand in their own syndicates, and I am sure that our Electorate will be satisfied with this, as unknown to me, 1) will not let me be a Christian prince with the right to keep this matter. That I want to continue with my ganntz willign dinst ken [against^ Ewer K. F. G. allzeyt geflieſſen sein zw fordiennen. Gnedigister K.F. vnnd Her, wu Ach dißenn Drugk auff dem margk fundenn, het yt yt mich nicht erwegt, Ewer Kurfürstlichenn Gnodenn zu schreyben. But because his F. G., Margkraff Jochachinn, his Electoral G., the Illustrious Prince sund] Herr KarlIn, Herzuge zw Musenberg yn schlesien zur Olſe, Graf zw Glotz, foyt [Vogt] Inn Ober Laushnitz, disenn Drugk zugesertigkgett, vnnd der genannten Furst mir Geshrybenn, weil ych gewest bey meym gnedigenn Hern Herzugk Jörge sein Fürstlichen Gnodenn, from the Gehert or Sust dorfarenn, ob dißer beshließ, wy der Drugk zw Frangk wort ausgegangenn, von ewer Kurfürstlichen Gnoden vnnd alln sthtenden eyntrechtiglich forwylliget, byt yt ewer K. F. Gnodenn vmb eyynn Gnedigen vndericht. y shigke ewer K. F. G. neue Zeytung aus Vnnngern, die wend der allemechtige Gott zwm bestenn. ewer Kurfürstliche Gnodenn zu dienen als meyn Gnedigen Hernn nach formoegennheytt befint y ich mich wylich. Given on the Sunday after St. John's Day [Aug. 31] in the 21st year of the Free State.

E. KurFurstl. G.

W[ill]

Hannß Rechenbergk von Windische borau, Rytter vff Freinstat, ßhlawe und Wartenbergk.

1) in Cyprian: "vn-known".

To the Illustrious, Huchgebornn Furst vnnd Hernn, Herr Fryderychn, des Heyligenn Romischenn reychs ertz marßhaigk vnd KurFurst, Hertzog zu Sachsen, Landgraſſn vnn Doryngenn vnnd Marggraſ zw meyßen, meynn Gnedigiſn Hernn.

588 Prince Frederick of Saxony's answer that he had left Worms due to indisposition before the decisions on all matters concerning the empire had been made. Sept. 5, 1521.

From Cyprian's "Useful Documents," vol. II, p. 255.

By the Grace of God Friderich 2c.

Greetings to you, dearest, dearest one. We have read all the contents of your writings of the date of the Feast of St. John on the Sunday after his Ascension, and we have also published the newspapers which you have mentioned to us, for your kind favor, and we hope that the Almighty God will grant you mercy, and send it with the same newspapers, for the good of the common Christianity, everywhere for the best. Maj. commission, in addition to the consent of the Stend of the realm, of which he has sent you a letter, we wish to inform you by our letter 2c. We do not wish to reproach you for the fact that, at the recent Diet at Worms, we had decided on the weakness of our sovereignty, and on account of the insufficiency of the matter, a few days before, and before the matter of the realm had been decided on everywhere, we do not wish you to do so. Then we are inclined to be gracious to you. Datum Lochaw Dornstag nach Egidy [5 Sept] Anno Domini XXI.

To Hansen von Rechenbergk Knight.

Luther's report of this edict to Melanchthon, in which he also reports that Hartmuth von Kronberg had terminated his service to the emperor because of this edict, which had brought him 200 gold florins annually.

See Appendix, No. 69, § 4,

590 D. Mari. Luther's instruction to the confessors about his forbidden books.

This text is duplicated by Walch, namely here and in the 19th volume. Since we have already included it in our edition, Vol. XIX, 808, we omit it here.

Chapter Seven, Section Nine.

From the writings in which the actions from the Diet of Worms have been described.

591 D. Mart. Luther's summary report to Count Albrecht of Mansfeld of the action taken with him at the Diet of Worms. May 3, 1521.

Two different single printings of this letter have appeared. One, perhaps an Augsburg print (in two editions), is entitled: "Ain Mißsue so D. Martinus Luther nach seim abschhd zu Worms, Ain gebornen Grausten seinem verdrauten, Vnd liebgehabten zu geschriLen hat, seiner Handlung halben, Die sich vor Kay. May. And before princes, and sovereigns of the empire, have loused. - In jar. MDXXI." 3 leaves in quarto. The other by Martin Landsberg in Leipzig: "Geschichte vnd handelung Doctor Martinus Lütter belangede, dh mit hm auff gehalten ersten Reichs tagk Caroli des funfften Römische Keyzers tzu Wormbs gehalten, vnd durch doctorem Martinu selbst dem Hochgebornen Herren, herre Graffen von Manßuelt tzu geschrieiben Anno .M.D. xxi." 3 leaves in quarto. Duke Georg of Saxony sent a copy of this print to Counts Gebhart and Albrecht of Mansfeld on Sept. 8 (Seidemann, "Beiträge zur Res.-Gesch.", p. 53 and p. 177 f.) with the request: "ob solche Schrift von gemeldten Doctor Lütter an euch geschrieben sei, uns darnach zu richten". Count Albrecht's answer was evasive, but he admitted that "Doctor Luther has written to us several times, the thorough contents of which we have forgotten due to disregard, misplaced, or even partly lost". On a supplement to this letter, Count Albrecht writes: "We have also received reports that the same letter has been printed with changes, but we do not know why. In the collections, our writing is found: in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 117; in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 455; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 732; in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p. 585; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 602; and in the Erlanger, vol. 53, p. 71. The regest of this letter in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 144 has the wrong date: "May 9."

Noble and gracious Lord, E. Grace be my poor prayer and service always before. Gracious Lord! Mr. Rudolph von Watzdorf has ordered me to write, by way of an appointed messenger, the story (so I should call it) that happened to me in Worms. First of all, they did not wait for my future at Worms, therefore they sent a ban against me and condemned me in free imperial escort before I came and was interrogated. I was condemned before I arrived and was interrogated, after which they hurriedly dismissed me.

I was asked before Imperial Majesty whether I wanted to keep my books or revoke them. I have given my answer to this, as I respectfully inform Your Grace. Your Grace be informed. Immediately, the Imperial Majesty, embittered against me, issued a serious mandate with her own hand, 1) and let it appear to the imperial estates how she intended to act against me, as befits a Christian emperor and bailiff of the faith against a stiff-necked, obstinate heretic, but would like to keep the escort 2) before her.

3) Some of the empire have shot out to graciously and kindly remind me beforehand that I should submit my books and the matter to the imperial majesty and the empire's estates; and there I am summoned before the bishop of Trier, 3) Margrave Joachim, Duke Jörg of Saxony, bishop of Augsburg, German Master, bishop of Brandenburg, Count Jörg of Wertheim, and two of several cities.

4th Then the Doctor, Chancellor of the Margrave of Baden, stood up, and truly gave me a skilful, well-formed admonition that I must confess that the Official of Trier, who spoke before Imperial Majesty, had given him the right of audience. Maj. spoke to him about the

1) Although the individual printings and according to them De Wette and the Erlangen read: "gesellet", but the Wittenberg and the Jenaer: "gestellt", which seems to us to be the correct reading. For one makes a judgment, but not a mandate, still less "with one's own hand". We consider "gesellet" to be a misprint.

2) At De Wette and in the Erlanger: "hold out".

3) The "Bishop of Trier" is Richard, Churfürst zu Trier. He is named in Spalatin's Annals, p. 44: "the Archbishop of Trier, Lord Reich hardt, born of Greifenklau"; "the Margrave" is Joachim of Brandenburg; the "Bishop of Augsburg" is Christoph of Stadion; the "German Master" is the last German Master, Dietrich of Clem, son of the city mayor Wenzel of Cleen; the "Bishop of Brandenburg" is Hieronymus Scultetus, currently Bishop of Havelberg, as can be seen from no. 567, not his successor in Brandenburg since Oct. 1520, Dietrich von Hardenberg; "Count Jörg von Wertheim" requested a Protestant preacher in 1522 (see appendix of this volume, No. 93); the "two of several, cities" are Conrad Peutinger of Augsburg and Hans Bock, Knight of Strassbourg; the "Chancellor of Baden" is Hieronymus Vehus; "the Official of Trier" is Johann von Eck.

may not hold water; and has been the opinion:

5. it is not the opinion that one wants to enter into dispute with me, but to do a gracious, faithful, brotherly admonition out of Christian compassion to me, namely, that I should consider what mischief and turmoil would arise from it, and also that much trouble and offense would arise from it; and to hold the authorities in honor, to let up on many things for the sake of brotherly love, and to do the best in all things. Even if the authorities were sometimes mistaken, their power would not be lost, but they would still be obliged to be their subjects, and the like.

6 I have replied to this: I may and will submit myself and my books not only to Imperial Majesty, but also to any lesser person. Majesty, but also to any lesser person; but I reserve the right that nothing contrary to the holy gospel be recognized and decided. I have also never taught that one should despise authority, be it good or evil. Neither do I challenge the pope, nor the council, because of their evil life or work, but because of false doctrine. For in false doctrine hearken unto violence and obedience. And have namely condemned the article displayed in Costnitz: Tantum una est sancta, universalis Ecclesia, quae est numerus Praedestinatorum. I did not want to let this article be condemned; for it is an article of our faith, since we say: "I believe one holy Christian church."

(7) Likewise, the aversions in works are to be shunned, but in doctrine they must remain. For the word of God always vexes the great, the wise and the holy; just as Christ himself was made by God in signum contradictionis, and set as the fall of many in Israel [Luc. 2:34]. Therefore, in brotherly love, I could not indulge in anything further, except as much as would be acceptable to the gospel and faith.

Since nothing was done to me with this, my Lord of Trier has taken me specially to himself, along with D. Hieronymo 1) and Licentiate Amsdorf, and the Official with D. Cochleas, 2) Dechant at Frankfurt, with me.

1) Prospecting.

2) Cochleas - Cochläus.

before his grace alone let me bribe. 3) But it was a wicked disputation, that they tried me with sharp words, but did not reach the goal. I said: The pope would not be a judge in matters concerning God's word and faith, but every Christian man would have to watch and judge, just as he must live and die by it. For faith and the Word of God are the property of everyone in the whole community. I based this on St. Paul [1 Cor. 14, 30]: Revelatum assidenti si fuerit, prior taceat. From which saying it is clear that the master should follow the disciple, if he has better in God's words. And the saying remained and still stands, that they said nothing against it. 5) So we departed from there.

9 After that, the Chancellor of Baden and Doctor Peutingger were again ordered to act with me, to submit my books to Imperial Majesty without any reservation; for I should provide the best to them. Maj. without any reservation; for I should provide the best to them, they would conclude Christianly. Since they pressed me hard here, I put it to their conscience whether they wanted to advise me that I should trust so freely in Kais. Maj. and others, since they had already condemned me and burned my books. Whether I would not have a just cause to be concerned, and would have made the reservation that they would not decide anything against the holy gospel; and whether the cause would be nothing, yet the holy scripture would have been buried, trusting in men, as Jer. 17, 5. says: Maledictus, qui confidit in hominem. So we parted. But I wanted to submit with the addition that they would not resolve against God. They did not dare to add it.

After that, my Lord of Trier let me demand to see him alone; for his Lord had indeed shown himself to be quite good and more than gracious in this matter, and would have liked to have done it well. I answered as before, and did not know how to answer otherwise; so he left me alone. Soon after that the official came with a count and

3) "bestechen" in the old prints, in the Wittenberg and in the Jena. The expression is taken from the tournament. In the newer editions: gestehen.

4) Thus the Wittenbergers and the Jenaers. De Wette and the Erlangeners: "a loose disputation".

5) Thus around Augsburg print and in the editions; in the Leipzig single print: aufbrachten.

Emper. Majest. Chancellor, 1) as a notary, and sent me a message from Imperial Maj. Maj.: because I did not want to turn away from my undertaking, I was to depart from there and be escorted for twenty days. Maj. then wanted to do what was due against me.

11. so I thanked imperial maj. Maj. and said: Sicut Domino placuit, ita factum est; sit nomen Domini benedictum [Job 1, 21].

They also bound me not to preach or write anything among the ways; I said: I want to do everything that pleases the Emperor. Maj. pleases, but I will leave God's word unbound, as St. Paul says: Verbum Dei non est alligatum [2 Tim. 2, 9].

13 So I am divorced, and now in Eisenach, beware, they will blame me, I have broken the escort with preaching, in Hersfeld and Eisenach. For they are looking for it. I hereby humbly submit to Your Grace. Hastily written in Eisenach. Die sanctae Crucis [May 3] MDXXI.

E. G.

Capellan Martinus Luther.

592 Detailed description of the action of D. Martin Luther before the Imperial Majesty and the Estates of the Holy Roman Empire at the Diet of Worms in 1521.

This writing is found in Latin in the Wittenberg edition (1551), tom. II, fol. 164; in the Jena (1566), tom. II, fol. 411 d and in the Erlanger, opp. var. arg., tom. VI, p. 5. German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 107; in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 440d; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 718; in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p. 574 and in Walch. There are very many individual printings available about this "plot" under very different titles, of which the Erlangen edition, vol. 64, p. 374 lists ten. The first writing described there, which is printed there with the note that it is "missing in Walch", has the title: "Doctor Martini Luthers öffentliche verhöf zu Worms im Reichstag, Red vnnd widerred, am 17. tag Aprilis im jar 1521. beschehen." Six quarto leaves. All other editions described there are smaller, with the exception of one, to which the letter to the Elector (No. 581) "Copia ainer Missive" 2c. is attached, which comprises ten leaves. From this it follows that Walch's assumption, Vol. XV, p. 116, that in the writing: "Römischer Kai. Mt. interrogation speech

The following is a summary of the treatise of the Augustinian Order of Wittenberg, in the presence of the princes, rulers, and sovereigns of the Holy Roman Empire, which was presented at the Council of Wittenberg. M. D. 21. Jare." our writing may be contained, is invalid. For our writing comprises in the Jena edition almost eight folio leaves, in the old edition of Walch, vol. XV, almost 23 columns, which are equal to an equally large number of pages in the Erlangen edition, while the writing printed there I. c. occupies only seven pages. In terms of content, too, our writing indisputably deserves superiority over that one, and in our opinion Walch would have been quite justified in not bringing it even if it had come to his attention. Walch also mentions a single Latin edition in quarto under the title: Xetu st res Mstae D. Martini Imtdsri in eoruitis principuru Vornmatiae 1521.

Anno after the birth of Christ our Lord and Savior in 1521, Tuesday after Misericordias Domini [April 16], Doctor Martinus Luther, of the Augustinian order, came to Worms, where he remained until Friday after Jubilate, or after 2) St. George's Day [April 26], after he was required by Emperor Carol the Fifth, King of Hispania, Archduke of Austria, 2c. who held the first Imperial Diet in the same imperial city in the first year of his imperial rule.

2 After D. Three years ago, Martin had publicly disputed in the University of Wittenberg in Saxony a number of propositions and books against indulgences, the papacy and the Roman bishop's tyranny; which, however, had been torn up, condemned, and burned in various ways by the papists, but had not been disputed by anyone, neither with sacred Scripture nor reasonable causes, and things began to get outrageous, because the rabble and the common man took up the cause of the Gospel against the clergy and the papists, and wanted to defend it:

Therefore, at the suggestion and insistence of the Roman legates, it was considered good that Luther himself be required. Since the Imperial Majesty, the Majesty, the churals and princes sent him an honorary retainer 3) and gave him an escort, he came to the same request and moved into the German Court there for lodging; there he was visited and addressed by many counts, barons, knights, and the nobility, clergy and secular, until far into the night.

2) The first "after" is Conjecture of the Jena edition in the margin, the second "after" we have inserted. The time determination, how long Luther had stayed, is missing in the Latin editions. In Förstemann's "Neues Urkundenbuch", p. 68u, in Spalatin's "Bericht über die Handlung" 2c. both "nach" are written.

3) "Ernhold" - herald. See St. Louis edition, Vol. XIV, 734.

1) The Emperor's Chancellor, formerly the Emperor Maximilian's Secretarius, is Maximilian Transsilvanus or Siebenberger. Cf. no. 579,

But many, both the repugnant and others, would not have provided for his arrival at all. For even though he was required by the imperial honorary with a public escort, but because a few days ago, before he arrived, his books had been condemned by publicly posted mandate, no one thought that he would come as he had already been condemned by such untimely judgment. And since at Oppenheim, when he first learned of this, he was advised by many of his friends that he should not set out on the journey himself, because he saw that the beginning of this matter, contrary to the given guidance, was so bad, he gave them this answer with great joy: Well, because I am required and called, I have certainly decided to go in, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, even if I knew that there were as many devils in it as there are tiles on every roof.

The next day, after he had arrived, on Wednesday [April 17], the honorable Ulrich von Pappenheim, hereditary marshal of the empire, came to Doctor Martin early before dinner. Majest. early before dinner, sent to Doctor Martin, and indicated to him the same order that he should appear in the afternoon at four o'clock before kaiserl. Majesty, the princes and other estates of the empire, and to hear why and for what he was called and required, which D. Martin accepted with due reverence and honor.

6th And as soon as four o'clock had struck, on the same day, the said von Pappenheim and Caspar Sturm, the honorary holder, who had led D. Martin from Wittenberg to Worms, came, required and gave him the escort through the German Court, up to the Palgrave's inn, and was thus led through secret passages to the Town Hall, so that he might be escorted by the people, who were much on the way, so immediately to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty. The people who had gathered on the way to the Imperial Majesty's inn would not harm him. Although there were many who ran up to it and wanted to enter, the guards drove them away by force; many climbed onto the roofs and houses to see Doct. Martinum.

7 When he now stood before the Imperial Majesty, the Princes and all the estates of the Empire. Majesty, the princes and all the estates of the empire that were present at the imperial diet, he was reminded by von Pappenheim that he should not speak unless he was asked.

8 Then the imperial orator, D. Johann Eck, common official of the bishop of Trier, began with a high and audible voice to speak first in Latin and then in German by order of the imperial majesty. Majesty, to speak first in Latin, then in German, on this opinion, and to hold Doct. Martin, as follows:

9 Martin Luther, the holy and invincible imperial Majesty, out of concern and advice from all the estates of the Roman Empire, has summoned you to appear before her Majesty. Maj. has, out of the concern and counsel of all the estates of the Holy Roman Empire, summoned you here before Her Majesty's See and required you to ask these two articles. First, whether you confess that these books (to which a large volume and bundle, written in Latin and German, was shown) are yours, and whether you recognize them as yours or not? Secondly, whether you want to revoke them and what is in them, or persist and insist on them?

10 Before D. Martin answered, D. Hieronymus Schurff, who had joined him and was standing by his side, called out loudly and said: "Show the books by name. Then the official from Trier told the names of D. Martin's books that were printed in Basel, among which was also the interpretation of several Psalms. Item, the booklet of good works. The explanation of the Lord's Prayer. The Sermon of Threefold Righteousness, and other Christian books that were not books of controversy.

After this, D. Martinus gave this answer to it in Latin and German:

From kais. Majesty, two articles are held against me. The first, whether I want to recognize all books that have my name as mine. The other, whether I want to defend or revoke those that have been written and issued by me so far. To this I will recently answer correctly, as much as I can.

First, I must recognize the books now mentioned as mine, and can never deny anything of them. But what follows from this, that I should indicate whether I also want to defend or revoke everything at the same time? Since this is a question of faith and the salvation of souls, and concerns God's word, which is the highest and greatest treasure in heaven and earth, and which we should all rightly hold in all honor, it would be presumptuous and dangerous of me to indicate something thoughtless, since I could affirm and say for certain less than the matter requires, or more than would be in accordance with the truth, imprudently or thoughtlessly; which both would bring me into the judgment which Christ has passed, saying: "Whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my heavenly Father." For this reason, I ask Imperial Maj. Maj. most humbly and most humbly to give me time to think about it.

that I may answer correctly to the questions put to me without detriment to God's word and without danger to my soul's salvation.

Thereupon the princes had their say, which the official of Trier presented in such a way:

11 Although you, Martin Luther, could now have understood sufficiently from the imperial mandate and command what you are required to do and why, and therefore would not now be worthy of being given further and longer time to consider; nevertheless, Imperial Majesty, out of his own kindness, allows you one more day, so that you will be present tomorrow at this very hour; but in such a way and with this condition that you will not express your opinion in writing, but orally. Maj. out of his own kindness allows you one more day to make up your mind, so that you will appear tomorrow at this very hour; but in such a way, and with this condition, that you will not state and present your opinion in writing, but orally.

After this, D. Martin is led by the Ehrnhold back to his hostel. Here shall not be passed over with silence, that D. Luther, as he went to hear the imperial order, and was now in the hall, where the princes were seated, was verbally admonished by some, one here, the other there, that he wanted to be confident and courageous, act manly, and not be afraid of those who could kill the body, but not the soul; but rather wanted to be afraid of him who could destroy soul and body, and throw them into the infernal fire [Matth. 10, 28.]. Item [Luc. 12, 11. 21, 12.]: "When ye stand before kings and princes, consider not what ye shall speak: for it shall be given you in that hour."

The following day, on Thursday [April 18], at four o'clock in the afternoon, the Ehrnhold came, led Doctor Martin to the Emperor's Court; there, because of the princes' business, he stayed until six o'clock, and waited among a large crowd of people, who themselves were pressing and shoving. When the princes were seated and D. Martin stood before them, the official began to speak thus:

14 Yesterday evening, Imperial Majesty appointed this hour to you, Martin Luther. Majesty appointed this hour for you, Martin Luther, because you publicly recognized and accepted the books we told you about yesterday as your own. But because you asked for time to think about whether you would consider some of them null and void, or whether you would consider everything you professed to be right and approve it, which is now over; although by right you should not have obtained a longer time to consider, because you have known for such a long time what you were required to do, and the cause of faith should be so certain to all and sundry, and each one should be so reported in it, that at whatever time it is sought and desired by him, he will have the same certain and constant reason,

If you are such a great and skilled doctor of the Holy Scriptures, you could give cause and account for it. Well, then, give a final answer to the Imperial Maj. Maj. Seek the kindness of which you have experienced in the time of reflection you have attained: Do you want to defend your recognized 1) books all at once, or do you want to revoke something? The official said this in Latin and German.

15 To this Doctor Martin also answered in Latin and German, though in the most submissive and humble manner, not shouting very much nor violently, but speaking in a fine manner, demurely and modestly, yet with great Christian joy and constancy, and in such a way that the adversaries wished and desired that he had spoken more despondently and timidly than they had provided for and hoped for, after he had asked for time to think things over, that he would have revoked and recanted.

Now his answer 2) is as follows:

Most Sublime Emperor, Most Illustrious, High-born Prince [and] Princes, Most Gracious Fund Gracious Lords. I appear as the obedient one at the appointment set and appointed for me yesterday evening, and by God's mercy, I ask Your Imperial Majesty to give me the honor of your presence. Majesty, and princely graces would graciously hear this just and true matter (as I hope), and if, out of ignorance, I would perhaps not give any one his due title, or would otherwise not show myself with gestures according to court custom, graciously give me credit for it, as I have not been at court, but have been confined in the monastery, but am confined to the monastery, and cannot testify of myself otherwise than that in what I have taught and written with a simple heart up to now, I have looked and sought only God's glory and the benefit and blessedness of the believers in Christ, so that they would be taught righteously and purely.

Now, most gracious Emperor, most gracious princes and lords, in response to the two articles which were held before me yesterday by your Imperial Majesty, I would like to ask you. Maj., namely, whether I can accept the above-mentioned and under

1) agnitos - those recognized by you.

2) As Spalatin reports, Luther delivered the following speech first in Latin and then in German. The speech "Doetoris Martini vor kay. Mayt." 2c. is found in Förstemann's "Neues Urkundenbuch", p. 69, and agrees completely in content with the one given here, which seems to us to be the German original, but is much more awkward in expression. Also, that relation in Spalatin's manuscript is not complete, but breaks off at the point we have indicated below.

I have given my submissive, clear and correct answer to the first article on which I still firmly insist and want to insist forever, namely that such books are mine and have come out from me under my name. I have given my humble, clear and correct answer to the first article, on which I still firmly insist, and want to insist forever, namely, that such books are mine and have gone out from me under my name; unless perhaps something in them has been changed by my favorable malice or untimely cleverness, or has been maliciously tweaked out; for I do not recognize anything else for mine, except what is mine alone, and written by me alone, without some man's interpretation, however skillful he may be.

But what I will answer to the other article, I ask most humbly, E. kais. Majesty, your high and princely graces may well accept and consider that my books are not all of the same kind. For there are some in which I have taught about Christian faith and good works in such a bad, simple and Christian way that even the adversaries themselves must confess that they are useful, harmless and worthy of being read by Christian hearts. Yes, even the papal bulla, though it is swift and violent, nevertheless renders some of my books harmless, even though it condemns them by a monstrous, unnatural judgment. If I now begin to revoke them, dear, what else would I do but to condemn the truth, which both friends and enemies confess at the same time, as one among all men, and to contradict only the unanimous confession 1) of all?

The other kind of my books is, in which the papacy and the papists' teachings are attacked and touched, as those who have devastated Christianity in body and soul with their false teachings, evil life and annoying examples. For no one can deny and dissimulate, because experience testifies, and all pious hearts lament, that through the pope's laws and the doctrine of men, the consciences of the Christian faithful are most dreadfully and miserably entangled, weighed down, and martyred, even the goods, causes, and possessions, especially in this highly famous German nation, with unbelievable tyranny.

have been exhausted and swallowed up, and are still being swallowed up today in an unseemly manner, while they themselves in their own books and decrees set and teach, as Dist. 9, L 25, H. 1, L 2, that the Pope's laws and teachings, which are contrary to the Gospel or the sayings of the fathers, are to be considered erroneous and incompetent.

If I were to revoke them, I would not do otherwise than to strengthen their tyranny and open not only the windows but also the doors and gates to such great impiety and godlessness, as they would rage and rage much more freely than they have been allowed to do so far, and by such a testimony of this revocation of mine, their tyrannical regime, in which without which all bravery, mischievousness and malice is practiced unashamedly and unpunished, would become much more unpleasant and intolerable to the poor common man and mob, and yet would be strengthened and confirmed, especially so vaunted that such would be ordered by me from Your Imperial Majesty and the whole Roman Empire. Majesty and the entire Roman Empire. O, what a great cover of shame of all kinds of mischievousness and tyranny, dear God, I would then become!

The third type of my books is the one I have written against some private and individual persons 2) who have taken upon themselves to protect and defend Roman tyranny, and to falsify and dampen the godly doctrine taught by me. Against them, I freely confess, I have been somewhat more vehement and strident than befits the occasion of religion and profession 3); for I do not make myself a saint, nor do I dispute not about my life, but about the teachings of Christ.

It is also not my place to revoke them, because such a revocation would once again lead to tyranny and all kinds of ungodly beings ruling with my approval, gaining the upper hand, and raging against God's people much more violently and cruelly than has ever happened before.

2) Here Spalatin's manuscript offers: "wider etliche sonderliche und vngemeinen Personen"; in contrast, the Erlangen edition, which is based on the same relation (vol. 64, p. 380): "wider etlich Sünder und ungenehme Personen".

3) Profession - monastic vows.

But because I am a man and not God, I cannot help or defend my books in any other way than my Lord and Savior Jesus Christ has done in his teaching; who, when asked about his teaching before Annas the high priest, received a blow from the high priest's servant, saying, "If I have spoken evil, prove it to be evil" [John 18:22 ff].

If the Lord, who knew that he could not err, did not refuse to hear testimony against his teaching, even from a lowly, vile servant, how much more shall I, who am earth and ashes, and can easily err, desire and wait if anyone will bear witness against my teaching.

1)

Therefore, by the mercy of God, I ask Your Imperial Majesty, churlish and princely graces. Majesty, your sovereign and princely graces, or whoever can do it, be he of high or low standing, will bear witness and convict me with prophetic and apostolic writings that I have erred. Then, if I am convinced, I will be quite willing and ready to recant all error and be the first to throw my little books into the fire.

From this, I think, it appears clearly and publicly that I have sufficiently considered and considered the distress and danger, the nature and the discord, which is to be awakened by causing my teaching, of which I was strongly and severely reminded yesterday. It is truly the greatest pleasure and joy for me to see that discord and disunity arise for the sake of God's word. For this is God's way, course and happiness, since Christ the Lord Himself says [Matth. 10,34.35.]: "I have not come to bring peace, but the sword, for I have come to stir up man against his Father" 2c.

For this reason, it must be considered how wonderful and terrifying God is in His judgments, lest perhaps that which causes disunity and discord should be avoided.

If we start with persecution and blasphemy of the holy word of God, out of trust in our power and wisdom, we will cause a terrible flood of sin, insurmountable danger, both physical and spiritual harm and damage. Moreover, it is also to be feared that the government of this most noble and kind young man, Emperor Carl (in whose majesty, next to God, there is great hope), would not only gain an evil, unfortunate beginning, but also a means and an end.

I could explain and illustrate this trade with examples from the holy scriptures further and more abundantly than Pharaoh, the king of Babylon, and the kings of Israel, who then brought themselves into the greatest harm and destruction, because they wanted to pacify and preserve their kingdoms with their cleverest plots and riddles. For it is he who seizes the witty in their wit and cleverness, and turns back the mountains before they realize it [Job 5:13, 9:5]; therefore it is necessary to fear God. But I will now refrain from brevity 2c.

I do not say this in the opinion that such great heads need my instruction or remembrance, but that I should not have nor want to withdraw from the German nation, from my dear fatherland, my due service, and I hereby wish to express myself to Your Imperial and Princely Majesty. Maj., chur- and princely. 2) that they will not be moved by my adversaries against me without cause. In order to forbid them with my poor prayer to God, I will always be willing to do so with all humility.

When he had said this, the imperial orator began as if he were somewhat moved. Orator began as if he were somewhat moved, and said: he had not answered the matter, nor should there be any doubt, nor should there be any dispute about it, which had previously been defined in conciliation, finally decided and condemned; therefore, in the case of

1) Here Förstemann breaks off Spalatin's relation of this speech, while in the Erlangen edition the following is also found: Förstemann's text senselessly adds to the preceding: "meyner abgunstigen vbelmeynung vervnglimpfen vnd in vngnaden bringen". These words are in fact the end of the speech. The intervening part is therefore omitted.

2) The following words, as much as we can conjoin to the incomplete relation in Förstemann and the erroneous text of the Erlangen edition, will read in Spalatin's handwriting approximately like this: ssie wollten mich gegen ihnen nicht lassen durchl meiner Abgunstigen Uebelmeinung verunglimpfen und in Ungnaden bringen. In Latin: ns patiantur stnais sckvsglriorim ms sins eansa sidi rscckci invisum.

sought him, he wanted to give a simple, round and correct answer on whether he wanted to revocir and revoke or not?

To this D. Luther said:

Because Your Imperial Maj, chur- and F. G. desire a bad, simple, correct answer, I will give one that shall have neither horns nor teeth, namely thus: Unless I am overcome and convicted with testimonies of the Holy Scriptures, or with public clear and bright reasons and causes (for I do not believe either the pope or the conciliar alone, because it is evident and obvious that they have often erred, and have been repugnant to themselves), 1) and I am thus convinced with the sayings that have been put on and introduced by me, and my conscience is caught in God's word, 2) then I cannot and will not revoke anything, because it is neither safe nor advisable to do anything against the conscience. Here I stand, I cannot do otherwise, God help me, amen.

16 This answer of the doctor was accepted by the Electors, Princes and Estates of the Empire for deliberation. After diligent consideration, the Trier official began to refute it:

17 Martine, you have answered more immodestly than befits your person, indeed, it serves nothing at all to the matter. Among the books, you make various distinctions, but in such a way that all of them neither do nor serve anything in answer to the question posed. If you had recanted the books in which a large part of your errors are contained, then Imperial Majesty would undoubtedly, out of her own goodness, neither tolerate nor permit that the others, as good as they are, be persecuted.

(18) But you revive and stir up again what the whole common council at Costnitz, which was assembled there from the whole German nation, has condemned, and you want to be overcome with the holy Scriptures; in which you are completely mistaken. For what is the use of a new disputation?

1) According to the Latin, the following reads like this: "I am overcome by the scriptural passages which I have attracted, and my conscience is caught in the words of God; I can neither revoke nor will I revoke anything, because" 2c. - The Erlangen edition (Vol. 64, p. 382) offers at the corresponding place: "it is then also a matter of fact that I am overcome by the Scriptures which are led and written by me" 2c.

2) In the text: "be"; in the Jena the conjecture "is" in the margin; in Latin: est.

What should we do about the things that were condemned by the church and the churches a hundred years ago? Perhaps, then, one should indicate and give cause for every piece and article. For if one who contradicts the conciliarities and the opinion of the church were once to be overcome by writings, we would have nothing certain or conclusive in Christendom. 3) And this is the reason why every piece and article is condemned. And this is the reason that Emperor Maj. Maj. desires a simple and correct answer from you, either yes or no, whether you want to defend all of yours as Catholic and Christian, or revoke and recant some of it?

19th Then D. Martin, Imperial Maj. did not want to allow that he would be urged against his conscience, which was overcome and imprisoned by the holy scripture, to recant something without public arguments and proofs of those who speak against it. The answer he would give would not be incorrect or sophistical, but simple, bad and right; he would have no other answer than the one he gave before. Unless the adversaries "explicated" and loosed his conscience, which was caught by the errors (as they are called), with sufficient reasons of the holy Scriptures, otherwise he could not get out of the nets in which he would be entangled. It would not immediately be true everything that the Concilia ordered; indeed, they would often have erred, and decided repugnantly to themselves. Therefore, the adversary's argument would be useless, because he would be able to show and prove that the concilia were in error, and he would not be able to retract what was so diligently and publicly expressed in the Holy Scriptures.

20 The official did not answer, but with very few words, namely: one could not prove that Concilia was mistaken. But D. Martinus offered himself and said that he could and wanted to prove such.

When it began to get dark and gloomy, everyone went home. The Spaniards, however, laughed at and despised the man of God, D. Martinum, when he left the imperial guardhouse for his inn. Maj. from the guardhouse to his inn.

On the Friday after Misericordias Domini [April 19], after the princes and estates, who were in the habit of being in the Imperial Council, had gathered together, the Emperor sent them a document 4) with this content:

3) "with writings" (scripturis), that is, with passages of Scripture.

4) This is the Emperor's own rescript, No. 572 in this volume.

23 Our ancestors, who were also Christian princes, were nevertheless obedient to the Roman Church, which Martinus now considers. And because he has undertaken not to deviate from his errors even a single finger, we cannot depart with honor from the example of our ancestors to protect the old faith and to help the Roman See. But him, Martin Luther, and those who adhere to him, we want to pursue with the ban and the eight, and other ways that are open to exterminate them. But we do not want to break the given and ascribed escort, but we want to make sure that he will safely return to the place from which he was required to come.

24 This decision of the emperor was discussed by the princes, princes and estates of the empire on Friday all afternoon, together with the whole of the following day on Saturday. Martinus has not yet received a reply from the Emperor. Majesty.

In the meantime, he was visited by many princes, counts, barons, knights, from the nobility, clergy and secular (not common people): they were always in and around the courtyard, where he was staying, and could not get tired of seeing him. Also, two notes were posted, one against D. Martinus, the other (as one thought) for the doctor. Although it was thought by many people of understanding that it was deliberately and dangerously ordered by the enemies, so that they would have cause to cancel the escort, which the papal legates sought with diligence.

26. Monday after Jubilate [April 22], before dinner, the Archbishop of Trier let D. Martin Luther know that he wanted to appear before him early on Wednesday at six before noon to name a place again. On St. George's Day [April 23], in the evening about Essen, the Archbishop of Trier's Capellan came by order of his lord to D. Martino and requested that he appear the following day, at the appointed hour, at his lord's inn.

On Wednesday after St. George's Day [April 24], D. Martinus came to the archbishop's inn at Trier, where he was accompanied by his chaplain and the imperial honorable; he was also followed by those who had come with him from Saxony and Thuringia, and by several other very good friends. [They] 1) appeared before the Archbishop of Trier, [before] Margrave Joachim of Brandenburg, Duke George of Saxony, the Bishops of Augsburg and Brandenburg, the German Master, Count Georgen of Wertheim, Johann Bock of Strasbourg, D. Vehus and D. Peutingern.

28 Then D. Vehus, chancellor of the Margrave of Baden, protested that he was therefore not required to dispute with him, but only that they, the princes, out of Christian love and special grace, had obtained from Imperial Majesty a gracious and brotherly admonition. Majesty to graciously and fraternally admonish him.

29 Then he said that although the Conciliarities had decreed many things, they had not decreed anything unpleasant. And since they had erred, their authority and power had not fallen, least of all so that every man would strive against them according to his own mind. He brought in many things from the Centurion and Zacchaeus [Matth. 8, 8. Luc. 19, 6.], that the one had taken Christ into his house, the other had asked that he not enter; likewise from human statutes, ceremonies, ordinances; these were all established and made to curb the vices and to control the will, according to opportunity and change of time; and that the church could not do without human statutes, nor could it do without them; by the fruits a tree would be known. However, it was said that much good came from ordinances and laws, and that St. Martin, St. Nicholas, and others had been many saints in the churches.

30 Secondly, that his books would arouse and cause great agitation and unspeakable indignation, that the mob would misuse the booklet of Christian liberty to throw off the yoke and strengthen disobedience. Now it would be much different, because since the believers had one heart and mind [Apost. 4, 32], therefore one would have to have laws and order.

(31) About this it should be considered, because he wrote many good things, and doubtless of a good spirit, as, of threefold righteousness, of good works, and other things, that the devil, by stealth and deceit, would deal with it, that all his books should be eternally damned. For from those which he wrote at the last, it would truly be seen, as a tree is not known by the blossom, but by the fruit.

32. then he said from the 91st Psalm, v. 5. 6. of the devil or pestilence, so in the midday ver-talk and protest". - In the old German editions, the text here is quite badly in order. Walch has set it right. Also in Latin Vuorästatt stands Vuso (Vehus).

1) In Latin, the thread of the context is: "where before the Archbishop of Trier 2c. V. Vehus began to derbet, of the pestilence that creeps in darkness, and of the arrows that fly by day 2c. Summa, the whole speech was mainly based on rhetoric and oratory to admonish and move him (M.), he wanted to consider respectability, honor, welfare, good law, justice and order, and on the other hand the great danger of conscience, common and special salvation and benefit; he repeated and generally urged in the beginning, middle and end, that this admonition and reminder was done by the princes out of inclined will and special graces. At last, he let himself be heard in the resolution of several words of warning, and said that if he persisted in his presumption, the emperor would proceed against him and expel him from the empire, and admonished him to consider and ponder this and other things.

To which D. Martinus gave this answer: "Most noble and illustrious, highborn princes, most gracious lords! I thank you, as humbly as I can, for your graciousness, the most gracious and kind will, from which this admonition and reminder emanates. For I realize that I am far too poor a man to be admonished by such great princes and lords.

34 After this, he said freely and publicly that he had not rebuked all the conciliar churches, but only the one at Costnitz, mostly because it had condemned God's word. Which would be evident from the article of John Hus, which condemns all there, namely: The Christian church is a common bunch of those who are provided for salvation. This article would have been condemned by the Concilium at Costnitz, that would be certain; and subsequently the article of our faith: "I believe in a holy general Christian church. Therefore he said: he would not refuse to give up life, limb and blood, only that he would not be pushed to revoke God's word. For to defend the same, one must be more obedient to God than to men [Acts 5:29].

(35) He could not prevent the trouble of faith here either. For there would be two kinds of trouble: one of love, the other of faith. The adversity of love is in the outward life and conduct, but the adversity of faith or doctrine, which is in the word of God, he could not now avoid or prevent, since it was not in his power that Christ should not be a stone of adversity, as it is written in Luc. 2:34, Ecce hic positus est in ruinam, etc. If the sheep of Christ are fed with the pure pasture of the gospel, if the faith in Christ is righteous, and if the sheep are not a stumbling block, then the gospel is a stumbling block.

If the church had been preached, and if there had been pious and Christian leaders or ministers in the church who faithfully carried out their office, there would have been no need to burden the church with the statutes of men.

He would know that one should be obedient to the authorities, even to those who live evil and wickedly. Likewise, he would know that one should give way to one's own mind and thoughts, as he had taught in his books and writings, and would most obediently like to do all this; only that he would not be forced to deny God's word.

37 When D. Martinus escaped, the princes discussed and deliberated. Martinus escaped, the princes discussed and deliberated what answer they wanted to give him. And when he was called back in, the Chancellor of Baden repeated what had been said before and admonished him that he wanted to submit his books and writings to Imperial Majesty and the Empire for judgment. Maj. and the empire to judge them.

38 To which D. Martinus answered humbly and demurely: he did not want to suffer that it would be said of him as if he had shunned the imperial majesty, the electors, princes and estates. Majesty, the princes and estates of the Holy Roman Empire and fled. For he not only wanted to have Her Majesty and graces, but also the very least, willingly and gladly, most diligently and most precisely, examine and consider his books; only that such be done by God's word and holy scripture. But God's word would be so clear and public for him that he could not deviate, unless he was told and taught better things by it. For St. Augustine also writes that he had learned to give this honor only to the books that are called canonical or biblical, so that he believed that they were right and true; but the other teachers, however holy and learned they were, he believed so far away, if they wrote what was right and true.

39 Moreover, St. Paul wrote in 1 Thess. 5:21 that we should test everything and accept what is good; and Gal. 1:8, 9: "Even if an angel comes from heaven and preaches otherwise, let him be accursed," and let no one believe him.

40 For this reason, he humbly asks that they do not urge his conscience, which is bound and captive to God's word and holy scripture, to deny it, and that they be commanded to do so, and that they work and bring about this matter, especially with the Emperor. Maj. that he would not be forced to do anything contrary to his conscience; otherwise he would do everything most willingly and obediently.

41 As he spoke this, the Elector, Margrave Joachim of Brandenburg, asked him if he could would have said that he would not give way, that he had been overcome by the Holy Scriptures? Doctor Martinus answered: Yes, most gracious Lord, or with clear and public causes and reasons.

So they parted, the other princes went to the town hall, but the archbishop of Trier summoned D. Martinum to his chamber, along with his official, Johann Ecken, and Cochläum. With D. Martino stood D. Hieronymus Schurff, and he Nicolaus von Amsdorf. There the official began to argue and dispute, as a sophist and canonist of the pope's cause to defend; that from the holy scriptures heresies had always arisen, as the Arian, from this saying in the Gospel: "Joseph did not recognize his spouse until she gave birth to her first son" [Matth. 1, 25.].

43) Then he went on to say that he would support himself to overthrow this proposition: The Catholic Christian Church is the whole bunch of saints; he wanted to make wheat out of the tares and members out of the dung of the body. This and such ridiculous, useless and childish things he claimed. Doctor Martinus and D. Hieronymus Schurff refuted it, but modestly and sensibly, as if it neither served nor did anything. From time to time, D. Cochläus also chattered among them, and supported himself in persuading D. Martin that he wanted to desist from his presumption, and henceforth abstain completely from writing and teaching. Finally, they left each other.

44 On the evening of the same day, the Archbishop of Trier informed Doctor Martino through Mr. Amsdorf that Imperial Majesty had extended the escort for another two days. Maj. had extended the escort for another two days, so that he might act with him (D. M.). Also on the following day D. Peutinger and the chancellor of Baden would come to him, indeed, he himself wanted to deal with him; as happened. Both, D. Peutinger and the Chancellor of Baden, came on Thursday, St. Marx's Day [April 25], early before dinner; they agreed to talk to D. Martinum, that he wanted to heed the Emperor and the Empire badly and without any condition, to recognize and judge about his books.

45 To this Martinus answered and said: he wanted to do everything gladly, to suffer and be satisfied, if they only acted according to and from the holy scripture, and let it be master and judge; otherwise he did not want to get involved in anything, nor did he want to consent to it. For God said through the prophet, Psalm 146, 3: "Do not rely on princes, they are men, they cannot help"; item, Jer. 17, 5: "Cursed be he who relies on

Trust in men" 2c. Since they pressed so hard and so vehemently, he said, "In short, he did not want men to know or to judge God's word.

46 So they went away, but they asked him to consider and give a better answer, and after noon they wanted to come again; as they came again, but in vain, because they reported as much as before. At last they sought that he would at least put his cause to the knowledge of a future council. Which Doctor Luther was satisfied with; but with the condition and the decision that they would submit the articles drawn from his books to the Concilio itself, but in such a way that they would be spoken of and judged from the holy Scriptures, and the contradiction would be presented and proven with the same testimonies.

47 Then they went and told the archbishop of Trier: D. Martinus had offered to submit his books in some articles to the Concilio. Martinus had offered to submit his books in several articles to the Concilio, and in the meantime to keep silent about them. This, however, Martinus had never taken into consideration or thought, since neither admonitions nor reprimands could ever persuade him to either revoke his books, which he had preserved and fortified with clear and public testimonies of Scripture, or to submit and submit them to the knowledge and judgment of men, since he would prove from Scripture and with public, certain reasons and causes that he had erred.

For this reason, God, by special grace, sent for the Archbishop of Trier to summon D. Martinum and to hear him himself. When he heard that it was much different than Peutinger and the chancellor of Baden had reported to him, he said that he did not want to take much notice of it if he had heard him himself; otherwise, he would have gone to the emperor immediately and reported to him what the doctors had reported.

The Archbishop of Trier, however, dealt most graciously with D. Martino, first of all alone, both as far as the Emperor's and the Empire's, as well as the Council's decision was concerned; in which conversation D. Martinus did not hold anything against the Archbishop. Martinus did not hold anything against the archbishop, saying freely: it would be impossible to trust and submit such a great, important matter to those who had touched him in public with new mandates, condemned his books, and approved and confirmed the pope's bulla.

50 Secondly, the archbishop called one of his (D. Martini) friends to him, requested through him from D. Martino, he wanted to indicate himself where he was.

with which this matter could be advised and helped? Martin answered: "There is no better counsel nor help," he said, "than that given by Gamaliel, as St. Lucas testifies in Acts 5:38, 39. 5, 38. 39.: "If the counsel or the work is of men, it will perish. But if it is of God, you will not be able to stop it. Such is the wish of the Imperial Majesty, the He would know for certain that if his actions and deeds were not of God, they would perish in three or even two years.

(51) Then the archbishop said, "What would he do if the articles that were to be submitted to the Concilium and placed at home were to be withdrawn? Luther answered, "If only they are not the ones that the Concilium at Costnitz condemned. The archbishop said: "I fear it will be the same ones. Said D. Luther: So I cannot and will not remain silent, as I am certain that God's word is condemned by such a decree and decision. Therefore, I will let go of it before life and limb, stump and stem, because I have surrendered God's clear and true word.

When the archbishop saw that D. Martinus did not want to submit God's word to man's knowledge. Martinus did not want to submit God's word to man's knowledge, he graciously let him come from him. But when the doctor asked him to help him, he asked Imperial Majesty to grant him a pardon. Maj. a gracious farewell, the archbishop said: he wanted to do it well and let him know again.

Not long after, the official of Trier, in the presence of the chancellor, who had been secretary to Emperor Maximilian, of high noble memory, came to D. Martins. Martins to his inn, and showed him, by order of Emperor Maximilian, Secretarius. Majesty: Because he had been summoned by the Emperor's Majesty, the Elector. Majesty, princes, princes and estates of the empire so often and in many ways, but in vain, and he nevertheless did not want to take this to heart, did not want to improve himself, nor to go to the unity of the church, nor to compare himself with it, then Imperial Majesty, as an advocate of the church, would have to order him to go to the church. Majesty, as an advocate and bailiff of the Catholic faith, would have to proceed and continue. Therefore, Her Majesty's order would be that he should return safely to his custody within one and twenty 1) days from then, in public escort, which should also be kept free for him; but that he should not arouse the people on the way, neither with preaching nor with writing.

When Doctor Martinus heard this, he spoke with great humility and modesty: "As it has pleased the Lord, so it has been done, let the name of the Lord be praised [Job 1:21]. He then went on to say: "Before all things, he thanked the imperial majesty, princes, princes and estates of the empire most humbly and most humbly, as he always could, that they had heard him so graciously, and that the free and secure escort had been given to him, and should be given. For he would not have desired anything else in it, except that a reformation from the Holy Scriptures, for which he so diligently asked, be undertaken and made; otherwise, for the sake of Imperial Majesty and for the sake of the Empire, he would not have wanted it. Otherwise, he would gladly do and suffer anything, life and death, honor and disgrace, for the sake of imperial majesty and the empire, and reserve nothing for himself, but only the one word of God, to freely confess and testify to it. Finally, he wanted to present himself to His Imperial Majesty and the whole Empire. Maj. and the entire empire in the most humble manner.

55 Therefore, the next day, that is, Friday after Jubilate, April 26, after he had blessed his lords and friends, many of whom had come to him, and had taken a little soup and breakfast, he departed at ten o'clock before noon, with those who had come there with him and had led him. But Caspar Sturm, the Ehrnhold, followed him after several hours, found him at Oppenheim, and escorted him by verbal order of Emperor Carl.

May the eternal, merciful God preserve the godly man, who is awakened by God to purify the Christian doctrine again, and to enlighten the glory of Christ, for the long life of His Church, comfort and improvement, and awaken many others besides him, who preach the word of the Gospel with great power, amen.

593 D. Mart. Luther's letter to Lucas Cranach about his interrogation at Worms and future imprisonment.
Frankfurt am Main, April 28, 1521.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 118; in the Jena edition (1564), vol. I, p. 454 d; in the Altenburg edition, vol. I, p. 731; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVII, p. 595; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 588 and in the Erlangen edition, vol. 53, p. 64.

To the careful master Lucas Cranach, painter at Wittenberg, my dear father and friend.

1) Thus the Latin editions. In the German ones: twenty.

JESUS.

1. my service, dear Gevatters Lucas! I bless and command you God; I let myself be imprisoned and hidden, do not yet know where. And although I would rather have suffered death at the hands of tyrants, especially at the hands of the furious Duke Georgen of Saxony, I must not despise the advice of good people until his time.

2 My future at Worms was not taken care of, and you all know well from the ban that came against me how I was escorted. I thought Imperial Majesty should have assembled a doctor or fifty, and honestly overcome the monk; so nothing more is done here, but this much: Are the books yours? Yes. Do you want to revoke them or not? No. Then lift yourself up. O, we blind Germans, how childishly we act, and let the Romanists ape and fool us so miserably!

3 Give my greeting to my godmother, your dear wife, and that she may be well in the meantime. The Jews must sing once: Jo, Jo, Jo! Easter Day will also come to us, so let us sing Alleluia. There must be a little time of silence and suffering: "A little you do not see me, but a little you see me," says Christ [John 16:16]. I hope it will be the same now. But God's will, as the very best, be done in this, as in heaven and earth, amen.

4) Give my regards to Master Christian 2) and his wife, and I would also like to thank the council for the shipment. If the Licentiate Feldkirch 3) is not enough for you, you may send Mr.

1) Luther was probably the godfather of Cranach's daughter Anna, born in 1520. She later married Caspar Freund, who died as mayor of Wittenberg in 1574.

2) "Master Christian" is the goldsmith Christian Döring or Aurifaber, the partner in Cranach's printing business. He had provided the cart to Worms and had been paid for it by the council. He received for it, according to the Wittenberg treasury account of 1522, "six shocks [groschen], seven weeks of three horses each a day 2^a groschen.

3) "Feldkirch" is, according to Seidemann (De Wette, vol. VI, p. 645), Bartholomäus Bernhardt von Feldkirch, according to the Erlanger Briefwechsel (vol. III, p. 129), Johann Doltsch von Feldkirch, Canonikus at the Allerheiligenstifte in Wittenberg. The latter is probably correct, because

Ask Amsdorf to preach, he will do it with pleasure. Goodbye, herewith all of you commanded to God, who will protect all of your understanding and faith in Christ from the Roman wolves and dragons with their followers, Amen. At Frankfurt am Main, Sunday Cantate [April 28], Anno 1521. D. Martinus Luther.

594s. Ulrich von Hütten's letter to Wilibald Pirkheimer, alderman of Nuremberg, in which he also briefly relates what happened to Luther at the Diet of Worms. The I. May 1521.

This letter is found in Latin in the Wittenberg edition (1551), toru. II, col. 176 and in Burkhardt's oominont. (Io Huttoui katis 8,6 Illsrit., Theil II, p. 205. Also published in German together with Hutten's letter to the emperor (No. 565) under the title: "Ein Sendbrieve, so Ulrich von Hütten an Kayserl. Majestät gethan, bebstliche Botschaft betreffende, vast lustig zu lesen. Another missive written by the above-mentioned von Hütten to a prominent citizen of Nuremberg, concerning Doctor Martinus Luther's departure from Worms, in which the great malice that the Romans have wrought can be seen in brief.

Translated into German.

Ulrich von Hütten, knight, sends his greetings to Wilibald Pirkheimer, Rathsherrn in Nuremberg.

I had heard from some emperors that Luther had been called to responsibility. But they lied. There is nothing to it. For they only asked him in the assembly: whether he wanted to revoke some of his writings? He answered steadfastly that he wanted to revoke them if he was proven to have written erroneous things. He was asked again if he did not want to recant, because many things he had written had already been condemned. He asked: one would not want to force him to a most unreasonable retraction, that he would condemn against conscience what he knew 4) to be perfectly right. When they pressed him the third time: whether he would not recant? because that was all the emperor and the princes wanted to know, he answered: that he neither could nor would recant what he could prove with the testimonies of the most truthful Scriptures.

At that time Bernhardt was provost at Kemberg (see Appendix, No. 79 in this volume). A third Feldkirch, who is also called Joh. Doltsch, prokessor oratoriae, can probably not be considered here.

4) Instead of 86utiÄQT, read koutiat.

This has been enough to condemn the man of God to the highest. Dearest God, where is this going? I truly believe that at these times one will see in particular whether Germany has princes or whether it is ruled by beautifully dressed image pillars. For those clergymen who give advice against Luther surpass everything there is in ungodliness and knavery. His last letter to me brought tears to my eyes, in which he wrote me how unfairly he had been treated. Among them was also this, that he had received his farewell with the prohibition to preach the word of God on the way. O, what an utterly detestable evil! O shameful deed that deserves the irreconcilable wrath of God! To fetter the word of God! To block the mouth of an evangelical teacher! Behold the Christian princes. What will the foreigners say to this? I am ashamed of my fatherland.

They have chosen Johann Eck, the official of Trier, a completely unlearned sophist, to speak. He has spoken so vehemently against Luther that it is firmly believed that he has some of the pope's money, which, as they say, has been used for bribes, in the amount of many thousands of gold florins. The ungodly wretch has dared to attack the pious evangelist with invectives, of which some people give this interpretation, that the adversaries had taken this advice, so that, if he had been provoked in such a way, they would have wanted to force an insult out of him, about which it would have come to his neck afterwards. Behold the ungodly wiles.

4 Some legal scholars argue that the emperor should not give Luthern a free escort, nor could he do so without injustice. Dear people! Do you not think that they should all be chased out of Germany in one day, together with their unjust justice? The godless bishops would like to be able to imitate their forefathers, who set such an example at the Costnitz Concilio with the burning of John Hus! It is said that the emperor decided to protect the pope and the Roman church with all his might. Evil instigators have incited him to do so. Therefore, there is great rejoicing among the clergy. They want to win in a short time. For they think that the matter is finished, but they do not know, the wretched people, that they are far from being finished, and that the last act is still left.

(5) Someone posted a note saying that four hundred noblemen had conspired for Luther, and added to it: Covenant shoe ! Bundschuh ! O great and foolish people! They want to help Luther with this and harm him beyond measure. But some think that the enemies have done this to make him hated. This seems very likely to me.

Awaken the courage of your people. For I still have some hope for the cities, because of the love of freedom, which is especially great among you.

Luther obviously acts on a divine impulse and has nothing to do with any human counsel, relying entirely on God. But no one has ever despised death as joyfully as he. Let Christ keep his evangelist, at least for a while, until true godliness has taken root a little in the minds of men. When he leaves there [Worms], an exceedingly horrible edict will follow (as is written to me by friends), which I fear will be opposed by a good part of Germany. So heated are the parties! Herewith enough in the shortness of so many things. Write me also something that you have not done for a long time; and farewell. From Ebernburg, May 1, 1521.

594b. Extract from one of Hutten's pamphlets. April 1521.

This writing follows in the Latin Wittenberg edition 1. e. immediately after the previous letter, but has nothing to do with it. The title of the writing from which it is taken is: luvsetiva in Oarckinalss, Lxi8eopo8 st 8a66rckot68, 4,utksrulin ^Vorinatias in oneilio Osrnranias inipuZnant68.

Ulrich von Hütten also writes in his invsetiva against Hieronymus Aleander, the Roman Pope Leo X's envoy, among other things the following:

You have spoken to an honorable man, whom you do not trust, but with the audacity with which you are accustomed to think that the Germans have no brain in their heads and that there is neither reason nor wit in them: Even if you Germans throw off the papal yoke (so you said), the pope will nevertheless know how to retain his sovereignty and his empire. Although it has already come to such a pass that you will soon fall by your own bullet. For he is able to do so much through his wisdom that as soon as you will subject yourselves to such, it is certain that you will atone for this misdeed through a ruinous defeat. You accuse this yoke as a heavy one, which you will only exchange with another, far heavier one.

But the divine vengeance is already upon you, so great theurung, so many years of pestilence, the internal discord of the princes. [1] So you admit that it is a yoke, measure the sovereignty of the pope according to the command and the rule of the popes, and do not deny that he has them with

1) "Huts" is written in the margin.

He also clearly indicates that he will disrupt Germany, instigate war among the princes, and interprets natural events as punitive judgments. This you do, I say, and yet hope to obtain here in Pabst Leo X's name everything you desire! 2c. In the month of April, Anno 1521.

Section Ten of Chapter Seven.

Luther's Patmos, or how the Elector Frederick the Wise of Saxony, on his return journey from the Diet of Worms, had Luther, who had been put under guard and was in great danger of his life, picked up on the way by disguised persons and brought to safety at Wartburg Castle, and what happened to Luther there.

A. How it happened with his removal on the way and the removal to the Wartburg.

595: Des Mathesius' report of Luther's enlistment on his return journey from Worms.

From Mathesius' third sermon on "Dr. Martin Luther's Life," St. Louis, 1883, p. 43.

When Doctor Luther left the Emperor's Herold of Oppenheim and peacefully arrived at the Harz Mountains on the Landgrave's escort through Hesse, and had to travel from there through a forest to Waltershausen, he got rid of some of his companions who accompanied him through the forest, and he sent the others to order the inn. However, not far from Altenstein, he came to a hollow way, where two noblemen, the one from Steinberg and Captain Prelops, attacked him with two servants, and when one of them got word from the carter, they were ordered to stop, and attacked D. Luther with disguised impudence. Luther with disguised impudence, and pull him out of his wagon; the one servant blows the wagoner and drives him away, so Ern Amsdorf leads away, until they surround the prisoner with a horseman 2) and help him onto a horse, which they lead for several hours in the forest along the bridle path, until the night overtakes them. They also tie one on a horse, so that they can take a prisoner.

2) Gepner - riding coat.

would bring with them. So they come almost at midnight to the castle Wartburg near Eisenach, harmless in the cross week; there one holds the prisoner well and honestly that even the waiter is surprised about it.

Luther's own report of this to Spalatin.

See Appendix, No. 68, § 7.

Luther's declaration against Melanchthon that he had gone to Wartburg more out of obedience to his authorities than of his own free will.

See Appendix, No. 69, § 1.

Luther's report of this to Amsdorf and Gerbel.

See Appendix, No. 70, § 3 and No. 71, § 2.

599 Another report to Johannes Agricola, Eisleben, in which he says that he is a strange prisoner who likes to sit there because God wants it that way, but with reluctance because he would like to publicly defend God's word.

See Appendix, No. 72, § 2.

B. About Luther's physical condition, about the very good treatment he had at the Wartburg, but also about his very painful illness.

Luther's report to Spalatin, how his host at the Wartburg provided for him very politely, kindly, and abundantly, and how he might have gotten such a body ache from it that he had no rest at night. However, he thanks God for the cross sent to him, but thanks Spalatin for the medicine sent, and reports what effect it has had.

See Appendix, No. 73, §§ 8.10. No. 74, §4. No.76, § 4. No, 77, §§ 1. 4 and No. 78, § 4.

601: A report from Luther to Melanchthon about his condition in solitude, in which he says that he is kept too well in food and drink, while he was used to living badly in the monastery; that he therefore could not pray and study properly, sits too idle, and is not spared the temptations of the flesh, therefore, if things do not change, he intends to travel to Erfurt soon to ask the doctors for advice.

See Appendix, No. 69, § 5 and No. 75, §§ 1. 2. Compare No. 78, § 4 and No. 76, ss 4. 6.

C. About Luther's state of mind, since not only did the idle way of life become very burdensome for him, but Satan also attacked him fiercely with temptations and all kinds of terrors.

Luther's report to Melanchthon on his state of mind and soul in solitude.

See Appendix, No. 79, § 6.

Luther's report to Gerbel and Spalatin about the satanic temptations he had to endure in his solitude, and how not one devil but many were around him in his solitude and attacked him.

See Appendix, No. 71, § 3 and No. 80, § 7.

D. What Luther deals with in his Patmos) especially from his Bible translation, which he started there and continued afterwards.

Luther's report to Spalatin on how he spends his time in his Patmos reading the Bible in the basic languages and what he intends to write.

See Appendix, No. 68, § 4. No. 74, § 4. Compare No. 81, § 10.

Luther sends the explanation of the 68th Psalm, which he wrote in solitude, to Melanchthon with the request that he share it with good friends and, if possible, have it printed.

See Appendix, No. 79, § 2.

Luther reports to John Lang that he is willing to translate the New Testament, and because he has heard that Lang is also dealing with it, he exhorts him to continue.

See Appendix, No. 82.

Luther's report to Spalatin that he had translated the entire New Testament in his Patmos and was now reviewing it with Philip Melanchthon, for which he requested Spalatin's help, sent him a sample of his translation soon afterward, and wrote that he expected the promised gems and wanted to send them back.

See Annex, No. 83, § 2, No. 84, No. 86, § 1 and No. 87, § 1.

Luther's letter to Amsdorf concerning this and the Old Testament translation.

See Appendix, No. 85, § 4.

Luther informs Amsdorf that he, along with Duke John, is the only one who has the honor of receiving the sheets from the press one by one, since no one else has had the least to do until everything has been together; he also states that 10,000 sheets are printed daily by three presses.

See Appendix, No. 88, §1. Cf.No.89. No.90. No.91. No. 92, §2 and No. 93.

Luther's other report to Spalatin and Wenceslaus Link of his work on the Old Testament.

See Appendix, No. 94 and No. 95, § 5.

Luther's request to Spalatin to provide him with the actual names of the birds of prey, the wild and creeping animals, in order to be able to use them in the translation of the books of Moses.

See Appendix, No. 96, §§ 2.3.

E. How Luther faithfully cared for the University of Wittenberg and its preservation in pure teaching and in a flourishing state during his absence at that time.

612 Luther's admonition to the Wittenberg professors, his assistants, not to follow the advice of the court, since for political reasons they did not want to have his writings printed or discussed, but to anticipate them, as he had done. July 13, 1521.

See Appendix, No. 75, § 20.

Luther testifies to his displeasure that his Wittenberg colleagues have been forbidden by the court to dispute on confession, and that papal law is still being read publicly in Wittenberg, namely by D. Jonas, and adds the wish that the princes would one day take it into their hearts to abolish the jurisdiction and censures of the pope in their lands.

See Appendix, No. 77, § 2 and No. 78, §§ 2. 3.

Luther's request to Spalatin that Melanchthon sometimes preach a German sermon to the common people of Wittenberg, who had a great desire for the preaching of the Gospel.

See Appendix, No. 76, § 7. Compare No. 97, § 4.

615. Luther's declaration to the Wittenbergers, how happy he is that Wittenberg is flourishing in his absence; reminding them that they should send a Silas or Paul or Barnabas from their Antioch to other places as well, and thus make up for the lack of others with their abundance, because the harvest is great and the workers few; As he himself testified to his desire to go either to Cologne or Erfurt, or to another place where God might call him, because it was uncertain whether he would come to Wittenberg again, and they could now do without him there.

See Appendix, No. 75, §§ 17-19. No.76, §7. No.77, §

§2. No. 78, § 1 and No. 81,? 10.

F. How Luther's whereabouts have finally become known, which Divine Providence has so sent, because it was soon time anyway that this Elijah or John should now soon come forward again before Christian Israel.

616 Mathesius reports how Luther sometimes went for a walk to the nearest monasteries and visited his friends, but was not recognized, except once at Reinhardsbrunn. His secret visit to Wittenberg.

From Mathesius' fourth sermon on "Dr. Martin Luther's Life," St. Louis, 1883, p. 50.

Because our doctor continues with his studies and writing in his Clause, and becomes weak, good friends advise him to go for a walk, to change the air, and to move around for his health. That is why he is taken to the countryside, and at times he goes to the strawberries on the castle hill. Finally, he is given an honorable servant, a discreet horseman, whose faithful and equestrian advice and admonition he later often praised, because he forbade him to lay down his sword in inns and not to walk over the books from hour to hour, so that he would not be mistaken for a scribe. Thus Luther came, but unrecognized, to several monasteries.

At Martsal 1) he comes to his friends; but the Junker Georgen (for so the horseman called him) they did not know.

1) Maybe "Marksuhl"?

At Reinhardsbrunn, he was acquainted with a conversation; when his courtier noticed this, he reminded his squire that he had to be at his appointed place of business in the evening, so he hurriedly set off again. But because his church and preaching seat in Wittenberg were constantly on his mind, as he said at one time over the table, sitting in deep thought: Oh, who would be in Wittenberg! he also undertakes a journey, and arrives in Wittenberg safely in November, 1) and stays with his journeyman, Ern Niclas Amsdorf, where he lets some of his good friends stay, and as he had discussed and rejoiced with them for several days, he secretly returns to Wartburg. In the meantime 2) it comes out through a chancery clerk that a prince and several great women are looking for him, but cannot see him.

1) Rather, at the beginning of December. See St. Louis edition, Vol. XIX, 560, note.

2) Around the middle of July, while Luther's secret visit to Wittenberg falls in the beginning of December.

Luther's own account of his secret visit to Wittenberg.

See Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XIX, 560 ff.

Luther told Spalatin that Amsdorf had written to him that a scribe of Duke John had reported to a woman in Torgau that Luther was at Wartburg Castle and that the talk was now almost everywhere.

See Appendix, No. 77, § 3.

619 Another report to the same, that Duke John now knows his whereabouts, since the innkeeper at Wartburg has secretly discovered it to him.

See Appendix, No. 76, § 4.

The eighth chapter.

Of the good and bad changes that occurred during Luther's stay in his Patmos, especially in Wittenberg and Saxony, and Luther's return to Wittenberg caused by the latter. From all events between Carlstadt and Luther, until Carlstadt's complete escape and departure from Saxony, and the subsequent transition to the Swiss.

First Section.

What good changes have taken place in Wittenberg and Saxony in the meantime.

A. From the case of the mass and the monastic vows.

1. how the Augustinians, at the lonvent or chapter held in Wittenberg at the beginning of 1522, abolished the private or angle masses by joint resolution, and declared the monastic life to be free.

620 Luther's writing on the abuse of the mass.

This writing is found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XIX, 1068.

Luther's earnest reminder to Spalatin not to withhold and suppress this writing of the mass sent to him, as well as that of monastic vows and against Mainz, out of court politics, otherwise his spirit would become very bitter and irritated to write even more vehemently, because he definitely wanted his things to be printed.

See St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 560 f.

622 The resolutions of the chapter or convention of the Augustinians in Meissen and Thuringia held in Wittenberg at the beginning of 1522, in which they abolished the mass in the fourth article.

This writing is found in Latin in the Wittenberg edition (1550), tona. I, toi. 201 b; in the Jena (1566), tora. II, col. 470 b. German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 134; in the Jena (1585), vol. II, p. 1; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 15 and in the Leipzig, vol. XVIII, p. 239. We leave the old excellent translation.

JEsus.

We, the Vicarius, Piores and Brothers of the Order of St. Augustine, assembled at Wittenberg, have decided on the vows, the begging and other articles of the Order as follows.

(2) In which opinion, since we follow the Scriptures, we do not want to allow ourselves to be hindered by some human reputation or statute, for it is right that God's words should also be given to all creatures. But those who do not yet understand such freedom, or do not consent to it through their power, we let them rule in their mind. We know that we have to give an account of our opinion before God, so we are certainly not afraid to answer men as well.

(3) But since our opinion is to serve the simple consciences, we do not want those who use the word of God to prevent the harmful liberty of their carnal will to have recourse to our decision; and we admonish everyone who reads or hears this, just as St. Paul admonishes the Galatians Cap. 5, 13, that he is free if he does not need liberty for carnal will, but that it is on every man's conscience. For what does not flow from faith is sin, Rom. 14, 23. Therefore, brethren, do not be deceived; God is not mocked, Gal. 6, 7.

In the first place, we leave it to each one, as his conscience feels, to remain or not to remain in the monastery, since what believes in Christ is neither Jew nor Greek, Gal. 3:28, neither monk nor layman, and the vow that is contrary to the gospel is not a vow but an unchristian thing.

5 On the other hand, since Christian liberty is a spiritual liberty, which is not attached to food or clothing, it seems good to us that those who remain in our monasteries should keep to the clothing and customary practices, so that we may be able to offer to everyone just or all kinds of things, according to the example of St. Paul 1 Cor. 9, 21. f.

6. to the third, but we want to have the essays tempered, both in custom and practice, so that no one's faith will be damaged by it, or it will be done against love. For the kingdom of God is not eating or drinking, but righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit, Rom. 14:17.

In the fourth place, we do away with begging, which the Scriptures have so often forbidden, 1 Thess. 4, II. 5, 22: Every man shall work with his hands, be quiet, and eat his own bread. We also do away with the commissioned masses, since St. Paul wants us to shun all evil forms (or appearances).

In the fifth place, as much as is possible in our monasteries, choose those who are skilled in teaching the Word of God publicly and specifically, and let the others work to earn food for the brethren, as was the way of the ancient fathers.

In the sixth place, because we want to moderate the essays, it seems good to us that our brothers in monasteries should be subject to their superiors out of free love, so that we may walk among ourselves and before everyone without offense, lest cause be given to the adversaries to blaspheme the holy gospel.

623 Joh. Aurifaber's report on what changes the Augustinian monks at Wittenberg made in their monastery life during Luther's absence, how they dropped the corner masses and began to distribute Holy Communion in both forms; also about the commission ordered to investigate the matter by Chursachen.

This writing is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. I, p. 179; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 256 and in the Leipzig, vol. XVIII, p. 237.

1) While D. Martin Luther was still at Wartburg near Eisenach in his Patmos, when the Augustinian monks in the monastery began to change the monastic life, so that they would stay in the monastery or go out; item, they needed their clothing and ceremonies out of love, and not out of necessity; they also dropped the corner masses, and no longer wanted to serve the Lord's Supper to the laity in one form, but in both forms, as Christ would have instituted. And when the Elector of Saxony appointed commissaries for this purpose

The monks, who were ordained by D. Justus Jonas, Philippus Melancthon, Nicolaus von Amsdorf and Johann Doltz von Feldkirch, and who found the monks' nobility grounded in God's Word, approved it. And to strengthen them in this, D. Martin Luther wrote to them from his Patmos the little book on the abuse of the mass.

Since some monks had immediately taken off their caps, he wrote for their instruction, comfort and protection the booklet of the monastic vows, 1) in which it is indicated that one may well leave monasticism with a good conscience.

3 Against these two little books a barefoot monk at Würzburg, called Caspar Schatzgeier, wrote and wanted to become a knight to Luther. But he was soon beaten over the mouth by him, so that he did not get back on track with his loose grimaces.

In this year, the Archbishop of Magdeburg Albrecht, Cardinal, through his council, Wolfgang Fabricius Capito, also wrote to Luther, seeking to persuade him to spare and do what he could out of Christian love for the great lords. But Luther met him with a serious writing. 2)

And because Luther heard that things were bad in Wittenberg and that many innovations had been made, he secretly left his Patmos and came to Wittenberg to Nicolaus von Amsdorf's house, quietly asked his well-known friends to come before him, investigated every opportunity, and when he found it to be right, he hurried back to his Patmos and immediately wrote a comforting booklet with an interpretation of the 37th Psalm to the church in Wittenberg. 3) In it he admonished them to stand firm in God's word. Psalm to the church at Wittenberg, 3) in which he exhorted them to hold fast to God's word.

6) This was followed by the innovation and noise of Doctor Andreä Carlstadt, canon of Wittenberg, against Doctor Luther and his teachings, with the iconoclasm and other things, which Luther brought back from his Patmos against Wittenberg. How to read of such innovation rst in this tomo. And such gave Luther's doctrine a hard blow, as there was disagreement and discord about the doctrine among the theologians themselves at Wittenberg.

7 In his arrival wrote D. Martinus Luther, on the Friday after Invocavit [March 7, 1522], to Prince Frederick, 4) and indicated the cause of his return, with the added promise that no harm should befall his presence because of his princely graces; then he stood up and preached against such innovation, as such seven sermons 5) are printed in this tomo.

8) Such fanaticism and iconoclasm is also stirred up in Zwickau and Alstädt, out of incitement by Thomas Müntzer and Claus Storcken, who wanted to storm and destroy the papacy with their fists, and such deceivers have not been brought back to rights by Luther's teaching, instruction, pleading, exhortation and refutation of their error.

In addition to this storm of the red spirits, the persecution against Martin Luther and his teachings was not left out. For serious and swift mandates from high potentates, princes and lords, ecclesiastical and secular, went out in the beginning of the 1522nd year. As, from Duke Henry of Brunswick the Younger; item, from Bishop Philip of Freisingen and Naumburg, also from Bishop John of Meissen. Duke George of Saxony issued a bloodthirsty letter against him, as can be found in this section.

10. And although all this, as heresy and persecution, brought the man of God much challenge, shocks, great work and trouble, also weakness of body, God through the Holy Spirit nevertheless raised him up, strengthened him, comforted him and made him joyful, so that he continued with his teaching, and also penetrated, so that neither the highly respected doctors, nor high schools, nor any papal clamor or ban, much less worldly power and tyranny, could drive him in and overcome him.

In this year, the King of England, Henry the Seventh, 6) also wrote against Doctor Martin Luther, and attacked his teachings severely, to which Doctor Martinus answered seriously. And since this sharp writing offended many people, D. Martinus Luther therefore let his responsibility go out in print on Thursday after Bartholomew, in which he distinguishes verba officii, official words, and verba CONVICIi, evil words, 7)

1) St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 1500.

2) St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 554.

3) St. Louis edition, Vol. I V, 306. However, this interpretation did not go out, as Aurifaber says here, after his secret visit to Wittenberg (which took place in the first days of December), but on August 12, 1521.

4) No. 648 in this volume.

5) There are eight sermons. St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, Col.4ff.

6) Rather: the eighth.

7) The writings alluded to in this K are found in the St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, cols. 134. 238. 280 and 350.

12) This year, on the fifteenth of June, he had an apology printed to Claus Storni, mayor of Magdeburg, why he had to write so harshly against the pope, cardinals and bishops.

13. The Holy Roman Empire's princes and estates held a Diet at Nuremberg this year, at which the new Pope elected at that time, Adrianus, the sixth of that name (as all other popes, his ancestors, had done before), delivered his message orally and in writing to the estates, but especially to Duke Frederick of Saxony, Elector, with great earnestness, that they wanted to silence Luther and either bring him to renounce his intended doctrine and return to the right path, or else act against him with due punishment, as their forefathers had also done to Johann Hus at the Concilio of Costnitz in the past. But D. Luther remained before this pope, and his teaching, as the right, blessed light of the knowledge of our dear Lord and Savior JEsu Christ, has spread the longer the more, has shone and shone the longer the more.

2. the commission ordered by the Electoral Court to investigate the beginning of the Augustinians, which again deputized some of the university to do so.

624 Report and concerns of the deputies ordered by the Elector to investigate the conduct of the Augustinians and their opinion of the private mass to Elector Frederick of Saxony.

This writing is in Latin in the Wittenberg edition (1651), torn. II, fol. 346 and in the Jena edition (1566), torn. II, col. 471. German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 134; in the Jena (1585), vol. II, p. 1b; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 16 and in the Leipzig, vol. XVIII, p. 240.

Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Lord, our subservient, obliging, obedient services at all times before. Most gracious Lord! By order of Your Electoral Grace we have heard the Augustinians orally and in writing, and have found that for these reasons they have ceased to hold mass, as Your Grace may understand from their note enclosed herewith.

2. First, because a great, unchristian abuse of masses has been planted throughout the world, both spiritual and secular, which no man can remove from the hearts of men, in that the mass is accepted for a good work, by which we make atonement to God, offering and giving something to him for our sin, and so that even a priest who is in mortal sin may do such a sacrifice for another fruitfully and usefully: Therefore, the Augustinians no longer want to keep Mass, because such keeping of Mass gives such abuse cause, strength and power, and thus want to bring the right, true Mass, as it was instituted and kept by Christ and the apostles, back into right use and practice.

(3) Secondly, the masses as they are now celebrated are contrary to the custom and practice of Christ and the apostles. For Christ communicated twelve of them, and the apostles a multitude, and never one alone; just as Paul also gave the Corinthians privatas coenas 1 Cor. II, 22.

4 Thirdly, Christ commanded and appointed that both should be given form. Since the masses, as they have been celebrated up to now, are ordered to give one form to the bystanders alone, they do not know how to affirm such masses with a clear conscience.

On this opinion of theirs, we wish to inform E. C. F. Gn. of our opinion and concerns, and we humbly request that E. C. F. Gn. graciously listen to us with the ears of the spirit, which despises human art and wisdom of this world, and only highly esteems and accepts divine wisdom hidden in the spirit.

(6) It is certain that among the greatest and most heinous sins on earth is the abuse of the Mass. For St. Paul has so highly and severely reproached a small abuse of the mass among the Corinthians, that they alone dealt magnificently with it, in that he says: "Whosoever hath not distinction under the body of Jesus Christ eateth death, and many have been punished with pestilence and other diseases because of it. Since we now have much greater abuse of the mass, there is no doubt that we are more severely punished with wars and pestilence, as is now evident, and, what is greatest, with blindness of reason, which is clear to those who keep the mass daily, who administer and protect it.

7. for the mass, in its most important part, is nothing but a distribution and partaking of the body and blood of Christ; everything else that is added to this has been added to it by men and popes, and has been increased daily with time. And the use of a priest is no better than when a layman goes to the sacrament, by which we are reminded, as by a sure sign, of the forgiveness of all sins. As Christ Himself says: "As often as you do it, do it in remembrance of Me [1 Cor. 11:24, 25], that is, in remembrance of the grace and mercy given and shown to you through My death.

It follows that the Mass is not a good work, so that one may offer or give something to God for oneself or another, just as a layman may not partake of the Sacrament for another, just as no man may be baptized for another. Now it is public that all masses are instituted as a good work, that we may be sufficient for our own and others' sins. Which is nothing else but a blinding of the Christian faith and true custom of the holy sacrament. Hence it is that every week so many, four, five, or more masses in all monasteries, convents, or churches are ordered and founded on one person. Thereby the evil priests are pleased to hold masses for the sake of money. And although there are pious priests among them, who would like to use the sacrament properly, according to their conscience, they often have to say mass because of such a foundation and order, with displeasure, without pleasure, and with annoyance and danger to their consciences.

(9) From this, Your Electoral Grace may well judge what benefit or piety it may bring if a sinner, for his own benefit, or a pious person, under the compulsion of the foundation, without desire and love, must often say mass, even against his conscience. For it is impossible for even a pious priest and clergyman to have the desire and love to say mass as often as he is bound and obligated to do so by the foundation.

(10) Although some would say that the prayers of the Mass are good, useful and fruitful for others, even if the priest's use would not help or comfort anyone, C.C.F.G. can well judge how useful the prayer of a sinful priest or a pious one, who does it with reluctance, is. And even if it is done in the best possible way, the prayer of a pious priest at mass is no better than that of a pious layman in his chamber.

11) Masses for the dead have also been instituted, for the above-mentioned reasons, and many other such frauds, which, if fraud were not a sin, would be acceptable. However, because there are excellent, great

If they are sins, they should not be tolerated or suffered in any way, even if the whole world is offended by them.

Therefore, as a Christian prince, under whom the Holy Gospel has come to light again, it is appropriate and due, for the salvation of his soul, that such abuse of the Mass in E. C. F. G. should be avoided. C. F. G. churches, and to restore the right, true custom of the mass, as Christ and the apostles kept it, namely, that whenever the people came together, the word of God was preached, for that was why they came together, and for no other cause; and then one gave the bread and wine, and gave it to all those who desired it. And as this form and manner is the best, so it would also be the safest; which also moved the Augustinians in their intention, that the old custom of the mass should again be negated. And in that the Augustinians do not want to abuse the masses, but hold masses freely and without constraint, they do right.

But that they say that no one should communicate alone is not certain, as far as we know. Although it is true that the reason they give for the offense, that the mass as it is now celebrated by one priest gives cause for the other simple priests to continue in their abuse, is good enough, yet it remains that the weak brethren in the faith should be tolerated and suffer for a time, until they are better instructed in the word of God, as St. Paul has taught us. That they also show in the cause that Christ has given his body in the supper of their many is a story, not a law, nor a commandment.

14 But what they have shown in the third cause, concerning both forms, we cannot reject; nor can we sufficiently excuse giving or taking one form alone, for Christ commanded and appointed it when he said [Matt. 26:27], "Drink from it, all of you," imperatively. They may seek to excuse protection and help, giving or taking a form, but it is not without danger. Therefore, it would be necessary that the first custom of the sacrament be reinstated and renewed in the Christian church.

15 And summa summarum, to speak of it finally, if we kept the form and manner as it is written in the Gospel, we would be sure of the matter beyond all doubt, and could not err. But because we have laws and orders of men, as good, spiritual, and holy as they are, from which Christ and Paul have so often and so often

We have faithfully warned, but we do not know whether we are doing right or right, and we are quite uncertain and doubtful about everything. Although it is certain that through man's law and doctrine the whole world, and even if it were possible, the elect, will be led astray [Matth. 24, 24]. But such law and doctrine is so implanted in the heart of man that he thinks more of it and considers it greater than God's commandment, so that the scripture may be fulfilled: Extollitur supra omne, quod dicitur Deus etc., 2 Thess. 2, 4.

16 Therefore we ask with all humility that E. C. F. G., as a Christian prince, take the matter seriously and soon put an end to such abuse of the masses in E. C. F. G.'s lands and principality. C.F.G.'s lands and principality, and to pay no attention at all to secular disgrace and dishonor, that E.C.F.G. would be called a Bohemian or a heretic. For all those who do something for the sake of God's word must tolerate and suffer such high dishonor and disgrace, and no one will have a contract with them; 1) so that E. C. F. G. will not be reproached by Christ on the last day, like Capernaum [Matth. 11, 23], that such great grace and mercy in E. C. F. G. will not be shown. C. F.G.'s lands in vain, without our doing, and that the holy gospel has been revealed, explained and brought to light in it. For this reason, he will also claim from H.C.F.G. the grace and gift shown to H.C.F.G. above all other kings and princes.

17 As far as the Augustinians are concerned, it is not sinful, in our opinion, to celebrate Mass alone, if the Mass is not otherwise abused. Nor should anyone be prevented from celebrating mass alone and privately. However, we do not know where they begin to say Mass in the way they are heard, according to the form of the Gospel. Therefore, we ask that Your Holiness, as a Christian prince, take it into gracious consideration. With this, we command ourselves to E. C. F. G. in all submissiveness.

E. C. F. Graces

subservient servants

Justus Jonas, Probst.

Johannes Dölitzk, D. Andreas

Carlstadt, D. Hieronymus

Schurs, D. Nicolaus Amsdorf.

Philip Melanchthon

3. what instructions the Elector of Saxony has given to D. Beyer 2) and what he has answered in turn.

625 The Elector of Saxony then issued instructions and orders to the above deputies to D. Christian Beyer, who was then professor and mayor of Wittenberg, but later became chancellor at court.

This and the following document can be found in the issues mentioned in the previous number immediately after it.

First of all, to say our greetings and to advertise in the following. After M. G. H. in the past days ordered the highly respected Gregory Brück, Doctor, to advertise to the university and chapter here in Wittenberg on account of his C. F. G., that it had reached his C. F. G. that various things should be done in Wittenberg, and especially that the Augustinians did not hold mass in some days. Now, S. C. F. G. did not know how this would be done, and whether it was true or not, especially because they, the university and the chapter, had not written to S. C. F. G. or given notice of it. Because S. C. F. G. has always been inclined to do so much for its C. F. G., that might have served to strengthen the holy Christian faith, their C. F. G. mind, will and opinion would not yet be, and, God willing, their C. F. G. should not be, for the rest of their lives, to hold and show themselves otherwise than a Christian prince, that is why his C. F. G. had established the laudable university and foundation at Wittenberg, so that many learned people should be educated and held there.

(2) Therefore, if anything improper had been done or would be done, S. C. F. G. would have requested that they, as those who understand it, have the appointment, so that nothing would be done or subjected from which complaint would be made; and to consider things well, so that things would be directed to good ways, so that discord, turmoil and complaint would be prevented.

3 So S. C. F. G. Doctor Brück wrote again that on such his advertisement the university and chapter made a committee, actually to inquire what Magister Ga-

1) In Latin: et ad Iris irnnunisiu köre - and no one will be spared.

2) The Jena edition writes Beyer, the Wittenberg: Bayer. He is also called "Beier" (Köstlin) and "Baier" (Seidemann).

brief, 1) Augustinians, had preached, and to act with the Augustinians, not to make any change with measurements at this time, or to introduce 2c., but to remain with the old way, until they received information from their vicar, or the things would be discussed and deliberated in the university. And if the Augustinians did not want to be instructed, then they wanted to make a council proposal, and indicate their concerns as to what should be done therein to S. C. F. G..

4) The committee had then discussed the matter with the Augustinians and finally agreed that the Augustinians should submit their plans, motives and reasons to the doctors in writing within two days, so that they would then consider them and do more about them; but in the meantime the innovation should remain.

(5) Thus, the committee concerned, by their letter, has now notified their C.F.G. of some of the causes of the Augustinian authorities, and, in addition, of their concerns, and has requested in the resolution that their C.F.G., as a Christian prince, take the matter seriously, and soon put an end to such abuse of the Mass in their C.F.G. principality and principality, and that secular dishonor and dishonor, that one would call their C.F.G. a Bohemian or heretic, would not be respected at all; for all those who do something for the sake of God's word would have to tolerate such scorn and dishonor. a Bohemian or a heretic, would not respect anything at all; for all who do something for the sake of God's word would have to tolerate and suffer such scorn, dishonor and shame, and none of them would have a contract for it; so that from Christ S. C. F. G. would not have to suffer such scorn, dishonor and shame on the last day, as Capernicus did. would not be reproached at the last day, like Capernaum [Matth. 11, 23], that such great grace and mercy in their C. F. G. lands had happened in vain, without their C. F. G.'s help, and that the holy gospel had been revealed, explained and brought to light in it. Because of this, Christ would also demand from H. C. F. G. the grace and gift shown to her C. F. G. before all other kings and princes, 2c. Which all S. C. F. G. would have to hear of its contents.

6) Thereupon, S. C. F. G. has ordered me to inform you that S. C. F. G.'s mind and opinion have always been, if God wills, and shall continue to be, as much as S. C. F. G. can help to promote that which may honor the divine Word and strengthen the holy Christian faith, and to keep and show himself as befits a Christian prince, as S. C. F. G. has also indicated before.

7. his C. F. G. but bedmken on your scream-.

It should not be bad, because this is a great thing and concerns the whole community of common Christianity, that you do not overdo it. For, S. C. F. G. mean that such a thing could hardly be maintained by you, as a small part. If such a thing were founded in the holy gospel, more people would undoubtedly notice it and become attached to it. And if this were to happen, the change would be made constantly with the common crowd, without any particular difficulty. For my most gracious lord may not be reported when this order of celebrating missam, which has now lasted perhaps many hundred years, has begun, and that which uses the apostles has ceased.

(8) Moreover, since churches and monasteries are commonly founded on the celebration of mass, consider what would happen if the mass were to be dropped. For you know that when the cause ceases, the consequence and effect of the cause also cease. From this it can also be assumed that the income of the 2) churches and monasteries would be withheld and deducted. If, for this reason, someone were to take it upon himself to 3) reproach heretics or persecutors of the church, then many complaints would arise, as you can judge for yourselves. This my most gracious lord, in his gracious opinion, did not want you to do. And because you have made this request to S. C. F. G. as a layman who does not report to the Scriptures, S. C. F. G. Request that you, together with the others of the University and the Chapter, look into the matter in such a way that nothing is done nor obeyed that could lead to discord, revolt and aggravation, but that you consider the matter well and direct it to the ways and means that will benefit the holy Christian Church, and that revolt and aggravation be prevented. This is what M. G. H. wants to do for all of you and for everyone in particular, and it is done to please S. C. F. G..

626: The Wittenberg deputies' response to the electoral concerns raised by D. Christian Beyer concerning the fair.

See No. 624.

2) In the German editions: "der Kirchen", but in Latin: templis; likewise in the following scripture, where this is recapitulated.

3) Instead of "interpretation" in the German editions, we have put "imposition" in the text after the Latin (orRuinarstur).

1. the concern, which is held out to us on account of and in place of our most gracious Lord, by Doctorem Christianum, rests on five points and articles.

(2) First of all, since this is a great matter, and concerns the whole communion of all Christendom, we should not be hasty, for it would be difficult for us, as the smallest group, to preserve it.

3) Secondly, if this were based on the Holy Gospel, more people would undoubtedly take note of it and become attached to it. In this way, the change would be made constantly with the common crowd, without any particular difficulty.

4. thirdly, that S. C. F. G. may not be told when this order of keeping Mass, which has now been kept for perhaps many hundred years by all Christendom, began, and that used by the apostles ceased.

(5) Fourthly, since churches and monasteries are generally endowed to celebrate masses, if the masses were to be dropped, the consequences and effects of the cause of the masses would also drop and disappear, and the income of the monasteries and churches would be withheld and withdrawn.

Fifthly, if it were forbidden to anyone to impose 1) the name of heretic or persecutor of the Churches, many complaints, disagreements and discords would arise. Therefore, both the chapter and the university shall see that nothing is done or omitted from which discord or sedition might result.

(7) We have heard all of this with further content in all humility, and after having held diligent counsel, we have considered the following by order of H. C. F. G., humbly requesting that H. C. F. G. graciously hear us and diligently consider the matter, and after we have written to H. C. F. G. earlier about the grossest two abuses of the masses by those who, for their own benefit or out of orderly and endowed foundation, are thus compelled without all desire. having previously written of the two grossest abuses of the Masses, of those who, for their own benefit, or because of ordered and endowed foundation, thus compelled, without all desire and thirst of grace, keep Masses, we still say that these two abuses of the Masses shall be remedied. This can be done without complaint and indignation. And if it cannot be done, let no offense or shame be regarded in it, as Christ did to the Pharisees, who also took offense at his teaching because it was contrary to their human law and tradition,

1) See the last note to the previous number.

Matth. 15,14., said: "Let them go, they are blind and blind guides." "One should ever be more obedient to GOD than to men," Apost. 5, 29.

(8) And though we be the smallest house, yet the truth of the divine word, which is above all angels and creatures, because it is clearly written in the gospel and the apostle Paul, shall not be despised. For the smallest group has always preached and accepted the truth, and will remain so until the end of the world. Christ sent despised, lowly, poor, simple, unlearned and few persons into the world to preach the truth, and revealed to them alone the divine wisdom, which he hid from the great lords, prudents and wise men of this world, Matth. 11, 25. With this, the first article of our consideration is sufficiently answered.

9 To the other article. In the law of Moses, Isaiah 53:3, it was clearly stated, and in more than one place, that Christ was to be born and come into this world as a despised person, as a redeemer. No one would yet understand, find in it, nor accept Christ, except those to whom it was given by the Father, the lowly, the simple, and the poor [Matt. 11:25], who were enlightened with the Spirit of God. So also, although in the holy Gospel this foregoing and true custom of the mass and many other Christian things are clearly written, 2) the popes, prudents and wise men, for their own benefit, and that out of blind, obdurate disloyalty to their estates, honor, interest, and corner fear, cannot understand it nor permit it, For they are wholly blinded by the law of men and tradition, as the Pharisees, chief priests, and scribes of Christ's day were blinded by their own tradition and law, that they not only did not understand nor accept Christ, but also with all their strength resisted him, wholly raging. Therefore, even though it is written in the Gospel that such simple, proper Christian observance of Mass, since it is primarily the Word of God that is preached at all times, how one should observe Mass, no one would admit or refrain from doing so, since it is given and bestowed upon him from above.

2) Wittenberger: "announce"; Jenaer: "announced"; in Latin: possnvt. - Following immediately we have put instead of: "high priests" "popes", because we consider the former an inappropriate translation of kontiūoes. It could also be translated here by "bishops", or if really for that time the translation by "popes" and "bishops" should seem too daring, so they are surely meant.

(10) As for the foundations, and when these present masses first began to be said, as the third and fourth articles state, we find that the old monasteries and convents were not founded and established for the purpose of holding masses and canonical hours, without any improvement of the church and the Christian community, as is done now. But they were founded and ordered for the purpose of educating and instructing young people in the Holy Scriptures and the Christian faith. And so the old cathedrals, monasteries and convents of the Christians 1) were children's schools until the time of St. Augustine and even longer, until the time of St. Bernhardt. For this purpose, all the goods of the church were decreed and given as wages and salaries for the preachers and readers; also for the abstention of the pupils and poor people; as this is clearly found in history.

The new monasteries and convents, which were founded four or five hundred years ago, were all erected for the sake of keeping and singing masses, as is now the case. And since these monasteries require persons to celebrate a certain number of masses weekly, which cannot be done without sin, as indicated above, such endowments or compulsions should be discontinued without any hindrance. And even if some endowments to a certain number of masses do not urge anyone, since they are endowed and founded on the fact that the mass, as a sacrifice and good work, may be kept for another soul, such endowment should also be discontinued and changed. For the true mass of a pious priest is of no use to anyone but himself and no one else, nor is it more or better than when a layman goes to the sacrament, as we have instructed S. C. F. G. in our previous letter. And for this reason the founders 2) suffer no harm at all, for they have been deceived by the priests and thought they had done something useful and fruitful for themselves and their friendship, which should bring them salvation and comfort for their souls. And without a doubt, if they were standing up now, they would know themselves that it was thought up in vain, for the sake of the apostles' avarice.

12) And it is also certain that this way and form of holding a measurement for another, especially for a deceased person, for the sake of money, for a named and certain time, namely before some

It is certain that the ancient emperors did not celebrate in their cathedrals any anniversaries, funerals or masses of the soul that they had founded. And even if such selling of masses had existed in Peter's time, it should be stopped because it is a vain sin and blasphemy. Paul already complained in his time that the Antichrist's regiment wanted to be seen in ceremonies and other works [2 Thess. 2, 4]. Therefore, such abuse of the masses should not be tolerated or suffered for the sake of any creature, whether in heaven or on earth.

13) The first and ancient way of reporting the bystanders with both figures was used until the time of Cyprian, and it is still used throughout Greece and the Oriental Church to this day, performing Mass as the apostles did.

14) And that this way and form, how now mass is read with us, is completely new, is shown by the whole diocese of Milan, which is not far from Rome, and does not have the most important part of the Canonum of the masses, and no Roman can say mass from the Milanese books. So also the way and form of the Mass has been changed and increased by the popes Damasus, Gelasius, Celestinus, Gregorius, who have been recently.

(15) Therefore one should not despise the old, first custom, the way and form of the apostles, and so freely depart from it without all Scripture. For St. Paul says: "I have taken and received from the Lord that which I have given you" [1 Cor. 11:23]. Although we do not speak of the manner and form in the first place, and there is little interest in the manner and form if the main parts remain unchanged. But we are talking about the fact that nowadays, because of the change in manner and form, great abuses and blasphemies are taking place almost in all masses, and that, contrary to Christ's order and institution, the one form is being taken away from the poor people by force.

(16) And although this would cause great trouble and discord, it is not our fault, nor the fault of those who teach and preach the truth of the divine word, but of those who, out of envy and hatred, for their own honor and benefit, do not want to accept, tolerate nor suffer, even prevent and suppress. If the same chief priests, Pharisees, together with the scribes, do not want to accept the divine word, they will not tolerate it.

1) "Christians" is missing in the Wittenberg.

2) So correctly with Walch. Wittenberg and Jena: "Stiften". In Latin: autores.

1) [the] Magistris nostris eximiis, let the holy, divine Scripture be publicly heard, preached and read, whether they did not accept it, and, as they could, refuted it with reason and scriptures, and did not suppress it by force, so that there would be no discord, rebellion or disunity.

17 Because they, without any reason and scripture, against their own conscience, imagine and blow to the worldly rulers that such teaching is heretical and unjust, it is no wonder that the preachers of God's word, together with their followers, are persecuted and strangled. Therefore, one should not esteem or fear such a burden so highly. For if Christ should have regarded and feared such afflictions, discord, riots, wars, and other deaths, and the change of the whole world through his gospel, he would have had to cease his preaching, just as the apostles did. And even though their preaching caused such turmoil, uproar and sedition among the Jews at Jerusalem, because of the law set and given by God, they did not cease their preaching.

(18) The devil accuses us of such physical and external dangers in order to prevent God's word, which he cannot stand. Therefore, we should not fear the devil so much, and command God and give it home. The Scriptures must ever be fulfilled that such a great persecution should come upon Christendom, the like of which has never been since the foundation of the world, Matth. 24, 21. So also Christ clearly said, Matth. 10, 35: "I have not come to make peace on earth, but disunity between father and son, mother and daughter, husband and wife, so that one should enrage and deliver up the other for the sake of God's word. For whosoever loveth me not more (saith Christ there) than his father, and mother, and his own honor, and body, and estate, is not worthy of me: that is, he that for my word must not leave honor, and body, and estate, is not a true Christian.

019 Neither let any man offend himself, lest great and much trouble arise therefrom. For Christ, as it is written, is come into the world, and is given to them that believe on him, and on his word, to amend themselves in him, that they may have eternal life.

020 But to them that believe not in him, or in his word, he is set, and given, that they should cleave unto and thereby die eternally, and as Lucas says in the other chapter, v. 34: Hic positus est in ruinam et resurrectionem multorum in Israel. And on the 20th, v. 17: "The stone that the builders rejected has become a chief cornerstone. And every one that shall fall upon it shall be crushed; but upon him that shall fall it shall be broken. For Christ is set and given for a sign, which shall be contradicted," Luke on the next day.

1) "den Schriftwelsen" put by us instead of: "der Schriftweisen" in the Wittenberg edition. In the Latin only: cum Magistris nostris eximiis.

Justus Jonas, Prepositus.
Johannes Dölitzk, Doctor. Andreas
Carlstadt, Doctor. Hieronymus
Schürf, Doctor. Nicolaus Amsdorf, licentiate. Philippus Melanchthon.

B. About the remarriage of the priests and Archbishop Albrecht's zeal against it; nevertheless, others have followed and the monks have begun to leave the monasteries.

1. by Bartholomäus Bernhardt of Feldkirch, as the first priest in the papacy, who started to enter the married state.

627: Luther's opening thoughts against Melanchthon about the provost's marriage at Kemberg, and the report that several have already followed in it.

See Appendix, No. 79, § 12.

628 Luther's congratulations to Gerbel for choosing the married state over the celibate life.

See Appendix, No. 71, § 7.

2) How Feldkirch, after Elector Albrecht of Mainz requested that the married priest be made responsible to Halle, has defended itself both to the Elector of Saxony and against everyone because of his marital status.

629: Feldkirch's affidavit on account of his marriage. 1521.

This writing is found in Latin in the Jena edition (1566), tom. II, col. 438 b.

Translated into German.

Against the papal laws forbidding priests to marry, protective letter of Bartholomäi Bernhard! of Feldkirch, pastor in Kemberg, who recently took a wife with his church's permission.

Answer of Bartholomäus Bernhardt from Feldkirch, pastor at Kemberg, to the pre-claim of the archbishop at Magdeburg because of his Matrimonial.

1st Excellent doctors, because I am called to you to answer for my beginning, I will recently state how my conscience stands in this. And for the sake of Christian love, I ask that it not trouble you to hear and hear this matter diligently, as I will present it simply and honestly.

First of all, I cannot deny that I have married a virgin, for if I were to deny it, I would be ungodly deceiving my church, which, believing until now that my marriage is right, would be justly offended if I were to call my life a fornication. A bishop must be blameless, as the apostle Paul often says. Should I, then, as a ruler of the church, have an iniquity found in me? [1 Tim. 3:2Z Paul does not want our life to be offensive even to the Gentiles; and I should become an offense to the brethren if I acknowledge fornication? I therefore confess that I have married her, and will also confess that the marriage is right, as long as Christ will grant me this life.

(3) But my conscience moved me to marry her for reasons that must move all pious hearts, even though the common delusion, custom, the law of the popes and so many hundred years of agreement argue against it. A Christian must look more to what Christ wants than to what is pleasing to men; as Paul says to the Galatians [Cap. 1:10], "If I would still please men, I would not be Christ's servant"; and Matt. 8:22, "Let the dead bury their dead."

4. that my deed is not only uncourageous and ungodly, and contrary to my monastic vows, oath and obedience, but also audacious and futile.

If I am scolded for my boldness, it will easily fall away when I have rejected ungodliness and perjury. And would God that those who speak so much of boldness would look at the causes of my presumption with spiritual eyes!

(5) These are the causes and reasons of my action. Neither the law nor the gospel has ever rejected marriage, nor has Christ forbidden it to any class, whether clerical or secular. For thus it is written in Matt. 19:11, "Not all take hold of such a word, but those to whom it is given." And after this, v. 12: "He that can lay hold on it, let him lay hold on it," where Christ did not command the single estate at all, but rather made it known that it could not happen to any but those to whom it was given. This word should frighten those who surrender to the celibate state, since Christ indicates that the gift of perpetual chastity is not given to all, but to a few.

Paul, who explains Christ's opinion in 1 Cor. 7, 7, as it were, speaks of it more expansively. The passage is well known: "Each one has his gift from God, one in this way and another in another." And soon after, v. 28: "If you take a wife, you do not sin." And then (as if he was very anxious that he should not have the appearance of requiring the celibate state) he says, v. 35: "All this speech is written for your benefit, not that I should cast a snare upon you," that is, that I should not make you prisoners of any way of life. Behold. Paul is concerned that if he demanded the celibate state, he would throw a rope on it. How then shall we call the popes' statutes of celibacy, according to Paul's custom, other than ropes?

(7) Further, in v. 9, "It is better to be free than to be in heat," the apostle urges that those who are in heat should marry, if they are challenged by the lust of their flesh. For this is called suffering heat. But he teaches of two kinds of chastity. One, when one has the appearance of chastity in the heat of the flesh. The other is given by God and has nothing to do with such heat. And these must not be explained further. The first kind is commanded to marry; the other he leaves, as Christ says [Matth. 19, 11.]: "Not everyone grasps these things, but those to whom they are given."

8. if God would have considered that those who have established the abominable law of the celibate state, who have made the weak youth to priesthoods, to monasteries. And we do not want to admit that Christ and Paul said this only to the laity, but rather the passages in the first letter to Timothy Cap. 3, 2. and in the letter to Titus Cap. 1, 6. indicate that it also applies to priests. For Paul wants a bishop to be the husband of one wife who has obedient children with all chastity.

9 From this it is clear that marriage is not forbidden to priests by divine right. And we have it from credible stories that they did not shun marriage at the beginning of the church. For who does not know Philip in the Acts of the Apostles, whom the Scriptures [Acts 21:8] call an evangelist, so that we should know that a priest had been married? And Eusebius says much about Peter's wife.

The history of Spiridion is known, who, as far as I know, was a bishop in Cyprus. Hilarius, who does not yield to any bishop of the occidental church, also had a wife, and this custom to marry has been granted in the Greek church until our times. Our unfortunate Germany, however, has taken this yoke upon itself slowly or only forcedly, as the reports of the history of the Cologne and Costnitz churches give.

(11) Moreover, the passages of Scripture which we have quoted not only leave the marriage state free to everyone, but even enjoin it on those who feel the heat of the flesh. And so far from divine law. Now we want to say something about the statutes of men.

(12) But (say) the statutes of the fathers forbid marriage? Answer: Let them see how they will answer for such statutes before God, who have laid such a burden on the people we call priests. I, for my part, call them false prophets who have given such a law; let them be whoever they want.

13. then I add this, that one should not obey the statutes of men, if the conscience suffers thereby, Apost. 5, 29: "You must obey God more than men"; and 1 Cor. 7, 23: "You were bought at a price, do not become servants of men"; and again 1 Cor. 3, 22: "All is yours, whether Paul or Apollo or Cephas" 2c. And Col. 2:20: "If ye then have died with Christ 2c., why suffer ye yet as living to be afflicted with the statutes of men?" 2c. In these and many other passages, Scripture teaches that it is up to us to free ourselves from the ordinances of men according to our spirit.

as often as we see offense and danger in it. I was also in such danger. So what should I do? Should I rather act against God's law, which forbids fornication, than against the papal laws, which forbid marriage? Who should be such a hard bishop that he should demand his law in such a way that the divine one would be broken over it, or who would let a brother's soul perish for the sake of a bald, human custom? If someone's body was in danger because of a day of fasting, should he not also be commanded to eat? How much more must the soul's food remain free than that of the body? Is it not shameful that, since Christ gave his soul (life) for his sheep, a Christian bishop should not (for their sake) let go of a wretched statute? Paul was all things: to them that were without law, as one without law; to them that were under the law, as one that kept the law [1 Cor. 9:20]. But these would that all things should send themselves into their statutes and judgments with the host, much less that they should send themselves into weakness with the host.

(14) It should also be considered here what Paul writes in 1 Tim. 4:3 that it will happen that lying spirits will forbid marriage; and Daniel Cap. 11:37 prophesied that the Antichrist will not respect women (for these are the words of the prophet). These passages have moved my spirit to believe that the Spirit of God has foretold this in Scripture, so that pious hearts may diligently guard against the statutes of the celibate state, and, knowing that they are of the devil, may not consider breaking them. In this passage of Paul, the Roman popes may be reflected, who insist so stubbornly on the celibate state that they deny that no marriage can be right that is contrary to their canons.

(15) I see, looking at the histories, that the holiest men have long and constantly opposed such a celibate state. In the Nicene Assembly, some wanted the presbyters, deacons and subdeacons to live celibate. But the martyr Paphnutius opposed this and did not allow it to arise, and the whole council of Christian bishops agreed with him, so that the clergy kept their former freedom. In the sixth Constantinopolitan Concilio, a statute was also added, in which it was decreed that one should not vow the celibate state, and that those should be banished who would deprive women of the clerical state. It

This resolution is mentioned in dist. 31. And if one holds so much on the conciliar conclusions, and prefers to accept the old ones rather than the new ones, why then did we let these depart from their resolutions, especially since they were better and closer to the Gospel than these new ones from the celibate state?

(16) So far I have shown that I was not bound to obey the papal laws with such danger to my soul, because no statutes of men that endanger the conscience are to be kept. For this is what Paul means when he says, 1 Cor. 7:23, that we are not to become servants of men.

Now I must also apologize for perjury. I do not know any other way than that I swore with the words: I want to do what the statutes of the fathers command. However, I have been appointed Subdiaconus at Brandenburg, Diaconus at Halberstadt and Priest at Chur in Graubünden. Now I will let you judge what the ordinary, common oath is about. For if all errors against the canons are equal to perjury, then priests commit perjury as often as they do not fast according to the canons, do not find themselves properly dressed according to them, in short, nowhere will there be more perjury than among those who impiously wrest such an oath from us.

18 And it is well to note that the Canons require this: that no one be bound contrary to divine law, nor command anything that can be done without danger to conscience. If this is so, then, as often as one swears to keep the canons, nothing against divine law is pledged, and even in this oath the case of necessity is excluded, which is to dispense with the statutes. Gerson deals with this extensively in the Commentary on the Spiritual Life.

19 How? when one has also sworn on the canons, with the piece attached: As much as human frailty permits. For this is usually added in many churches. For then one has sworn: one wants to be celibate as long as the weakness of the flesh allows it; but what is weaker than the flesh? For we cannot even think of anything good of ourselves, as the apostle testifies in 2 Cor. 3:5.

(20) And if one had expressly sworn from the celibate state, one must break the vow if there is danger to the soul. For then it cannot be kept without sin.

21. for first of all, god does not want you to give him

I vow everything without distinction, as he testifies in Jer. 4:2; for there the prophet means to swear in truth, 1) judgment and righteousness, that is, if you interpret it correctly, he forbids lying and swearing to unrighteous or evil things. Furthermore, if I had sworn an oath of celibacy, which I could not keep, what great and grievous sins I would have brought upon myself! I have erred once, that I have vowed into a mischief; do the bishops then want that I should always err, yes, sin? Is it not possible to revoke such oaths, which escape from one's carelessness, if they cannot be kept without horrible sin? Indeed, the papal laws give dispensation from the rule of orders, and with regard to those who enter the monastery, from the oath of minors, so that they, because such age does not understand the burden of the conjugal state, have unthinkingly joined themselves. I praise the opinion of the popes who count themselves free from the vow; but I do not praise that they count only such young people free. For it can happen that even a man does not know himself well; and since the same reason for dispensing with vows can occur both in the case of minors and minors, why should one not judge in the same way?

(22) We see in the Scriptures examples of the saints changing some unrighteous oaths. David had sworn to kill Nabal. Abigail set out to meet him, turned him from his purpose, and David gloriously and heartily thanked God that He had kept him from the intended deathblow, for he knew his error when he said, "Who hath fed me, that I should not do evil" (1 Sam. 25:21 ff.). V. 39. Did I then, who could not keep my vows without sinning, not break them?

Look around in your canons what such an oath means. For in 22. 3. and 4. there is much that confirms my opinion. In the fourth book of Moses, Cap. 30, God's word cancels some vows; as when a woman vows something and the man is not satisfied with it, and the like much more. Such vows are annulled because a woman has no power either over her body or over the goods, if such a thing were vowed. This very reason can also absolve me from my vows, because the gift of eternal chastity is not in anyone's power.

1) According to the Vulgate, veritats is to be read instead of virtuts in the text.

(24) If Moses declares the oath null and void, by which something that is not ours is pledged, why is it demanded of him to keep the oath who has pledged the celibate state out of carelessness, since it is a thing that does not rhyme at all with human nature, and which cannot be kept without great and terrible sins? And who is not surprised that one cries out about his perjury, who takes a wife, and yet does not cry out about their unfaithfulness, who roll around in the very worst abominations of unchastity?

25 In the fifth book of Moses, Cap. 23, 18, it is commanded that one shall not sacrifice the wages of whores. How much less will God want to sacrifice the impure state of celibacy? If He calls the wages of whores an abomination, who would not believe that such a hypocritical and impure state of celibacy is an abomination?

I therefore apologize for the perjury: first, that I am not aware that I have sworn anything expressly about the celibate state; second, that such a thing should not have been sworn; finally, that even if I had sworn, such a thing is not to be kept, which one cannot keep without sin. In this I appeal to the judgment of the Christian heart.

27 From this you can clearly see: first, that nothing has been sinned against the divine laws; then, that I was authorized to break human laws in such obvious danger to my soul; finally, that the vow was made to me in vain, be it sworn, as it may.

Therefore there is no reason to condemn my deed as ungodly; and I have presented my case in such a way that you see I have acted according to my conscience, and that I was not driven to it by lust or audacity, but by common weakness and extreme necessity. What danger there is in the common unmarried state, as it tends to be, and how certain such danger is, I do not need to go into detail, because it is well known enough. And if those who accuse me want to take it to heart, they will not only not reject my example, but rather praise it, if they are Christians otherwise. Christ will be our judge; hopefully he will like my deed. And I have looked to this alone, that Christ may be pleased with me.

29 I did not raise this defense because I wanted to protect myself with these reasons against the power of the bishops, but only to show that I was moved to marriage for godly reasons; because a true Christian must give due account of his life and faith. I might well have wished that with these reasons the bishops would also be satisfied. I would like them to have compassion for my weakness; I would like them not to lead out thoughtlessly against godly reasons, for why should my freedom be judged by a foreign conscience? But if they want to speak according to the statutes of the popes rather than according to the holy scriptures and the ancient conciliar, then I will bear the Lord's wrath until the time comes when I know that the light will dawn on him who sits in darkness. For this is the comfort of the prophet Micah, Cap. 7, 8. 9. But let them see that they do not run against Christ and against his little ones, whom he cares for as the apple of his eye.

30. May you, excellent doctors, receive this letter of protection favorably, and in Christian love support the good cause, and protect it against violence, so that the prophet may not also have prophesied about you when he says Mich. 7, 3: "As the prince wills, so will the judge. Amen.

630 Feldkirch's petition to the Elector Frederick of Saxony, in which he defends his marital status with concise reasons based on divine and secular rights. 1521.

This writing is found in Latin in the Jena edition (1566), tom. II, fol. 440b.

Translated into German.

Most Serene Prince, Most Gracious Lord! That the highborn and most reverend Cardinal claims that my responsibility is not sufficient, and that my deed is still proclaimed ungodly, I cannot say anything else, because the reasons for my defense have not yet been refuted.

First of all, as far as perjury is concerned, I am not aware of having sworn other than to keep the canons of the fathers. Even a craftsman knows what such a general oath formula means. Furthermore, even if I had expressly sworn to the celibate state, oaths are not binding, which cannot be kept without sin, as I have proved with David's example. And the example of the prophets teach this, which so often condemn the alliances of the kings of Judah with godless kings. Also no human statute binds, which cannot be kept without sin, Matth. 15,3: You have abrogated God's commandment because of your statute.

(3) And I have already proven this earlier with such certain and suitable scriptural passages that I hope no one will be so insolent as to contradict them; at least they calm my conscience completely that I have no hesitation about dying. For such an ungodly nature is far from me that I want to misuse the word of God as a false pretext or cover for my deed! And since I am of this opinion, and my conscience is thus satisfied, what kind of hardness must this be, that one would rather just throw me to the ground than instruct me better!

4 But if I am blamed for wanting to overturn only what the Roman popes and emperors have decreed, everyone can see that I neither want to nor can do this, for I do not overturn such law. But from the law of men I make myself free according to the Gospel, and that as far as I must. For I must look more to my salvation than to all that men ordain, Acts 5:29. 5, 29. Therefore, the need to keep the divine law has driven me to break the laws of men. Although I know that the canons and the laws themselves are so kind that they do not want to bind any man against God.

(5) Nor can you turn away from anger. For one does not have to look at the offense when sin is to be controlled. 1 Cor. 10, 29: "Why should I let my liberty be judged by another man's conscience?" And Christ, Matth. 15, 12, despised the offense. Since the apostles argued: The Pharisees were angry at your speech, he said, "Let them be, they are blind men and leaders of the blind. But if one blind man lead another, they both fall into the pit." If Christ despised the offense, that he called them blind men, who had such precepts, the followers of the same were also blind, who ordered the celibate state, because they took heed to seducing spirits and devils, 1 Tim. 4:1; so they also are blind according to Christ's word, who obeyed this cruel statute with danger to their souls.

I now leave it undecided whether the emperor or the pope founded the matrimonial state. Pabst has founded the marriageless state. This much is certain, that the apostle Paul calls those lying spirits who want to forbid marriage. I will leave the most reverend power in honor; but Paul commands the Romans that no one judge another about things that are based on evangelical freedom [Rom. 14], and holds that such things must be left to God's judgment alone, who is a judge of the heart. For this reason, the most reverend must take care that he does not go against the apostle, who forbids judging a foreign freedom.

7 I therefore ask, for the sake of Jesus Christ, that God have mercy on my distress, and that He have the providence not to expect more of me than I have offered, although I will gladly suffer anything, if God wills it otherwise. God keep E. C. F. G. for the benefit of the Gospel! Wittenberg in Saxony, in the year 1521.

3. the subsequent abandonment of the monasteries, which Luther, through his book of monastic vows, partly initiated and partly approved of, but by no means approved of the abuses that took place.

631 Luther's report to Spalatin of Nov. 11, 1521, on how he was now willing to attack monastic vows and deliver young people from the hell of the celibate state.

See Appendix, No. 80, § 7.

The book itself, "Luthers Urtheil von den geistlichen und Klostergeübden," is found in the St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 1500 ff.

632 Luther's complaint to John Lang that he had to notice how many monks left the monasteries merely for the sake of carnal freedom.

See Appendix, No. 101.

633 Luther's complaint against Spalatin about this.

See Appendix, No. 102, § 2.

The second section of Chapter Eight.

What evil changes took place in Luther's absence, and of Luther's return to Wittenberg as a result.

A. Of the so-called new prophets, who had meanwhile begun in Zwickau and had also come to Wittenberg.

1. from the Wittenberg report on the puddle to the Elector of Salmon, and how he behaved.

634 Melanchthon's report to the Elector Frederick of Saxony about the arrival of three men from the so-called new prophets at Zwickau and about their actions and nature, from which it can be seen that these will-o'-the-wisps had greatly blinded Melanchthon, who was otherwise not lacking in wisdom and insight.
Dec. 27, 1521.

From Seckendorf's 8i8t. lmt. lib. I, p. 192, (o), where the original is printed, which, as Seckendorf says, is kept in Leipzig, and is dated "from the day of St. John the Evangelist 1522", that is, Dec. 27, 1521, because the new year used to begin with Christmas.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To the most illustrious and exceedingly wise Prince, Lord Frederick, Duke of Saxony, Elector, the Lamp of Israel, his most gracious Lord.

I wish Your Electoral Grace the grace and peace of Christ. E. C. F. G. gives me credit for having dared to write to you, because at this time very great and dangerous things require my attention and care. (The matter, however, that he had to present is this:) 1) E. C. F. G. knows very well how many, manifold and dangerous ambiguities about the word of God there are in E. C. F. G.. C. F. G. city of Zwickau have been raised. There are also some who have made I do not know what kind of innovations, thrown into prison. Of the authors of these

1) The words we put in brackets seem to be an insertion by Seckendorf, because they are not printed in italics like the rest.

Three men have come here because of the riots, two are clothiers, unlearned people, the third is scientifically educated. I heard them. They say strange things about themselves: they are sent by the bright voice of God to teach, they have confidential conversations with God, they see future things, in short, they are prophetic and apostolic men. How I was moved by them, I cannot easily say. I am certainly prompted by great causes that I do not want to despise them, for it appears for many reasons that certain spirits are in them, but about which no one but Martin can easily judge. Therefore, because the Gospel, the honor and the peace of the church are in danger here, every effort must be made to give these people the opportunity to talk to Martin, because they refer to him. I would not write to E. C. F. G. if the greatness of the matter did not require that advice be given in time. For we must be careful at the same time, lest we be overcome by Satan. May the Lord keep E. C. F. G. alive for the salvation of His Church.

E. C. F. G.

most subservient

Philip Melanchthon.

635 Spalatin's account of how Chursachsen had spoken out in the matter of the new prophets.

From Spalatin's Historia, Hiäeriei Hievor, bei Seckendorf, lügt. lib. I, p. 193a.

Since the wretched swarm spirits, Nicol. Stork and Marx von Elsterburg, absent D. Martin's Luther, who was still in his Patmos, had gone to Wittenberg, and had caused almost all misfortune, and had also almost saddened the most learned and distinguished, for which reason his electoral graces required some high scholars to go to Pretin to advise on the matter with God's help. When it came to the council, and his electoral graces had heard the misgivings of his councilors and servants, as they could suffer in the same dealings, they said

His Electoral Grace, among other things, said these harsh words with great seriousness: "This is a great, important trade, and one that I, as a layman, do not understand. Now my dear God has given my brother and me quite a bit of poverty; if I now understood the things before I wanted to act with knowledge against God, before I wanted to take a staff in my hand and walk away. The words of his princely grace astonished the councilors and servants who existed at that time, and certainly his heart stood the same way until the end of his life.

2. from Luther's correspondence with Melanchthon and Spalatin, the new prophets half.

636 Luther's letter to Melanchthon of January 13, 1522, in which he indicates how these new spirits should be tested, also at the same time aptly asserts the infant baptism rejected by them.

See Appendix, No. 103.

637 Luther's reminder to Spalatin that he should work to prevent the Elector from staining his hands with the blood of the Zwickau prophets.

See Appendix, No. 104.

How Luther himself met with the new prophets after his return from Patmos and soon discovered by their performance what spiritual children they were.

638 Luther's report of this to Lang, in which he asserts, among other things, that he had obviously encountered Satan in them.

See Appendix, No. 105, the postscript.

639 Luther's report to Spalatin about how Nicolaus Storch, one of the new prophets who did not attend the above meeting, came to him in soldier's clothing, along with two others, and what he said.

See Appendix, No. 93, the postscript. In Walch's old edition, this is separated from the letter and included in the appendix as No. 6VI.

B. Of the Carlstadt riots, which mainly forced Luthern to return to Wittenberg.

1. as Luther already complained in his patmos about Carlstadt's disagreement in doctrine, but nevertheless, in order not to give his opponents any trouble, tolerated him.

640 In his Patmos against Amsdorf, Luther expresses distress over Carlstadt's contrary doctrinal opinions, explaining that although he could easily be resisted, it would give the opponents the opportunity to boast as if the Wittenbergers themselves were at odds with one another, to the great annoyance of the weak.

See Appendix, No. 97, § 3.

2. Luther's decision to return to Wittenberg.

641. short summarium of the first five of the "eight sermons against D. Carlstadt's innovations in Wittenberg," March 9-16, 1522.

This writing is not, as Walch meant and put in the title, an "answer of Luther to the Wittenbergers", but a Summarium of a part of the eight sermons, which he preached from March 9 to 16, 1522 at Wittenberg. For the locations, we refer to the 20th volume of our edition, Col. 6, note. Our assumption just expressed is further substantiated in the introduction to the 20th volume, p. 16 b and in the note mentioned. We give the text according to the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 68. There, the writing is among those of 1522, but there it has the title: "Schrift D. M. L. Wider die Neverung zu Wittemberg, durch D. Carlstad angericht, weil D. Martinus, after the Diet of Wormbs was held, XXI in his Pathmo." This writing does not belong in this place, but should have been after No. 656. Even the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 290 f., still has in a registry the superscription: "Luther an die Wittenberger." The locations of this writing are given in our edition, Vol. XX, Introduction, p. 6, note.

1 I cannot be with you all the way; every man is guilty of dying for himself, and of suffering his death, and of waiting for the greatest trials in his departure; no one will be able to have counsel or help with him. I will not be with you; you, in turn, will not be with me. Who then exists against sin, hell and the devil, he is blessed; he who does not stand up to them is condemned.

(2) But no one can stand unless he has learned and practiced the comforting sayings against sin in his life. What the soul has received in the world, that it takes away with it, and nothing else. No one can stand against the devil and hell, for he has thoroughly recognized Christ, that he knows how to defy the devil without a doubt, how Christ died for him, overcame hell and the devil; and that he is the one to whom it has been done well, and whom God wants to have blessed: so he must be blessed, even if all devils were against it.

(3) We are all born sinners, and thus corrupted in Adam's birth by his fall, that by our powers and wills we can do nothing but sin, and nothing is free, as Paul says in Ephesians 2:3: Omnes natura sumus filii irae. But Christ has borne our inability in life and death.

4 As Christ has done to us, so shall we do to our neighbor. Christ bore our infirmities, and we ought to bear our neighbor's infirmities also. Christ gives us credit for falling into sin, so that we may pass over in the same way; why should we not give something to our neighbor?

(5) This innovation has been introduced with masses, images, attacking the sacrament, and other dissolute things, in which there is no interest, letting go of faith and love, as if all the world around had a great understanding of these things, which is not the case, and made many devout people attracted to it, which is the devil's work.

(6) It would be a good thing to do such things if we all had faith at the same time, and if it pleased the whole community so that no one would be offended. But this will never happen. We cannot all be so learned as Carlstadt. Therefore we must yield to the weak; otherwise you who are strong will run very fast, and the weak who cannot follow you at the same pace will perish.

God has given you the word pure and has shown great mercy to those in Wittenberg.

Yet I feel no love at all from you. How much more should you tolerate those who have never heard the word? We still have many brothers and sisters who live in Leipzig, in the country of Meissen, and elsewhere around; we must also have them with us to heaven. If Duke George and many others are angry with us about this, we should nevertheless bear them and hope for the best from them. It is possible that they will be better than we are.

(8) Now this business has been started quickly, purdi purdi, and driven in with fists; I do not like it at all that you know it; and if it comes to that, I will not stand with you in this business either. You have started it without me, so see that you can carry it out without me. It is not right what you have done, and if Carlstadt 2c. had said it again.

(9) You have brought in many wretched consciences who have taken the sacrament and attacked it, torn down images, eaten eggs and flesh. If they were to give account to the devil in their death or in a trial, they would not know a hair's breadth about it. You have been a cause of destruction, that you have plunged into it so carelessly, and you still want to have the glory of it, as if you were a Christian, and better than another. You are far wrong; you want to serve God with it, not knowing that you are just the forerunner of the devil.

(10) Believe me, I know the devil well, and almost well; he started it only because he wanted to desecrate the word that was spoken. He has led you on a little fool's errand, to attack the sacrament, to eat eggs and flesh, so that in the meantime you forget faith and love. And look at me right away, as if those who started this game sought their glory, the devil also gave them their reward.

(11) Now let us see the things which you have done in my absence. First of all, the things that God has commanded to be kept must be kept, and no other; nor has any man on earth power over them, neither bishop nor pope. Some things God has left us free to do, such as eating, drinking, womanizing, 2c., of which God commanded nothing, also has not forbidden anything. These things must also remain free, and no man on earth or angel in heaven has to change them.

(12) Here the popes and bishops came and made of this freedom ropes and statutes, appointed priests and monks, forbade them to marry, imposed fasting days, and suppressed the right fasting, so that they brought many hundreds of thousands of souls to the devil. And by this they have just served the devil; yes, the devil himself has done it, when Paul says 1 Tim. 4,1-3: "False spirits will come with devilish doctrines, forbidding the marriage state and the food that God has created to be enjoyed. For no authority nor man has power to change God's word. What God has left free, that shall remain so without any addition. Therefore, what the pope or bishops do in this regard is nothing.

Thirteen: In these free things thou shalt not press into any place. If the pope says, You shall not eat eggs or meat on Friday; if you do, you commit sin. If they come, then, as to a necessary thing, resist them, and say, Now will I eat it first, that thou hast forbidden it against God.

(14) In this way one should deal with the "troublesome" and against the stiff-necked; but against the weak, who have no understanding, of whom there are many, who would gladly do if they knew right, one should deal with them gently and neatly, teach them, and as St. Paul says [Heb. 5:13] feed them with milk food, while they are still young in the faith.

When a child is first born, it is first given soft food, that is, milk; then a little stronger, as mush and porridge, until it grows stronger, then it is given cheese and bread 2c. So it is also here. You must yield to your neighbor until he also becomes strong and equal to you. St. Paul, when he was with the Jews, lived according to their customs; with the Gentiles, he also lived according to their ways. If you have suckled enough and become strong, will you cut off the teats so that the others cannot suckle? Should the mothers all

If you were to throw away children who could not soon eat, where would you be? Dear fellow, when you have suckled enough and grown up, let another suck and grow up too.

(16) In these free things it gains this place that necessity requires, as, a sick person, or a pregnant woman, if they cannot eat fish, they eat meat, be it when it will, it offends whoever will. If they permit such things in Rome for money, then it is permitted for me in my need, free without money, and no one shall judge me in my freedom, which I have from God. It is the same with taking wives and the like.

(17) But the kingdom of heaven does not depend on eating and drinking. If you eat, you are not the better or the less a Christian, even if you do not eat 2c. But St. Paul says [Rom. 14, 15]: "If any trouble should come of it, I would never eat meat," 1 Cor. 8, 13.

(18) It is true that the word shall not depart from any man, but shall go forth judicially, God willing, whether it be for pope or bishop, emperor, king or prince. Notice a similitude: the sun has the radiance, and the heat or warmth; neither emperor nor king can bend the radiance. So, the word shall not depart from anyone; but the heat one can well flee, and go into the shade; so does love, which yields to the neighbor as often as it is necessary.

19 Again, one should not penetrate to the other side. This one eats eggs, that one too, so they all have to eat eggs. Not yet! What should I complain about, that I eat fish for the benefit of my neighbor? I would do a greater thing, if it were for his benefit. So I can wear this cap for my enemies (if their conversion is to be hoped for) and for the weak, and I should not complain.

Luther wrote to Spalatin that he was hearing worse things every day, and that it was necessary for him to return to Wittenberg as soon as possible, so that the Elector would not have to worry about him.

See Appendix, No. 104.

Section Three of Chapter Eight.

From Luther's departure from his Patmos at Wartburg, his return, and his public appearance at Wittenberg.

How Luther announced his return to the trousers
- but the Elector did not want to allow it at all.

643 Luther's letter to the Elector of Saxony, in which he congratulates him on God's visitation of him with this cross (the unrest in Wittenberg); he should not be frightened by it, but thank and praise God; but he wants to be present soon. End of Feb. 1522.

Here Walch has brought a fragment which Seckendorf, List. 6utti., 11k. I, p. 217, ex eoxlal. [retiv. Vinar. into Latin; afterwards Elias Frick translated it again into German in the German Seckendorf, p. 449. This translation was taken up by Walch and after him by the Erlangen edition, vol. 64, p. 383. This is a part of the letter that is first found in the supplement of the Leipzig edition, p. 33, then in Walch, vol. XXI, 32; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 136 and in the Erlangen edition, vol. 53, p. 103. We give here the letter completely after De Wette, who compared the original.

To my most gracious lord, Duke Frederick, Elector of Saxony, in his own hand.

Grace and happiness from God the Father to the new sanctuary. Such greeting I now write, my most gracious Lord, instead of my offering. E. F. G. has for many years been seeking sanctuary in all lands; 1) but now God has heard E. F. G.'s desire. F. G.'s desire, and sent home without any food and effort a whole cross with nails, spears and scourges. But I say again: grace and happiness from God to the new sanctuary. E. F. G. only do not be afraid, yes, stretch out your arms confidently, and let the nails go in deep, yes, give thanks and be happy: so it must and should go, whoever wants to have God's word, that not only Annas and Caiaphas rage, but also Judas is among the apostles, and Satan as among the children of God. E. F. G. only be wise and prudent, and

1) See St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, inset, p. 506 f.

Do not judge by reason and appearance of the being; do not be afraid, it is not yet there where Satan as wants to go. E.F.G. believe me fools a little bit, because I know these and similar handles of Satan, therefore I am not afraid; that hurts him. Everything is still in the beginning. Let the world cry out and judge, let fall whoever falls, also St. Peter and the apostles, they will probably come back on the third day, when Christ rises again. This must also be fulfilled for us, 2 Cor. 6 [v. 5]: Exhibeamus nos in seditionibus etc.. E. F. G. wants to have for good, before great haste the pen had to run, I have no more time, will myself, God willing, be there soon. E. F. G. only take care of me nothing.

E. F. G. subservient servant Martinus Luther.

644: Instruction from Elector Frederick of Saxony to Johann Oswald, Amtmann in Eisenach, to Luther. End of Feb. 1522.

The original concept of this typeface can be found in Weimar H6A. D. 61t. X. X. col. 101. It is printed in the 6orp. Rec. I, 559, No. 201 and thereafter in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 292. In Walch's old edition, an extract from this writing is found at this point, which Seckendorf, nist. 6utti., Ud. I, p. 217 translated into Latin, and Elias Frick then retranslated into German. We give the writing in its entirety according to the Erlangen correspondence.

By the Grace of God Frederick, Duke of Saxony and Elector.

Instruction, what our dear faithful Johann Oßwald should advertise to Dort. Luther should advertise.

First of all, we would like to say our gracious greetings, and then tell you that my most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony, has received his current letter, 2) in which he would like to extend to his elector his grace and good fortune.

2) namely, Luther's letter referred to in the previous number.

wishes from God to the new sanctuary and whole cross, and subsequently writes that his Lordship should now be wise and prudent, and not judge by reason and appearance of being, and finally indicates that he himself, if God wills, wants to be there, and his Lordship should only assume nothing according to all content and reading.

Now he himself would know that the order of his grandfather in these matters was not judged, and perhaps did much less than was proper and due in such serious cases. For they had taken many a strange action at Wittenberg and were not in agreement about the matter among themselves.

Those in the monastery and the chapter would not all agree, not even those in the university.

Thus, in Wittenberg, such things would be held outside Wittenberg without end, since some would be dependent on those in Wittenberg, one otherwise, the other thus mass, one in mass robe, the other without mass robe. And even if it should be good, it would be at least an impropriety.

Many students also moved away from it. 1) Thus, several princes had also requested their applicants 2) from the University of Wittenberg for this reason.

According to this, his chiefs would not know what should be the best in this. Therefore, because he writes that his chiefs should now be prudent and wise, and not judge according to reason and appearance of the being, his chiefs would be graciously requested to indicate what he thinks and respects. G.'s gracious request, he would indicate to his Chf. G. what he thinks and respects that S. Chf. G. should or should not do in these matters, and that [he] wants to send his Chf. G. an answer. For S. Chf. G. does not want to do or undertake anything that would be contrary to God's will and His holy word. Even if something unreasonable should be done, from which indignation and complaining would arise, S. Chf.

Thus, the Reich's regiment at Nuremberg had written, requested and asked S. Chf. G. about these matters in various days: 3) if

If a prince has raised or brought about an innovation of this kind against the traditional Christian usage in his principality, or if such an innovation would arise in the future, he is not to allow it to take root, but is to prohibit it severely under severe penalty, to prevent it diligently, and, if he wishes, to exhort and proclaim it in the pulpit by skilled preachers. 2c.

Some bishops, such as the bishop of Meissen, can now be heard as if they wanted to preach themselves in the places where the people should be deceived and to order others to preach. Also S. Chf. G. the Bishop of Meissen recently wrote in response to a letter from the kingdom's regiment, stating that it was his right from his episcopal office 4) to send out virtuous preachers by divine appointment at the time of the holy fasts and other times, to proclaim the word of God and of the holy church, and to exhort the poor simple-minded people, especially in the region where there is already an uprising, to Christian unity and obedience. Majesty's governor and regiment, as well as his good opinion, and to reject them from their error to the best of his ability.

If it would now be made good and right by such preaching, then it would certainly like it manly. And when he [Luther] also indicated at the end of his letter, as if he himself wanted to be there soon, if God so willed, and his Lord should only accept nothing at all, his Lord would not know whether he wanted to indicate that his will and opinion would be to turn back to Wittenberg.

But if this were his mind, then S. Chf. G. would have misgivings that he should not go there again for the time being. For S. Chf. G. would not be able to judge that it would be to his benefit if he were to let himself be seen in public in these runs.

Should he now be found out in Wittenberg, and the Pope and the Emperor's Majesty continue to proceed and proceed against him with their mandate issued above, S. Chf. Majesty, with their mandate issued above, proceed and proceed further against him, and also command and mandate S. Chf. G. with several processes to have him answered, that S. Chf. G. does not yet know the reason that this should be done, because he is still unconquered, S. Chf.

1) Melancthon and Aurogallus also intended to leave Wittenberg, but were prevented from doing so by Luther's return.

2) "Bewandten" == subjects. Margrave Joachim of Brandenburg, Henry the Younger, Duke of Brunswick and Duke George of Saxony had recalled their subjects from Wittenberg "so that the youth, inclined to evil, would not be led into this unchristian work and error". Wittb. Vol. IX, 141 b.

3.) January 20. The following up to the end of this paragraph is found in the same wording in the letter of the Imperial Regiment to the Bishop John of Meissen. The bishop sent this letter to the Elector on February 12 (Erl. Briefw.).

4) The following to the end of the paragraph is almost verbatim from the letter of February 12 (Erl. Briefw.).

The first time he is wronged, the second time he is wronged.

So he must also know that S. Chf. G. has so far never taken any further notice of him and the matter, except that S. Chf. G. has graciously requested him from Kais. Majesty to graciously listen to his simple, humble request. S. Chf. G. would not know how to get involved any further, nor to accept him and the matter, who he had not yet overcome, and he himself wrote that S. Chf. G. should only accept nothing from him.

If, however, S. Chf. G., if he were to turn again to Wittenberg, should refuse the Pope and Kais. Majesty's request, and not obey it, nor have sufficient cause to refuse it, he would have to consider what good might result for His Majesty and his lands and people.

But His Grace would be well disposed, if His Grace actually and thoroughly knew what was right and good in God's will, so to suffer, endure and leave what His Grace should, that His Grace would have no complaint for his person. For if this were to be the right cross and sanctuary of God, then S. Chf. G. would not have been appalled by it, but because God had said that His yoke was sweet and His burden light, S. Chf. G. would gladly bear the cross, if they knew that it was to be of God, without doubt that God would grant S. Chf. G. help and strength for it. However, they made it so strange and diverse in Wittenberg that so many sects arose from it that men became confused about it, and no one knew who was the cook or the waiter.

But that because of S. Chf. G.'s head or main also other people should come to harm and complaint, that would be almost burdensome for S. Chf. G. as well.

In addition, in his gracious opinion, S. Chf. G. does not want to keep it from him that there is now talk that a new Imperial Diet is to be set up and announced around mid-Lent, and thus presumably at this same Imperial Diet his cause will not be one of the least that will be acted upon. Accordingly, S. Chf. G. considers that perhaps it would be good for him to have patience in the meantime, to abstain until it is seen how things will turn out, and also, if he considers it good, to send his written reminder and concerns about what should be done in these matters to the aforementioned Diet, if God Almighty wants to bestow His grace to accomplish something good. For it would stand on it that the things would come in the meantime to a big change.

If, however, God's will and work should be prevented by this, this would not be dear to His Holiness, and for this reason he wants to have all this placed in his mind, which is experienced in these high things.

His Lordship's Grace, who means it graciously, well and faithfully, did not want to restrain him in his gracious opinion. Date ut s. 1)

B. How Luther nevertheless set out, and on the way also freely announced his return to Hose, and what means Elector Frederick the Wise took to see himself out of suspicion and guilt with the Emperor and the Imperial Regiment because of Luther's return to Wittenberg.

645 Luther's letter of March 5, 1522, from Borna, on the journey, to the Elector, which is written with unheard-of frankness.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 146b; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 69b; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 90; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 271; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 137 and in the Erlangen edition, vol. 53, p. 104.

To the most illustrious, highborn Prince and Lord, Lord Frederick, Duke of Saxony, Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Landgrave in Thuringia, Margrave of Meissen, my most gracious Lord and Patron.

JEsus. 2)

Favor and peace from God our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, and my most humble service.

Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Lord! E. C. F. G. Schrift und gnädiges Bedenken 3) ist mir zu Freitag [den 28. Febr.] zu Abend zukommen, als ich auf morgen,

1) The date of this instruction in Corp. Heb is February 20, which is too early, but in Burkhardt, p. 45: March 3, which is too late. This "gracious concern" of the Elector reached Luther's hands, as we see from Luther's next letter, "on Friday [28 February] in the evening". Cf. SeidemannDe Wette, vol. VI, p. 579, note 7.

2) "JEsus" is missing in De Wette and in the Erlangen edition.

3) The previous paper, No. 644.

Saturday, want to ride out. And that E. C. F. G. means it in the very best way must of course be neither confession nor testimony with me, because I am certain of it, as much as human investigation gives. But again, since I also mean well, methinks I know it from higher than human inquiry; but that does nothing.

2) But I let myself look at E. C. F. G.'s writing as if my writing had 1) moved E. C. F. G. a little, so that I write that E. C. F. G. should be wise. But against such delusion, my great confidence has humbled me, 2) that E. C. F. G. probably recognizes my heart better than that I should falter E. C. F. G.'s highly praised reason with such kind of words. For I hope that my heart is ever in that, that I have always had a desire and pleasure in E. C. F. G. before all princes and sovereigns for a reason, without all hypocrisy.

What I have written, however, was done out of concern that I wanted to comfort E. C. F. G.; not for my own sake, of which I had no thought at the time, but for the sake of the clumsy trade, namely in Wittenberg, to great dishonor of the Gospel by ours. There I was afraid that E. C. F. G. would bear a great burden. For I myself was so driven by misery that, if I had not been certain that the Gospel was with us, I would have despaired of the matter. Everything that has hurt me so far in this matter has been shame and nothing. Even if it could have been, I would gladly have bought it with my life. For it has been done in such a way that we can neither answer for it before God nor before the world, and yet it is on my neck, and before that the holy Gospel. This grieves me from the bottom of my heart.

Therefore, most gracious Lord, my writing does not extend further than to that, 3) and not to my trade, that C.F.G. should not look at the present image of the devil in this game. And such an admonition, although it would not be necessary for E. C. F. G., has nevertheless been necessary for me to do.

1) Letter No. 643.

2) humble - instructed, taught.

3) Randglosse der Wittenberger: die solche Unlust zu Wittenberg anichtet haben.

(5) But concerning my cause, most gracious lord, I answer thus: E. C. F. G. knows, or does she not know, let it be known to her herewith: that I have the gospel not from men, but only from heaven, through our Lord Jesus Christ, that I might well have boasted and written myself (as I will do henceforth) a servant and evangelist. But that I offered myself for interrogation and judgment was not because I doubted it, but out of other humility to entice others.

But now I see that my too much humility wants to lead to the degradation of the gospel, and the devil wants to completely take the place where I give him only a hand's breadth, I have to do something else for the sake of my conscience. I have done enough for E. C. F. G. that I have refrained from serving E. C. F. G. this year 4). For the devil knows very well that I did it for no reason. He saw my heart well when I arrived in Worms, that if I had known that so many devils had held out for me as there are tiles on the roofs, I would still have jumped among them with joy.

Now Duke George 5) is still far unlike a single devil. And since the Father of abysmal mercy has made us through the gospel joyful lords over all devils and death, and has given us the riches of confidence that we may say to him, dearest Father, E. C. F. G. himself can judge that it is the highest dishonor to such a Father, if we should not trust in him as well, that we also find wrath over Duke George.

8 I know this well about myself, if this matter were to stand in Leipzig as it did in Wittenberg, I would still ride in, even if (E. C. F. G. forgive me for speaking foolishly) it rained for nine days on the vain Duke George, and each one would be nine times more angry than this one is. He considers my Lord Christ to be a man woven of straw; that my Lord, and I, can well suffer for a time.

4) Marginal gloss of the Wittenbergers: the 21st year, since he was secretly hidden in his patmo.

5) Duke Georg had worried the Elector with letters because of the Wittenberg innovations, and as a member of the imperial regiment, he had issued orders from this authority to the bishops that they should proceed with severity against the innovators. Seckendorf, List. l-utd, lib. I, p. 217 (1).

I do not want to hide from C. F. G. that I have not once asked and meant for Duke George that God would enlighten him. I will also ask and cry once more, but never again. And please, E. C. F. G. also wanted to ask and let ask for help, if we could turn the judgment away from him, which (oh Lord God!) presses upon him without ceasing. I wanted to strangle Duke George quickly with one word, if it would be done with that.

10 This was written to E. C. F. G., in the opinion that E. C. F. G. knows that I come to Wittenberg in much higher protection than that of the Elector. I also have no intention of requesting protection from E. C. F. G.. Yes, I think I want to protect E. C. F. G. more than she could protect me. If I knew that E. C. F. G. could and would protect me, I would not come. No sword can advise or help in this matter; God alone must accomplish this, without all human care and help. Therefore, he who believes the most will protect the most. Because I now feel that C.F.G. is still weak in faith, I cannot regard C.F.G. as the man who could protect or save me.

11) Now that E. C. F. G. also desires to know what she should do in this matter, since she considers that she has done far too little, I answer humbly: E. C. F. G. has already done too much and should do nothing at all. For God does not want to and cannot suffer E. C. F. G. or my worries and doings. He wants to leave it to him, that and no other; then E. C. F. G. may comply with it. If E. C. F. G. believes this, then she will be safe and have peace; if she does not believe, then I do believe, and E. C. F. G. must be at peace. C. F.G.'s unbelief will have to suffer his anguish in sorrow, as is fitting for all unbelievers. 1)

Because I do not want to follow C.C.F.G., C.C.F.G. is excused before God if I am caught or killed. In the sight of men E. C. F. G. shall thus hold himself: viz.

1) Marginal gloss of the Wittenberg edition: Doctor Martinus says, which credible from his mouth more than one heard: he would have written his life long no great lord so hard, as just Duke Frederick Churfürsten, who kept it yet everything to him zugut 2c.

The Emperor must be obedient to the sovereignty as a prince and allow His Imperial Majesty to rule in His Majesty. Maj. may rule in E. C. F. G. cities and lands, in body and goods, as is due according to the imperial order, and not to resist or oppose, nor to seek compensation or any obstacle to the power, if it saw me or wants to kill me. For no one shall break or resist the power but he alone who has established it; otherwise it is an outrage and against God.

I hope, however, that they will need reason to recognize E. C. F. G. as born in a higher cradle than that she herself should become cane master over me. If E. C. F. G. leaves the gates open and keeps the free electoral escort, if they themselves would come to fetch me or their envoys, then E. C. F. G. has done obedience enough. They can never demand anything higher from E. C. F. G. than that they want to know Luther at E. C. F. G.. And this shall be done without C.C.F.G.'s worries, doings and some driving. For Christ has not taught me to be a Christian with another's harm.

14 If they are ever so unreasonable as to order C.F.G. to lay a hand on me himself, I will then tell C.F.G. what to do: I will keep E. C. F. G. safe in body, goods and soul for the sake of my things, believe it or not.

15 I hereby command E. C. F. G. by the grace of God. Let us speak further at our earliest convenience, if it is necessary. For I have hurriedly finished this writing, so that E.C.F.G. will not be distressed by hearing of my future; for I should and must be comforting to everyone, and not harmful, if I want to be a true Christian. It is another man than Duke George with whom I am dealing, who knows me almost well, and I do not know him badly. If E. C. F. G. believed, she would see God's glory. But because she does not yet believe, she has not yet seen anything. To God be love and praise forever and ever, amen. Given at Borne at the Gleitsmann, 2) on Ash Wednesday [March 5] Anno 1522.

E. C. F. G.

menial servant
Martin Luther.

2) Michael from the streets.

646 Prince Frederick, who had received Luther's letter on March 6, sent instructions to Jerome Schurf on March 7 to negotiate with Luther, that he should write a letter to the Prince, indicate in it his reasons for having gone to Wittenberg again, and testify that this had happened without the Prince's knowledge, and also that he should write this letter in such a way that the Prince could communicate it to some of his lords and friends. Lochau, Friday after Ash Wednesday, March 7, 1522.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 148; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 72; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 93; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 274; and in the Erlangen correspondence, vol. III, p. 297.

By the Grace of God Frederick, Duke of Saxony and Elector 2c.

1) Our greetings beforehand, esteemed, dear faithful and councilor! We graciously inform you that next 1) we will receive a letter from Doctor Martinus, which, among other things, indicates that he is willing to return to Wittenberg. We send you this document herewith to hear its contents.

2 Because, for many moving reasons, we considered it good that D. Martinus had remained in office for a while. Martinus would have held off for a while, especially because the matter is now very difficult and in great diligence, and would be very embittered, from which many a burden, especially if one should learn that he is at Wittenberg, would arise for him and others; moreover, that there are many people who would like to have cause to complain to us, and that it may be careful for him to consider how.

Since the doctor will now, by our providence, be in Wittenberg, our request is that you speak and act with him on the letter of credence here, after notification of our gracious greeting, so that he sends a letter to us, in which he states the reasons and concerns for which he has returned to Wittenberg, and that this has happened without our permission. And that he would also offer himself to some extent, with notice that he does not want to be a burden to anyone. And that the writing would be shaped and made in such a way that we would send it to some of our lords and friends, so that they would receive encouragement.

We also inform you that we do not seek anything in this matter, except that sedition and other things may be prevented; therefore you will help to make things work for the best, and be concerned that we obtain a writing that we may show from ourselves. Do the same with him, that he would abstain from preaching in the monastery at the castle for a number of moving causes.

5) And you will send us Doctor Martinu's letter, which we are sending you herewith, together with the letter of credence, after reading it, and at the same time indicate by your letter that 2) you would decide with him, and otherwise keep this matter secret in your duties to us. In this you do us a favor. Date at Lochau, on Friday after Cinerum [Ash Wednesday, March 7], Anno 1522.

To the esteemed, our councilor and dear faithful, Hieronymum Schurff, Doctor, for his own hands.

647. D. Hieronymus Schurf's reply and report to the Elector, sent on March 9, of his happily organized ordered trial. Wittenberg, Sunday Invocavit [9 Mar] 1522.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 149d; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 74; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 93; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 275; and in the Erlangen correspondence, vol. III, p. 299.

To the most illustrious, highborn prince and lord, Lord Frederick, Archmarshall of the Holy Roman Empire, Elector, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave of Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, my most gracious lord.

Most Serene, Highborn Prince! My most willing, subservient, obligated services are E. C. F. G. before. Most gracious Lord! I humbly offer E. C. F. G. to know that I have most diligently presented and opened your order, given to me, to the worthy Mr. Martino Luther, at this time the true apostle and evangelist of Christ, our dear Lord and Savior, and of His divine Word.

2) that in the present further writing, he has given E. C. F. G., 3) conjugal, constant and urgent

2) The Erlanger Briefwechsel, which supposedly brings the text after the Wittenberg edition, reads: "das" instead of: "wes", which is found in our Wittenberg.

3) No.648.

Christian causes, why he has gone to Wittenberg at this time, and that this has happened without any help from E. C. F. G.. As it is also the truth about himself that he found himself there without E. C. F. G.'s knowledge, help or approval 1) and I am comfortingly hopeful and confident that E. C. F. G. will graciously move his causes out of a high Christian understanding and will respect and hold them as urgent, to honor and praise the holy divine Word, also for the salvation, comfort and instruction of E. C. F. G.'s poor, erroneous and angry subjects.

For I, E. C. F. G., according to my obligation and as a poor, sinful Christian man, also do not know how to hide the fact that some have intruded upon us to preach, without any demand or appointment, but on their own initiative, and have finally, unfortunately, brought it about that many citizens and students neither know nor believe otherwise, because only he should be a true good Christian who does not confess, persecutes priests, eats eggs and meat on carnival day, tears down images 2c. And, which is to be moved most of all, so they have urged with their preaching the people to indignation and taking of the reverend sacrament of the altar, which alone the afflicted and hung spirits and consciences, who feel and feel grievances because of their sins, will receive usefully, so that where before in the parish of Wittenberg five or ten masses would have been held awkwardly and against the application on one day, that now on one day often a hundred and many more have been held.

4 The devil knows how to masterfully introduce such mischievousness and malice under the appearance and guise of truth, and from this and other clumsy preaching almost the whole of Germany has not been a little annoyed and offended. God is to be complained that from Wittenberg, where the holy gospel, by the special grace of the Almighty, has again been brought to light, such annoyance, insult and scandal of the neighbor have arisen, without any need, against brotherly and Christian love.

5 Similarly, we were not a little offended among ourselves. For I, for my own part, while still cold and weak in faith, have been greatly annoyed and scandalized. And all this, in my small opinion, comes from the fact that

1) "Gehellen" - unanimity, agreement. The Erlanger Briefwechsel, which supposedly gives the text according to the Wittenberg edition, reads: "Gefallen"; but in our Wittenberg and in the Jena one finds the reading given by us.

I am concerned that they are carnal preachers and not enlightened with the Spirit of God.

(6) For this reason I, and the greatest number, easily receive what is carnal and pleasing to the body and flesh. For this reason it is not enough for a preacher to have the art and knowledge of the Scriptures, for the Scriptures alone give life and hope, but the Spirit of God must be present. Therefore the apostle says [2 Cor. 3:6], "The letter killeth, but the Spirit maketh alive." For the word of God is preached without all profit and fruit, unless it strikes and stirs the heart and will of man, and he is wholly or partly renewed and renovated in spirit and will. It is all the same to such a person whether he eats meat or not, if this is done without annoying and offending his neighbor. For to the pure all things are pure; as to the impure all things are impure [Titus 1:15]. But care must be taken, even in the daytime, as the Scriptures show that these men are few, as the daily fruits also sadly show.

For God's sake, I sincerely ask that E. C. F. G. not ungraciously accept my vexatious letter, for I am well aware that E. C. F. G. has a much higher and deeper understanding of all this and has brought it to mind than I, a poor, incomprehensible fellow. Thus I have not let E. C. F. G., enough to do to my conscience, know it undisclosed. For I hope that the almighty, benevolent God will grant D. Martino grace and mercy, so that from his sermons, through the effect of the Holy Spirit, such and such ailments, spiritualities and scandals will be stopped and partly torn out of the hearts of the people. However, invading preachers should no longer be allowed to preach in this way. For Christ so faithfully and fatherly warned us against all pseudo-prophets, which will be until the end of this world, and warned us to beware of them [Matth. 7, 15].

(8) For this reason, every Christian authority, where it notices and understands this, is obliged to proceed and avert it. For the Christian people, as Christians on this earth, abstinence and nourishment rests and stands only in the pure, clean, pure Word of God through the action of the Holy Spirit.

9. and have this my clumsy writing with my insoluble hand E. C. F. G. that I did not want to trust my substitute, and that I lived up to E. C. F. G.'s orders as the obedient one; and not Therefore, I do not fear that it will come before the people, because I want to be known before D. Carlstadt and manly. And I hereby submit myself to E. C. F. G. as my most gracious Lord, to whom the Almighty God may grant and give true strength and constancy, against all challenge and persecution of His divine Word, to resist the devil and his followers. Amen. Date Wittenberg, Sunday Invocavit [March 9] Anno 1522.

E. C. F. G.
Hieronymus Schurpff, subject
and obligated.

648 Luther's letter to the Elector Saxony, written after the Elector's request and enclosed with Schurf's report, in which he relates several reasons why he had turned from his Patmos back to Wittenberg without the Elector's knowledge, will, and consent. Wittenberg, Friday before Invocavit [March 7, 1522].

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 148d; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 72b; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 95; in the Leipzig, vol. XVIII, p. 276; in the Erlanger, vol. 53, p. 109 and in De Wette, vol. II, p. 141. Latin in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 46, with omission of the postscript; likewise in the Latin Wittenberger (1551), tom. II, fol. 328 and in the Jena (1566), tom. II, fol. 515. S  mmtliche latin editions have the wrong date: Dis Vncris  s Invocavit instead of: Invocavit.

JEsus.

Favor and peace from God our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, amen; and my humble service.

Most Serene, Highborn Prince and Most Gracious Lord! I have almost considered that it would be a great inconvenience to E. C. F. G. if, without E. C. F. G.'s will and permission, I were to turn again to Wittenberg; 1) since it would seem to have the appearance of causing E. C. F. G. and all the country and its people a great hardship, but before that I myself, as one who has been banished and condemned by papal and imperial power, would have to wait all hours of death.

1) These words are changed in the "moderate letter" No. 652 to avert the appearance that the Elector knew about Luther's concealment.

But how shall I do to him? Cause urges, and God compels and calls. It must and will be so; so be it in the name of Jesus Christ, the Lord over life and death.

3 However, so that my causes do not go unheeded by C.F.G., I want to make some of them known to C.F.G. that I now feel. And first of all, I do not do this out of contempt for Imperial Majesty's authority, or for E. C. F. G., or for some higher authority. For although human authority is not always to be obeyed, namely when it does something against God's commandment, it is never to be despised, but to be honored. Christ does not justify Pilate's judgment, but he did not throw him or the emperor from his chair because of it, nor did he despise him.

4) The first cause is that I have been called in writing by the common church in Wittenberg, with great pleading and request. 2) Since no one can deny that through me the essence has begun, and I must confess myself a servant of such a church, to which God has sent me, it has not been possible to deny me in any way, because I would have denied Christian love faithfulness and work.

(5) Although there are many who consider this being a devilish thing, and condemn and condemn it, who undoubtedly consider this cause to be nothing, but rather think that Wittenberg and what has begun there should be left to sink, I am not excused by this, for God will not judge me according to others, be they much or little, faith or unbelief, but according to my conscience. For I know that my word and beginning is not of me, but of God; that no death nor persecution will teach me otherwise; methinks also that it must be left alone.

The other is that in Wittenberg, through my absence, Satan has fallen into my hurdles, and, as all the world is now crying out, and is also true, has brought about a number of things that I can no longer satisfy with any writing, but must act with my own person and living mouth and ears.

2) This passage is also changed so that it is not revealed that the Wittenbergers knew about Luther's whereabouts.

Saving nor forgiveness have been deceptive in my conscience.

7 For this reason, not only E. C. F. G.'s grace and disgrace, but also the wrath and anger of all the world. It is ever my hurdle, commanded to me by God, they are my children in Christ; there has been no more disputation whether I should come or not. I am guilty of suffering death for them; I will do so gladly and joyfully, with God's grace, as Christ demands, John 10:12.

8) But if I had been able to help the matter with letters, as before, so that it would not have been necessary to call me, 1) why should I not also gladly grant to remain eternally from Wittenberg, since I am also to die for the sake of my neighbor.

The third is that I am afraid (and worry that I will be, alas, all too certain) 2) of a great outrage in German lands, so that God will punish the German nation. For we see that this gospel falls well with the common man, and they receive it carnally, see that it is true, and yet do not really want to use it.

(10) Those who are supposed to quell such indignation are helping to dim the light by force, but they do not see that by doing so they only provoke the hearts and force them to revolt, and they are acting as if they themselves or their children wanted to be destroyed, which God undoubtedly sends to plague them. For the spiritual tyranny is weakened, which is the only thing I sought with my letter. Now I see that God will continue to do as He did to Jerusalem and its two regiments. I recently learned that not only spiritual but also temporal power must give way to the Gospel, be it with love or suffering, as it is clearly shown in all the histories of the bibles.

11 Now God has demanded through Ezekiel that one should sit against Him as a wall for the people, which is why I also thought it would be necessary to discuss with my friends whether we would turn or raise God's judgment.

1) This is changed nm to hide that Luther was in written communication with the Wittenbergers.

2) These brackets, which are in the Latin editions, are set here by us.

12 Whether this matter would be in vain for me and ridiculous for my enemies if they heard it, I must nevertheless do what I see and know how to do. For E. C. F. G. should know this, and certainly rely on it, it is much different in heaven than decided at Nuremberg, 3) and will, unfortunately, see that those who now think they have eaten the Gospel, as they have not yet spoken the Benedicite.

(13) There are probably more causes that do not yet really penetrate me, therefore I do not penetrate them or think deeply about them; there is too much that the gospel is in need, therefore no man has been seen by me.

14 I hereby ask that E. C. F. G. will graciously grant me the benefit of my future in E. C. F. G. C. F. G. city, without E. C. F. G. knowledge and will. 4) For E. C. F. G. is only the Lord of goods and body, but Christ is also the Lord of souls, to which He sent me and awakened me; I do not have to leave them. I hope that my Lord Christ is powerful over our enemies and will be able to protect me from them if he wants to. But if he will not, then let his will be done; I know for certain that no harm or suffering shall come to me.

15. May God mercifully command him E. C. F. G.. Given at Wittenberg, on Friday ante Invocavit [March 7] 1522.

E. C. F. G.

servant, Martinus Luther.

649 Postscript to this letter, in which Luther offers to provide another form, but leaves it up to the Elector to provide another one himself.

Where E. C. F. G. does not like this form, I humbly request that E. C. F. G. himself should have a pleasing one prepared and sent to me, since I also have nothing to fear if the next letter to E. C. F. G. would arrive. I do not want anything

3) In the other letter: "for on earth decided" and the following to the end of the paragraph is omitted because of the harshness.

4) Here is inserted the promise that Luther did not want to offend or offend anyone.

Act henceforth, which I do not want to suffer and look at in the daytime. Although I did not fear the outrage, which I despised until now and thought about the priesthood alone. Now, however, I am afraid that it will take hold of the dominion and, like a plague of the land, envelop the priesthood as well. But this shall not come to pass before the persecution and destruction of the gospel, as it was before.

650 Prince Frederick's other rescript to Jerome Schurs of March 11, to the effect that there were a few things in Luther's letter that needed to be changed, especially the somewhat harsh expression of Nuremberg, and that he would like to persuade Luther to put it in the form that Spalatin enclosed.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 150b; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 75b; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 98; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 280; and in the Erlangen correspondence, vol. III, p. 303.

By the Grace of God Frederick, Duke of Saxony and Elector 2c.

1 Respected, dear faithful and counselor! We have received and read your letter, which you acted on our order with Doctor Martino Luther, to our gracious favor, also the writing, which the same Doctor Martinus gave us next to it; and it is no less, we have never liked to see that some have intruded themselves to preach and do otherwise. What we have at all times done and allowed to be done against this is known to you and others whom we have used for this purpose. Wherever we were followed, there would undoubtedly have remained many things that would now be a further development and a burden.

(2) We have also overlooked the writing that Doctor Martinus gave us, in which he apologizes for having gone to Wittenberg again without our knowledge, will and consent, and know of no particular change in it, except for the words in which Doctor Martinus writes: "There is much different in heaven than decided at Nuremberg" 2c. We have had the same and several other words, which in our opinion are somewhat too sharp, moderated and changed, as you will learn from Magister Spalatin's handwriting.

We also send you Doctor Martinu's letter, which he has now written to us, herewith; and it is our gracious request that you speak to D. Martino about it, and inform him of this, and also move it for yourself. And we believe that if he were to write to us with a copy that has been touched, it would not be improper; we would then also have to report his writing to our lords and friends, with whom we are under suspicion. We do not seek anything else here, except that the writing be presented in such a way that it may be held up to our lords and friends.

4 For you know that we are completely innocent of these things, and that everything happened without our will and knowledge; if Doctor Martinus had wanted to follow us, he would not have turned to Wittenberg.

5. and otherwise keep these writings secret everywhere and not let them reach anyone, but send us all of them again, together with the instructions that we recently sent you, kept under your care. And what information and answer you will receive from Doctor Martino, you will let us know by your letter. And do us all a favor in this. Date Lochau, on Tuesday after Invocavit [March 11], Anno 1522.

(6) We also make known to thee that we seek nothing in this matter, but that sedition and other things may be prevented; wherefore, be diligent to help the matter for the best, and be concerned that we obtain a writing which we may show of ourselves.

651. Luther's letter to Spalatin that he did not like the change that had taken place, but he wanted to give way to the prince's weak faith; at the same time, he reported how Carlstadt was making it difficult to give in, but that Christ would force him to do so. March 13, 1522.

The original of this letter is in the anbaltnMn Gesamt-Archiv. Printed by Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 56d; by De Wette, vol. II, p. 150 (with the wrong date: March 12) and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol.III,p^8vs. According to the latter, which brings the original, we have translated.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To the servant of Christ, Mr. Georg Spalatin, his brother in the Lord.

Hail! That you are an evangelist rejoices me, dear Spalatin, and I pray that the LORD make your word a word of power, so that your faith and that of those who hear you may be complete. But that you wonder why I have not written to you is proof of your weak faith, as if I were evil because I have kept silent. But what can be the point of Luther being evil, since you are already rich and reigning in Christ [1 Cor. 4:8], of which alone one must boast?

I am sending here the letter to the prince; 1) as in the same the prince has shown many signs of a despondent unbelief (this weakness of his must be borne), so above all this word has annoyed me that I am forced to call the emperor "my most gracious lord", since the whole world knows that he is extremely hostile to me, and all will laugh at this obvious falsehood. But I would rather be ridiculed and accused of falsehood than resist the prince's weakness; but I so appease my conscience against this falsehood that the usage and spelling entails calling the emperor thus, as it were, by a proper name and title, which is also done by those to whom he is exceedingly hostile. For I hate such deceptive pretense extraordinarily and have conceded him so much so far; at last once one must also speak freely (παρρησία praestare). Do not refrain from praying for me, and help me to tread this Satan underfoot, who has risen up against the Gospel in Wittenberg under the name of the Gospel; we are now fighting with an angel who is disguising himself as an angel of light [2 Cor. 11, 14]. The Carlstadt will find it difficult to depart from his mind, but Christ will force him if he does not depart of his own free will. For we are masters of life and death, who believe in the Lord of life and death. Another time more; now be well and be confident in the office which you have taken upon you. The day after Gregory 2) [March 13] 1522.

Your Martin Luther.

1) No. 652.

2) Walch has the wrong date: "Den 2. Georgii" [April 24] instead: Htsra OrsZorii.

652 Luther's previous letter to the Elector, moderated and amended by Spalatin at his command. March 12, 1522.

The original of this letter is in the Weimar Archives, Registrande O, p. 74, FF No. 2. Printed in Spalatin'sS . 53. In the Gesamt- In the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 151; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 76; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 96; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 278; in the Erlangen edition, vol. 53, p. 114 and in De Wette, vol. II, p. 146. A diplomatically exact print of the original is found in Seidemann's "Lutherbriefe," p. 15. After this we give the text.

To the most illustrious and highborn Prince and Lord, Lord Frederick, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall of the Roman Empire, Landgrave of Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, my most gracious Lord and Patron, in S. C. G.'s own hands.

JEsus.

Favor and peace from God our Father and our Lord Jesus Christ, amen; and my humble service.

Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Lord! I humbly beg Your Electoral Grace to know that, by divine help, I have again turned here to Wittenberg, which is undoubtedly against and too much for E. C. G., who have never wanted to get involved in this matter, since it looks as if it might cause great harm to others, and especially to myself, as he who, banished and condemned by papal and imperial mandate, must await all hours of death.

But how shall I do to him? God compels and calls, and cause presses. It must and will be so; so be it in the name of Jesus Christ, the Lord over life and death.

3. so that E. C. G. does not take it for granted that I have so unintentionally, and without E. C. G.'s knowledge, will, and approval, inserted myself into E. C. G.'s work. C. G. University and the city of Wittemberg, out of human willpower and unnecessary arrogance, I want to inform E. C. G. of some of the causes that I now feel.

4. first and foremost, I hereby declare that I will not allow myself to be held in contempt of the roman emperor.

I have never been subject to the authority of my most gracious Majesty, my most gracious Lord, or of any other authority.

For although one should not always obey human authority, namely when it does something against God's commandment, one should never despise it, but honor it. Thus the Lord Christ did not justify nor praise Pilate's judgment, but nevertheless did not expel him or the emperor from the throne, nor did he despise them. Now these are the causes of my coming here to Wittenberg, in such my complaints.

6 First, that it is undeniable that the being has begun through me, and I must confess myself to be a servant of the congregation at Wittenberg, to which God has sent me, and for which reason I have not been able to withdraw from Wittenberg for a long time, because I wanted to be highly burdensome to others and to myself, to have failed in faithfulness and work of Christian love.

(7) Although there may be many people who consider this being a devilish thing, who condemn it, and who undoubtedly do not regard this cause as anything, but rather consider it reasonable to let Wittenberg and what has been started there sink, I am not excused by this. For God will not judge me according to others' faith, be it much or little, but according to my conscience. For I know that my word and beginning is not from me, but from God, which no death or persecution will teach me otherwise.

(8) Secondly, that in Wittenberg, through my absence, Satan has fallen into my hurdles, and, as all the world is now crying out, and is also true, has wreaked havoc on some pieces, which I cannot satisfy with any writing, but must act with my own person and living mouth and ears, no longer saving nor pardoning has been deceptive to me in my conscience.

9 For this reason, not only E. C. G.'s grace and disgrace, but also the wrath and anger of all the world has been put behind me. For Wittenberg is my hurdle, commanded to me by God, they are my children in Christ, there has been no more disputation, whether I am to them or not.

should come or should not come. I am obliged to suffer death for them; this I will also do gladly and cheerfully with God's grace, as Christ demands Joh. 10, 12. But if I had been able to help the cause with writings, why should I not have gladly given myself up to remain eternally outside of Wittenberg, since I should also die for the sake of my neighbor?

(10) Thirdly, I have been grievously afraid (and fear that I am all too sure of it) of a great outrage in German lands, so that God will punish the German nation. For we see that the gospel falls well with the common man, and they take it carnally; they see that it is true, and yet will not use it aright.

(11) Those who were supposed to quench such indignation, who saw to dim the light by force, do not see that by doing so they only provoke the hearts and force them to revolt, and act as if they themselves, or their children, wanted to be destroyed, which God undoubtedly sends to plague them.

(12) For the spiritual tyranny is weakened, to which I alone have aspired with my writing; now I see that God will continue to drive it, as He did Jerusalem and its two "regiments". For I have recently learned that not only spiritual, but also worldly power must give way to the Gospel, be it with love or suffering, as it is clearly shown in all the histories of the Bibles.

Now God has ever required through the prophet Ezekiel [Cap. 22, 30] that one should set oneself against Him as a wall for the people, which is why I have also thought to discuss it with my friends, whether we want to turn God's judgment or to forgive. Whether this matter will be in vain for me, and also ridiculous and mocking for my enemies when they hear it, I must nevertheless do what I see and know must be done. Because E. C. G. should know that and rely on the fact that it is decided in heaven much differently than on earth.

14 There are also more causes that do not yet really penetrate me; therefore I do not penetrate them or think deeply about them. It is too much in that the gospel is in need, because of which I should not have looked at, shunned, or feared anything on earth.

15 Therefore, my humble, submissive request to E. C. G. is that you graciously grant me and forgive me that I have come here to E. C. G. behind and without E. C. G.'s knowledge, will, favor and permission. C. G. city of Wittenberg, and graciously see and consider the above-mentioned high and moving causes, and that I intend to refrain here, with God's help, from any unjust burden or insult. For E.C.G. is only Lord of goods and body, but Christ is also Lord of souls, to which he has sent and awakened me; I must not leave them.

16 I also hope that my Lord Christ is mighty over all enemies and adversaries, and if he wills, he will protect me and handle me well. But if he will not, let his good will be done. I know for certain that no harm or suffering shall befall me.

17. may god mercifully command him E. C. G.. Date at Wittemberg, middle week after Invocavit [March 12] Anno dni 1522.

E. C. G.
servant Martinus Luther.

658. D. Hieron. Schürf, March 15, 1522, reports to the Elector, at the time of the transmission of Luther's changed form, how Luther's return and sermons are causing immense joy in Wittenberg, and how the people are already beginning to recognize the truth again.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition <1569>, vol. IX, p. 152; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 77 b; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 98; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 281; and in the Erlangen correspondence, vol. III, p. 306.

To the most illustrious, highborn prince and lord, Lord Frederick, Archmarshall of the Holy Roman Empire, Elector, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave of Thuringia, and Margrave of Meissen, my most gracious lord.

Most Serene, Highborn Prince, my most willing, subservient, obligated services are E. C. F. G. before. Most gracious Lord! I have obediently presented the copy provided to E. C. F. G. to Doctor Martino, who then accepted it with all humility, and according to which I have humbly written to E. C. F. G., as I hereby humbly send to E. C. F. G..

2 And please E. C. F. G. humbly "to know that great joy and rejoicing, among the learned and the unlearned, will arise among us from D. Martini's future and sermons. Martini's future and sermons, for he thereby, by means of divine help, daily points us poor deceived and angry people back to the path of truth with irrefutable evidence of our error, in which we have been miserably led by the intruding preachers: so that it is obvious and evident that the Spirit of God is in him and works through him. And I have no doubt that by the special providence of the Almighty he came to Wittenberg at this time. Gabriel 1) also confessed that he had erred and done too much.

D. Capito has also been with us for two nights, and has listened to two sermons by Doctor Martino, 2) in which he has shown how grossly the reverend sacrament of the altar and its use has been erred against, and he is highly pleased about it, as he told me himself. And therefore, since without any doubt this work that has been started comes and flows from God, he will also represent it and send it in such a way that it will remain undisturbed, neither by the devil nor his followers, where it is commanded and sent home to God in true confidence and trust, in right humility and fear.

4 It shall also, if God wills what E. C. F. G. commands and orders me, remain with me in secrecy until the pit. Carlstadt is not well satisfied, but he will neither accomplish nor create anything, I hope to God. And I hereby command myself to E. C. F. G. in all submissiveness, which the Almighty God in true constant faith keep until the end of this miserable life, amen. Date Wittenberg, Saturday after Invocavit [March 15] Anno 1522.

E.C.F.G.
Hieronymus Schurpff, subject
and obligated.

1) Gabriel Gemini.

2) The fourth and fifth sermons on March 12 and 13, 1522, St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 28 ff.

654: Prince Frederick of Saxony's letter to Duke John of Luther's return to Wittenberg, together with an enclosed copy of Luther's letter of apology, with a request that a copy of it also be sent to von Planitz in Nuremberg, so that he may she could show at the Reichstag [March 16, 1522].

From Cyprian's "Nützliche Urkunden," Vol. II, p. 261. This letter was presumably written at the same time as the next one; according to it, our time determination.

And after E. L. knows that Doctor Martinus is back in Wittenberg, therefore E. L. and we want to give him a lot of trouble; but with which we are excused, that he is here on our will and permission, so he has written to us, from what causes he has come here. We hereby send copies of this letter to your lordship, because we believe that it will also have been sufficient in Nuremberg that Doctor Martinus is back in Wittenberg. For this reason we ask E. L. to send copies of Doctor Martinus' letter to Hanssen von der Plawnitz, so that he can show them to E. L. and to my family and apologize. Gladly at the service of E. L. Dat. ut supr.

Zettl Hertzog Johannis.

655 Instruction enclosed by the Elector to Planitz concerning Luther's letter of apology. March 16, 1522.

From Cyprian's "Useful Documents," vol. II, p.262.

Dear Council. Since you also know that Doctor Martinus is back in Wittenberg, in which we may have a lot of trouble, but with which we are excused, that he is here at our will; So he has written to us, for what reasons he has given himself, as our brother will send you a copy of it, the same copy you may well let see for your own benefit and excuse, so that we may not be charged in this, in which case it has fallen to us. Dat. ut supr.

At Werthen on Sunday Reminiscere [March 16, 1522].

To Hanßs von der Plawnitz.

6. how Luther, immediately after his arrival in Wittenberg, seriously opposed the innovations of Zwilling and Carlstadt and other estates.

The eight sermons delivered by Luther after his return to Wittenberg against D. Carlstadt's innovations. March 9-16, 1522.

These sermons are found in the St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 5 ff. Here also belongs the short Summarium of the first five sermons, in this volume No.641.

657 Luther's paper "Von beider Gestalt des Sacraments zu nehmen und anderer Neuerung. Mid-April 1522.

This writing is found in the St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 62.

D. How Luther announces his reart to good friends, as well as his opinion, what he thinks of Carlstadt's actions, and how he enrages him very much by his contradiction; also that he is in great danger as someone who is still under the rule of the Reich.

658 Luther's letter to Nicolaus Hausmann, addressed soon after his arrival in Wittenberg, in which he encourages him to stand firm because of the new prophets, informs him of the evil that has broken out there, and shows how he dares to control it only by means of the Word; but he should also follow his example in it. Wittenberg, March 17, 1522.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches GesamtArchiv. Printed by Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 49; by Schütze, vol.II, p.39 with the wrong year 1521; in DeWette, Vol. II, p. 151 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 311. A translation of this letter from 8° 2 on, with the wrong address: "To Spalatin" and the wrong date: "Freitags nach Estomihi 1522", has made the rounds of all previous editions as a special letter; namely in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 146; in the Jena (1585), vol. II, p. 71 b; in the Altenburg, vol.II, p.92; in the Leipziger, vol.XVIII, p.273; in Walch, vol.XXI, 14 and in the Erlanger, vol.53, p. 112.

This error can be explained, as far as the wrong address is concerned, by the fact that the German translation was found among Spalatin's papers; the wrong date perhaps by the fact that one read March 7 instead of March 17. We have translated according to the Erlangen correspondence.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To the faithful evangelist of the church at Zwickau, Mr.
Nicolaus Hausmann, his extremely dear brother in Christ at Zwickau.

Hail! Although I, my dear friend Nicolaus in Christ, am busy in many ways in such great turmoil, I still could not avoid writing to you, especially since the opportunity is pressing and this friend, your scholar, 1) requested it. But I hope that you are firm in the faith and grow daily in the knowledge of Christ. Your prophets, who have come from you, are up to strange things and are pregnant with them, which are not pleasing to me; if the same should be born, they will do no small harm. This spirit of theirs is very deceitful and apparent, but the Lord be with us, amen.

(2) Satan has done much evil here in my hurdles in such a way that it was difficult to oppose him without anger on both sides. But you see to it that you do not allow anything new to be started by a vile decree or with impetuosity; only with the word that must be fought, with the word that must be thrown down, with the word that must be destroyed which our people have undertaken with violence and impetuosity. This is how Satan has driven them. I reject the fact that the masses are held for sacrifices and good works, but I do not want to put my hand to it or to stop those who do not want to or the unbelievers by force. I reprove only with the word: he who believes, let him believe and follow; he who does not believe, let him not believe and let him go. For no one must be forced to believe and to do that which is of faith, but must be drawn by the word, so that the willing believer may come of his own free will.

I reject the images, but with the word, not that they should be burned, but so that trust should not be placed in them, as has happened so far, and still happens. They would fall of their own accord if the people were instructed and knew that they were nothing before God. Thus I reject the Pabst's laws of confession, of taking the sacraments, of prayer, of fasting, but with the word that I may free the consciences from them. When they have been freed, they can finally use them for the sake of other weak people who are still entangled in them, or not use them where there are strong people, so that love may reign in these outward works and laws.

But now no one is more annoying to me than this rabble of ours, who abandon the Word, faith and love, and boast only that they are Christians because they can eat meat, eggs and milk in front of the weak, use both forms, do not fast, do not pray.

4. teach in this way, dear one, you also want to walk. With the word, of course, everything must be punished, but the hearts, like the herds of Jacob, must be "maltreated." 2) [Gen. 33:14] so that they first take the word of their own free will, and finally, when they have become strong, do everything. But this is perhaps superfluous for you, but concerned love exhorts me to this service. Be well in Christ and support the gospel with your prayers. Wittenberg, Monday after Reminiscere [March 17] 1522.

Your Martin Luther.

659 Luther's letter to Gerbel, a lawyer from Strasbourg, of March 18, 1522, in which he reports to him that he had had to plunge into the emperor's and the pope's fury by returning to Wittenberg because of the destruction that had taken place in his sheepfold, and that he was now

2) The Erlangen correspondence reads: insuvandu and notes: "This word, which is difficult to read in the original, has been rendered by the manuscripts in many different ways: minaiida, iueitanda (in the Zwickau manuscript XVII, IX, I, in the margin: vsl suvundu vsi mutundu), duetzudu, miinisuda, juvanda, mutauda.

1) In the original: litsrator - one who instructs others in a language. Aurifaber offers: Udsrator.

He lived in the midst of his enemies, to whom power was given to strangle him every hour, but he surrendered to the will of God.

This letter is found in Latin in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 51 b; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 153 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 313. German in Frick's German Seckendorf, p. 471 and subsequently in Walch.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To Nicolaus Gerbel, Doctor of Laws at Strasbourg.

Hail! I believe, dearest Gerbel, that the letter has reached you, which I previously sent to you from the desert 1) through Philip. Now, although you have not written anything back to me, I have not wanted to let this Aristobulus 2) of yours return to you without at least a short letter, which would greet you in Christ and address you in my name and ask that you command me your Lord. Satan is raging, and the neighbors are raging on all sides, I don't know with how many deaths and shells. Now, in fact, even my court has truly confused things to the point of despair. I have therefore been forced to throw myself alive into the midst of the raging of the emperor and the pope, whether I could possibly drive the wolf out of the hurdle. Therefore, I am now surrounded by no protection but that of heaven, but live in the midst of enemies to whom men have given the right to kill me at any hour. I take comfort in knowing that Christ is the Lord of all things, to whom the Father has put all things under his feet, including, without doubt, the wrath of Caesar and all devils who are not among the sheep the Father has put under the Son. So, if he wants me to be killed, let it be done in his name; if he does not want it, who will kill me? Only take care with your own that you support the gospel with prayers; for I see that Satan is dealing with it, so that not only the gospel is eradicated, but also the whole of Germany is flooded with his own blood. Woe, what abominations he is bent on! and if I am not mistaken, they are all too certain to be-

1) This is letter No. 71 in the appendix of this volume.

2) Seidemann in De Wette, Vol. VI, p. 643 assumes that a Strasbourg city councilor is meant by it.

because there are no people who make themselves a wall against God for the house of Israel [Ezek. 22:30, 13:5], then because we have the gospel of the kingdom in words alone, but not in power, because of our hard ingratitude, and are more puffed up by knowledge than edified by love; therefore we will be given, I fear, what we deserve. Pray therefore, let yours also pray, let us all pray. The matter is a serious one, and Satan seeks us with incredible cunning and with the highest powers. Here I must rest my pen, because of the many affairs. Be well with your spouse and greet all of us. Wittenberg, Tuesday after Reminiscere [March 18] 1522.

Your Martin Luther.

Luther's report sent to Wenceslaus Link on March 19, 1522, that he was staying in Wittenberg again because of the unrest caused by Carlstadt and Zwilling.

See Appendix, No. 107, § 1.

Luther apologized to Joh. Lang that he could not come to Erfurt; it was not necessary to tempt God, nor to run after danger, he had enough danger to wear out in Wittenberg, since he, who was under papal and imperial ban, could be beaten to death by anyone, and he had no protection but from heaven.

See Appendix, No. 101.

Luther wrote to D. Joh. Hess his opinion about the riots and innovations that had taken place. March 25, 1522.

This letter is found in Aurifaber, Vol. II, p. 57; in De Wette, Vol. II, p. 159 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 318 (with the wrong date: March 15). German in Frick's Seckendorf p. 476 (not p. 47, as the Erl. Briefw. states) and subsequently in Walch.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Martin Luther wishes his Heß

Hail! I will write more at another time, dearest Heß, now that I am overwhelmed with work and a lot of things, I am forced to be shorter. I am glad that you have become an evangelist; the Increase and strengthen your ministry, O Lord, that you may be complete in faith, and those who hear you, amen.

I am at Wittenberg to quell these disturbances where possible, even though the pope and the emperor have condemned me and I alone live under the protection of heaven. I praise the zeal of your prince 1) for the Gospel, but see that you inflame his heart more to faith and love than to the outward use of the Sacrament. For I see that even ours hasten to take both forms, although in the meantime they regard faith and love as nothing. Certainly, both forms do not make a Christian, but it is the custom and the work of a Christian. But faith and love make a Christian, even without both forms; but those think that they are Christians when they follow this custom. The pope is to be condemned, who by giving a law has abolished the one form against the gospel, but we are not to be praised either, if we leave love and faith standing, however much we may have taken possession of both forms according to the gospel. But this is more fully explained in the booklet I am publishing on this matter. Meanwhile, farewell in eternity, dearest Hess. Wittenberg, on the day of the Annunciation of Mary [March 25] 1522. Yours, Martin Luther.

663 Luther's report to Caspar Güttel, prior of the Augustinian monastery at Eisleben, of March 30, 1522, to the effect that he had offended Carlstadt by overruling his orders, indicating what Carlstadt's errors were.

This letter is found in Aurifaber, Vol. II, p. 56; in De Wette, Vol. II, p. 177 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 326. German in Frick's Seckendorf, p. 476 and in Walch twice, namely here and in the appendix of this volume, No. 108.

Newly translated from the Latin.

1) Duke Carl von Münsterberg, whose court preacher was Hess. Cf. Oorp. kok. I, 566. The place where Hess stayed at that time was Oels in Silesia, not Breslau. (Erl. Briefw. III, 319.)

2) "To Take of Both Forms of the Sacrament," St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, 62.

Hail! I am writing, dearest father, so that the messenger could bear witness that he has come here, otherwise I would have had no reason to write, especially since I have a lot to do with letters, strange stories and people's speeches. I hope that the venerable father Vicarius will also come to you, otherwise I would write to him at length. I have offended Carlstadt because I have cancelled his orders, although I have not condemned the doctrine. Only I am displeased that he has spent his effort on ceremonies and external things alone and meanwhile neglects the true Christian doctrine, that is, faith and love. For by his inconsistent way of teaching, he had led the people to think that they would become Christians by these trivial things, if they communicated under both forms, if they touched the sacrament, if they did not confess, if they broke images. Behold the wickedness of Satan, how he has undertaken to incite to the destruction of the Gospel by a new appearance! For hitherto I had sought this, that the consciences should be freed from these things contrary to the Gospel (contrariū faciebus), and the thing itself should fall away by itself through common consent. But he wished to quickly become a new master, and to establish his orders among the people with suppression of my reputation. Not so, you wicked, not so, but GÖtTe alone the honor! But more about that at another time. But, dear one, we want the father vicarius to be deposed in a short time, 4) because we do not want this one to rule over us, who wants to teach the gospel, not our articles! Fare well and pray for the cause of God. On Sunday Lätare [March 30] 1522.

Martin Luther.

3) Wenceslaus Link, not Staupitz, as Aurifaber and after him Walch assumed, because the latter had long since resigned from office.

4) This is what De Wette understands: "The Augustinians of Wittenberg wanted their Vicarius [Link] deposed because he accepted the Gospel." But the words are to be understood ironically; the artionli nostri are the teachings of the troublemakers.

Section Four of Chapter Eight.

Of Gabriel Zwilling's conversion and improvement, as well as of the hope for Carlstadt's improvement, which was soon overturned.

A. Von Zwillings Umkehr, Desterung und Schicksalen, und wie sich Luther bei dem Churfürsten treuen, obwohl fruchtlos, angenommen hat.

Luther's judgment of Gabriel Zwilling's change and improvement in a letter to Spalatin.

See Appendix, No. 88, § 1.

Luther's letter of recommendation for Gabriel Zwilling to the mayor and council of the city of Altenburg for a preacher's position. Wittenberg, April 17, 1522.

This letter is found in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 255; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XXII, p. 547; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 183 and in the Erlangen edition, vol. 53, p. 131. It is subsequently printed again from the original in the "Mittheilungen des Osterl", VI, 43, and the more important variants of it are noted in the Erlangen correspondence, vol. III, p. 341, which we have made use of.

To the honorable and wise, mayor and council of the city of Altenburg, my especially favorable gentlemen and friends.

God's grace and peace before, and my willing services. Honorable, wise, dear sirs! I have gladly received your writings, which were sent to me for the sake of a preacher, and I have heard with joy your Christian eagerness for the divine word. Therefore, I am willing, as well as obliged, to serve and advise you in this as much as I can. There is one called Gabriel, now at Düben, who is almost famous for his understanding and preaching, and is now well practiced; I would advise him and wish that you would accept him. However, it is a small shame that he has left the order and is now dressed as a secular priest; it is also necessary and good that he has come out, so that one could enjoy him for the salvation of many souls. Where this monster does not

I would not know how to improve it for you this time. And I have written to him about it, so that he will join you, that you will examine and try him yourselves. If you do not like him, there are two other secular priests here, also skilled men; if E. Wisdom will tell me again, I will see to it that I help you to one of them 1). Wherever it would be convenient or suffer, it should have no lack at all, according to your desire, to appear with you. However, if you have Gabriel, you may not have mine. Hereby commanded by the grace of God, who may make you all rich in faith and love through His holy Word, Amen. Given at Wittenberg, on Green Thursday [April 17] Anno 1522.

D. Martinus Luther.

666 Luther's letter to Zwilling, telling him to accept the Altenburg profession. April 17, 1522.

This letter is found in Latin in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 73 d; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 184 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 342.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and mercy and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ, amen. The council of Altenburg desires from me an evangelical preacher; if they should come to you, you will go with them, and if they accept you, you will consider it the very certain voice of God calling you. For I, too, have applied and commended you to them. Therefore I pray that you will receive this counsel and action of mine in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, who calls you through me and Philip, and go in peace, and the Lord make you increase in many thousands. Take heed therefore above all things, that thou be humble and honorable in priestly service.

1) In the original: "the one".

You will not do this if you do not work only with the word as you have heard from me and read in my last booklet.

1) You will not do this if you do not work only with the word as you have heard from me and read in my last booklet. 2) You will not do this if you do not work only with the word as you have heard from me and read in my last booklet. You will not do this if you do not work with the words alone, as you have heard from me and will read in my last booklet 2). The Father wants people to be drawn to Him through Christ, not to be compelled or led by our statutes or ordinances. The contempt of ungodliness must first be implanted in the hearts, then ungodliness will fall of its own accord, without hand; and the love of godliness must first be implanted, then godliness will come of its own accord, and it will happen that the kingdom of God will suffer violence, and those who do violence will snatch it to themselves. May the Lord give you understanding and spirit, that you may be a worthy servant of Christ His Son, and bless His word in your mouth, amen. Grace be with you, amen. Wittenberg, Green Thursday [April 17] 1522.

Brother Martin Luther.

Luther's letter of intercession to the Elector Frederick of Saxony to allow Zwilling to preach in the Altenburg congregation and the council's request there, even though the lords of the order were opposed to it, since he had improved and promised not to get into any more mischief. May 8, 1522.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 152b; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 94; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 253; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XXII, p. 545; in the Erlangen edition, vol. 53, p. 134 and in De Wette, vol. II, p. 192. The original is in the Weimarsche Gesamt-Archiv, from which the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 356 has recorded the more important variants.

1) About Zwilling's appearance during the events in Eilenburg, New Year's Day 1522, an eyewitness reports (Seidemann, "Erläuterungen", p. 37): "After the Gospel, the Wittenberg monk who had gone out began to preach, and the monk wore a long black skirt and a shirt with black braids and a black beret with two lapels, and had a ruff, no crown, but cut over the comb alone, and looks like the devil" 2c.

2) "Von beiderlei Gestalt des Sacraments zu nehmen," St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 77, § 41 ff.

To the most illustrious and highborn Prince and Lord, Lord Frederick, Duke of Saxony, Elector 2c., Landgrave of Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, my most gracious Lord and Patron.

1. grace and peace from God, and my subservient services 2c. Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Lord! I humbly inform E. C. F. G. how the council of Altenburg has requested and asked me to appoint a good preacher. In response, I have proposed to them, not from myself, but from my dear lords and friends here in Wittenberg, in the matter of the most reasonable, Magister Gabriel, who is famous and respected before them as the best in understanding and preaching.

2) Now I notice from his letter and several other statements that he is almost pleasant to the people, but only gains an offence from the fact that the rulers on the mountain, as spiritual rulers over them, do not want to suffer him anywhere. To this I have given my advice that these rulers have no power to resist, but God Himself has given all authority and power where they act against the Gospel, 2 Cor. 10:8 and 13:10: Non est potestas a Deo data ad destructionem, sed ad aedificationem. Item, Act. 5, 29: Oportet Deo magis obedire, quam hominibus.

For this reason, the council of Altenburg and also E. C. F. G. are obligated to prevent false preachers, or to help or suffer that a proper preacher is hired there. No seal, letters, custom, or any right can help against this, unless they are forced to do otherwise by force. For against God no seal, law, custom, or authority will hold.

4. have sufficiently shown them that they have the power and right to recognize and judge true and false doctrine, Matth. 7, 15: Attendite a falsis Prophetis, so that the right, power, interest and authority of the lords of the rule is everywhere gone, because they are publicly against the Gospel, and the council of Altenburg should not refrain from its actions, unless they are driven away by tyranny and worldly power, which they should suffer, but still not approve nor give justice.

3) "Die Regelerherren" find die regulirten Augustiner.

5th About this I hear, E. C. F. G. complain that Gabriel had been reprimanded by me before and that I did not like his thing. That is true; but he turned around as soon as, confessed and corrected himself so thoroughly against me/ and chastised himself before everyone that I did not know to reject him, but because he has special grace to preach, to accept his repentance and correction. Would God that the other heads would remember a piece of his conversion.

6. Also, I have laid it on him very hard before all of us, and have shown that he does not start or initiate any innovation, but that he only promotes faith and love, and that he also attacks with words what is against it; so that he brings the gospel morally to the people first, and then lets God rule and act; which he has promised me not only now in this letter, but also before, very earnestly and faithfully, that I hope, as much as there is to rely on men, it should not be necessary for that reason.

7 But that he was a monk, E. C. knows. C. F. G. well knows that [it] is not annoying because with the blind and erring leaders, which annoyance is to be despised, so that God's word is not withdrawn from the poor souls.

8 Therefore, my humble request to the C.F.G. is that the C.F.G. help the poor people with their Christian opinion, right and nobility, or not hinder them at all, and let them prevail; who knows what God wants to do through this.

9 For E. C. F. G. cannot in good conscience protect the right and authority of the Lords of the Order in such a matter, namely to defend preachers of the Gospel, but is also obliged for itself, as a Christian member, to advise and help, also as a Christian prince, as far as it may be, to meet the wolves.

God, through His mercy, wanted to look at, save and keep C.F.G., amen. Such my letter E. C. F. G. did not want to receive from me to disgrace. Given at Wittenberg, on the Thursday after John xort. 1stat. [May 8] 1522.

E. C. F. G.
menial servant
Martinus Luther.

668 Luther's other letter to the mayor and council of Altenburg, in which he testifies to his joy that Zwilling pleases them, and lives in hope that the Elector will allow the request made on his behalf to take place. May 8, 1522.

This letter is found in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 255; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XXII, p. 547; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 191 and in the Erlangen edition, vol. 53, p. 133. According to the original, it is reprinted in the Mittheilungen des Osterl., VI, 53, whose variants are noted in the Erlangen correspondence.

To the honorable and wise, mayor and council of the city of Altenburg, my especially dear gentlemen and friends.

Grace and peace from God our Father, Amen. Honorable, wise, dear lords and friends! I am glad to hear that Magister Gabriel pleases you, but the fact that you are still reluctant is not a bad sign. What comes from God must have oppositions, so that it may be tried. Therefore, stop and do not give up; ask God to help you. For the devil must be resisted with prayer, and not with our choice and ability. I have written to my most gracious Lord as you desire; I hope it will succeed. But we must wait for what God will give and accept His will. Often our sins have earned what is detrimental and obstructive to us. And as I told you, the rulers of the rules no longer have any authority if they are contrary to the Gospel, but are to be shunned and abandoned as wolves. And it behooves every man to judge their doctrine, and to know the wolves. For each one must believe for himself, and know what is right or wrong faith. I stand up, and you stand up. And God grant you His grace and strength to know and to do His will, Amen. Given at Wittenberg, on the Thursday 1) after Misericordias Domini [May 8] Anno 1522.

Martinus Luther.

1) In all prints the date is: "Tuesday after Misericordias Domini" f6. May], which cannot be correct, because the letter of the Altenburger to Luther, to which this is the answer, carries the same date. We have half assumed the Conjecture of the "Erlanger Briefwechsel" that "Tuesday" was read from Thursday.

669 Luther's sending to Spalatin of the petition of the Altenburgers that Gabriel Zwilling be left to them, together with his own enclosed plea that the Elector not take him away from there and expel him; whereby he reports that he had expressly ordered Zwilling in writing that he should not leave Altenburg until the Elector would send another.

See Appendix, No. 109,? 2.

Luther's exhortation to Gabriel Zwilling that he should not boast about what he would suffer and do for the Word of God, but rather walk in the fear of God and despair of his ability, let Christ do everything alone, and incidentally turn his congregation away from external things and ceremonies through the Word, and lead them primarily to faith and love. May 8, 1522.

This letter is found in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 62; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 194 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 357.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To Gabriel Zwilling, evangelist of the church at Altenburg.

Grace and peace in Christ! I wrote to the prince about this matter, but your letter did not please me at all, because I sensed I don't know what spiritual presumption in it. Do not boast that you will do and suffer many things for the word. Whoever stands there, see to it that he does not fall [1 Cor. 10:12]. You have not yet struggled with death; that is not so easily done as said. Let the example of the Prior of Antwerp 1) and many others frighten you,

1) Jakob Probst, Luther's student, had become a master's student at Wittenberg in 1509 and had attained the degree of licentiate there on July 12, 1521. He then returned to Antwerp, where he was summoned to Brussels on December 5 by Inquisitor Franz van der Hulst, imprisoned and put on trial. After much reluctance, he recanted before Aleander in Brussels on February 9. He was then sent to the Augustinian monastery in Ypres, where he began to preach the Gospel again; taken to Brussels again, where he faced a certain martyrdom, he managed to escape to Germany with the help of a friar, where he first found refuge with Luther (Erl. Briefw. III, 329).

Which daily fall, and few stand. Therefore walk in fear and contempt of thyself, and pray the Lord that He may do all that is thine, and that thou mayest do nothing, but be a Sabbath to Christ. By the way, as I have exhorted thee to abstain from new doings, but by the word alone to make consciences free, acting and urging pure faith and love: so I beseech and exhort thee still, that thou do so. For I promised the prince that you would do so as much as I could promise; therefore see to it that you do not disgrace me and yourself, and at the same time the gospel, if you do otherwise. You see that the great heap falls on external things, on the sacraments, on ceremonies. This must be countered, and only care must be taken that the people are held back, and first brought to the point that faith and love gain a form in them, so that they prove by the fruits that they are branches on our vine. I trust 2) in the Lord that you will do so. In him, be well and greet the pharmacist and his wife, to whom I have not had time to write, for I am overwhelmed with letters from all sides. Thursday after Misericordias Domini [May 8] 1522.

Your Martin Luther.

671 Luther's letter to Zwilling, in which he admonishes him to wait calmly to see whether he will keep the office or not. May 27, 1522.

This letter is found in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 656; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 199 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 373.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in Christ! Put on faith, dear Gabriel, and do not look at this thing with closed senses, whence it comes or whither it goes, as befits him who is born of the Spirit.

2) Aurifaber: eonüão; De Wette and the Erlanger: oonkläk. We have followed the former reading.

3) The evangelically minded Sebaldus Nebe, with whom Zwilling found accommodation, since there was a lack of a parish apartment (Erl. Briefw.).

The Lord will order them, meanwhile you preach and stay until you are ordered to go out with Abraham, and you do not know where to go, and ask the Lord for this matter and everything else. For thou hast done enough, if thou hast been willing to leave the city and the ministry at the command of the superiors; but go not away until another be procured by the prince, or by me. For I have taken upon myself the obligation and the work of procuring another. If then the prince should precede me, let the will of the Lord be done. 1) Let the priests of Baal boast, for this must be done; for otherwise how could this be their end, that they should be put to shame? Be thou ever fugitive and iniquitous in their eyes: who knoweth whether the LORD will not strengthen thee, and let thee not wander, though they all will not? Greet and comfort the apothecary and his wife and all the others. Then excuse me for not having written, for the time and the amount of business do not suffer it. And now be well, be confident and be strong in the Lord and act manly in complete faith. Wittenberg. 1522, on Tuesday after Urban [May 27].

Your Martin Luther.

672 Luther's answer to Gabriel Zwilling when he reported to him that he had had to leave Altenburg and that the Elector had put someone else in his place.

See Appendix, No. 110.

673 Luther's testimony of his displeasure against Spalatin that Zwilling had been expelled, along with his avoidance of how he had had very good praise from the Altenburgers.

See Appendix, No. 92, § 1.

B. As Luther sought to appease the enraged Carlstadt in kindness and to bring him out of better thoughts, this also turned out quite well.

1) liat voluntas do. These are exactly the words of the third petition in the Lord's Prayer. The Erlangen correspondence has in one note the conjecture: sua, which does not seem to us to be appropriate.

and seemed to have renewed his friendship with Luther, so Luther carried him again with great patience.

Luther's report to Spalatin, how he had asked Carlstadt on Easter Monday to stop writing against him, otherwise he would have to oppose him against his will, which he did not want to do because of the papists. Carlstadt was very presumptuous in saying that he would not consider a pen against him, while the Rector already had some printed sheets in his hands, who was working together with the Senate to have Carlstadt take back the book.

See Appendix, No. 111, § 2.

Luther's report to Spalatin that he had written to Carlstadt about a meeting and settlement with him.

This letter of Dec. 29, 1524, which Walch provides with a wrong date and erroneous content, belongs to the next section, sub 6.

Luther's report to Wenceslaus Link, April 8, 1523, that he and others were traveling to Link's wedding, but Carlstadt was not at home.

See Appendix, No. 113.

C. How Carlstadt broke with Luther again at the beginning of 1624, had writings printed against him and escaped to Orlamünde, cunningly drove out the priest there, took his office and income, and in addition sought to justify himself to the Elector by very impudent and presumptuous writings.

Luther's account of the changes and incidents with Carlstadt, together with his thoughts about them.

This story is found in Luther's writing "against the heavenly prophets" in the first part under the heading: "Auf die Klage D. Carlstadts, dass er aus dem Lande zu Sachsen vertrieben ist", St. Louis edition, Vol. XX, 157 ff.

678 Luther's report to Spalatin that Carlstadt, in his own way, has not yet ceased to make trouble, but intends to have eighteen tracts printed against him at Jena, and has already made a start on some of them.

See Appendix, No. 115.

679 Luther's thoughts to Spalatin about Carlstadt's departure from Wittenberg, along with a heartfelt wish that God would not give him away in a wrong way, and an exhortation to Spalatin to pray for him as well; Luther, however, is concerned that he will not cease to hurry toward his downfall.

See Appendix, No. 116, Z1.

D. How Luther had to travel to Jena by princely order and warn the people there against the heretics, which offended Carlstadt and started a disputation with Luther.

680 The so-called Acta Jenensia or Martin Reinhard's, preacher at Jena, report of the action between D. Luther and D. Carlstadt, which took place at Jena on August 22, 1524; printed at the end of September.

This writing appeared at the time we indicated (because Luther already gave his verdict on it on October 3, 1524; see No. 681) under the title: "Weß sich D. Andreas Bodenstein von Carlstadt with D. Martino Luther in Jena, and how they decided to write against each other. Item, The action of Doctor Martini Luther with the council and community of the city of Orlamünd, on the day Bartholomei Dasselbst geschehen. Anno etc. xxiiij." Without place and printer. 3 quarto sheets. The author of this writing is the Carlstadt-minded Martin Reinhard, preacher at Jena, therefore it is also, as Luther states in the next number, a mixture of lies and truth, and reads entirely in favor of Carlstadt, in order to undermine Luther's good name. In the collections, our writing is found: in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 209b; in the Jena (1585), vol. II, p.446b; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 797; in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 148 and in the Erlangen, vol. 64, p. 385. In the following number, Luther indicates why he does not want to answer this writing.

Ascension, which is the 22nd day of August, the highly learned 2c. Martinus Luther, Doctor of the Holy Scriptures 2c., after he had come by princely command of the noble, highborn princes and lords, the dukes of Saxony 2c., on the Sunday before after noon to preach at Jena, there and elsewhere, the above-mentioned D. Martinus began to preach on the above-mentioned day early at seven o'clock, and preached until an hour and a half about and against the doctrine and fruits of the spirits. Among other things, he called the spirit of Altstadt, told some fruits, as riots and murder, so before also by the same spirit, as its high fruits one, in Zwickau quite sublime.

He said that the works and fruits of this spirit were to tear down churches, images, wood and stones, and in sum, to take away baptism and the sacrament of the altar, to eradicate them and not to make them at all, as this all-city spirit now and then subjected itself to many more, from the same inspiration of a devilish spirit; in sum, that all these fruits were worked by a devilish spirit. But let not the elect be dismayed at this," Luther comforted them in the sermon, saying, "There are not many of them, though there are many of them; more must come to them, and there must be sects, that the elect may be proved, and the ungodly put to shame [I Cor. 11:18, 19]. But we, he said, have judged them before, as the Sermons 1) further indicate, and by the grace of God we can still judge them well, that it is not a good spirit who subjects himself to such things, but is the devil himself.

These and similar words of the sermon, when Doctor Carlstadt heard them (for he himself was in the sermon), he took to heart, was struck by several things, as indicated below, wrote a letter to Doctor Luther, which some read in the above-mentioned inn "zum schwarzen Bären" over the midday meal; requested, where Doctor Luther was not opposed, he would like to talk to him. Doctor Luther gave Doctor Carlstadt's envoy a verbal answer: if Doctor Carlstadt wanted to come to him, he would like to suffer it; if not, he would like to leave it alone.

After that Doctor Carlstadt sent again to Doctor Luther: if it is convenient for him, he wants to come. Luther answered: In the name of God, he comes when he wants, so I am ready. When Doctor Carlstadt was informed of this, he came and

1) Thus, the "act Sermons Wider Carlstadt's Innovations" must be meant. St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 5 ff.

Doctor Gerhard Westerburg with him. There were also many foreign imperial and margravian messengers, as well as many Jenische in the hostel, who listened to such conversation and were very pleased, some of the small-minded were frightened, but many were very surprised. But Carlstadt had a servant announce to Doctor Martin that he was there and wanted to talk to him. Doctor Martinus answered: "Let him come in and talk to me freely and publicly; this is what happened, and the conversation follows, as it is written here:

So Carlstadt went into the parlor, sat down on a sidel 1) against him and the other companions at the table, began to talk in this way:

Carlstadt. Dear Doctor, and all of you dear brothers, I ask you not to take it unkindly that I am overflowing you here; my innocence and great need urge me to do so. For you, Doctor, have touched me somewhat highly in your sermon today, and interwoven me with the rebellious, murderous spirits, as you call them, in one number and work. To this I say no. Even though you interpret such speech to the same spirits, from the living voice of God, which I have never heard from them in my days. I do not say that I want to defend their matter here, and so I say: Whoever wants to add me to such murderous spirits and bring me in, that he promises me such things without truth, and not as an honest man.

But that I am meant by you, and that I may take up the matter, is the reason that you have spoken of the sacrament, and have somewhat exalted me, I say: that I truly know that no man has written and taught about it in the way, opinion and reason, as I have, according to the apostles, I also freely confess to this. But that it is the murderous spirit, and the same, as you said today, one and the spirit of Allstädt, I say no to; because he has nothing in common with me in my speech of the sacrament.

To this Doctor Martin Luther answered thus: "Dear Doctor, I will start at the last and at the end, since you have left it, and say: That you can never prove it nor make it true that I have called you; but since you assume that you are touched or hit, then you are hit in the name of God. You also sent me a pointed letter; you should not have done so, for I have nothing to do with you. I am surprised at what you show yourselves. Well, I see gladly that I have met you, and do not see it gladly. I like to see it, because I only know that you are one of them, as you suppose, of whom I preached; but I do not like to see it, because I am sorry that people should be deceived in this way. Today I preached against the spirits, and now I will do it again. If I have deceived you, I have deceived you.

Carlstadt. Doctor, I also want to start at the back. I accept what you said about the sacrament and will prove with writings that you have preached the gospel wrongly. In addition, I say that you do me violence and injustice by bringing me into the murderous spirit. And that I have not to do with the spirit in the riot, I protest publicly before these brethren all with one another.

Luther. Dear Doctor, it must not be so, I have read the letter which you have written from Orlamünd Thomä, 2) and have well heard inside that the rebellion is against and against you.

Carlstadt. Why did you say, Doctor, that it was just one spirit, the murderous spirit in Allstädt, and the spirit that breaks the images and touches the sacrament?

Luther. I have not named anyone, I have not named you in particular with a word.

Carlstadt. But I accept it because of circumstances, because I have attacked the Sacrament alone in the present abuse, and have nothing in common with the spirit at Allstädt in the matter of the Sacrament; and you preach that it is a murderous and seditious spirit. But what I have written to you, I may also and will well speak to you. There was a little silence.

Carlstadt said, "If I had erred, and you had wanted to do a Christian work when you wanted to be a Christian, you should have instructed me as a brother before you stabbed me publicly. You preach and cry, Love, love; what kind of love is it when you give a partisan to one, and see a brother err, and do not instruct him?

Luther. If I have not preached the gospel correctly, I do not know it.

Carlstadt. Yes, I will prove with the sacrament how you have preached Christ, whether you have preached Christ crucified or otherwise a self-imagined Christ. Yes, you have preached against yourselves, as it can be read from your books.

2) This will be the letter that Carlstadt addressed to Thomas Münzer from Orlamünde on July 19, 1524. It is found in Seidemann's "Thomas Münzer," p. 128 f., Supplement No. 21.

1) So in the Jenaer; Wittenberger: "Sydel"; it will probably mean "armchair".

Luther. Dear Doctor, if you know this, write it freely and come out bravely, so that it may come to light.

Carlstadt. I will also do this; it must also come to day, I do not shy away from the light, as you blame me; I offer myself for public disputation in Wittenberg or Erfurt, or to hear and accept a Christian instruction, where and when you want, as far as you provide me 1) a free escort, as you have it.

Luther. Are you afraid, do you not have escort to Wittenberg?

Carlstadt. Yes, I have been there for the very first time; but in a public disputation you will not spare me; so I will certainly not spare you either. So I know how you have attached the people to you.

Luther. My dear doctor, no one is doing anything to you, just come out freely.

Carlstadt. I also want to come out into the light, and wkl either be publicly disgraced, or God's truth must be revealed.

Luther. It will happen to you, your foolishness must come out.

Carlstadt. I will gladly bear the shame, that God may keep His glory.

Luther. It will also meet you; and I am surprised that you only dread writing, and no one is afraid.

Carlstadt. I am not afraid either, I know that my teaching is right and from God.

Luther. Since your teaching was right and of God, why did your spirit not break through when you broke the images at Wittenberg?

Carlstadt. I did not do it alone, but the three councilors, and some of your companions, decided it; then they pulled their heads out of the noose and left me standing alone.

Luther. That's where I come in.

Carlstadt. And me too.

Luther. I do not advise you to refer to those at Wittenberg; you do not have it so good with them as you mean.

Carlstadt. You do not have it so good as you think; but I take comfort in the truth, on the last day the Lord's day will reveal all secret things, then it will be seen how everyone, what you and I have done, and nothing will be hidden under the cover.

Luther. You always insist on the day of the Lord, but I desire mercy.

Carlstadt. Why not? He will never do anyone wrong, nor will he look at the person; the small will count as much as the great; I will be judged in this matter according to mercy and justice. But when you reproach me with my spirit, and say that it should have gone away, you come to measure honestly. You bound my hands and feet, and then you beat me.

Luther. Where did I hit you?

Carlstadt. Were you not bound and beaten, since you alone wrote, printed and preached against me, and caused my books to be taken from the printing press, and I was forbidden to write and preach? If I had been allowed to write and preach as freely as you, indeed, you should have experienced what my spirit would have done.

Luther. Why do you want to preach? Wouldn't you be called, or who told you to preach?

Carlstadt. If we want to speak of man's calling, then I know well that it is due to me on account of the archidiaconate; 2) but if we want to speak of God's calling, then I also know well something about it.

Luther. Who told you to preach in the parish?

Carlstadt. If I had erred there, you should have punished me brotherly for it beforehand, and not have stabbed and struck at me in this way. But is it not one people who listen in the monastery and in the parish?

Luther. You stabbed me before I stabbed you.

Carlstadt. I did not do that.

Luther. This is what your booklets show, since you put on my own words.

Carlstadt. Which booklets? I have one about the vocation, but I wrote it the other day, which may be too close for some. When did you instruct me then? show me a piece in which you have punished me all your life! You have never told me in my life where I have been guilty or have erred; you have done everything by force. And if you would not have done it between you and me alone, you should have taken one or two to yourselves.

Luther. I have done that.

Carlstadt. If you have done it, God grant that I may be publicly disgraced here in front of all of you.

Luther. It will happen to you.

Carlstadt. But I know that [it] is not true. Luther. I have done it.

2) In the original: "was gebüren".
This have already the Wittenberg and the Jena given by "gebürete".

1) Thus the Wittenberg and Jena editions. Erlanger: "so fern schafft mir".

Carlstadt. Who has been there? Luther. Philip and Pomeranus. Carlstadt. Where? Luther. In your little room. Carlstadt. That is not true; you may well have been with me, but you never took it upon yourselves to punish me or to give me the articles of the Jrrsal. Luther. We brought you the notes from the university, in which the articles we had missed were listed. Carlstadt. Doctor, there you speak your violence; it has never come to me nor been shown to me; I also remember that the articles of supposed error had not yet moved out of the university. Luther. Well, dear Doctor, if I tell you a lot, I will have to lie to you. Carlstadt. If it is true, God grant that the devils tear me apart before all of you; ei, you have never offered them to me. Luther. I brought it to your house myself. Carlstadt. Doctor, as if I had Doctor Jerome's writing in which he reproaches me that such erroneous articles would have been given to me if I had followed it; how will you stand there? After all, the university had not yet gathered the time to withdraw such articles. During this, Doctor Luther was silent for a while, and in the silence, Doctor Carlstadt turned to the others sitting near him and said: "Dear brothers, I beg you, do not take offense at my harsh speech, it is because of my complexion that I speak so harshly, and because of this my heart is not bad or angry. Luther sang again and said: "Dear doctor, I know you well. Carlstadt. I know you well, too, and I know what you mean. Luther. I know well that you all ride high, throb great, and want to be exalted and seen alone. Carlstadt. Where I would do this, you should instruct me; but I can see who boasts the most and seeks the most honor. Luther. I punished you at Leipzig because you were so arrogant and wanted to argue before me. Well, I granted you the honor and let it happen. Carlstadt. Ah, Doctor, how can you say that? Do you know, since I have already disputed, that you are still uncertain whether you will be admitted or not? I refer to the Duke George's Councilors and to the University of Leipzig. But you must always speak in such a way that you can	and arouse hatred in other people. What else have you done today in your preaching, as you have always done, but to arouse envy and hatred among the people at the first entrance against those against whom you intended to preach? Luther. I say as before: I have preached against the spirits today, and now I will do it again; in spite of him who tries to prevent me. Carlstadt. Well, dear Doctor, preach and do it well; other people will do their part, too. Luther. If you have something, write it out freely. Carlstadt. I will also do it fearlessly. Luther. Nevertheless, you stand with the new prophets. Carlstadt. Where they are right and 'true; where they are wrong, let the devil help. Luther. Write against me publicly and not secretly. Carlstadt. If I knew that you were in such need of 1) it, it may be granted to you. Luther. So it does. Carlstadt. Go ahead. Luther. Do it, I will give you a guilder for it. Carlstadt. A guilder? Luther. If I don't do it, I'm a prankster. Carlstadt. If you give it to me, I will truly accept it. Then Doctor Luther reached into his pocket, and pulled out a gold florin, and gave it to Carlstadt, and said: Take it, and attack me only bravely; fresh on me! Carlstadt took the guilder, showed it to all the assessors, and said: "Dear brothers, this is Arrabo, a sign that I have the power to write against Doctor Luther, and I ask you all to confess it to me and be witnesses. Luther. It darfs not. And Carlstadt bent it, and put it into his bag, and gave Doctor Luther his hand on it, and Doctor Luther drank a drink to it, and Carlstadt told him so; and then he said: Doctor, I beg you, you will not prevent me from printing, nor will you otherwise persecute me or hinder my nourishment; for I intend to feed myself with the plow; what the plow will give, you shall well understand. Luther. How would it behoove me to hinder you, if I desired it, that you should resist?
---	---

1) In the Wittenberg and in the Jena: gach----Me"

I will give you the florin so that you will not spare me. And the braver you attack me, the better you shall be to me.

The princely preacher 1) also said to Carlstadt: "The doctor shall not damage your food, nor harm you. Then Carlstadt said to Doctor Luther: "Well then, if I am missing you, it is my pity. And so they shook hands with each other. And Carlstadt went home, and Martinus preached, and after that went to Kahla.

Also present were Doctor Gerhard Westerborg of Cologne, Martinus Reinhard, preacher at Jena, Wolfgang Stein, preacher in the castle at Weimar, who also rode with Doctor Martino Luther, the prior at Wittenberg, Andreas Brenning, 2) mayor at Jena, the town clerk and many others, who also spoke about the matter with many good suggestions, so that the matter would come to light, as God would also arrange it by His grace. These speeches were omitted shortly, and thus the summa of both doctors' speeches is concluded herein. The Christian reader prays to God that He would teach us with the revelation of His truth, amen.

681 Luther's letter to Spalatin, in which he judges these Acta to be unfaithfully written, and lies and truth to be mixed together in them. October 3, 1524.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 234 b; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 552 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. V, p. 32. A part of this letter is in Latin denominated in the Wittenberg and in preceded by the Jena edition.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To his extremely dear [friend] in the Lord, Magister Georg Spalatin, the servant of Christ.

Grace and peace! The booklet of my actions at Jena and Orlamünde pleases me very much in that I see that people who are not honest and have an evil conscience fear for themselves, and by this have wanted to get ahead and anticipate the honor and damage my good name, which the kind of that spirit tends to do. But because this will happen, that Carlstadt must come forth [with writings], and

- 1) Wolfgang Stein, court preacher at Weimar.
- 2) Wittenberg and Jena: Breuning.

this book, in which the truth is so mixed with lies, comes out without a name, one must overcome it with patience and eat it up, so that it does not appear as if I am seeking honor and revenge, and so that I do not come to a quarrel about our own affairs by setting aside the main matter through writing. For to write such books is to teach nothing, to be of no use, but to seek honor and excite the mob, which is really Carlstadt's way. I would have liked to strike out such a book far better, but Christ will finally judge his cause. I must also suffer my Absalom [2 Sam. 18]. Farewell. Monday after Michaelmas [Oct. 3] 1524.

Martin Luther.

682 Luther's letter to Amsdorf, with the same content as the previous one, in which he reports that Carlstadt had addressed a letter to Orlamünde, with a strange signature, and that the preacher Reinhard had received orders to leave Jena.

See Appendix, No. 117.

E. How Luther matured from Jena also to Kahla and Orlamünde, and what repulsions he encountered in both places.

683 Letter from the council and congregation of Orlamünde to Luther, in which they complain that he considers them heretics and false spirits and publicly declares them to be so in his pulpit at Wittenberg; therefore, they blame him for not being a true member of Christ himself and demand that he come to them so that they can give him an account of their faith. Aug. 16, 1524.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 214; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 450b; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 801; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XIX, p. 153; and in the Erlangen edition, vol. 64, p. 398.

To the Christian teacher Martino Luther, our brother in Christ.

1. divine peace through Christ our Lord before. Dear Brother! Our pastor and pastoral caretaker, Andreas Carlstadt, having now been in Wittenberg, has sent us this message.

The author of this book has given us to know, as he experienced and heard there, as if you should shout us out unashamedly on your preaching chair for heretics, erroneous and enthusiastic spirits, when you have not examined our spirits, not investigated them, nor spoken to us about them. And if you would deny this, you are to be referred to your own writings, which we ourselves and well read, when you wrote against the erroneous spirits to the sovereigns of Saxony; since you then despise all those, who by divine command kill dumb idols and pagan images, against which you mock up a powerless, worldly and unstable probation from your own brain, and not founded scripture.

(2) But that you so publicly reproach and blaspheme us, implanted as members of Christ by the Father, unheard and unremitted, shows that you are not a member of this true Christ and Son of God Himself, because you are using impudent words of reproach, and not Christian and brotherly punishment, as laid upon you by Christ, Luke 17:3, against us. If you have now become so unthinking and hot-tempered, we will write to you out of Christian and brotherly love, asking you not to defile and promise God his own, acquired through his only Son Christ, so poorly.

(3) Now thou mightest say, Behold, good Christians, they cannot suffer to be a little offended, which Christ hath done, and hath endured much more. We know this well, dear brother. But do you also know that Christ punished the scribes and supposedly pious Jews most severely and always, and cried woe on them, and prayed to his Father for the unreasonable crucifiers? 2c.

(4) Hereby we offer to confess and give an account of our faith and faithful works by divine power, help and assistance before you and everyone, even where nothing but the form of death appears.

5 We also ask you, after we have held you in such high suspicion, to appear before us in the most beneficial way, if it is convenient for you, to discuss with us, and where we are mistaken (God forbid), to instruct us amicably, and not with words of scorn, and to reprimand us with a ban on land. From this divine unity and Christian community may be established and built up to the special praise of God, ask your brotherly answer. Date Orlamünd, Tuesday after Assumptionis [August 16] Anno 1524.

Council and community of Orlamünd.

684: Luther's action with the council and congregation of the city of Orlamünde concerning Carlstadt, August 24, 1524.

This writing is found in the editions given in the previous number immediately before letter No. 683. It belongs to the so-called Acta Jenensia (above No. 680), and the same applies to it as to that one. Luther says (No. 688, §14) of the same: "They have decorated themselves very finely in the booklet of it.

1. on the mounting of the eighth day of the Assumption [August 22], in the year of the birth of Christ 1524, the princely preacher at Weimar in the castle, Mr. Wolfgang Stein, sent to Orlamünde to the council, and gave them written notice, after they waited for the future Doctor Martinus Luther, that he would be available and to get.

Thus the town clerk of Orlamünd quickly went to Jena. When he found Doctor Martinus, he 1) gave him a letter from the council and the community in Orlamünd, and asked for a favorable answer; which he gave him later in Kahla, in this form: "Messenger, tell your masters in Orlamünd that I want to be with them myself in a short time, and give an oral answer. Therefore, the council and the community hoped that Doctor Martinus would come the next day before St. Bartholomew's Day, and they provided the inn with food and drink as best they could; but he did not come, and returned to the new town. On St. Bartholomew's Day, at one hour of the clock, Doctor Martinus arrived, and the people were in the field waiting for the harvest. Martinus[2] before him to ask for the mayor, who found the mayor and said: After the council and the whole community sought Martin Luther in Jena with a letter, and delivered him there from their side, therefore Doctor Martinus Luther has now come, and the council and the community are to demand him, because he would have to talk to them because of the same letter.

The mayor immediately sent his councilors and the community to search for and demand some of them from the field. Immediately, some of the council went to meet him, as many of them as were present, received him in a friendly and brotherly manner, inclined themselves toward him, and spoke these words:

4. honorable, erudite, favorable doctor, welcome to all of us god. WhAt He

1) Erlanger: and gave.

2) "D. Martinus" is missing in the Erlanger.

I don't really know if he answered, but he kept his red-pointed banner on his head and did not honor her again. Then the mayor wanted to talk further with Doctor Martins; Martinus answered and said: he should soon be up again, but we want to talk to each other in the house. And when he came to the Schoesser's house, the mayor gave him back his former title, thanked him on behalf of the council and the whole community for his efforts, and came to them at their request, asking them for God's sake to preach a sermon.

(5) But Doctor Martinus answered that he had not come to preach, but that he had their letter, and that he would speak of it with the council and the congregation. In the meantime they drank with him for a while; in the meantime the people gathered, and in this the council, and as many of you as were with each other, stood up, talked, and went to him again, and asked the second time for God's sake that he would preach God's word to them, because he considered them suspicious in some articles, which he should give them on the day, and where they strayed, instruct them in Christianity; which they gladly and humbly accepted, and let themselves be instructed.

6 They also wanted to open their minds and their minds. Doctor Martinus shook his head and said: he did not want to do it, he would not have come to them for that reason; but he took the letter of the city of Orlamünde in his hand and asked: whether the city council acknowledged the seal? the city council and the community said yes. Doctor Martinus said: "I consider you to be simple-minded people, and I do not believe that you should have made this letter; I do not want to blame you for the letter, but consider it good; but I am concerned that Carlstadt made the letter and acted under the city's seal.

The city council and the community answered that Carlstadt had not made a letter of this letter, nor had they done anything with their city seal, nor were they able to do anything with it; they wanted to preserve this for life and limb, and for this reason they were too short; for they know how to make other and better provisions than that only men should handle and have to do with their seal. So Doctor Martinus read the council's letter at Orlamünde from beginning to end.

After such reading, Doctor Martinus spoke about each article in particular; and especially when he read: "Our pastor and pastoral caretaker, Andreas Carlstadt," 2c., he said: "You call him your pastor, but my lord, Duke Frederick, and the University of Wittenberg know nothing about it, nor will they confess it to him. To this a treasurer of the council answered: If Carlstadt is not our pastor, then Paul has taught falsely, and your books must also be false; for we have chosen him, as our writing, done to the above-mentioned university, proves and holds. And so it remained with this article.

1) This is the letter reported in No. 683, which in the Wittenberg, Jena and Erlangen editions is only inserted here between § 7 and § 8.

9. conveyer he read thus in the letter: "by divine command, kill dumb idols and pagan images" 2c. And wanting to speak of it, Andreas Carlstadt just came to measure, and some on Doctor Martinus' side beckoned him to sit down; but Carlstadt went to Doctor Martinus and said: Dear Doctor, if you can stand it, I receive you. Then Martinus said, "No, I can't stand it. Then said Carlstadt: It is the same so much. And turning from Martins, Martinus said, You are my enemy, and I have given you a florin on it. Said Carlstadt: I will remain your enemy, and of all those who are against God, as long as you are against truth and God. Answered Doctor Martinus Luther: "Doctor, you want to go out, I do not want you in this matter. Said Carlstadt: But this is a public audience; if you act rightly, you must not shy away from me. Said Doctor Martinus: You are suspicious of me and my enemy. Said Carlstadt: Even if I were suspicious, I am not your judge; but your enemy would like to stand and listen to you.

10th Thereupon the princely preacher of Weimar, Mr. Wolfgang Stein, started and spoke to Carlstadt: Doctor, you have obtained your farewell in Jena, therefore you may well go out. Carlstadt answered: "You are not my prince, that you have to command me; but if he has a princely command, he would like to present it. But since Carlstadt wanted to listen and see, and not go out, Martinus said to his servant, "Tighten up, tighten up! I have nothing to do with Carlstadt; if he does not want to go out, then I will go; and he got up. But so that the discussion that had begun would not be prevented, Carlstadt escaped and went away.

When Carlstadt now escaped, D. Luther took out the council's letter again, apologized, said that he had never thought of the Orlamündischen in the pulpit or in his letter; they had to send more to Wittenberg, than that they would be thought of. Thereupon the town clerk says to Martin Luther: "You have written, which can be proven from your own writings, that you have also conscripted us Orlamündians with the enthusiasts and floating spirits and meant, as if we should also, as happened in Allstädt, act and act in such a way, because we have also removed the images, and freely confess this. To this Martin Luther replied: "I have spoken in general, and there are still more cities that have done so; if I have hit you, what can I do about it? On the other hand Obgemeldter said: "But you have met us with falsehood, that you compare us to the spirits of the dark ones.

12 After this Martin Luther said further: You have written me an enemy letter; you do not give me my title, which some princes and lords, who are my enemies, give me, and do not break it off; therefore I accept your letter as an enemy letter. On the top of the letter you call me a Christian teacher, and inside you condemn me. The mayor said: "We have written to you as brothers, and have secretly spoken between you and us, and have not condemned you. Says Martinus: Brotherly? I cannot understand that in this letter of yours, for I consider it an enemy letter. Said one of the congregation: For what cause is it an enemy letter? Martin Luther said, "If I did not know that you are fanatics, I know it now; for you are all burning before my eyes as a fire; surely you will not eat me up? And immediately he began and said:

(13) Where do you prove in the Scriptures that images are to be removed? Said one of the council: "Doctor, kind brother, you allow me to say that Moses is an interpreter of the ten commandments? Said Martinus, "Yes." He continued, "Thus it is written in the ten words: Thou shalt not have strange gods; and immediately in the interpretation of Moses follows: Thou shalt put away all images, and have none. Said Martinus: Yes, this is what is said about idolatrous images; these are idolatrous ones that are worshipped. What harm is a crucifix on the wall that I do not worship? Said a cobbler: I have often taken off my hat before a picture on the wall or on the way, that is idolatry and dishonor to God, and great harm to poor people, therefore one should not have pictures.

14, Martinus said, "Then you must also kill the women and spill the wine because of the abuse. Answered another from of the community: No, these are creatures of God, created for our help and abstinence and need, which he has not commanded us to kill; but the images that men's hands have made, these are commanded to be destroyed. But Doctor Martinus held fast to the word "idolatrous images," and the cobbler said again, "Yes, I would let you have it, if all images were not forbidden in Moses. Martin Luther said, "It is not written in the Scriptures. Said the cobbler, Let it be what thou wilt, it is written therein: and they joined their hands together, and wagered. Said the cobbler, What is this that God saith, I will have my bride naked, and will not let her put on her shirt? Then Martinus sank down, stroked his hand over his face, considered himself, and said, "Listen, this means to remove images; how strange German is this!

15 Another one spoke: Yes, it is true, and so much has been said, that God wants the soul of all creatures to be naked, that is, bare and unclothed, and as soon as I lust after a permitted creature, the soul is deformed; how much more is the soul covered and entangled when it ventilates itself with forbidden images. One of them brought the Book of Moses, and Martino was read the text, which reads [Deut. 4, 15-19.]: "Take heed therefore unto your souls: for ye saw no likeness of the day that the Lord spake unto you out of the fire of Horeb; Lest ye corrupt yourselves, and make unto yourselves any graven image, like unto a man, or like unto a woman, or like unto cattle upon the earth, or like unto fowls of the air, or like unto creeping things upon the earth, or like unto fishes of the waters under the earth; lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and behold the sun, and the moon, and the stars, all the host of heaven, and be cast out, and worship them, and serve them, whom the LORD thy God hath appointed unto all people under the whole heaven."

16 From this it follows publicly that not only idolatrous images, but all images are forbidden; indeed, that Christians should neither make nor have any images. To this Martinus said: it is written: you shall not worship any; therefore God would have meant the idolatrous ones. Then one of the community said: It is not written "idolatrous", but, you shall not make or have any. Worship is a special evil, which God also specially forbids. Said Martinus: read on; and he read: Thou shalt not lift up thine eyes unto heaven, to worship the star, the sun, and the moon. Doctor Martinus asked and said, "Why do you not remove them? Then answered the cobbler: Stars from heaven are not made by our hands, therefore God does not give the stars in our power to remove; neither has God commanded us to remove them as images; therefore we should not do it.

17 Then Martinus spoke, saying again about idolatrous images. Said the mayor: "Hear, dear sirs, hear! There was a great silence. Then he continued: "Dear sirs, listen: We keep strictly to the word of God, for it is written: You shall neither add to it nor take from it. Then the prince preacher said: "Dear old man, be silent. Said Martin again: You have condemned me. Answered the cobbler: If you ever want to be damned, I hold you and every one damned, as long as he speaks or reads against God and God's truth. Said Martinus: The children would have told me this in the street. And with that he arose and hastened to the chariot.

(18) When the chamberlain saw this, he said, "My dear doctor, tell us about the articles of the sacrament and of baptism. Then Martin Luther turned back and said: I have written enough of them, read my books. He answered again, "I have read them in part, but I am not satisfied enough in my conscience. Martin Luther answered: "If you have something wrong with it, write against me. Next to him was the prior of Wittenberg, who said to the chamberlain, "What harm do the images do? Answered the chamberlain: Much. The prior: You should know and understand a lot about it. The chamberlain: I have forgotten more than you have learned; let them sit down, and I will tell you about the harm of the images. But they all hurried to the chariot, and so departed.

May God's truth help us to salvation and comfort, amen. I do not care about this division at all, because I want to keep to God's truth and not pay attention to what man says.

685 Mathesius' account from Luther's mouth of how Luther traveled to Kahla, preached a sermon there, and what special things he encountered during this sermon.

This story is found in "Luthers Leben" by Joh. Mathesius, St. Louis edition, p. 67. Walch has Luthern travel from Orlamünde to Kahla, while it is the other way around. The sermon at Kahla will be held on August 23, 1524.

I heard from the doctor himself that he was supposed to preach a sermon in Kahla at that time; as everything was ordered, these spirits broke a crucifix and strewed it on the preaching chair; When Doctor Luther finds this, he is moved at first, but he stands up and pushes the pieces into one place, and preaches a doctrinal sermon and faithful warning that one should keep faith and a good conscience in all submission, and does not remember with a word the sacrilegious will of courage that they had shown him. For one can also do to the devil with contempt at the appropriate time the burned suffering.

F. How Carlstadt finally had to vacate the land by order of the Elector and Duke John, against which the intercession of Orlamünde did not help.

Luther's report to Spalatin that Carlstadt, after his departure, had written two letters to Orlamünde, one to the men, the other to the women; the people were called together by the bells for the reading of these letters.

See Appendix, No. 118.

G. How Carlstadt went from here to Strasbourg and further to Basel, and Luther, when he warned the Strasbourgers against Carlstadt, began to blaspheme publicly through writings, also vehemently denied the true presence of Christ in Holy Communion.

687 Luther's letter to Gerbel in Strasbourg to comfort him and others about the Carlstadt tragedy. October 22, 1524.

This letter is found in Latin in Aurifaber, vol. II, p.235; in De Wette, vol. II, p.555 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol.V, p.37.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in Christ! How can we be surprised, my dear Gerbel, that under the prince, yes, the god of this world, the ge-

We know that the one who does not lie does not in vain attribute so much to Satan that he calls him prince and god, not of one people but of the whole world, because he wants us to be warned. This is not to be wondered at, rather, if under such a great tyranny only a few remnants can remain who stand right [in doctrine] and become blessed, so that the wonderful work of the true God may shine forth all the more gloriously. Therefore, Carlstadt does right that he, who has long since been handed over to Satan, finally reveals the secrets of his God. Nothing has driven man to this but the untamed desire for vain glory, so often prevented by Christ, from which this heart burns inextinguishably. Therefore, according to Paul's teaching [Phil. 4, 4-6.], it behooves us to be sure not to worry about anything, since we know that the Lord is near, only that we make our requests known before God with thanksgiving. For we will not fight or win the more happily the more we are anxious or worried, nor will we fall the more unhappily if we are cheerful and confident. Let us leave the sadness together with the anxious worry to the spirit of Carlstadt. We want to take this fight upon ourselves, as if we had something else to accomplish; the cause is God's, the worry is God's, the work is God's, the victory is God's, the honor is God's; he will fight and win without us. Now if he will keep us worthy to be his weapons, let us be ready and willing. This I write to exhort you and through you others, that you fear not Satan, and that your hearts be not troubled [John 14:27]. If we are unjust, what is more just than that we should be oppressed? But if we are righteous, God is righteous, who will bring forth our righteousness as the noonday [Ps. 37:6]. Therefore, let fall what falls, let stand what stands: it is not our cause, since we do not seek what is ours. Farewell, my dear Gerbel, and pray for me. Wittenberg, Saturday after Lucas [Oct. 22] 1524.

Martin Luther.

688. D. Martin Luther's letter of warning to the Christians of Strasbourg to beware of Carlstadt's ravings. Dec. 145, 1524

This letter was first published in 1524 by Joseph Klug in Wittenberg in a single edition under the title: "Eyn brieff an die Christen Zu Straspurg Widder den schwermer gehst. Martini Luther. sUnder the title border:] The LORD knoweth the way of the righteous, but the way of the wicked shall be turned aside. Psal. 1. Wittenberg." 6 leaves quarto. In the Erlangen correspondence, four other individual editions are noted that belong to the year 1525, including one from Strasbourg. In the collections: in the Wittenberg (1551), vol. II, Bl. 66K; in the Jena (1556), vol. III, Bl. III; in the Altenburg, vol. III, p. 104; in the Leipziger, vol. XIX, p. 225; in the Erlanger, vol. 53, p. 270 and in De Wette, vol. II, p. 574. Vincentius Obsopöus translated this letter into Latin; this translation is found in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 247b and in the Wittenberger (1558), tom. VII, col. 501 d. The date of the letter is derived from Luther's letter to Spalatin of 14 Dec. 1524, De Wette, vol. II, p. 573.

Martinus Luther, unworthy Ecclesiast and Evangelist at Wittenberg, the dearest friends of God, all Christians at Strasbourg.

The Lord knows the way of the righteous, but the way of the wicked shall perish. Ps. 1, 6.

Grace and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. Dearest lords and brothers! I am hitherto highly pleased and thank God, the Father of all mercies, for the abundant grace He has bestowed upon you, calling you to His marvelous light and bringing you into the fellowship of all the riches of His Son JEsu Christ, so that you may now, through His salvific Word, recognize and call with a joyful heart the true Father, who redeemed us from the dreadful darkness of the end of Christ, and led us out of the iron furnace of Egypt [5 Mos. 4, 20], of sins and death, into the wide, safe, free, right promised land.

2 Therefore see to it that you remember behind you what you have been, and that you are not found ungrateful for such great grace and mercy, as some already do, and arouse God's anger again, but remain, practice, and increase in the same knowledge and grace of Jesus Christ. For this is the right way to salvation, which you cannot lack. And see to it that you have one thing in common.

Keep your minds firm, and show brotherly love in deed toward one another, that your faith may bear witness that it is not false, slothful, or idle, and that the enemy, having been cast out, will not return and find the house idle and beautiful, and invade it with seven evil spirits, that the last may be worse than the first [Luc. 14:26].

But whether you are blasphemed or persecuted, blessed are you [Matth. 5, 12.]; if they have called the father of the house Beelzebub, how 1) much more his household! The servant shall not fare better than his master [Matth. 10, 24. 25.]. And what harm can it do, if poor men, who pass away like smoke [Ps. 37:20], blaspheme you, if you are sure that so many thousand times a thousand angels in heaven and God Himself rejoice over you, and praise and glorify you with all creatures? How all this your faith and good conscience feels in the Holy Spirit and gives you testimony, where you believe otherwise and have Christ truly living and reigning in you. For such sufferings only improve and promote our blessedness.

4) But these are dangerous things, where discord, sectarianism and error arise among Christians, which 2) distort and mislead such comforting knowledge and consciences, and secretly tear them away from grace in the Spirit into outward things and works, as the false apostles did, and afterward many a heretic, and finally the pope. Here it is highly necessary to watch. For if our gospel is the true gospel, as I have no doubt and am sure it is, it must also be challenged, tried and proved on both sides: on the left, by the outward reproach and hatred of the unrighteous; on the right, by our own division and discord, as St. Paul says [1 Cor. 11:19]: "There must be heresies, that they which are righteous may be made manifest among you. Christ must not only have Caipham among his enemies, but also Judas among his friends.

1) De Wette and the Erlanger: "or" instead of: like.

2) This is the reading of the Jena edition and Walch. In the Wittenberg and in De Wette incomprehensible: "Thus such comforting knowledge dislocates and misleads the conscience" 2c. In the Latin translation: per 6Uri8ti eognitio in simplieum eouseientüs variis involvitur erroribus.

(5) Knowing this, we should be armed and prepared, as those who must surely be provided for every hour of both offences, and not be surprised or frightened at all if there is discord among us, but think freshly that it must and will be so, and ask God to be with us and to keep us on the right path. For, as Moses says [Deut. 8:2, 13:3], God tries us whether we cling to Him with all our heart or not.

6 I say this because I have experienced how new prophets arise at some ends, and how some of you have written to me that Doctor Carlstadt is causing a ruckus among you with his raving about the sacrament, images and baptism, as he has also done elsewhere, and scolds me as if I had driven him out of the country. 3)

Now, my dearest friends, I am not your preacher, no one owes me to believe; each one looks to himself. I may warn everyone, but I can defend no one. I also hope that so far you have recognized me in my writings, that I have acted so truthfully and confidently on the gospel, the grace of Christ, the law, faith, love, the cross, the laws of man, what to think of the pope, the monastic state and the mass, and all the main things that are necessary for a Christian to know, that I am found blameless in them, and indeed cannot deny that I have been an unworthy witness of God, through whom he has helped many souls.

8. which piece has never wanted to make any right D. Carlstadt, nor can, as I now see from his letter, that I am truly not meant, and am immediately startled that the man still lies so low. And when I look at his thing, he falls out on the external things with such impetuosity, as if the whole power of a Christian being lay in the storming of images, overthrowing the sacrament and preventing baptism, and would like to darken with such smoke and steam the whole sun and light of the Gospel and the main pieces of Christian being, so that the world should forget everything that has been taught by us so far. And

3) In the signature of his letter to the Orlamünder. Cf. Appendix, No. 118.

But he does not distinguish himself by raising his voice, which is a truly Christian being. For to storm images, to deny the sacrament, to punish baptism, is a bad art, which even a knave can do, and never makes a Christian. Therefore, this is a crude devil who has little regard for me.

(9) Now therefore my faithful counsel and warning is, that ye take heed, and stand upon the one question, what is it that maketh a man a Christian, and by no means allow any other question or art to be equal unto it. If anyone brings up anything, look at it and say, "Dear man, does the same thing make one a Christian or not? If not, let it not be the main thing, nor fall out of it with all seriousness. But if anyone is too weak to do this, let him take his time and wait until he sees what we or others have to say about it. I have ever, praise God, done it right and well so far in the main parts, and whoever says otherwise must not be a good spirit; I hope I will not spoil it even in the outer parts, where such prophets alone insist.

I confess that if D. Carlstadt or someone else had told me five years ago that there was nothing but bread and wine in the sacrament, they would have done me a great service. I suffered such a hard challenge there, and struggled and squirmed, that I would have liked to be out, because I saw that I could have given the papacy the biggest puff with it. I have also had two who have written more skillfully to me about it, 1) than D. Carlstadt, and not so martyred the words according to their own conceit. But I am trapped, cannot get out: the text is too powerful there, and does not want to be torn out of my mind with words.

(11) Yes, if it should happen this very day that someone should prove with solid reason that there is bad bread and wine, I should not be touched so with anger. Unfortunately, I am all too inclined to do so, as much as I feel my Adam. But as D. Carlstadt says

I am so unconcerned about the fact that my opinion is only strengthened by it. And if I had not believed it before, I would first of all believe, through such loose, lame antics, without any Scripture, based solely on reason and conceit, that his opinion must be nothing, as I hope everyone will see when I now answer. I also hardly believe that he is serious, or God must have hardened and blinded him. For if it were serious, he would not mix in such ridiculous bits and pieces, and therefore juggle from Greek and Hebrew language, 2) which he has not forgotten much, as is well known.

I could easily bear his raging with the storming of images, because I too have broken off the images more with my writing than he will always do with his storming and raving. But the fact that Christians are urged and driven on to such work, as if they had to do it or were not Christians and wanted to capture Christian freedom with law and conscience, that is not to be suffered at all. For we know that no work makes a Christian, and such outward things as images and the Sabbath are free in the New Testament, as are all other ceremonies of the law. Paul says 1 Cor. 8:4: "We know that an idol is nothing in the world." If it is nothing, why should Christians' consciences be captured and tortured for nothing? If it is nothing, let it be nothing, let it fall or stand, as he also speaks of circumcision; but of this further in the answer. 3)

13) I would like to suffer that he scolds me for having driven him away, if it were true, and I would also answer for it, God willing; but I am glad that he is out of our country; I also wish that he were not with you, and that he himself could have been advised to refrain from such a complaint. For I am afraid that my excuse 4) will accuse him quite severely. Beware of the false spirit, whoever can; that is my advice, there is nothing good behind it.

14. he could have taken me to Jena himself, for cause.

2) In his "Dialogus," Walch, St. Louiser Ausg." Vol. XX, 2312 ff

3) This "answer" refers to Luther's writing "against the heavenly prophets. Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 132.

4) Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, 157 ff.

1) These "two" are Cornelis Hendricks Hoen in Haag and Franz Kolb, preacher in Wertheim. The letters are found in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 412 and vol. I V, p. 378. The second one beside Hoen is not Rodius, as Köstlin, Mart. Luther (3), Vol. I, p. 701 assumes.

1) that I would not have mixed his spirit with the all-city, rebellious, murderous spirit. But when I came to Orlamünde among his Christians by princely command, I found what seeds he had sown there, so that I was glad that I was not thrown out with stones and dirt, since some of them gave me such a blessing: Go in a thousand devils' names, that you may break your neck before you get out of the city! Although they have adorned themselves very finely in the booklet, from which they went out. 2) If the donkey had horns, that is, if I were prince of Saxony, D. Carlstadt should not have been expelled, unless I had been begged; only let him not spurn the kindness of the princes.

(15) But, dear friends, I pray that you may be wiser than we, if we become fools, and write of our doings. I am well aware that the devil seeks only cause to write and read about us men, however pious or wicked we may be, so that the main things of Christ may be kept silent and people's mouths may be opened with new newspapers. Let each one look at the straight path, what law, gospel, faith, Christ's kingdom, Christian salvation, love, patience, human law and the like are; we have enough to learn from them forever. Even if you do not break the law, you do not sin; even if you do not go to the sacrament, you can still be saved through the word and faith. The devil's only concern is to turn our eyes away from our Lucerne in this annual night, and lead us out of the way with his flying fires and lights.

16. and ask your evangelists, my dear lords and brothers, to point you away from Luther and Carlstadt and always to Christ; not, like Carlstadt, to the works of Christ alone, as Christ is an example, which is the least part of Christ, in which he is like other saints, but as he is a gift of God, or, as Paul says [1 Cor. 1, 30.], God's power, wisdom, righteousness, redemption, sanctification, given to us; which ver-

1) "of a writing," namely Carlstadt's letter to Thomas Münzer of July 19, 1524. See Col. 2031.

2) In the Acta Jenensia, above Ro. 680 and Ro. 684.

These prophets have never felt, tasted, nor learned, and therefore, with their lively voice, they are boasting from heaven, with the degradation, sprinkling, killing, and such pompous words, which they themselves have never understood, and thus only make erroneous, restless, heavy consciences, so that one should marvel at their great art, and in the meantime forget Christ.

(17) Pray, brethren, that God the Father will not leave us to fall into temptation, but, according to His causeless mercy, will strengthen us, keep us, and accomplish His work begun in us, as we are comfortingly exhorted to pray through Christ our Savior. What an advantage we have over the prophets. For I know and am certain that they have never asked God the Father for their cause, nor do they have so much of a good conscience that they could ask him for a blessed outcome, but as they have begun out of their own presumption, so they also rage out thunderously for vain glory, until their end, the disgrace, is found. God's grace be with you all, amen.

689. the Strasbourg letters and reports to Luther about Carlstadt. November 1524.

These two letters are found, from Spalatin's copy, in Kapp, "Kleine Nachlese nützlicher Reformationen - Urkunden", Vol. II, p. 641 and p. 644 and afterwards in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. V, p. 56 and p. 59. Both letters were carried to Luther by the same messenger. Luther received them on December 14 and wrote the "Letter to the Christians of Strasbourg" already on the following day.

Translated into German.

a. Letter of the Strasbourg jurist Gerbel to Luther, from Carlstadt's nobles against the Lord's Supper and baptism. November 22, 1524.

To the faithful witness of Christ and right angel of peace, Martin Luther, his patron, wishes

1. n. Gerbel Hail in Christ JEsu! Let it not grieve you, my dearest Luther, to give me, who love you so dearly, a little of your time in a matter that is so necessary and will serve your purpose so well. The cunning Satan, who has so far transformed himself among us into all shapes, into all monsters, and so

He has thrown around many threats, orders, torture, crosses and death, but he has seen that he has achieved nothing with them: listen now. Rather, with what cunning, with what treachery he tries to tear the minds of the weak away from the love of truth. For since most of our people gladly heard the servants of the Word and were a little in limbo between the old slobber and the new must, behold, now that roots were taking root everywhere and a few tender little trees were sprouting, Carlstadt, driven by I don't know what furies and what brakes, secretly came to our city. And he did not visit any of those who teach the gospel here, but first slandered terribly against you in the corners: you would have been the cause of his expulsion, then, he would not have been heard nor warned, and thus, by your counsel, by your deceit, you would have been expelled from the whole world; and since you could not have won by writings, you would have won only by force and by the prince's power and finally obtained the victory.

This and the like he has only brought out in a few who like to hear something new and seek their own honor, and has easily drawn them to his opinion, partly through the unfairness of the proceedings against him, partly through pity over his misery, over the pregnant wife, and the child wandering around in misery with her. For he does this everywhere fiercely, with great spite.

Then, if I am not mistaken, he goes to Basel, publishes his writings and sends them out in several armies. First, of course, with us, so that they would be spread quite widely before they came to you, and you, as I assume, would not be able to resist them at times. You should not think how both parts clamor in various ways. The papists take this as an opportunity for all kinds of quarrels. And never has a Faber, Eck, or Emser harmed your leadership as much as this few Carlstadt, since up to now it has been said of all of you that you otherwise did everything together, did everything together, yes, did the whole main thing together. In the meantime, however, those who have begun to grow in Christ are wavering and hovering doubtfully in the middle, not knowing whom they should follow, you or him, since they believed before that 1) one confesses the same doctrine as the other. They shout from both sides: there are only two sacraments left; what kind they are will also be put in doubt at the end. I have already cried out against this several times: Listen,

1) Walch: Instead of xrokssionsm, read prok "88or "m.

Dear people, first hear what Luther will answer. Do not, I say, let yourselves be moved from your post and place by such a light wind and start. You know that the 7-ovT-o, 7-0V7-O, 7-avT-J, 7-avT-H (sic) is a dispute about words, which was only devised by Satan to drive us away from the matter itself, namely faith and love, to a futile dispute about words.

That is why our people write to you with such great concern for the herd that is entrusted to them. Behold, you would have the best opportunity to write to the Strasbourg people, especially to the evangelists; not briefly, but rather in detail and emphatically, so that you may send healing medicine where that Cerberus first spat out his poison. Dear one, help the weak! Dampen the pride of the nonsensical spirit, which, since it has no other door through which it can sneak in, now primarily finds these nooks and crannies, which are the most harmful thing the human heart could have conceived. For these [namely, the sacraments] are the signs by which we, according to our weakness, can grasp the epitome of divine goodness and grace.

This, however, you will know how to handle far better and more gloriously according to your great intellect and according to God's unspeakable grace toward you. The rest you will hear through Mr. Nicolaus, 2) whom we are sending to you for this purpose. Farewell, and stay well with me. Give my regards to Philip. The brothers, especially my dear Hedio, then my wife and the whole family greet you. Strasbourg, Nov. 22, 1524. 3) Farewell, Apostle of God. Gerbel.

To the dearest man, D. Martin Luther, the afflicted apostle of Germany, his brother beloved in Christ.

b. The Strasbourg Protestant preachers Capito, Zell, Hedio, Althießer, Schwarz, Firn and Burcer letter to Luther. November 23, 1524. 4)

M. Luther, the apostle of Germany, our beloved and venerable father, [offer

2) Diaconus of Matthew Zell.

3) These words appear in Kapp immediately before § 1.- We have taken the following inscription from Walch.

4) The author of this letter is Martin Bucer, then preacher at St. Aurelien. This is evident from the fact that some passages of this letter literally correspond to his writing: "Grund und Ursach aus göttlicher Schrift der Neuerungen" 2c. Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, 352.

their greeting] the brothers at Strasbourg, the servants of the church, W. Capito, Matthäus Zelt, C.Hedio, Symphorianus, 1) Theobaldus, Antonius, M. Bucer 2c. Strasbourg, November 23, 1524.

May grace and peace from God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ be multiplied among you. Dearest Father! As we have been taught by God and so often reminded by you, we strive, according to the measure of grace given to us, to prevent ourselves from teaching or raising anything in the Church of Christ of which we do not have certain proof in hand from the Scriptures, although we, together with you, have hitherto tolerated, both with regard to infant baptism and the Lord's Supper, a number of things which, although they have been brought into the way without reason from Scripture, are not at all inconsistent with the fact that a godly man could not make good use of them. With such tolerance, however, we also had the hope that soon afterward everything would improve in the way given by the rule of Scripture, when our people would have received the gospel of Christ more completely. In the meantime, while we are quite diligent, according to our thoughts, that both in private and in public everything is done according to the precepts of the Word of God, seven of Carlstadt's 2) writings are coming out, as it were, in one go, but we have not yet been able to see them all.

(2) But those whom we have seen dispute that in the holy supper there is the mere bread and wine, and not the body and blood of Christ. We send them to you with our brother, whom we have sent to you for this reason at our expense. The writings that came to us were published in Basel, but secretly, and there they were immediately taken away from the accountants at the mayor's behest; nevertheless, as many are curious, they are eagerly read by the citizens everywhere, and many are pleased with them. We, who hold to the context of the whole speech: "This is my body" 2c., preach so far 3) with you, that the

1) Symphorian Althießer (also Altbießer) or Pollio, called "Herr Zhmprich" by the common man, pastor of St. Martin. - Theobald Nigri, Diebold Schwarz from Hagenau, helper of Matthäus Zell. - Antonius Firn from Hagenau, preacher at St. Thomas.

2) "seven" writings: namely one that he had already published in Strasbourg and six others in Basel. See the introduction to the 20th volume of the St. Louis edition, p. 21 d.

3) Instead of dnjnsHne we have assumed liouou^us.

Bread is the body of the Lord, and wine his blood, although we exhort the people most to the remembrance of the death of Christ, and reproach them that this is the proper use of the Lord's Supper, but that the other does nothing for salvation, since the flesh is of no use, even if the whole Christ were already there, as he hung on the cross, and in the same form. Now we confess that Carlstadt has not yet persuaded us of his opinion, but nevertheless, since he has thrown apart the context of the words on which we alone relied, he has made us waver a little. For although he interferes not a little with his cricket catching, he also brings forward some things that are probable to many others besides us, although they have not yet completely convinced us.

3) Such is about this: First, the words of Christ are, "This is my body, which shall be given for you." And it is certain that only the one and true body of Christ is crucified for us. So the word "this" must be referred to this very one, not to the bread eaten by the apostles and never sacrificed for us. 4) And it is nothing new in Scripture that the demonstrative is referred to something other than the context gives. As can be seen, among others, in the saying: You are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church [Matth. 16, 18; since "this" does not refer to the "rock", as the context would have it, but to "Christ", as the true understanding demands.

4.⁵) Then, since Christ commanded nothing else to eat and drink in remembrance of him, but bread and wine, and not to make of them his body and blood, as he commanded to preach, to baptize, to heal the sick 2c., and since the flesh is of no use, and the bread and wine alone are sufficient for the sacrament, as the water in baptism; Since the true miracles were only performed to confirm the word, there is no reason why it should be said that the body of Christ is in the bread and the blood in the wine, especially since Scripture does not have such expressions, and we also see that so many errors and superstitions have arisen from them, and that it has been to the great annoyance of unbelievers that they have everywhere said that the body of Christ is in the bread and the blood in the wine.

4) These thoughts are expressed in Carlstadt's "Dialogus". Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 2325 f.

5) The thoughts expressed in this § are from Carlstadt's "Dialogus," Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, 2350 and 2351.

have: Behold, here and there is Christ, and is eaten. Finally, Paul does not call the bread and the cup the body and blood of Christ, and this bread and this cup were never held in such high esteem by the ancients as they are by us.

(5) What he concludes otherwise, 1) as that τοῦτο is a neuter, but x xxxxx a masculine; and that τοῦτο is written with large letters in Lucas; and that in Marcus [Cap. 14, 23/]: "They all drank from it," 2) precedes the words: "This is my blood," makes no great impression on us. But it, together with what we have mentioned above, finds such acceptance with many that they completely agree with Carlstadt. Others are doubtful and ask us for advice. To these we answer: The bread and the cup are external things, and although the bread is the body of Christ and the wine His blood, it does not help us, because the flesh is of no use at all [John 6:63]; but the remembrance of the death of the Lord is the only thing that brings us salvation, for which purpose alone such bread must be eaten and the cup drunk, therefore a Christian has more to consider for what purpose he eats and drinks, than what is that which he eats and drinks. And so, as much as we can, we draw the minds of our people away from this dispute.

Some, however, we cannot satisfy with this; they urge us to say: 3) what we believe such bread and wine to be. In fact, we cannot yet say anything certain to them out of complete conviction, and therefore we continue to draw them away from this question. We have therefore agreed with each other to write to you about this through our own messenger and most beloved brother, the deacon of our colleague Matthew Zell, who has planted here, and to send along the aforementioned writings, kindly asking that you not disregard this matter. For one can hardly believe how the minds of many people are troubled by it. Nor is it a small rejoicing of the adversaries that Carlstadt so cruelly sets upon you, who otherwise has been your faithful fellow helper in the Gospel, and now lays out such a great cruelty to you. We give him, in whom we also have many other things to criticize, which are does not send an evangelical man, by no means faith. He knew well that we and the Basel brethren were in good agreement with you, and yet he did not want to speak to them or to us and teach us anything better, but wanted to remain hidden from us both there and here.

Therefore we ask you for the sake of Christ, who has abundantly given you his Spirit, to control this evil, for it is spreading beyond measure, and, since it is easy for you to strengthen your brethren, for example, by writing, and to deprive the enemies of the opportunity to rejoice over such evil, until you teach in right books what one must believe in this according to the Scriptures, and what we can safely assert according to the indisputable word of God, even against Satan. As many as are practiced in the Scriptures only at Zurich, Basel and here, as well as others more, are quite inclined to Carlstadt's opinion, although everyone regrets and detests that you are thus belittled and blasphemed by him. There are also some who think that man learned it from you and yours, since he was still present at your free discussions, but few agree with them.

8 They also say that he does not agree with you about baptism, because he does not want to have children baptized, which is what you teach and what we still hold with you. In this dispute we also console ourselves with the fact that baptism is an external thing. Therefore, although it might be better, according to the usage of the early church and also according to the Scriptures, which want those who have been taught about Christ to be baptized, that only adults be baptized, because they have been taught godliness, and then confess Christ through baptism, and the false trust in water baptism be taken away, in which many today are also ignorant, doubting the blessedness of the unbaptized: we would gladly concede to the common consent and unity to baptize the children, if only, since the vows of the godparents are found ridiculous, a certain time would be set aside to teach the children, if they can now grasp the doctrine of Christ, who, as far as we could know, did not yet understand anything about it when only they were baptized.

(9) Furthermore, it is also very repugnant to us that we see that the wicked therefore take occasion to mock us and to blaspheme the doctrine of Christ, that since we have received only two ceremonies from Christ, we have not kept them uniform, since where the Word of God is preached, the same also prevails over all the laws and ordinances of men.

1) These points are taken from Carlstadt's "Dialogus," Walch, St. Louis ed. vol. XX, 2324 f. and 2327 f.

2) Here Kapp improperly inserted the words that are repeated later: uonuullos tsust, r'ui sidi puletrrs Okristiani viasntur, omr'ua xrsstsr äoivLiaulL äisui adotsmus.

3) Instead of äieirus, "Hoamus will be read.

The Holy Communion is celebrated differently by you, by the people of Nuremberg. You celebrate Holy Communion differently, the people of Nuremberg differently, we differently, those in Nördlingen, our neighbors, differently, which, of course, many interpret as proof of inconsistency and uncertainty, even those who do not want to be regarded as carnal people. 1)

(10) We have long since prayed and taught in the church in our own language, so that our prophecy may edify, and the whole congregation may say Amen to our prayer, after the Latin language has been abolished, by which the Romans first kept us in the bondage of the bodies, and then also of the souls, for only too long, by which we finally received many unclean things, and nothing holy, which did not come from the Hebrew or Greek, and in that [language] has almost always been corrupted and polluted.

(11) We have the use of baptism almost exactly as you have described it in the booklet which you translated from Latin on this matter, 2) except that we gradually leave out the Chrism, the salt and the lights, which almost no one likes anymore. For we fear that a false confidence is immediately placed in everything that is done in the church contrary to the commandment of Scripture. And it is shameful to boast of the Scriptures, which abundantly teach all that is good, and yet not be able to prove thoroughly from them all that one does or undertakes. For if we reproach others for weakness, many reproach us for ours, that we doubt that the Lord will give the voice of power to his word. There are also many here who have not yet fallen in with the word, so that it is to be feared that they will never join it; so foolishly and foolishly do they resist it.

12) We still celebrate Holy Communion in the ordinary vestments of the vestments of the Mass; we also raise the bread and the cup of the Lord, after reciting the words of Christ. Since this is a use of the sacrificers, I would very much like it to be abolished. For we also do not like to use the garments. For what do Christians have in common with the papists? As for the rest, we have reason from Scripture, namely, that we first confess our and the people's sins to the Lord, and then the church sings a psalm in our courage.

The priest also sings the "Kyrie Eleison", "Glory to God in the highest". Then the priest offers a common prayer to God and reads a short lection to the people from the apostolic epistles. When this is finished, and the church has again sung either a psalm or the Ten Commandments, he ascends the pulpit and preaches on the Gospels for about an hour. Thereupon the congregation makes its profession of faith: "I believe in One God. After this song, he exhorts the people with a few words to sacrifice themselves to the Lord and to offer the farren of his lips, whereupon he immediately adds the so-called preface, and first the hymn of praise: "Holy", but then the common prayer for the authorities and the whole 3) church to God. This is followed by the words of the evangelists about the Lord's Supper, which he recites, and then, as has been customary up to now, he shows the bread and the cup to the people and prays again. In this prayer he recently explains for what purpose we are to celebrate the commemoration of the death of the Lord; then the priest prays the Lord's Prayer. After that, "Lamb of God." And then he takes the bread and the cup of the Lord, and gives it to those who wish to receive it with one another, after they have been carefully told about the Sacrament beforehand. Then the whole church sings: "Praise be to God", and the whole service is concluded with a very short prayer, and the congregation is dismissed with the blessing.

(13) This is the only custom we publicly observe at Holy Communion, which we celebrate only on Sundays, and which at first was observed in different ways by the brethren in different churches. But when we saw that many were offended by it, we became united about this custom, and lived in the hope that soon afterward the neighboring churches, and those at Zurich, and those who adhere to them, would also agree with us about a completely pure usage, and become one with the Scriptures, so that we could also stand against Satan, and among us, who preach the same Christ, who have one heart and one soul, and who are to walk in the same footsteps, everything would be uniform. We know, of course, that this will not be both graceful and decent, but useful and salutary. We also see and have experienced that everything we undertake on the good ground of Scripture and firm faith is finely accomplished by Christ's power. We also become aware that the cause of our hesitation is the power of Christ.

1) stiaiu hui kũöi noluut viästri uniroalss. Walch translates: "even those who still hold something on their souls". This passage will probably remain an orux iutxrxstuaa.

2) "Das Taufbüchlein verdeutscht," 1523. Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. X, 2139.

3) Instead of tot, read tota.

derns 1) is not seldom the fear of man, and that the 2) abominable [that is, who does not despise ungodly enough in our eyes, more than the consideration for the weak, which comes from love.

14 We give the Lord's Supper to the sick while they are still in their homes, and have had the council ask us to be at their beck and call for a time, if some have not yet been brought to agree with us and persistently desire to be communicated with according to the old custom, and have first been carefully reminded; but few have yet asked for it. This is because those who are not moved by the Word to walk in the same way with us have such an abhorrence of us that they prefer to ask for nothing at all, so that the whole flock, having lost all but one parish, goes there on holidays from the most distant parts of the city.

(15) The festivals by which the youth here have been miserably corrupted, and which are still in the minds of some who consider themselves good Christians, let us abolish them all, except Sunday, and from Christmas on, let us celebrate on Sunday all the wholesome commemorations mentioned in Scripture.

16 The idolatrous images have been removed from the churches by order of the council, but only the most noble ones, to which the foolish women consecrated wax candles 2c. We hope, however, that soon all of them, at least in some churches, will be removed. For we obviously see and experience that they are a nuisance to the weak, although those who are founded in their Christianity and godliness can suffer them without being disadvantaged in their godliness. Let us not mention that the antichrists, to the disgrace of the Gospel, now worship them even more fiercely.

17. from the uproar that almost arose here because of the exceedingly blasphemous book of Treger, 3) the Augustinian provincial, an un-

Shameful fellows, do not let yourselves be falsely led to believe anything, although there are always people there who constantly accuse us of sedition, while ours daily tolerate the greatest insults of the papal congregation, and it is also said that the very Treger, who has defiled us and the citizens in his pamphlet, is still here and continues his good life. For no one was harmed by the gathering of the people, who wanted nothing else than that this provincial and a preacher-monk, who barked against the word of God in an exceedingly insolent, coarse and blasphemous manner, should convict us of the heresy, which he always accused us of. Only in a monastery of the preaching monks, where they had found a whore, when they were looking for the preacher, they broke open some cells, and there they hunted up such silent game. Now everything is quiet, except that the priests are making noise, and the council is urging them to accept citizenship, so that if they do not want to, they will be forced to vacate the city. For it is said that it has been firmly decided that they will not tolerate their fornication any longer.

18 We also send here Erasmus' recently published booklet, 4) in which the unfortunate slave of ambition continues to put his slander on the Scriptures, which in truth is not worthy of being defended by some. We also confess, 5) that through him we have been given much cause to recognize the truth. But what is more? Why do we not rather recognize Christ as the author? What he wrote about you, the proverb about the Scyrian goat, fits him in truth, 6) since he now harms the kingdom of Christ much more than he does the kingdom of God.

Treger replied in May with a "Vermanung Bruder Conradis Treger an ein löblich gemein Eidgenossenschaft, von der böhmischen Ketzerrei" 2c., in which he very dishonorably attacked the Strasbourg. It was not until August that this writing appeared in print and Treger himself sold it at his monastery. The citizens demanded that he stand trial for the dishonor done to them and, to prevent his escape again, placed a guard in front of the monastery. But when the rumor spread that he had already escaped, they forced their way into the monastery on Sept. 4, where they found him and delivered him to the authorities. In the monastery of the preaching monks they searched for the preacher who had enraged the crowd with his sermons, but they did not find him, but a number of prostitutes hidden in the cells and in the cellar. The whole thing passed without further mischief.

4) The "Diatrobe," in September 1524. St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 1600.

5) In the Erlangen correspondence here is wrongly interpung: H'atknur, 6t nog; the comma should only be after Q08.

6) 6apr6a, Levriu, a wild goat which, having given the milk, immediately knocks over the milking cask.

1) Gautationig is wrong, it must be osggationis or eausationig (excuse, bald pretending). (Walch.)

2) According to the basic text Ps. 15,4, where it says of the righteous that he does not respect the wicked. (Walch.)

3) The Augustinian Provincial on the Rhine and in Swabia, Conrad Treger, had challenged the Strasbourg preachers with a hundred paradoxes <16 Deelsiu," GonoiiiorumHUK autotrituk on March 12, 1524 to the disputation, but had gone to Switzerland to escape it. Therefore, at the beginning of April, Capito sent out his "Warning of the Servants of the Word at Strasbourg to the Brethren of the Common Confederation" 2c. Thereupon he has ever been of use to him. For what does he seek but to destroy the reputation of Scripture everywhere, and to prefer the tranquility of the antichristic kingdom to the unrest of the kingdom of Christ? If only he knew 1) how much such shameful writings harm the godliness of Germany, of which Joh. Rode, 2) a very pious man who traveled through here to Basel, told us horrible things two days ago. For he [Erasmus] has made that also in Cologne many brethren have been turned from free will by his disputation. Therefore we ask you for Christ's sake not to listen to flesh and blood, and to respect what you once wrote of Erasmus, that for Christ's sake one must also hate one's parents, 3) better now than the advice of all orators. For this is Christ's word. All the adornment of the Latin language may perish; the wonder of scholarship may also perish, thereby obscuring Christ's glory! By His word we become blessed, by that of others we are only more corrupted.

(19) We have written this to you out of a heart that desires some things, that Christ's kingdom may grow and be furthered, which you, on no one's advice, want to throw to the wind. You know well how much depends on you according to God's will, how many thousands of souls hang on your mouth because they believe that it is the mouth of the Lord. You also know how, through your ministry, the world has come to disgust everything that is not written from the revealed word of God. It does not want to have anything to do with so-called well-meant, or as Erasmus says, acceptable interpretations. It wants to see the living and

They do not want to be children who are driven by everyone's opinion. This region also has children of God; it has those who are devoted to the Scriptures, who ask about the will of God and are concerned about it.

20 May the Lord grant that you also may be aware of ours, who have often strengthened so many other nations in word.

21 Answer carefully to everything that Carlstadt teaches. But answer without gall and anger; this he did not do, but thereby also made his writing very hateful. Let it be known that until now, and alone, you have always sought only Christ's glory and despised all human days. We thank Christ, who has granted that in your many writings you have not left a window or gap open to overturn your teaching, so that not even the outward things, which in themselves do not help to salvation, could be found fault with.

22 By the same grace of our Savior it also happens that the truly pious do not mind his blasphemy at all, but nevertheless wish for the sake of the weak, once the game has begun, that one might have something certain to answer and defend against all the subtleties of Satan. Help us in this.

(23) We also need to be instructed by you in some other matters, but this time we do not want to burden you with more.

24 Christ keep you, to whom you will diligently command us and our church, which wishes you and yours all salvation. Greetings to us from Philip Melancthon, Pommer and your other co-workers. We command our messengers to you in the Lord. Strasbourg, November 23, 1524.

1) Thus the old translator. Erl. Briefw.: scires.

2) ckodunnkg likockius, Hinne Rode, was dismissed from his position as Rector of the Hieronymus School in Utrecht in 1522 because of his Lutheran convictions, but returned to the Netherlands in 1525 and joined the Anabaptists. It is he who in 1522 delivered to Luther the letter of Cornelius Hoen together with a collection of small writings of Wessel. Compare St. Louis edition vol. XIV, 252, note.

3) Hence also Erasmus or all masters. Luther put odiendok, which is admittedly not graceful, so he aims at Redner Rath (Walch.)

690 Carlstadt's Tractate, in which he vehemently denied the true presence of Christ in Holy Communion, and sought to make Luther as black as he could.

Some of these tracts are included in the 20th volume of our edition, namely Col. 92. 2306 and 2312.

Section Five of Chapter Eight.

Of the renewed hope for Carlstadt's change and settlement with Luther, for which the latter again offered his hand, and not only pleaded for him with Elector Frederick, but also, after his death, obtained permission from the new Elector John for him to come to Saxony again, and again made every effort to bring Carlstadt back on the right path, who, however, after a friendship that had lasted for a while, was unresponsive and remained obdurate, secretly exchanged letters with the false spirits against Luther, and then escaped from Saxony forever.

A. What an effort Luther made during the lifetime of Prince Frederick the Wise to bring Carlstadt back into the country, but the court refused.

691 Luther's report to Spalatin of Dec. 29, 1524, that he had written to Carlstadt and hoped to have a meeting with him and make peace.

See Appendix, No. 119.

692 Luther's letter to Spalatin that Carlstadt had answered him, and he sent this answer along; he asked Spalatin to arrange for Carlstadt's safe conduct with the Elector in order to hold an interview with him. March 4, 1525.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed by Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 279d; by De Wette, vol. II, p. 629 (datirt: end of February) and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. V, p. 133 after the original. The date of the original is: l'sria sabbato post I, - On Saturday after Quinquagesimä, which Aurifaber incorrectly resolved by: Laddatüo post liStLrs.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To his extremely dear friend in the Lord, M. Georg Spalatin, the servant of Christ at the Court of Saxony.

Grace and peace! I am sending Carlstadt's letter, my dear Spalatin, which is addressed to me, in which he answers mine, as you see, which I sent to him through Joachim. 1) Now only that you help me to obtain from the prince an escort letter for Carlstadt for a while, so that we can have a conversation with each other. For although I have little hope that he, who is puffed up and hardened by the applause of the mob, will be able to leave, I must nevertheless do this, so that he will not seize the opportunity to blaspheme the gospel, which they are always and everywhere lurking for; at the same time, so that God will see and the world will know that we have not omitted anything that could serve to set these people straight. For I promised him in my letter that if what Joachim reported was true, I would see to it that he could talk to me under safe escort, or I would meanwhile live with him in exile in some place away from Wittenberg for the sake of the conversation. I will send back the new things. Farewell and pray for me. On Saturday after Quinquagesimä [March 4] 1525. Martin Luther.

Luther's further report to Spalatin on how he liked the Elector's negative answer, which he wanted to send to Carlstadt.

See Appendix, No. 120.

B. How Carlstadt after the death of Prince Frederick, fearing to be killed as a co-initiator of the peasants' riot, had gone to Luther Luther sent a letter to Carlstadt on December 23, but it did not reach Carlstadt's hands until February 18, 1525. Luther did not receive the answer until March 2. (Köstlin, Martin Luther, Vol. I, p. 729.)

1) Joachim Camerarius was visiting Melanchthon from Bamberg in December 1524, and Luther gave Carlstadt hid him compassionately in his house for more than eight weeks, induced him to recant through printed writings, trusted him this time as well, and obtained permission from Elector John for his return to Saxony.

694 Luther's letter to all Christians as a preface to Carlstadt's booklet, in which he apologizes for the riot. Probably late June or early July 1525.

This writing is the preface to the "Entschuldigung des falschen Namen der Aufruhr, so ihm ist mit Unrecht aufgelegt worden" written by Carlstadt on June 24, 1525. It is found in the Wittenberg edition (1551), vol. II, p. 68d; in the Jena edition (1556), vol. III, p. 1056; in the Altenburg edition, vol. III, p. 109; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XIX, p. 227; and in the Erlangen edition, vol. 64, p. 404. Since Carlstadt wrote his paper on June 24 and then sent it to Luther, there is some time between the writing of the paper and the writing of the preface. After that, our approximate time determination.

To all the dear Christians before whom this writing comes, grace and peace from GOD our Father, and [the] Lord JESu Christo.

1. Andreas Carlstadt has made me a booklet, in which he excuses himself from the dangerous and grave rumor, 1) as if he were guilty of the sedition, or had been a head and instigator of the seditionists, and has asked me with great earnestness that I would let the same go out through the printing press, to save his name, and also, that he should not be condemned so miserably, unheard and unconquered, and without merit and cause be insecure of his life and property, now that the clamor is going on, as if one should go too fast with many poor people, and out of pure anger judge both guilty and innocent, unheard and unconquered. So I fear that the timid tyrants, who were afraid of a rushing leaf before, have now become so bold, until they accomplish their will of courage, that God also overthrows them to the ground in his time.

2 Although D. Carlstadt is my greatest enemy because of the doctrine, and we both have been so hard on each other that there is no hope for a contract or further fellowship, nevertheless, because he is so loyal to me in his concerns and temptations, more than to his friends who have set him on me, I will let him find the same loyalty with me, as much as I can, and gladly show him service and others.

3. considering that Christ has taught us and shown us by his own example to do good to our enemies and to love them. 3. Seeing that Christ has taught us, and shown us by his own example, to do good to our enemies and to love him, whom we owe to follow, if we want to be Christians and have a part with him in his kingdom. If I did not know how to keep my conscience before God, when I saw that he would be harmed in an unimportant way, and I could help to defend it, I would not do it. Of course, it would be as much to me in the sight of God as if I had done such evil to him myself, even though St. Paul teaches Romans 12:20: "If your enemy hungers, feed him; if he thirsts, give him drink" 2c.

4. and do this so much the better, that I hope God will give grace (if we ask earnestly), that this good beginning will be followed by even better things, and that he will finally recognize himself, and fall from his error in the sacrament and come back to the right truth along with many others. For Christ says [John 11:9], "The day has twelve hours." No man, because he lives, can despair of how high and low he has always fallen. And we know that God is marvelous in His works [Ps. 139, 14.], to which we can give neither time nor duration, neither measure nor goal, neither color nor shape.

(5) For I hereby freely state and make known that with this service of mine I do not affirm D. Carlstadt's opinion and doctrine, especially of the Sacrament, nor do I fall into it in any way, but, as I have previously written against it, so I still stand and remain. I also ask everyone most sincerely to beware of the same, regardless of the fact that many others also write about the same, but with such unfounded, solicited intrigues that I know of no other thanks to the same, except that they only make me the stronger in my mind.

1) Walch and the Erlangeners: Court.

(6) But if anyone is so full of suspicion, and would blame me for believing Carlstadt all too soon, and not wanting to be serious, but having other things in mind, I answer, "It is not for me or anyone else to judge another's heart. Moreover, St. Paul says in 1 Cor. 13:4 ff: "Love is not suspicious." And again, "Love trusts all things." Although it is often deceived by such trust, as it is said, "Ride away the horse," it does not leave.

I now state my opinion: As long as D. Carlstadt is justified and wants to suffer what he wants to suffer, where he is found rebellious and overcome, I must believe his booklet and confession; even though I myself was moved before I heard such his expensive, high plea, that he had a rebellious courage, like some who were with him. But now I must leave room for his own plea, and not refuse to help the interrogation, but encourage it.

8 For, if one is to tell the truth and look at the matter in the light, this lamentation and turmoil is not the fault of the peasants alone, but much more of the mad princes and foolish bishops. For since the common man had righteous preachers and liked to hear the pure gospel, in which they learned faith and obedience, our nobles could not stand that, and without any cause drove out the righteous preachers, and set over the people rude asses' heads, who could do nothing, and wantonly incited the people against themselves. Therefore, God caused seditious preachers to come among the people, and they began such a miserable situation, which has caused such discontent among the common people that there will be no end to it until the tyrants also rise up in the mud. For there can be no endurance where a people do not love their lord, but must fear him alone; and it comes to pass, as he says, "Whomsoever fears much must fear much again; for he cannot be secure nor happy with those who have neither desire nor love for him.

(9) But our nobles and idols shall not hear nor accept these things, but shall become and blame the gospel for what they deserve, and lead the fools' rhymes, which are called: I do not care; until one comes, who leads another rhyme against it, and says: It is my earnestness, that neither prince nor bishop remain under heaven. Therefore, let what is fled go, they will soon find what they have long sought; it is already on the way, God grant that they may be converted in time, amen.

(10) So now I ask both gentlemen and everyone, because D. Carlstadt so highly deserves to be excused from the rebellious name, that he be allowed to come to this, so that God will not be tempted further and higher, so that the displeasure and resentment of the mob against the authorities will not become stronger and greater justice will be gained. For it is not good to take upon oneself the common prayer and cry, since He cannot lie, who promised that He would hear the cry of the oppressed and not suffer; He also has power enough to avenge and punish such. May God grant us His mercy, Amen.

Luther's preface to "Carlstadt's Declaration, How He Respects and Wants His Doctrine of the Reverend Sacrament and Others".

Probably still in July 1525.

Carlstadt's "Declaration", which he wrote in Luther's house, who kept him hidden for more than eight weeks (see St. Louis edition, vol. XX, Introduction, p. 24 f.), is found in our edition, vol. XX, 312. The "Declaration" is dated July 25, 1525. Therefore, this preface is to be placed somewhat later. It is found in the Wittenberg edition (1551), vol. II, p. 70; in the Jena (1556), vol. III, p. 163b; in the Altenburg, vol. III, p. 154; in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 229 and in the. Erlanger, vol. 64, p. 408.

To all dear Christians, grace and peace in Christ our Savior, Martin Luther.

D. Carlstadt has sent me a booklet in which he explains himself and his writing, especially that which he has taken from the reverend Sacrament. And I am highly pleased that he freely and publicly testifies that he does not want his teaching to be considered a certain and decided truth, as he himself does not yet hold it, nor can he hold it, but has his own opinion and mind.

The question is how to hear and learn where to prove and confirm the truth thoroughly and stately.

2 And indeed, when I think behind me and look around, I myself am well aware that almost all of his little books are titled or headed in such a way that he also presents a delusion and disputation, and concludes nothing finite, as an article of faith. For this is what his titles usually read: Whether one may prove this or that from Scripture? In addition, his prefaces also require that he question and research, and give others cause to question and stimulate them to research.

But because he handled the matter so well in his letter, and I saw that so many people fell on it and were attached to it, I forgot his titles and prefaces, 1) and truly did not think otherwise, because it was his serious opinion. And so perhaps it has happened to all others. For this reason, it is truly necessary for him, and he was also guilty of omitting such an explanation.

4 And though it is dangerous to waver, doubt, or at first dispute in matters and articles of faith, if anyone finally persists in them, yet we, who are certain, are obliged to help those wavering and questioning hearts, and in such peril to reach out a hand, to listen kindly to their questions and inquiries, causes and motions, and with the Scriptures to help them out. For there is no need to despair of those who waver, and ask and plead for just cause, as those who are not yet hardened and sunk, but still shoot up and swim, and would gladly reach the shore.

For let it be said to every man, that whatsoever is taught or understood by the Holy Ghost hath these two virtues in itself: First, that it maketh him sure and certain that hath it, as John saith, 1 John 2:27, "As the anointing teacheth you, it is true, and is no lie." Secondly, that it makes one courageous, joyful and confident, even to to confess against death and the devil. Therefore he is also called Spiritus veritatis, a spirit of truth [Joh. 15, 26. 16, 13.]; spirit, that he makes courageous and confident; truth, that he makes sure and certain, that it cannot be otherwise.

6 Because now D. Carlstadt and also all others who deal with this article speak of it out of delusion and questioning, as they themselves confess, it is certain that they do not yet have the spirit in this matter, even out of human conceit, and do not speak out of the spirit. Therefore let every man beware of their opinion, lest he fall and cleave unto it, but, if he doubt and think with them, wait and forbear, until he be sure and certain, or else give up his soul in danger. For what we are to believe must not be delusion or conceit, but certain truth, about which we may let our necks be deceived. God's grace be with us, amen.

On Nov. 22, 1526, Luther petitioned Elector Johannes on behalf of Carlstadt that he be allowed to live in Kemberg, because he could not stay in the villages around Wittenberg due to the malice of the peasants, and the provost at Kemberg could also keep a better eye on him.

This letter to Churfürst Johannes is found in Walch, vol. XXI, 156; De Wette, vol. III, p. 135.

C. Of Carlstadt's former inconsistency, new false tricks against Luther, stubborn insistence on his error, secret correspondence with Krautwald and Schwenkfeld against Luther and the Wittenbergers, and his secret escape from Saxony.

697 Luther's report to Melancthon that Carlstadt had already been absent from the place assigned to him for several weeks and was perhaps looking for his nest elsewhere, adding that he should always move there because he could not be brought back to normal by any kind of good deed.

See Appendix, No. 121, § 1.

1) This is said with reference to Luther's writing "against the heavenly prophets".

698 Luther's report to Brenz on how Carlstadt, who until now had been carried in the fold, as it were, in the hope that he would get back on the right path, had become more and more hardened from day to day and still held to his opinion of Holy Communion.

See Appendix, No. 122.

699: "Luther's answer and refutation of some erroneous arguments which D. Carlstadt led against him to defend and maintain his false opinion of the Holy Sacrament. End of November 1527.

This writing is found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XX, 324.

700 Carlstadt's letter to the Silesians Krautwald and Schwenkfeld, in which he badly criticizes Luther's great confession of the Lord's Supper, also complains about his poverty and the poor mercy of the Wittenbergers, whether they already see and know that he must sell everything, and also reports that he has written a booklet about the Lutherans' disunity and wants to write another about their (the Sacramentarians') unity. May 17, 1528.

This letter is found in Latin in the German Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 277; in the German Jena edition (1566), vol. IV, p. 375d and in the Altenburg edition, vol. IV, p. 446; in German in the Leipzig edition, vol. XIX, p. 700 in a translation by I. I. Greif, which Walch has included. Because it is good on the whole, we have retained it.

Translated from Latin.

To the excellent and famous men and brothers,
Krautwald and Schwenkfeld, at their own hands.

Peace to you from God the Father through Jesus Christ. I have written many letters to you, famous men, and have dug them up in the hope that a messenger might be found who could deliver them properly. But since none came to me, I tore them up. Now, however, I come by chance to speak with the present brother, who says in conversation that he wants to take up his quarters with you. After I heard this, I asked him to be so kind as to take a small letter to you with him. And he also promises. Accordingly, I wanted to tell you the course of our circumstances recently.

After I had taken much trouble, the Elector finally allowed me to exchange writings with Luther and to write my fill; Luther, however, had made this agreement with me beforehand. I presented him with an argument, namely that no man, except Christ, could offer the body of Christ for food. In this Luther agrees with me that Christ alone gives his body for food, but he denies the implication, namely, that others cannot give Christ's body for food. We have spoken of men. So now he admits that Christ alone gives his body for food; but this he wants to be proved, that other men cannot give it for food. 1) I do not know how to prove this. Praise be to God, who has given me sharp arrows; I do not doubt that the truth will have the victory. But, as it seems to me, Luther will chase me away again, or will make an effort that something more annoying will happen to me. I will write a booklet about the unity of all of us, if God wills it; I have already written about the disunity of the Lutherans. In a short time I will send you many Lutheran booklets, but I fear they will be without fruit and use. Because of you, I have been in great anxiety for the sake of the tyrant; I have been worried that the good Prince Frederick might suffer some harm.

3. I would like to visit you and discuss one thing and another with you; but I do not know what ours suspect, since they fear that I would turn to Silesia. Therefore, they want me to be here; but no one will be moved to mercy against me. I have to sell everything, beds, skirts, jugs and all my household goods. They know that, but no one has mercy on me; perhaps they would also like it if I and my children were to die of hunger.

Now about other things. There is a rumor that N. N. is willing to attack some bishops, and he would really have done so if he had not been restrained from doing so by the pleading of our Elector. Your N. is not the best of rumors here. Some say that he had in mind to destroy you 2) secretly; but it is said that he was prevented from doing so by the Turk. He is said to be standing in Greek Weissenburg with a very large army. If you are well, it will be a pleasure for me, if not, I am sorry for you. If you can, I ask you to write to me; let me know (I am also concerned for you) about your condition, especially about the progress of the Gospel. I wish that your, indeed also my prince, is well. I have written in great haste and somewhat obscurely, for I do not know the messenger.

1) Compare "Luther's Answer and Refutation of Several Erroneous Arguments" 2c. St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 339.

2) In Latin: "os, in the old translation: "you", as must also be read.

If it were in my power, I would have sent a messenger of my own to you long ago, primarily for the sake of the reason that people are saying strange things about the cruelty of the N. A messenger from Nickelsburg has been with me 2c. Doctor Martin's booklet, 1) which he has sent out against you and me, is full of forgetfulness of the benefits of God, full of ungodliness and blasphemies. As often as I look at it, bile rises up in my mouth. Among all, I am most enraged by the fact that he has written: In Holy Communion we drink the forgiveness of sins, from the cup. Oho! Be well in Christ JEsu. Given at Kemberg, May 17, 1528.

Andreas Carlstadt.

I send my heartfelt greetings to your provost and wish him all the best.

701 D. Carlstadt's letter to Chancellor Brück, in which he accuses Luther and defends his false opinion and error about the Sacrament. Kemberg, August 12, 1528.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol.IX, p.272; in the Jena edition (1566), vol.IV, p.367b; in the Altenburg edition, vol.IV, p.438; in the Leipzig edition, vol.XIX, p.692 and in the Erlangen correspondence, vol.VI, p.339. The original is in the Weimar archives.

1. respectable, high esteemed, great favored, beloved lord! E. Respectable are my quite willing services always ready beforehand. Kind sir! I hope I have favorable knowledge that the honorable and strict gentleman, Hans Metsch, Captain at Wittenberg, my decreed superiority, addressed me many times, and left me no peace, until I agreed to explain my reasons of the holy scripture, because of which I was divided by Doctor Martins in the article concerning the sacrament.

1) Luther's great confession of the Lord's Supper. Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 894.

and how I do not want to put anything in before I have received my most gracious lord's permission and have been assured that no harm or damage will come to me from it, with the gracious promise that I will receive gracious and Christian instruction. For even though my most gracious lord has escorted me and given me a princely promise that I will not do anything wrong before I have been duly interrogated and, as is right and proper, overcome, as the princely grace will continue to guide me, and I might well have consoled myself in the above-mentioned article, but I know that their Electoral Grace would graciously allow me to live in their Electoral Grace's principality with this appendix, where I would sufficiently contradict my error.

2) Since from such a statement of my reasons it clearly follows that I have recanted with my miserable mouth, 2) but with my heart I have clung to the perfection of Christ's redemption, and must still cling to it, that is, that I do not believe that Christ is bodily in the bread, or bodily consumed, to make peace in the conscience of forgiven sins, or to forgive the sins, I hope E. A. will know that I am excused. A. will know me excused, if perhaps some are displeased that I desire my most gracious lord's gracious permission above all, or rather do not want to put in anything. After having obtained my gracious permission, I have divided my reasons into three parts: two parts of E.A. were given into your own hands at Torgau a year ago, kept quietly and secretly. That now to Wittenberg carried out, has happened without my will, as well as that Doctor Martini answer 3) before is written out, because it me behändet.

Now I have not behaved to E. A. in the next fast, as the Doctor Martin has taken great displeasure against me, as if I had inserted the thought book of the opinion to bring my most gracious lord's court to me 2c., that E. A. will well know my innocence without my excuse, also hope my most gracious lord will have excused me. I have also told Doctor Martin and Pomerano that the above-mentioned Mr. Hans Metsch, Captain, although I believe incited by them, forced me to do so at once 2c., and

2) In "Carlstadt's Declaration, How He Respects and Wants to Have Respected His Doctrine of the Reverend Sacrament and Others. St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 312.

3) "Luther's Answer and Refutation of Several Erroneous Arguments, which D. Carlstadt Led Against Him" 2c. St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 324. Compare the introduction to the 20th volume of our edition, p. 26.

I have satisfied them with the fact that I am in need of great help in the above-mentioned article. Then the doctor said: I should hand over to him one argument after the other with brevity. Thereupon I was fearful as a burnt child, and wanted to obtain my most gracious lord's other permission also before; which E. Achtbar 1) gave me in the next different fast, of which I thank him obligingly.

4 On this I have inserted a refutation and an argument: whether they bring humility or hopefulness, I put in my G.H. and E. A 2) cognition. In the other, I have thus humbly submitted and begged that I thought a hard stone should become soft and do me no harm if it fell on me. In the refutation this is my reason: After Doctor Martinus writes that Christ gave his body in the Lord's Supper as food, I put on it, and say: that not one word, not even one syllable is to be found in the Lord's Supper, from which it is clear what Doctor Martinus writes. If there were any, it would have to be the word dedit or datur: but none of them can.

For this reason, we must search for scriptures in which enough of this is written; I have shown the sixth chapter of John, from which I have decided that no man who is not the eternal, true and personal God can give the body of Christ as a food of salvation. About this I have shown a contradiction of his doctrine; from which one of his best reasons must sink, and other things, so dependent on the action, have been brought in. Thus Doctor Martinus has given me an answer that both teaches me and reviles me.

(6) As for the other, I have taken from this speech of Paul, 1 Cor. 11:26. "As often as ye eat the bread of the Lord, ye shall proclaim the death of the Lord until he come," an argument that Christ is not bodily with them that eat his bread for his memory's sake; may well say that I have armed and guarded such speech with so much scripture that he must be skillful, and truly know more than I, or perhaps more than a Christian should know; therefore I hoped he would use and prove his art.

007 For it is said, why a believer should not desire, neither can desire, that Christ should come to him bodily in the bread, or in the mouth, for the remission of his sins.

Sins, as Doctor Martinus now writes, namely, that one drinks forgiveness of sins when he bodily drinks the blood from the cup 2c., and has proved this with the saying of Paul: "The righteousness of faith speaks thus: Thou shalt not say in thine heart, Who ascends into heaven? for that is to bring Christ down. Thou shalt not say: Who shall go down into the deep? for that is bringing Christ back from the dead," Romans 10:6, 7.

8) It is reported that in the past I demanded Christ from heaven with words against this saying, and still demand them daily, and bring them here; I have also discovered my mind, as 3) I hear the repetition from the dead, and fortified it with writings in such a way that I considered it certain that Doctor Martinus would either give me something better from a higher cause, or become more favorable.

9 Because it is proved that Christ must give his body to death and die bodily, that he might take away our sin from our conscience and bring true peace and assurance of our salvation, that even today Christ with his body could not take away our sin without his bodily death. Sin is such a great and horrible thing in the sight of God that Christ also had to be cursed, just as He is cursed this time, since He took away our sin bodily and carried it, and redeemed us from the law through His body [Gal. 3, 13], that Christ also is a foolishness [1 Cor. 1, 23], a sin 2c. [2 Cor. 5:21.]: have proved all this with scriptures, and finally set it down that it is not possible to speak of the possibility of scripture, that he may bodily give his body for our sin, if he die not bodily; yea, that they cast Christ out of his name, out of his honor, nature, and essence, who speak otherwise of the body of Christ and forgiveness of our sins, that they also are blasphemers.

(10) I thought Doctor Martinus would think and feel that I needed a thorough instruction, because I put the reasons and articles of Christian faith to my mind. But he has let me read such an answer through the above-mentioned Herr Hauptmann: If Doctor Carlstadt makes from the dedit, and donec veniet, argument that we do not give or eat the body of Christ bodily, then also from these words, Partes orationis quot 4) 8nn? Argument to be made. This is the opinion of his answer. He also writes,

3) Erl. Briefw.: "where ... distinguished." Our reading is according to the Wittenberg.

4) Thus the Jena. Wittenberger: <Mock.

1) Erl. Briefw.: E. G. Achtbar.

2) Erl. Epistolary: "E.G."

that I take him and his part for great fools, or must be blind as a bat.

11 Truly, Mr. Chancellor, I have experienced what Uebermuth does, and, if God wills, no one shall testify to me with truth that I consider Luther and his followers to be fools. But that is true, if such arguments count for nothing, I am so blind as a bat that I do not understand a single letter. God willing, that my G. H. incumbent business could be discharged so much, that her C. F. G. with her own personal eyes would see our cause itself, which truly touches the highest honor of God and His Son JEsu Christ. Now may God our Lord grant that our Lord may have both our letters, Luther's and mine, recognized and judged by impartial, understanding, God-fearing people, if their C.F.G. is prevented from doing so himself. I could not experience anything better, nor do I know of anything on earth that would be more beneficial to his C.F.G.'s salvation and more useful in attaining an eternal name that would be dear and delicious in heaven and earth. I do not wish this because I have written it out, since I still have much to do and to put in.

But as he gave me an answer, so he does with the evangelists. For he writes that Matthew and Marcus write against each other; for this reason he wants to cast suspicion on the text of Marcus for falsity 1) and then scrape out the word biberunt and destroy it, because it is harmful in its teaching. If we allow this, good night has Scripture and God and faith. He probably puts it dubitatively, but one knows and sees what the scheme and figure dubitationiss means, because Luther leaves it at that, and has no other answer than that the word beaver is to be eradicated.

My Lord Chancellor, E. A. is concerned about hell or heaven as well as about me. Even if we do not respect God, he will not be denied or suppressed because of it. Behold, for God's sake, whether those write the contumacious speeches, one of which writes the commandment of a lord, and the other the obedience of his servants and performance of the commandment, when the execution and the commandment contend against each other. Why did Christ say [Luc. 12, 43]: "Blessed is the servant whom the Lord finds doing this" 2c. [V. 47. I:] "If a servant who knows his master's will and does not do it" 2c. Now Matthew writes the commandment of Christ, but Marcus writes the obedience of Christ's disciples. Matthew therefore [Cap.

26, 27.], "Drink ye all of it"; so Marcus [Cap. 14, 23.], "And drank ye all of it." Are these vile words, or senses? For my part, I can well prove that they are not contraries. For this and other articles, I also have more to put and write; but if I feared such a help from someone, I would have encountered it.

14 It is no less true when Doctor Martinus publicly prints, 2) that Christ was not broken on the cross. For Saint Paul, who writes [1 Cor. 11, 24]: "This is my body, which is broken for you," is a diligent copy of the prophet Isaiah, which testimony the Lord also gives after the Lord's Supper. But Isaiah writes twice, right in the chapter in which he prophesies of the suffering and death of Christ, that Christ was broken on the cross; once thus: "He is broken for our sins", Attritus est propter scelera nostra, Cap 53, 5. The other time thus [V. 10.]: "And God would break him in sickness", or God would break him in sickness; Et Dominus voluit eum conterere infirmum.

I have had to sell half of my Hebrew bibles, otherwise I would have shown more passages; but from the places now shown, it is obvious that D. Martinus suppresses the prophecy of Jesus of the death of Christ, and Christ himself. Attritus et conterere, voces emphaticae sunt ejus, quod est fractum esse et frangere, quod tua clarissima prudentia multo me melius novit.

(15) Then he shall know that Isaiah hath expressed the cause of the breaking, saying, And the LORD would make him sick, or break him in his sickness. Dica Hebrew means in German: he has broken; it is often described in the Psalms. But Luther leaves the sickness and makes a new breaking against the scriptures. For in the first place, according to his meaning, Christ had to be broken in the bread, as bread, if Christ was to be broken as bread. But that would be against this scripture [Ex. 12, 46. 4 Mos. 9, 12. Joh. 19, 36.]: "You do not break his leg", and D. Martinus would have to grant such breaking and pieces, and his synecdoche will not redeem him.

16 Secondly, he also says against the Scripture, that Christ was broken without suffering, against Isaiah, who says, "And the Lord would break him in sickness. What? If no heart and no spirit in the Psalms is broken without suffering, he takes the word shibar, or

1) Compare Luther's great Confession of the Lord's Supper, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, 1043, § 377.

2) 1. c. Col. 1066, § 436 s.

Dica, 1) both of which are at times in One Verse, and mean "to break" or the like; Pf. 34:19.: "GOD is near to broken hearts and broken spirits." The first has the nishbar; the other, the dica. As also this verse: Cor contritum et humiliatum. From which also to note that dica means a violent breaking, because shibar, and undoubtedly Isaiah the word dica not in vain, and Paul also not idly written, "broken for you." It does not brocket itself, however, as it would be useful to his opinion. This can be learned from the 143rd Psalm, v. 3, and 34, 19. 51, 19.

Thirdly, this is an undeniable 2) punishment of divine wisdom, if he says that Christ was not broken on the cross; for Isaiah says twice that Christ was broken on the cross; do not trouble yourself if you want to recognize this. Such pieces are found several in D. Martini books, which one can and must beat to the ground with legible writing. I have certainly presented Luther with good writings that would have admonished him to do better, for he is allowed to print that Christ was broken on the cross. But because he is now allowed to print what he wants, God also wants me to petition him with obvious writings and see that printing is as useful to him as reading out the matter; indeed, it would be a thousand times more honest for him to submit to the obedience of truth than for him to print (which no believer may print). 3) I would ever be unfaithful to God if I stood against the public testimony of Luther.

Heavenly Father, how gladly would I listen to Luther and all men, and comply, if your divine truth were not in my way! I believe that your holy witnesses have rightly and properly described the order of commerce and history, together with the speech of your Son, our Lord Jesus Christ; and behold, Doctor Martinus not only departs from the order in which he tells how and what Christ did with the bread and the cup, but also departs from the quality and natural simplicity of your speeches. What shall I do? From the story of the bread, Luther's contradiction comes to light, and is revealed as soon as Doctor Martinus says that the Lord took the bread and gave it, as the evangelists write. How Paul describes the unrighteousness of the Jews and the works of the time of Abrahah's faith.

1) xxx and xxx.

2) Wittenberger: unleachable; Jenaer: unleachable; Walch: unbelievable.

3) The words in brackets have been struck out again in the original.

Rom. 4, 3.], thus understands this contradiction whether the order in bread is reported and counted.

(19) If I go into the words of Christ and inquire why D. Martinus throws a soloecismum into the beard of Christ and his disciples, and accuses Christ that he or his evangelists say inconveniently: Hoc panis, or panis hoc, when he would like to repeat Christ and his evangelists without defect of construction, without figure, and with better reason, and say: Hoc corpus, then I truly do not find a reason, I cannot sufficiently wonder, that he confesses here either a defect in construction or figure, when he so grimly scolds the others on account of figures. He boasts of the quality and avoidance of all errors and figures, as if it were true that he accepts the word and speech by their natural quality and simplicity, and no one else.

20 Does he not see that St. Paul uses the tuto in the cup in eodem genere and does not make a soloecism? From this it can be seen that St. Paul could also interpret bread with the quality of speech and skillfully; as he does twice in the same chapter, v. 26: once there: "As often as you eat the bread," the other time down: "Which eateth the bread" 2c. There he writes not Duto or hoc panem, but Tuto or hunc panem; from which it follows that Paul does not point to the bread where he speaks, Tuto or hoc corpus meum; for he would have written ouros or the, as St. Paul did in the other two passages mentioned. If Doctor Martinus is so certain, he gives an example from the New Testament that the bread is shown with the tuto. But what seems strange to him? Is it not enough, if I give twenty examples, I will give a hundred each, and publicly prove that these pronouns ouros^ aoty; touto, and articulirten kio, kaoo, koo, tend to point to the and following nouns ^to]. With this I do not mean to deny, 4) that such also often point to the preceding nouns, but always conveniently and congrue, in the same case. For from the property of the pronoun we see where and to whom it points, as E. A. knows everything better than I do. For the sake of this demonstration, I have not even offered to give honest proof. If I were admitted, perhaps I would write that Luther does not suspect himself.

21 I know this when I point to the body of Christ and say, "This is the body that is for us.

4) In the old editions: "liegen". In the original: "leugen".

has been given, so that no man or angel has been able to punish me with lies. If I ask what body has been given to us, the Scriptures do not tell me any other than the natural body of Jesus Christ. What shall I do? If the articles of our faith protect and shield me in this interpretation, hoc corpus, and not in that, hoc panis, namely the article of the conception and birth of Christ, the article of the suffering and death of Christ, the article of our atonement and redemption, the articles of the works of God and of divine creation.

22 The old translation stands by my demonstration, for it thus represents: Hoc corpus, hic sanguis. Why hoc here, and kiio there? Because of the nouns panis and calix, which both precede each other? No, they are both generis masculini, therefore he looked at the following nomina oorn8 and sanguis, and interpreted them. What Erasmus holds, and where the demonstration consecrates him to, is to be noted from this translation: accepto poculo etc. Hic est enim sanguis meus. Why not therefore: Hoc est enim sanguis meus? If the translation does not dispute, it nevertheless confesses its delusion, and testifies that it would much rather err with Carlstadt, and interpret rightly with truth, than have the doctor's glory.

The clause "which is given for you" is a final speech of our redemption, which recently comprehends the greatness of our sins and the full sufficiency of Christ's suffering, which also masterfully comprehends the divine and paternal love, together with the supreme obedience of Christ, also his love and grace, and holds all that this speech says [Luc. 24, 46. 47.]: "Christ had to suffer, and on the third day rise again, and repentance and forgiveness of sins be preached in his name." For it teaches true repentance and full salvation, how necessary, how useful, how good it is. And even though it has been a hundred times over laid out with divine teaching, it must still kneel down and lose its light and usefulness. We know that in all the arts it is forbidden, shameful and harmful to draw examples non subjectae materiae: how much more shameful is it in the holy Scriptures? What shall I do here, my Lord Chancellor? The scripture lays out such clauses in all the books of the apostles, and in one book many times. If I am to follow the Scriptures, then I remain of my own mind; if I am to accept Luther's teaching, then I must leave the Scriptures, as I will prove.

24) These words: "The bread we break, is it not a fellowship of the body?"

1 Cor. 10, 16, is Doctor Martinus' crown and firm foundation; yet he perverts word and sense, if he wants to build his delusion on it. For he says thus: The body is a fellowship of the bread, which Paul does not say; and continues to teach how the body is in the bread, and the bread partakes of the body, which all strives against the Scriptures now presented. For St. Paul says that the bread is a fellowship of the body of Christ; and not that the body of Christ is a fellowship of the bread. St. Paul also teaches who the body is. Namely, how many and how the body of Christ partakes of one loaf. As: if the body of Christ breaks and eats the bread of Christ, the bread is its fellowship, and thus the body of Christ partakes of one bread. This is so clear and public in Paul's text that a reader would like to be struck in the eyes: nor should I accept Luther's glosses against the bright day. Who will advise me to do so? From this you should realize that I am not to be mocked, ridiculed, scorned, despised, or to remain on my faith out of hatred and envy.

In the other part of Christ's supper, we have St. Mark's testimony as clear and bright as the sun at noon in the sky, that the disciples all drank from the cup before Christ began to say, "This is my blood. 2c. Doctor Martinus also confesses this, where the text has the word biberunt. Now he has it, and there is no copy that indicates otherwise. I have broken the supposed contradiction above with redemption.

26 I confess that Lucas [Cap. 22, 20] and Paul [1 Cor. 11, 25] call the cup a new testament; but that Matthew and Marcus call the cup the blood of Christ, I must not believe nor speak, because I find it not written. But because Lucas and Paul have called the cup a new testament in the blood or through the blood of Christ, we should not change their words, nor improve them, nor move them, but follow them straightway, and say in the same way as they do, that the cup is a new testament in the blood, for this is ever rightly and wisely said. But it follows that the cup would not be a new testament if it were not in the blood of Christ in some way. It also follows that the cup is not better still in the blood, because the new testament is in the blood. Whoever then understands how the new testament is in the blood, knows ready how the cup is in the blood. This scripture, "the cup a new testament in my blood" 2c., ever brings with it that the cup obtains the name of the new testament through the blood, and would not have it without blood. Since

But no one may speak otherwise if he wants to follow this Scripture, for the cup must be in the blood.

(27) If the true New Testament is not in itself bodily in the blood, nor does it pass bodily through it, as a man through water, or a knife through flesh, it is foolish for any man to forsake the manner of the Scriptures, and say that the cup is bodily in the blood, or that it passes through the blood. Nor do these words lead more firmly to such a sense than to this: The blood is bodily in the cup, or in the new testament. For this is a perverse and counterfeit scripture, contrary to this bright scripture: the cup a new testament in the blood.

(28) I do not teach Christ to speak as Luther teaches me, but I learn from the words of Christ how and what I should speak. I say that the cup is a new testament in the blood; no more nor better in the blood than the new testament. Now it is evident that the new testament signifies and reveals the blood of Christ with its power. But what blood? Paul writes the blood of the cross, Col. 1, 20. This is also the intention of the other evangelists. Lucas thus [Cap.22,20.]: "The cup the new testament in my blood, which is poured out for you." Matthew [Cap. 26,28.]: "This is the blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." Marcus also says [Cap. 14,24.that the blood of Christ poured out for us is the blood of the new testament; of which St. Paul's teaching is rich and full. Accordingly, I must understand the cup also in the blood to be a new testament, that it is outwardly begotten of the same blood as the Scripture calls its witness. What wonder is it, since the anointing and bodily anointing is called a gospel in Luke [Cap. 14]. 1)

(29) Now there are two contumacious teachers: one is Christ; the other is Doctor Martinus. Christ says that the cup and the new testament are in his poured out blood; Luther, on the other hand, in the unpoured out. Christ says, in the blood the cup is a new testament; Luther: not in the blood, but the blood in the cup. What do I do? Which one do I follow? Give me advice. Shall I praise the word in my mouth, and by deed transgress and desolate, as Luther does? These are public contradictions: in the blood, not in the blood; in the cup, not in the cup. I see that Luther laughs at me and mocks me, because I contradict the simple words of Christ and say: the cup is in the blood a new one.

Testament. But is it unreasonable for me to love and guide and preserve the language of God?

30 Since E. A. see that I have the simple, loud and clear word of God, and Luther has not. Almighty God, how I would like to be of one mind and heart with Luther, if the Scriptures did not divide us! As this place Doctor Martini's ground and door shakes, and bends to fall, so it goes with the following words: "That for many, or for you, is poured out in remission of sins."

Effunditur must mean (if it does not want) confunditur, or bibitur. But I have drawn the difference between the blood of the old and new testament from this word, and proved it by scriptures; do not help me, there I am stuck, and shall and must rave, how strongly the scripture has taken me, and how none at all is set against it.

Then I must hear with what force this clause "poured out for us" must fall out of their meaning, which the evangelists put into two sections, Matthew and Marcus of the pouring out of the blood on the cross; Lucas and Paul of the blasphemous bodily pouring out of the blood over the table; 2) as if the evangelists were fooling with two masters' words, and whether Christ was divided, and Lucas said nothing of the pouring out, and Paul did not clearly say of the death of Christ.

Respectable chancellor! Doctor Martinus has promised me an answer, and not mocking words, dräuwort, Nachtrachtung. I am warned about five miles ago by a person who has been in the monastery 3) did not have to hear great joy at Wittenberg yesterday. Did I deserve that, I don't know. If he wants to hold me thus, then I am badly deceived. As I hear, he relies on the fact that he has a gracious master; but I do not want to be indignant about it, because I do not believe that your C.F.G. will let herself and her name be used for inequity. Thus, their C.F.G. have also promised me mercy, so that their C.F.G. will not let any punishment be inflicted on me before I have rightly, and how justly, overcome.

I have their C. F. G.'s gracious will and permission, on this and on my good, well-founded right and provable right I am also confident. I ever boast of the quality of words, more than any other. My foundation is not only based on the words of Christ and his holy evangelists, but also on the rules of the law.

2) Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 1063, § 428 ff.

3) That is, in Luther's house.

1) It should read, "Marc. 14, 9."

of speeches, the simple and natural understanding of speeches; and where this is and stands, ordinary and well-founded interpretation of the holy Scriptures, item, the articles of our holy faith must follow. I lack, praise God, nothing, and may speak cheerfully and confidentially in this matter: Lord God, judge me according to my innocence; Lord God, you know my simplicity, before you is my righteousness.

34 I offer myself once again and unnecessarily to give a good, right, firm, upright account of my faith for the full proof of my mind. Do not doubt at all that my Lord will let me enjoy my rightful request and plea, first of all her C. F. G.'s gracious promise and approval, and if I ever have to leave C. F. G.'s lands again, show me mercy, grant me time and space, and also provide me with gracious and written leave, for which I humbly ask, so that I may seek services with his C. F. G.'s knowledge and grace. F. G.'s knowledge and grace, to provide for my poor children, of whom I have three, to turn mine into money, and to bring in what I have outstanding debts; I want to honor and spread praise, honor and praise to her C. F. G. everywhere out of Christian debt, duty and love.

If, however, their C. F. G. could tolerate and suffer me in this faith and confession in their principality, and would pardon me [with] town clerkship, with a service, or with a fair amount of food, I would gladly, especially, and faithfully serve their C. F. G. before all princes and lords, and thank their C. F. G. eternally. What their C. F. G. will consider good or advise me on, I will obediently accept. I wrote in haste and did not want to write this time, but left E. A., who is otherwise anxious, unburdened; but my concern drives me and makes me have to bother E. A. now.

36. asking E. A. for God's sake not to blame me, and if E. A. did not want to look at anything else, but to take heart in the bitter suffering of Jesus Christ, and to let me enjoy my refuge, to ask my Lord for the most merciful answer in view of the fact that I will be forced into such a matter immediately. H. that I receive the most gracious answer, in view of the fact that I will be forced into such a matter immediately. If the Almighty God helps me to get in, or to obtain something, I will thank E. A. with the work. But if I remain poor, I will ask the living and merciful God for E. A.'s health, long life and blessedness. I have left my G. H.'s letter open, so that E. A. can read it and what is too much or too little in E. A.'s letter. A.'s letter too much or too little,

I have written this because I was in a hurry or because I was clumsy. Eternally commanded to the living God. Date Kemberg, Wednesday after Laurentii [August 12], Anno 1528.

E. Respectable willing

Andreas Carlstadt.

Please for favorable response.

702: Luther's report to Chancellor Brück, in which he apologizes against Carlstadt's edition and at the same time warns against it. Sept. 24, 1528.

This letter is found immediately after the locations given in the previous number, as well as in De Wette, Vol. III, p. 378 and in the Erlangen edition, Vol. 54, p. 38. The original is in the Weimar Gesamt Archive.

To the eightable, highly esteemed Lord Gregorius Brück, the right Doctor, and Electoral Chancellor of Saxony, my favorable Lord, and friendly dear Godfather.

1. grace and peace in Christ. Respectable, dear sir, kind benefactor! I have received and read your writing along with Carlstadt's ramblings; I truly do not know what to say to such evil grasps, for whatever evil happens to him, or good remains, that must have been done by Luther.

At my most gracious lord's request, my instruction is this: that Doctor Carlstadt surrender to my most gracious lord and promise to be quiet, not to write anything, nor to dispute with anyone secretly, but to feed himself in silence. He has often repeated this to all of us, and has also been directed to remain in the country, and has kept it (at least publicly) so stubbornly until now that he has not wanted to change his mistake even with me, if he had the permission of my most gracious lord, as he has then obtained.

(3) For once I had mercy on him, and out of compassion offered him whether I could dissolve his arguments and set them right; which he accepted with thanksgiving, and the joy and hope of us all, but afterward returned, and would not do it until he had been given the opportunity.

He had M. G. H.'s will to do so; he wanted to keep the escort so cat-clean. But I do not have a copy of the answer given to him by Spalatino three years ago.

But so that you may see how false the man is, I hereby send you a copy of the answer, 1) which I gave him to his argument, that he shows me to be quite unreasonable that I did not answer him. It is true, since he brought up such loose theiding, I got tired of it. And, however, it happened that I came across a letter he had sent to Schlesing 2) from which I realized that he took my good will and mercy for a mockery. Sint the time my heart fell from him.

Then I went and wrote to our captain, 3) he should tell Doctor Carlstadt: I wanted to have nothing more to do with him. For if he considered dedit or äoneo veniat to be an argument, he might also consider partes orationis quot sunt? and the like to be an argument. He was so annoyed by this that he wanted to disparage me against M. G. H., when M. G. H. had given me no order to act with him in this, but my mercy drove me.

I hereby send you the same letter as a sign, from which you will see how well he kept his escort and what a virtue his humility was. However, I kindly ask you to send the letter back to me in good condition, if it would be necessary to meet the devil with it. So far, I have kept it all for him. What should he do when he is away from us, if he does this in our castle? A booklet went out a year ago without any names, which were his, and I could not deny it when I held it up to him, but I knew it. But he made me the nose, he would have written and left them outside, and would be brought by others in print 2c. I had to let it be so; and still today leaves much to him secretly, and yet is pure.

7 Because he is now caught in public lies, I want to be seen by my Lord and trust him no more. For it would be a ride for my G. H. a ride, as well as all of us, if he acts so maliciously against us and writes books. For who would believe that without my Lord's will and our knowledge Carlstadt would be with us, and yet his books would fly out, as I have persuaded him so harshly at that time? But if he should come from your country, he would cause great trouble, and would perhaps be laid at the door of my gracious lord, as he might have done with good grace, and have kept the man safe; as was also the case with Münzer, which example almost moved me.

But I don't know how he should be treated. Some think that M. G. Herr should dare as much bread on him and hold him as the ostrich 4) was held in Weimar. My opinion would be that my G. H. indicated in reply that he had presented me falsely and did not want to be rebuked; therefore, S. C. F. G. caused to take him again into the previous silence and vow and not to let him leave the country, 5) until further grace 2c. How one can do this with serious words; for the man is so despondent against your seriousness that I worry that if he is taken in like this, he will perhaps despair. We are well burdened with him, and it serves me right that I have invited the devil as my guest and invited him into the country.

9 I want to have reported this out of duty, so that M. G. H. knows to beware. For so far we have not been able to get anything, so great a pretense did he put on, so much evil deceit was apparent. But now he betrays himself, and perhaps God warns us so graciously, the devil is not to be despised, for he can make a fire out of a spark, as he has often done,

4) About D. Jacob Strauß., Preacher at Eisenach, compare St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIX, Introduction, p. 47 f.

5) Towards the end of 1528, Carlstadt escaped from Saxony. See St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, Introduction, p. 27.

1) St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 324.

2) to Silesia to Krautwald and Schwenkfeld, No. 700 in this volume.

3) Hans Metsch at Wittenberg.

I had hoped that E. A. W. would have come here, so we would have continued to talk about it verbally; but this time it is enough. For the bottom line is that Doctor Carlstadt thinks we are all fools, and yet he is the most humble student before our eyes. Well then, let us be fools in Christo, Amen. Hiemit GOtt befohlen in seine Gnade und Stärke, Amen. Thursday after St. Matthew's [September 24] 1528.

E. A. W. willing

Martinus Luther.

Section Six of Chapter Eight.

Of other, in part from Carlstadt's evil example originated ravings, errors, impetuous preachers and such aergermissen, all of which Luther has bravely resisted.

From the impetuous Predign at Oelsnitz, and others who had spread erroneous teachings.

Luther's testimony of his annoyance at such preachers who cause trouble with uncouth words and manners.

See Luther's preface on Joh. Apel's Schutzfchrtft in the 14th volume of this collection, Col. 260 f.

Luther expresses his displeasure with Spalatin that the Weimar court preacher Wolfgang Stein married an elderly woman for the sake of mammon, which is a disgrace to the Gospel.

See Appendix, No. 123.

705: Luther's letter to the Oelsnitz City Council on account of their impetuous preacher, in which he asks for God's sake to turn the people away from him and to prevent the mob from using force. Dec. 4, 1523.

This letter is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. I, p. 277; in the Altenburger, vol. II, p. 366; in the Leipziger, vol. XVIII, p. 492; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 438 and in the Erlanger, vol. 53, p. 222.

To the honorable and wise council and the community of Oelsnitz, my special dear gentlemen and friends.

1. grace and peace in Christ. Honorable, wise, dear sirs and good friends! It is Come before me as a preacher 1) is with you, who undertakes to preach the gospel, but leads the people to it, or ever does not resist them, so that they refrain from doing it by force.

2 Now this is forbidden by Christ, that his preachers should be protected by human help, but stand freely under God's trust alone, as he says Matth. 5, 39: "You shall not resist evil. But flee from one city to another. For even if I had wanted to take comfort in the power of princes or lords, I would have long since made a different play, but not a good one.

For this reason, I kindly ask you, for God's sake, to turn away your people from such things. For it brings great dishonor to the holy gospel and to all of us, which unfortunately is all too great before, through much loose, careless preaching by boys.

4) One should preach and carry the cross, not teach and seek protection and shelter. But where the preacher will not let himself be guided, we must call upon God's hand with prayer, which would be very difficult for him to carry, for it is terrible to fall into God's hand, Hebr. 10, 31. Hereby commanded by God. On Friday Barbarä [Dec. 4] 1523 at Wittemberg. Martinus Luther, D.

1) This preacher was, as Seckendorf nist. l'utti., lid. I, x. 282, K160, äää.1. reports, Wolfgang Crusius.

706 Luther's letter to Michael von der Straßen concerning the preacher at Oelsnitz im Voigtlande, Wolfgang Crusius, who rejected confession and absolution, as well as papal law and the mass without communion, in very harsh terms. October 16, 1523.

This letter is first printed from a copy in the Weimar Archives in the Supplement to the Leipzig edition, p. 34; then in Walch; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 422 and in the Erlanger, vol. 53, p. 218.

To the honorable and firm Michael von der Straßen, escort at Borna, my especially favorable lord and friend.

Grace and peace in Christ. These articles are much more valid, namely those about forced confession and mass are about money. But you have well heard my opinion in the booklet on confession and mass: that confession is good when it is uncoerced and free, and mass is not sacrifice, nor good works, but only a testament and God's good deed 2c. But this preacher lacks that he starts too high, and throws away the old shoes before he has new ones, and wants to put the must into old barrels; that is not fine. He should teach the people neatly about faith and love; this teaching would be time enough for a year, if they understood Christ well beforehand. What is it that one attacks the ignorant people so quickly? I have preached in Wittenberg for three years before I brought it to the people, and they want to do it in one hour. We are sorry enough for them, such honor-seekers. For this reason, I ask you to tell the Oelsnitz governor that he should order the preacher to start cleanly and preach Christ correctly for the time being, or leave his raving and go away; but especially that he should leave confession unpunished and unpunished with absolution, and not mix the parish office with monastery and cathedral work. I can see that [he] is an immodest head who has seen a smoke, but does not know where it burns, and has heard ringing, but not beating. Hiemit GOtt commanded. Your gift, if it comes, we will not refuse and thank you kindly. Greetings to your dear Ribben. God's grace with you. Amen. I think that this writing is enough also for the Schösser zu Oelsnitz, because I am overwhelmed with letters. I will gladly be at the will of his son, where he needs me and I can. At Wittenberg, on Friday Galli [16 October] 1523 . Luther.

707 Luther's letter to the Elector John of Saxony in the matter of Hans Mohr, a soldier at Coburg, who had denied the presence of the body and blood of Christ in the Lord's Supper. January 16, 1528.

The original of this letter is in the Weimar Archives, printed from it in the Supplement to the Leipzig edition, p. 49; in De Wette, Vol. III, p.256 and in the Erlangen edition, Vol. 53, p. 416. All editions have the wrong date: "January 9", because it has been overlooked, which Burkhardt, p. 126, states, that the date of the original reads: "Dornstag nachtriura reZuin."

To the most illustrious, highborn Prince and Lord, Duke of Saxony and Elector, Landgrave in Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, my most gracious Lord.

Grace and peace in Christ. Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Lord! On the matter of Hans Mohr at Coburg, on account of the Zwinglian opinion, I give E. C. F. G. my humble opinion. First, because the same Hans Mohr has no command to speak of such matters publicly, and yet is annoying to others, since he is not required or urged by anyone to confess his faith, he should refrain from speaking of it among the simple until he is urged to do so. Secondly, because he is not certain of the matter, nor can he be certain, he should not speak of it to anyone, whether learned or unlearned, in the opinion that he wants to consider it certain, even according to divine right, 1 Pet. 3, but to the preacher (where he does not want to remain silent) and the pastor; 1) there first hear and ask that they first hear his cause and reason, and then act with him in a Christian way. Thirdly, because he blasphemes our faith with a public lie, since he says that we make the Creator out of the creature, he shall thereby justly deserve eternal silence, as the thus sufficiently indicating that he understands neither our faith nor his own, and out of sheer wilful ignorance wants to atone for his lust and blasphemy, and incite the poor rabble to the same lie and blasphemy. For we do not say that the creature is made the Creator when we say that Christ's body is in the Lord's Supper or the bread. He does not want to know that we do not make the bread and the body one being and nature, but only that the bread and the body are there at the same time; just as all blasphemers blaspheme. And even if one were to say that the creature became the Creator (as we do not do in this article), it would still not be all wrong, for we all believe and say that God is man and man is God in Christ, since man is the creature and God the Creator. Therefore, such speech is not so abominable among Christians as they blaspheme, and thus want to make it false that God is man. Therefore, such lies and blasphemies should be cause enough for his mouth to be controlled, as it is to be assumed that he prefers to deal with lies and blasphemies than with the truth. I order E. C. F. G. to judge this humbly. 1) Hereby commanded by God. Amen. Thursday after the Octave Trium Regum [16 Jan] 1528.

1) There is no punctuation mark here in the outputs.

E. C. F. G.
subservient
Martinus Luther.

708: Luther's letter to the escort at Borna, Michael von der Straßen, against the rebellious preacher at Oelsnitz.

December 5, 1523.

This letter is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. I, p. 177; in the Altenburger, vol. II, p. 366; in the Leipziger, vol. XVIII, p. 492; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 439 and in the Erlanger, vol. 53, p. 223.

Grace and peace in Christ. Honorable, dear Lord and friend! I have received and heard your writing together with the enclosed letter, and it is my counsel that my

1) Seckendorf, nist. lmtk., lib. II, x.124,? 43 (2), reports: After receiving this answer from Luther, this soldier's appointment was taken away, and he was dismissed, since he could not be reformed and silenced.

The most gracious Lord should do this by force and either expel the preacher at Oelsnitz or force him to talk the people out of such clumsy things and revoke them. For such preaching is neither evangelical nor human, but certainly of the devil. And because they do this with their fists, it is not enough to act against them with words, but to fight the fist with a fist. Let one or six be taken by the neck and thrown into the hole, and the devil will change his attitude. I have already written a letter to the council and congregation there. Hereby commanded by God, on Saturday, in Vigilia Nicolai [December 5] Anno 1523.

Martinus Luther.

B. How D. Strauss at Eisenach and Wolfgang Stein at Weimar have abolished imperial and papal law and want to reintroduce the Mosaic laws.

709 Luther's objection, written at the request of Duke John Frederick on June 18, 1524, to the controversy raised by V. Jakob Strauß as to whether one should judge according to the laws of Moses or those of the Emperor.

This concern, which is fragmented in Walch (namely the first part is found in vol. X, 402; the second part in vol. XXI, 70) is found in the St. Louis edition, vol. X, 354 ff. It is to be dated June 18, 1524. In the previous editions, the wrong date is: "May 21." Likewise, the wrong address: "An den Churfürsten Friedrich." According to Burkhardt, p. 71, the following corrections should be made in the text: Col. 356, line 2 v. u. read: "ob's" instead of: als; id. Z. I v. u. read: "GOtt" instead of: gar; Col. 357, Z. 7 v. u. read: "und lass da sehen".

710 Duke John Frederick of Saxony's answer to D. Matt. Luther, in which he testifies to great joy over the explanation he has received and the insight he has gained into this controversial question, adding that he hopes to win back his father, the Elector, whom Wolfgang Stein had completely taken over; he also wishes that Luther would hold a church visitation and remove unfit preachers with the help of the authorities.

This letter is found in Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. X, 352.

Two imperial congresses held at Nuremberg in the years 1522 to 1524, and the consequences of the latter in particular.

Since the documents in this chapter are rather colorfully jumbled, we give the reader here for his orientation a short historical message about the Imperial Diet held in Nuremberg in the years 1522 to 1524. The first one was announced by Emperor Carl V on February 12, 1522, for March 23 (No. 711), and lasted until May 8, as can be seen from the Reichstag resolution No. 734. In this very convention it was decreed that a new Diet should be opened on September 1, 1522. The first Reichstag dealt almost exclusively with the imminent danger of the Turks and how to avert it; Luther is not even mentioned in the Reichstag resolution. The second Reichstag lasted until March 6, 1523, and was ended on that day by the imperial mandate No. 731 instead of a Reichstag conclusion. The third Reichstag was announced for the beginning of December 1523, but opened only on January 14, 1524, and ended on April 18, 1524, by the Imperial Mandate No. 741. Here it is actually only about the last two imperial assemblies.

First Section.

Of the former Imperial Diet at Nuremberg, which began in the fall of 1522 and continued until March 6, 1523.

From the imperial tender of this Reichstag.

711 Emperor Carl V's invitation to the Imperial Diet in Nuremberg, addressed to Michael Freiherr von Wolkenstein. Nuremberg, February 12, 1522.

From Lünig's first part of the "xieil. " seul., x. 1545.

Charles by the Grace of God elected Rome. Emperor at all times Merer of the Empire in Germania to Hispania, baider Sicilien, of Jerusalem 2c. King Ertzhertzog zu Oesterreich. Noble dear faithful, after we have reported, how then the undoubted truth and history also indicates, that the villainous and frightening enemy of Christianity, the tyrant, recently entered the Christian kingdom of Hungary with great earnestness and great march, there, according to his brutal way and use, he shed a lot of Christian blood, also committed other inhuman cruelty, destroyed several castles and fortresses in no small number and thus almost the strongest pass in the world.

The king has conquered Hungaria with many villages, hamlets and territories in a costly and serious manner, and has in part destroyed and destroyed them, and has also occupied some of them for his own benefit, and has provided them 1) with guns and other equipment, which is also to remain unconquered, but (as if he had the power of the army) to be in power and to be in control, to go back to Hungary in the near future, to gain the remaining part there, and to fight against the attacking Christians as well as against the Lower Austrian Bavarians and other lands, and to make the Christians' care even more burdensome, He has betrayed his sister to the great Tartar, for which reason it can be safely assumed that he will move on Poland and also corruptly damage the Christian kingdom there, and as such an insatiable tyrant will unscrupulously seek the Christian blood everywhere, so that, if he were allowed to do so, and if he were not given timely advice, necessary serious help, counter-attack and salvation, that he might quickly take his tyrannical power and gain the greater part of the Christianity, destroy it and finally exterminate the same Christians, he would not be able to do so.

1) "gespisiet" - verpallisadirt.

and to the most demanding of the German nation to small and irreparable trouble and disadvantage, and because the frightening intercession and the great importance of the matter demand from many well-timed deliberation, together with strong help, serious and wise education, most earnestly, which then, without a proper imperial assembly, the emergency meeting cannot be held, decided upon, or carried out in a proper or fruitful manner, so for this reason, and therefore because of the unavoidable emergency, we, together with our governors, princes, sovereigns, and councillors, of our Imperial Regiment in the Holy Roman Empire, have convened an Imperial Diet on the Sunday of Oculi [March 23] in the Basilica of the Holy Roman Empire. March] in the Basten negstkhombenden in our and the holy. We herewith bind you and sincerely request you, by the duties with which you are bound to Us and the Empire, to personally submit to such Imperial Day and to appear there at Nuremberg at the earliest possible time, together with and in addition to the above-mentioned regiment and other sentries of the Empire, which we have described in the same white on the aforementioned day, In the above-mentioned matters, for the meeting, dismissal and prevention of the Tyrckian complaints, and in other matters concerning the realm, you will advise, act, decide and execute, and you will not fail to do so, nor will you refuse or delay on the part of others, and you will do so entirely in accordance with the above-mentioned order, even as a Christian citizen and according to the realm's wishes, Our sincere opinion, for if you remain outside of it, thus giving cause for the obstruction of the serious and high duty, then we want to excuse ourselves from the Almighty and hereby only bezaigt and the other obedient, that such by us or our Vleiß not confessed, especially you, what such the disobedience and remaining outside of menige suspicion and otherwise may bring with it, have hereby graciously warned and reprimanded you, and in view of the fact that the present intention and the planning of the attack have been reported and then the action, rescue and counteraction, which otherwise, according to the occasion and against the attack, must be taken, ordered and carried out properly, effectively and finally, between now and the beginning of the month of May, must be taken, ordered and carried out negatively.

1) Köstlin, "Martin Luther" (3), Vol. I, p. 624, gives "March 26" as the day on which this Reichstag was announced.

2) "sover" - provided.

have not been allowed to continue or extend the above-mentioned day any further or longer. Given in our and the imperial city of Nuremberg on the twelfth day of February after the birth of Christ, five hundred and fifteen, and in the twelfth and twentieth year, of our Roman Empire in the third year, and of all the others in the sixth year.

Inscriptio.

To the noble our and the empire's dear faithful,
Wilhelm, Freyherm zu Wolckenstein.

B. What the Emperor has sent to the Imperial Estates and to the Pope himself in response to their request for the Annals.

712 Emperor Carl V's answer to the concerns of Count Palatine Frederick, Imperial Majesty's governor, and the imperial estates assembled at the Imperial Diet in Nuremberg, concerning the Annals. 1522.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 158; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 1585; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 222 and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 320. In the Jena edition it is under the year 1522.

1. that you, and others, the secular princes, princes and estates, who were assembled at the aforementioned Imperial Diet held at Nuremberg, have considered that the annals, which the archbishops, bishops and prelates of papal holiness gave to Rome, were initially permitted and approved to be given to Rome for good honorable reasons, and especially to resist the Turk 2c., and because the Turk of this time is breaking out in many places and causing great damage to Christendom, there are good reasons to keep the annals in Germany and to use them for the maintenance of peace and justice in the Holy Empire.

2) Likewise, the pensions which now fall from German lands to Rome, and also that of all high and low monasteries the tenth penny of all their income, for four years, but still at the least a benefice, the next one, which is settled by the death of a person, of each monastery, is sufficient and used for such maintenance. And further, that all monasteries, such parish priests, chaplains, and other common priests, who are not in monasteries, would be assessed a considerable sum. And also that each of the mendicant monasteries shall give five guilders annually. As

For all this is understood in your and the other imperial states' instructions and articles, more broadly and more clearly.

3. we add to your love, and to you others, to hear graciously that such articles would not be almost repugnant to us, in so far as they may be obtained and raised by papal sanctity. We therefore write to our holy father, the pope, requesting his holiness to grant such annotations and other articles, so that peace and justice may be maintained in the holy realm and the Turks may be resisted all the more valiantly. As you will hear all this from our letter, which we are sending you together with copies of it.

We also write our message to papal holiness, 1) so that it may also promote such matter and action, and E. L. and you others may then hand over such letter to papal holiness and our message, and let the matter be pursued as you will see fit. L. and you others may thereupon hand over such letter to Papal Holiness and our message, and, as it will seem good to you, have the matter pursued further.

713 Emperor Carl V's letter to Pope Hadrian VI, dated October 31, 1522, at Valladolid, in which he informs the pope of the request made by the imperial estates and asks him to take it into consideration, adding that a tax was needed to subdue the Lutherans with the sword.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 158d; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 159; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 222; and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 320.

Carl von GÖttes Gnaden, elected Roman Emperor.

Most holy Father, most venerable Lord! Although your Holiness' kindness to us and fatherly love are so great, and our reverence and esteem for your Holiness so marked that they could not be greater, yet all the peoples who are subject to our authority before respect the same 2) your Holiness' kindness even greater, even so great that they consider it that we may ask nothing in vain from Your Holiness, so that Your Holiness will gladly grant us everything we ask for. Which also makes us ask for things freely and confidentially from H.H., which we otherwise would not be allowed to ask for without shame, before, because they are such things, which are conceived for the sake of common salvation and peace, and are asked by us.

2. Because in recent months in our imperial city of Nuremberg all the estates of the Holy Roman Empire came together for the protection and salvation of the Empire in Hungary, and the princes, other princes and secular estates noted, among other things, that the German lands had become so poor and incapable that they were not only able to act honestly against the Turks, but also that there was not so much wealth and property of the Holy Roman Empire, not only to act and execute something honest against the most ferocious enemies of the Christian faith, the Turks, but also that they do not have so much wealth and property of the Holy Roman Empire that they would be able to protect and maintain justice and peace, and also to punish the evil deeds and unpleasant injustices of the evil-doers, if they were not also endowed by H. H. with clemency, paternalism, and the power of the Holy Roman Empire. H.'s clemency, paternal favor and help.

3 And among other things, report how their new bishops have been in the habit of giving annuities from the beginning, and especially for this reason, that with such money the enemies of the Christian faith should be driven out. Since the Turks had already conquered a large part of Hungary and were now seeking German lands, it would be fair that such annuities be kept in German lands and be used for such purposes.

(4) Further, because there is nothing more holy among men, nor more pleasing to God, than the honor of justice and equity, therefore they would have considered it neither displeasing to God, nor ungodly in some ways, that the things which are consecrated and sanctified for the honor of the divine majesty alone, to preserve peace and justice, should be so applied.

5 Following they desired, were also of the hope, it should be obtained by our intercession of your holiness:

6. first, that all pension and interest, which are given from the German fiefs and benefices of your Holiness Court and the Romanists, be kept henceforth in German lands.

Item 7: That all high and low monastery churches should annually tithe their income, or at least the income of the 3) next settled prebend, as forfeited and continuously unpaid, should be added.

1) This seems to us to indicate that this writing will have to be set at the same time as the following number.

2) Jenaer: dieselben; Wittenberger: dieselb.

3) So the Jenaer. Wittenbergers: "des".

Because German lands are also full of very rich monasteries, a tax should also be imposed on them. Likewise, that the other priestly estates, each according to his wealth, give something to it. Item, that each mendicant monastery shall annually contribute five guilders.

(9) And that all such income should be used to resist the Turks, and to confirm and dedicate justice and peace in German lands and in the Holy Roman Empire, and to nothing else. And that your Holiness will grant and graciously permit all this for four years.

10. When we diligently note that the Turks, the eternal enemies of the Christian community, have won the most solid oers, and almost the keys of the Hungarians, and are now most eager for German lands alone; Also that the income of the holy empire and customs, due to the indulgence and leniency of our ancestors to make the clergy rich, are so much diminished and torn, that not only is it impossible to resist the Turks, but also law and peace cannot be maintained for a longer time, if they are not helped with these and other tributes, which they want to impose on themselves, by your holiness's leniency and most gracious disposition.

They also indicate to us that the harmful Lutheran sect, which we have not refrained from dampening and eradicating, has taken hold of the minds of so many Germans as a deadly poison, so that we fear that the Christian community will also be burned there, if justice is not strengthened and fortified by this tax, so that one day the followers of this poisoned doctrine may be punished with the sword.

(12) To which cause we know many Germans to be inclined and willing, and before those who are the noblest, to maintain the peace and power of the common Roman church.

For this reason, we ask your Holiness most earnestly that she, with her divine mind and most gracious eyes, so that she may be respected for having enlightened Christendom, may graciously look upon all this; and set before her eyes the hostile paniers and almost insurmountable armies of the Turks, as well as the fire of the Lutheran doctrine, which has taken over the minds of all the wicked. Likewise our absence from German lands, and that the present flames of such great evils and troubles may be quenched by nothing else than the eternal fountain of your holiness, kindness and clemency.

14) And Your Holiness deigns 1) all this to grant and abate four years to us, the Holy Roman Empire, and the German Nation, which has always been well behaved against the Roman See, so many and so great evils and troubles.

15. And if Your Holiness will give the nation, which is invincible in wars, desired assistance, as we hope to do, to tame the Turks, in the greatest empire of Christendom, and establish in the nation, which is otherwise restless, 2) honor of justice and peace, it will make innumerable, and the most illustrious princes accidental and favorable to it, also to the other Germans, who now, seduced by the Lutheran heresy, who, seduced by the Lutheran heresy, have been thought to be somewhat opposed to the Roman See, will be lured and moved by this most mild and paternal benefit of Your Holiness, who will offer and promise all that they can do with diligence, work and reverence, all that they can do with faithfulness and understanding, all that they can do with wealth and power, and all that they can do to protect your blessedness and the dignity and power of the Holy Papal See.

(16) How your Holiness will hear all this from our deputy, the noble Lord John Emmanuel, Duke of Sesse, for a long time. And we desire that your holiness be healthy, and blessedly preside over the holy Roman and the whole common Christian church for a long time. Given in our city of Vallis Oleti [Valladolid], on the last day of October, Anno Domini 1522, of the Roman Empire in the fourth 2c.

Carl, by favor of divine goodness, elected Roman Emperor, always the ruler of the Empire.

714 Emperor Carl V and the commonwealth of the Holy Roman Empire complain against the encroachments of the Roman Pontiff and his court. Valladolid, October 31, 1522.

From Goldast's oonstitut. iinpsrial, torn. I, p. 442. This number is nothing other than another translation of what is given in No. 713. The title given there corresponds better to the content than the one given here.

Translated from Latin by M. A. Tittel,

1) "geruhe" put by us according to the following relation instead of "gern" in the editions, which is probably read from "gerue".

2) Here, in order to make sense, we thought we had to change the text according to the following relation. The old editions offer: "and otherwise the restless honor" 2c.

2107

Carl V, Roman Emperor (all time Mehrer 2c. offers) Hadrian VI, Roman Pontiff (his greeting).

Most Holy Father, Most Reverend Lord! Although your Holiness' benevolence and fatherly love towards us, as well as our veneration and respect for him, is so great that it cannot be greater, all of us, and especially our subjects and peoples, consider it to be even greater, in such a way that they firmly believe that we can ask nothing of H.H. in vain, but that his Holiness would gladly be at our beck and call in all matters. Therefore, what we would otherwise ask only timidly and doubtfully, we ask everything from H.H. quite freely and confidently, especially if it is something that is for the common good, and thus seems to be desirable from us.

2. Since all the estates of the Holy Roman Empire met last month in our imperial city of Nuremberg for the protection and defense of the Kingdom of Hungary, and the princes, princes and other secular estates found, among other things, that Germany had fallen into such poverty and destitution, that they not only do nothing right against the arch-enemies of Christendom, but also can hardly muster so much in the Holy Roman Empire to administer and protect law and peace, and to keep ungodly, sacrilegious people's knavery and insolent damage in check, if they are not granted clemency and paternal favor by Your Holiness.

It was also thought that the annuities, which the new bishops are accustomed to pay to the Roman pope, were granted primarily so that the enemies of Christianity would be kept away by such money; but now the Turks have taken a good part of Lower Hungary, and are also snatching at Germany, and it is therefore reasonable that such annuities be retained in Germany and used for such purposes there.

Furthermore, nothing was more holy and pleasing to God than the practice of justice and equity, for which reason they were of the opinion that it could not be contrary to God, nor be called ungodly 1) if that which had been dedicated and sanctified for the honor of divine majesty, to preserve justice and equity, also common peace, was partly applied; therefore they also demanded and hoped to obtain through our intercession with your holiness, first of all, that the pleasures (interest, Pensiones), which are paid to Your Holiness and the Roman Court by the ecclesiastical priesthoods in Germany, would henceforth be retained in Germany. Likewise, that every higher or lower monastery church be taxed annually the tithe of its income, or else the income of the first prebend to become vacant in the future, as a dead and always vacant position, be retained, and the richest monasteries, of which Germany is full, likewise be taxed according to each one's fortune; and also that each monastery of mendicants should pay five florins interest annually; and that such income should be used entirely to ward off the invasion of the Turks and to maintain law and peace in Germany and the Holy Roman Empire, but that it should not be used for anything else. Holiness to allow and graciously grant the above-mentioned things for four years.

5. As well as considering that the constant enemies of Christendom, the Turks, have conquered the most distinguished fortresses and ramparts in Hungary and are now striving almost alone for Germany; and that the revenues and customs of the Holy Roman Empire, through the forbearance and tolerance of our forefathers, the leniency and benevolence of our forefathers, and the enrichment of the ecclesiastical class, have been so degraded and torn apart that neither the Turks can be resisted, nor can common peace and justice continue to be maintained in Germany, if by such and other taxes, which the estates of the Empire will moreover willingly impose upon themselves, the leniency and benevolence of your Holiness does not give them a hand.

6. it also comes to our minds that the godless sect of the Lutherans, which we have taken all pains to eliminate, has crept into so many German minds as a harmful poison, and has taken such hold that we also fear a devouring fire in Christendom from it, if the right were not strengthened and supported by reported taxes in such a way that one could finally take sharp action against the followers of such a poisonous sect. To which we see many German minds, and especially those who are of the noblest and most honest class, quite inclined and eager.

(7) So we implore Your Holiness most earnestly that, according to your divine mind and blessed eyes, so that they may shine upon Christendom, they may consider all this most graciously, the Turks' flying flags and almost insurmountable armies, plus the fire of Luther's harmful teaching, which has taken over the hearts of most of the wicked, as well as our absence from Germany; likewise.

1) Here Goldast offers imprium instead of Impium.

that such flames of evil can be extinguished by no other than your Holiness' inexhaustible source of kindness and clemency, and that the above-mentioned request be graciously granted and allowed to us, as well as to the Holy Roman Empire and the German nation, which has otherwise always been well deserving of the Holy Apostolic See, for the prevention or control of such great evils, for four years.

8. If your Holiness will be pleased to grant this, it will give the otherwise brave people the desired assistance in restraining the Turkish wrath and cruelty, and help to establish justice and righteousness, along with common peace, among the most prominent people of Christendom and the otherwise turbulent empire, and unite with a single act of benevolence a group of illustrious princes, as well as the other Germans, who, through the Lutheran sect, seem to have turned away somewhat from this Holy See and to be disinclined toward it, a fine opportunity, if they are enticed by this most mild and paternal benefaction of Your Holiness, to henceforth offer and promise all honor, love and esteem, also loyalty and zeal, yes, everything they can devise and accomplish, for the honor and prestige of Your Holiness and of the Holy Apostolic See. As all this Your Holiness will hear from our envoy, and Mr. John Emmanuel, Duke of Sesse (Sesse), with more. With which we entrust Your Holiness to the divine care, and wish her to preside happily for a long time over the holy Roman and universal Church. Given in our city of Valladolid, Oct. 31, 1522, of our kingdom, the Roman in the fourth 2c.

Carl von GÖttes Gnaden gewählter Röm.
Kaiser, allzeit Mehrer 2c.

6) How the pope tried to make the Chursachsen fearful by sending them hard brevia, which, however, the Elector did not turn at all, but rather showed his displeasure about it.

715 Pope Hadrian VI's letter to Elector Frederick of Saxony, concerning the religious matter at the Diet of Nuremberg, dated Oct. 5, 1522, in which he admonishes him to defend at the present Diet of Nuremberg the dignity and majesty of the Apostolic See and the

The aim was to help protect and manage the tranquil state of all Christianity, as his ancestors did, to abandon Luther and his followers, and to return to the Roman Church.

This writing is found in Latin in the Wittenberg edition (1551), tom. II, fol. 351b; in the Jena (1566), tova. II, fol. 536 b; and in the Erlangen, opp. v. ur^h, tom. VI, x. 459; German in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 157b; in the Jenaer (1585), vol. II, p. 158; in the Altenburger, vol. II, p. 370 and in the Leipziger, vol. XVIII, p. 369.

Adrianus, Pope VI.

Beloved Son, Hail and Apostolic Blessing. Having recently heard of the great and glorious gathering of the princes of the German nation to be held shortly in Nuremberg, we are greatly pleased, but even more so since we have heard that you, noble Lord, will also be coming there. For since so many Christian princes, but especially you, will be gathered there in the Lord, it is to be hoped that there will be acted upon for the common benefit, salvation and welfare of the Christian faith, or, above all, by what means and ways so much evil that has arisen in Christendom may be met and helped.

Therefore, so that we do not omit anything that is due to our pastoral office, to request and remember at such a meeting, we have decided, with the advice of the venerable of our brothers, the holy Roman Church Cardinals, to deliver our apostolicum Nuncium and Legate to the said place, which shall henceforth remain with the said noble nation (which has always been dear to us).

However, because our nuncio is preparing for the journey and getting ready, we have sent our dear son and chamberlain, Hieronymum Rorarium, who is always with us, beforehand and ordered him to hand over our Scriptures to the present, but especially, that he should dispose of you, noble lord (whom we, even when we were still in a lesser state, always loved before others, and also want to love paternally), and indicate to you our inclined will and fatherly heart for common welfare. You will hear further reports about this from our legate, which will follow soon after.

Therefore, we fatherly admonish, and earnestly desire, noble Lord, that you, in accordance with your office and profession (since you are Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, and Advocate and Member of the Roman Church), show and strive with the highest diligence, and uphold the dignity, dignity, and majesty of the apostolic office.

I hope that you will help to protect and preserve the holy and peaceful state of the whole of Christendom and of the holy faith, as your forefathers (whose praise and good report you have increased and not diminished in other matters) have done, and are fully hopeful and confident that you will follow them in this.

Jerome will give further account of this and other things, in all of which we ask that you give him complete faith. Date at Rome, at St. Peter's, under the Fisherman's Ring, the 5th of October, Anno Domini 1522, of our Papacy in the first year. 1)

716 Pope Hadrian VI's extremely punitive breve to Elector Frederick of Saxony, in which, among other things, he falsely accuses the Elector that his princely house owes the Church to Pope Gregory V. and is now paying the apostolic see with such ingratitude. and is now paying the apostolic see with such ingratitude; in doing so, he violently attacks Luther and uses the most bitter words to denigrate him and the Elector, but finally admonishes the Elector to repent and return if he does not want to receive both swords, the papal and the imperial, at the same time. 1523.

This document is found in Latin in the Jena edition (1566), tonl. II, fol. 541 and in the Erlanger, opp. var. arZ., tom. VI, p. 478. German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 180; in the Jena (1585), vol. II, p. 261; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 221 and in the Leipzig, vol. XVIII, p. 319. Both the Wittenberg and the Jena editions place it in the year 1523. On July 11, 1523, Luther sent it to Spalatin. See Appendix, No. 102.

Beloved Son, blessedness and papal pardon. We have endured enough, and more than enough, beloved in Christ, if perhaps God's goodness has deigned to 2) petition your soul, and give it repentance, to know the truth, so that you may return from the devil's snares, by which you are held captive.

2. we know that you have been fatherly remembered by our ancestor, blessed memory, that you wanted to separate from yourself the corruption of the Christian faith, Martin Luther. And after his most wicked deeds were revealed to the whole world, we hoped that you would also turn back to a repentant heart. But because we have waited for grapes, behold, there have been found hostlings, for the blower has blown in vain, for your wickednesses are not consumed. My mercy on you has moved me, my fatherly love has moved me, so that we have always meant you and your subjects, the Saxons, in the Lord, to address you with holy and fatherly remembrances, so that you may finally return and repent, lest the prophet soon after call them evil silver, for the Lord has rejected them.

3 And what shall we say unto you, but that Paul said unto his Galatians [Cap. 3:1.], "O ye unlearned, who hath bewitched you, that ye obey not the truth?" Ye ran well; Ask your fathers, and they will tell you, your ancestors, and they will proclaim to you, that from the time when Pope Hadrian and Emperor Carl the Great, planters of the faith in Saxony, lived at the same time and at one time, until our times, and the times of Carl, our most beloved son in Christ, your ancestors and forefathers, indeed all Saxons have always been considered lovers of peace, defenders of the faith, and everywhere peaceful children of obedience, and so done, that not unreasonably Gregory the Fifth, who was born a Saxon, about to become pope, appointed a Duke of Saxony a Elector of the Roman Empire.

4 Therefore, to what has the very best color so soon been changed? Why are we so soon maddened from him that called us into the grace of Christ, into another gospel, which is no other? Only that there are some who grieve you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ. Who hath destroyed the vineyard of the Lord of hosts, which was so beautifully planted? Verily a wild boar hath laid it waste, and a strange wild beast hath corrupted it. But the woe is from you, from the household and friends, and from the woe of the inward members.

5 We beseech thee, beloved Son in Christ, lift up thine eyes straight, and see where thou art cast down. Consider how great a battle you have brought to the Church of Christ, that she is surrounded, besieged, and crushed on every side, for that you have helped her to do.

1) In the Latin copies there is still the signature: Be: El: and the inscription: "To the beloved son, the noble Lord Frederick, Duke of Saxony, Elector of the Holy Roman Empire 2c."

2) In Latin: äiANKtur; in the old German editions: "gerwet" (-geruet); in Walch's old edition: "gereuet".

1) Outwardly it is warred against by the most cruel and powerful enemy of the Christian faith; inwardly and at home the princes and rulers of the Christian community are at odds and at odds, arming themselves to 2) destroy one another, contending against one another with the most bloodthirsty sorrows, and unsheathing their swords against the brotherly limbs, and so that the heathen hardly do it more cruelly and unkindly.

(6) If these troubles have not seemed burdensome enough to you, you have introduced sorrow upon sorrow, and nourished and kept the serpent in your bosom, who poisons heaven and earth with the poison of his tongue, so much so that the sword has now come even to the soul. But as much as the soul is more than the body, so much more grievous is all this, the dreadful and more than infernal poison, that by touching the heresies and breaking up so many thousands of souls are corrupted.

7. So we all have this to thank thee for, that they are now falling away far and wide from the unity of our church; that the unlearned people are deceived, and by innumerable deceits and enchantments are drawn away from the faith which they sucked from motherly breasts; that the churches are without people, that the nations are without priests, that the priests are without honor, and that the Christians are without Christ; that the holy things of faith are not held to be holy things; that the sanctuary of Christ is denied to be holy; that the holy days are deprived of their solemn glory; that men die in their sins; that souls are dragged before the dreadful judgment seat, neither reconciled by penance, nor confirmed by the holy sacrament; that the very finest order of the Tabernacle is disrupted, and that for the Christian peace and peace of mind one is aroused and hurried far and wide to mischief, disobedience, robbery, murder, burning, with great and manifest danger to the common good, as with a field cry.

8. for which of thy distinguished services in the church of Christ, what reward, thinkest thou, yea, what punishment and torture shall we know thee worthy of? You would perhaps say: The Snake has deceived me. Surely, you have received your deserved reward for protecting the snake in your womb.

9. But art thou so foolish and so utterly without understanding, that thou hast believed more in those things in which they that err are sure to be damned, a few little men that are full of sin, than so many most holy fathers from the beginning, who have striven in the law of God day and night, than so many common conciliar things, against which the insolent mouth, like an open sepulcher, is not ashamed to open; and finally also, because of the holy and common Christian church, whose use, practice, custom, decree and constitution, from the time of the apostles on, has been kept unbreakable until now, this one man dares to condemn by ecclesiastical sacrilege? O of blind nonsense, and more than Jewish 3) blindness!

(10) But you may have been deceived by the fact that the deceiver Martinus and his followers, your eighth, strengthened their opinion with the chapters of the Holy Scripture. And what heretic has not done so? Are these not the guilefulnesses of the old serpent, who likewise blinded the angel as by this carrion 4) and always pursued the unholy souls by a thousand kinds of art and cunning? Which has also long ago undertaken to break the cornerstone of the right faith, to separate Christian unity, to sow its seed in the field of Scripture, and to introduce a perverse understanding of Scripture.

Because the greatest part of the church is always the inexperienced multitude, and hardly one or two are found who with spiritual eyes are able to judge worthily of the understanding of the Scriptures; for we read that the book is sealed, which only the Lion of the family of Judah 5) has trusted to open, and all his seals. What devilish delusion is this, that you have been able to give more faith in the understanding of the Scriptures to a carnal man, who constantly drinks wine and drinks more than to the rest of the world, than to so many spiritual fathers, whose will has always been in the law of the Lord, who have proved their doctrine by the holiness of their lives, by the demonstration of the Spirit, and finally by the torture.

O of the new and unheard-of blindness! Has

1) The meaning of this sentence is according to the Latin: Consider how great a defeat you have inflicted on the Church of Christ, which is surrounded and almost crushed by so many evils on all sides, instead of doing what you should have helped her with.

2) "um" put by us instead of "an" in the editions; Latin: in intutuin xernioism....

3) "Jewish" put by us instead of "the Jewish"; Latin: juckaiea oasoitak.

4) "Carrion" (esca) here is that which serves for eating; bait. - blinded" - withdraws from the eyes, hides.

5) Here also the Jena edition has wrong: "gerewet".

You some apostate and apostate may persuade that the ancients have deceived us all, that the descendants err, and that the kingdom of God has come in him alone, and those whom he has deceived, and that have come all the riches of the mercy of God, and the grace of the whole world? And why do we not speak with the prophets: Alas, alas, alas, O LORD, hast thou deceived thy people? Yea, why have ye not rather, according to the commandment of the apostle, shunned the questions and disputings of words, out of which arise envy, strife, blasphemy, suspicion, wicked strife of men that have mad senses, and turn back the hearts of the hearers with their works, and, after the Lord's report, be diligent to know the unconsecrated Son, which came unto you at first in sheep's clothing, but which inwardly is the most ravenous wolf? For you should not have known the tree from the leaves, nor from the blossom, but from the fruit.

13. But are not his most mischievous fruits evident? For this church thief is not afraid to break the holy images against God, yes, even the holy cross of Christ with his wicked hands, and to trample with his stained feet, so that this sacrilegious man does not cease to constantly incite the laity by ungodly fury, to wash their hands in the blood of priests, and disturbs the church of Christ with murderous weapons. He is always doing this, so that people are strangled in their sins; he alone works on the fact that divine mercy, through its sacraments, which it wanted to be powerful remedies for sin, does not heal and cure the wounded in their churches.

(14) For he has either so consumed all the sacraments, or so poisoned them with his deadly poison of heresy, that they leave behind them more poison than medicine for the souls. He has commanded the Semen that they should not do enough to God when He is angry; that no one should redeem his sin by fasting, prayer and cheap lamentation; that the sacrifice acceptable to God, the body and blood of Christ our Lord, should not be offered daily for our sin; he teaches not to keep the vows to God his Lord.

15) And because he is an apostate and an apostate of his profession, 1) that he may make many like him, he is not ashamed to defile the vessels sanctified to God, to take the virgins sanctified to Christ, and who have promised to keep monastic life, out of their monasteries, and to drag them, and to give them back to the world, even to the devil.

which the Lord did not suffer in the Old Testament, in the figurative priests, which all the pagans hated in their idolatrous priests. He gives the priests of Christ even to the most foul whores. The holy fathers, whose life and teachings have enlightened the whole world, he not only does not hold in cheap dignities and honors, but the more wicked he is, the more he despises them, mocks them, scorns them, promises them, persecutes them; he publicly contradicts all common holy conciliarities with an insolent mouth, and back-talks them with a blasphemous tongue; he refrains from introducing, in the semblance of freedom, an impudent life, which is not entangled with any laws, and is truly wild.

16. Therefore the lawless man, the despiser and criminal of all laws, has fallen into such a great folly of mind that he has not been afraid nor afraid to burn with an open fire the decrees and laws of the most holy fathers and the spiritual canons and law, and, in short, all Christian truth, all order and police, and the most beautiful form of the Church, so exposed by Christ, by the apostles, by the apostolic men and most holy fathers from the beginning, he alone, after so many hundreds of years, dares to tear up, pervert and disguise.

17. And if you do not yet sufficiently recognize whether these things come from the mastery of Christ or from the spirit of the Antichrist; If this juggler has so bewitched you that you can believe that this certain most unrepentant apostate, like the other Heliseus, has the spirit of Helia twofold, or that he is the other Daniel for whom he boasts, in whom there is more spirit, and a greater understanding of the Scriptures, than in all the most holy and most learned men, and than in the whole holy, common Christian church: what is more blind than thou alone? Or, if thou knowest the tree from the fruit, and yet remainest in error, what is more wicked than thou?

18. But let this devil be transformed before thee into an angel of light, and that he may persuade thee with his poisoned oratory, that the works which are public works of the flesh and devilish, are works of the Spirit and of Christ: Has he not everywhere also shown by what spirit he has, that all his speech is bitter, poisonous, provocative and most blasphemous, is everywhere full of blasphemy, profanity, and more than poisonous pointedness, contrary to all standards of Christian kindness, discipline, meekness, and goodness?

and gentleness? Did Paul teach this, the spirit of which he is famous for having? because there is not one of his epistles that does not indicate peace and unity and the like. Does he not admonish his Romans [Cap. 12, 9. 10.] in the Lord, that they should love one another in brotherly love, take care of the things that make for peace, and keep those things that are sufficient for correction? Does he not testify to the Corinthians [1 Ep. 14, 33] that he preaches in the churches the God who is a God of peace and not of discord?

19 And in short, does he not everywhere cry out, does he not everywhere teach these evangelical precepts, that we should walk honestly and worthily, with all humility and meekness, and bear with one another in love with patience, and be careful to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, and that we should put away all wrath, ill will, malice, blasphemy, and all after-talk? [Therefore, how is it possible that even to a blind man it should not be evident and hidden that blasphemy, bitterness, wrath, ill-will, arrogance, boastfulness, which are so common to Luther, as those things are 1) to Paul and all his disciples, who is gentle and of a humble heart, not of a Pauline, not of a Christian, but of a devilish spirit, are the most sure signs? How did you know from his words whether he had Christ in his heart, 2) or the Antichrist? For as the truth itself says in the Gospel [Matth. 12, 34]: "You brood of vipers, how can you speak good, because you are evil? For when the heart is full, the mouth overflows."

20 And because it is written, Blasphemers shall not possess the kingdom of God. Further the Lord says in the Gospel [Matth. 5, 22.]: "Whoever says to his brother, Racha, will be guilty of counsel; but whoever says, You fool, will be guilty of eternal fire. To whom then could it be hidden that he is a messenger of the Antichrist, who not only reviles, tears apart and persecutes the brethren, but also the priests of God, yes, the prince of the priests, the descendant of Peter, the governor of JESUS CHRIST on earth, with such unspeakable and offensive names and blasphemies everywhere, that a pure tongue is afraid to tell them, and shamefaced ears are afraid to hear them?

21. Who ruled the apostolic see, on which the head of the apostles, Peter, presided over so many holy popes, which church the holy and highly glorious martyr Cyprianus did not shy away from as the most distinguished church, and from which the priestly unity has arisen, 3) with his impious and pestilent mouth to call the pestilential chair, the antichristic chair and the devilish chair, and what else he may have conceived more disgraceful, does not stop so often and thickly; Who, with his impure tongue, is not ashamed to call the Christian schools, which have brought us so many most learned and holy men, such excellent pillars in the Church of God, whore houses, Sodomas and Gomorras.

22. Who is not content to persecute the priests of the Almighty God with all their insults, curses, invectives, and terrifying and outrageous blasphemies, publicly and openly, making them lower and more vile than dogs, but also arouses the laity to wash their hands in their blood: when God the Lord Himself has indicated in the fifth book of Moses in what honor He wants His priests, and before the high priest, to be held, saying thus [Deut. 17, 8. ff.]: "If you see that the judgment will be hard and doubtful with you between blood and blood, between matter and matter, between leprosy and leprosy, and if you see that the words of the judges in your gates do not agree, then get up and go up to the place which God your Lord will choose, and go to the priests of the Levitical family, and to the judge who will be the time, and ask them. They will judge the truth of the judgment for you. And thou shalt do all that they shall say, which are before the place which the LORD hath mentioned, and teach thee according to his law. And thou shalt follow their judgment, and lean neither to the right hand nor to the left. But whosoever will be faithful, and will not obey the commandment of the priests, when the time is come to serve God thy Lord, that same man shall, according to the judgment of the judge, die, and thou shalt take away the evil out of the house of Israel. And all the people that hear these things shall fear; so that henceforth no man shall blow himself out in hope."

23 And unto Samuel, when he was despised of the children of Israel, said not the LORD thus [1 Sam. 8:7], They despised not thee,

3) Here we have deleted the words "the Luther", by which the construction is disturbed, which also do not stand in the Latin.

1) The words: "those things" (illa), which are missing in the German editions, we have inserted after the Latin.

2) Here we have deleted the word "erkennet"; it is not in the Latin.

but me, that I should not reign over them"? So that he publicly indicates that he, the invisible one) is despised, if one despises the visible priest. Therefore Moses also gave this answer to the people when they murmured against him: "You have not murmured against me, but against the Lord your God.

(24) If then the Lord desired that the Levitical priests, who alone were a figure and a shadow, should be in such great honor and dignity, and that they should set up the offices of the heavenly sacrifices in the figurative tabernacle, how great honor did he desire to have them to whom he gave the keys of the kingdom of heaven? And hath given them such great power, that whatsoever they bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever they loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven: and whosoever sins they forgive shall be forgiven, and whosoever they retain shall be retained [Matth. 16, 19. 18, 18.], who offer not the blood of goats, or of calves, but the living, holy, unblemished sacrifice, the body and blood of our Lord JEsu Christ, daily for our sins, consecrating with their word, and acting with their hands; and in short, all the holy things, that life and the blessedness of souls may be given to men, they spend with their prayers.

25 And as in great honor, as I have said, the Lord hath desired the priests to be held, who shall at last doubt it, because he himself hath not concealed it in the gospel, when he saith unto them [Luc. 10:16], He that heareth you heareth me; and he that despiseth you despiseth me. But he that despiseth me despiseth him that sent me." And what follows? That he who promises Christ and blasphemes, promises the priest of Christ and blasphemes.

26 Is not this "the first commandment of repentance: Honor thy father and mother, that thou mayest live long on the earth"? [Eph. 6:2, 3.] "But whosoever curseth his father or his mother shall surely surely be put to death." [Ex. 21:17] Is this to be applied to physical parents alone, and not as well to those who gave us birth in Christ the second time, through whom we are Christians, who forgive us our sins, who feed us with the heavenly sacraments?

How, if they are sinners and wicked priests? How, if our parents are also like that? Should they not be honored for that? Should they be and therefore curse and speak evil of them? Was not Judas also among those whom the Lord sent before him, and to whom he said [Luc. 10:11, 12], "If any man receive you not, nor hear your preaching, depart out of the same habitation, or out of the same city, shaking off the dust of your feet. Verily I say unto you, that in the day of judgment it shall be worse for the land of the Sodomites and the Gomorites than for that city?"

028 Did he not thus command the apostles, "Be obedient and subject unto your rulers"? [And if a man be not obedient to the wicked and to sinners, to whom shall he be obedient? For if we shall say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.

29. you are a sheep, you shall not judge the shepherd. You shall not set a judge of God and Christ. Did not the Lord command in the Gospel, saying, "The scribes and Pharisees sat in Moses' seat; whatever they say to you, do; but if they do evil, do not do it," to show publicly that they have dignity, if they are equal to a damned life.

030 Did the same our Lord, when afterwards in the time of his passion he received a blow from the priest's servant's cheek, and the servant said, "Answerest thou thus the high priest?" speak any profanity against the high priest? Yes, he rather answered and defended his innocence, saying, "If I have spoken evil, punish me; but if I have spoken right, why do you strike me?" [Joh. 18, 22. 23.] Did not also Paul, when he was beaten in the council by command of Ananias, and said to him [Apost. 23, 2. 3.], "Thou consecrated wall, God smite thee, sittest thou to judge according to the law, and dost thou command me to smite contrary to the law? When he hears from the bystanders: "Why do you compare the priest of God to a whitewashed wall, and curse him? Nevertheless, when he thought of the vain name and shadow of the priest, he trembled, and said [v. 5]: "Dear brethren, I did not know that he was the high priest, for it is written: Thou shalt not curse the prince of thy people."

(31) Therefore we are all the more surprised that you have not yet recognized the most evil tree from these devilish works, as from the most mischievous fruits. And who, in the end, is so rude and unintelligent that he does not see where his most insensate nobles are aiming? because all the most evil, desperate and escaped 1) robbers or murderers will gather under his banner and banner and wage war against the Church of Christ with murderous weapons and church-thieving hands, not secretly, but publicly, burn and desecrate the places sacred to God, churches and monasteries, persecute the virgins sacred to God, the priests of Christ and monks in the cruelest way, plunder the goods of the churches, and in short, with robbery, drudgery, murder and fire destroy all things, murder and arson destroy all things, from that they blind the just judgment of God, and let them fall so publicly into nonsense, that no one may be hidden any more his most wicked presumptions, and when those who have finally recognized that they are poisoned by his pestilential touch, they have discarded the schismatic and segregationist errors, and have left the heretical nonsense, and come again into the dwelling of unity and truth, through the health of faith.

32. among whom, our beloved in Christ JEsu, when we hoped that you would not be the last one to return to our holy bosom, whom we also, if he would return, would have gladly accepted with willing arms. But we are finally deprived of our good hope, and see that your face has been hardened harder than a rock. We have seen that Luther, the corrupter of souls, lies hidden under your protection, and still spreads his poison 2) in length and breadth. But because God the Lord is still able 2) to raise up children of Abraham from the stones, before his wrath goes out and is kindled like fire, and there is no one to quench it:

33 Therefore we beseech thee, beloved Son in Christ, by the inward mercy of our Savior, our Lord Jesus Christ, by Christian unity, by the love of the fatherland, and finally by thine own and thine own salvation and blessedness, have mercy on the church of Christ, which is now already burdened and challenged by so many storm winds of trouble everywhere, most of all by thy fault, and do thou this time help the church. Have mercy on our fatherland, which in former times has had a special fame because of the Christian faith and excellent obedience among the people.

the yoke of the Lord, and is not now 3) ashamed that it has borne the corruption of Christian faith, worship and godliness, the public enemy, Martinum, in its 4) inward members.

34. ultimately have mercy on yourself, and have mercy on your deceived Saxons, who, if you do not soon convert, will pass over the present and certain divine vengeance, from which you will not escape, either in this world or in the world to come. Thus says GOD the LORD: Hear, you foolish people, hear, you prince who has no heart, you who have eyes and do not see, you who have ears and do not hear; will you not be afraid of me? And will you not be sorry before my face? Have ye not seen what I have done unto them in times past? Read the Scriptures, in which you think you have eternal life, and you will find how great and how severe has always been the divine vengeance against those who have aroused schism, indignation and division among God's people.

035 Have ye not seen the terrible divine vengeance against Datan and Abiram, because they stirred up the common people against Moses, which devoured the earth and all that was therein, so that they went alive into hell? And against Kore, whom also, for the same cause, the infernal fire burned up with two hundred and fifty men?

036 And whether ye think that because of the hard rule, or because of some shepherds' lasciviousness, or because of their wickedness, there should be schism and division, have ye not heard in the book of Kings, that the LORD was so moved concerning the ten families of the children of Israel, and concerning all their seed, that he put them from him, and gave them to be spoiled, until he had cast them out of his sight? For what other cause than that they tore themselves away from the family of Judah and Benjamin because of Solomon's harsh rule and King Roboam's unwise and trustworthy answer, as soon as God smelled his priests.

037 Was not Saul deprived of his royal honors, and Osiah the king, punished with leprosy, because they submitted themselves to the priestly office against the priests?

3) "not" is missing in the German editions; Latin: uairnrne erudeseit.

4) "its" put by us instead of: "their". It refers to "Fatherland's".

1) "most unworthy" unworthiest. In Latin perditissimus. - For easier understanding we have changed the Latinisirende Constructiv: "because, as each one is the most evil 2c.". 2) "yet" put by us instead of: "again"; Latin: sckliue.

All of which may be a sufficient indication for you. And in short, do not all histories indicate that by the vengeful hand of God all those have died an unhappy end who have not been afraid to lay their ecclesiastical hands on the anointed of the Lord; and again, that all things have gone blissfully for them, and they alone have had long life who have honored Christ in his priests?

(38) Therefore be moved by the examples of others, and consider what you have to wait for, who dare to deliver the worthy assembly of God into unconsecrated hands. Accordingly, the Lord commanded all the people of Israel through Moses [Numbers 16:26] to separate themselves from the tents of Kore, Dothan and Abiram, that they should not touch anything that was theirs, lest they be involved in their sins.

39 We command the same to you, and before you, beloved Son in Christ, by the power of our Lord, and implore in Christ Jesus that you separate yourselves from Martin Luther, that you remove from yourselves the rock of offense, and touch nothing that is his, lest divine vengeance entangle you in his sin. Purge out with the most beneficial this leaven, which has leavened the whole dough of your faith, so that you may be a new dough and 1) a new creature.

40) Beloved son, do not be displeased to follow St. Paul. As you have preceded him by bringing about such a grave destruction of souls under your protection for the persecution of the Church of God, so come to your senses again; 2) be careful that all men take note of your conversion, and that those who are offended by you may in turn honor, praise and glorify God in you.

(41) But first of all, cause the impudent mouth to be stopped up, that the blasphemous tongue may be put in a bit, with which it will not cease to speak against God and His saints, and to spread its poison everywhere.

42 And that we may remind you with prophetic words, Stand up in the streets, and see, and ask of the old paths what is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find delight to your souls. I tell you to stand, and not let yourselves be troubled by some-lei and foreign doctrine. Ask about the old paths, which is the good road on which your fathers walked, which so many thousands of martyrs have shown, which so many thousands of 3) confessors have taught, and walk them.

(43) And if we obtain this from you, as we fully expect, we shall rejoice together with the angels over a penitent sinner, and shall gladly carry again the lost and found sheep on our shoulders into the sheepfold of the Lord, and with fatherly kindness, as much as shall be in us, shall give you again the former garment.

44 But if ye shall say: We will not walk; and ye shall answer him that exhorteth you fatherly and holy: We will not hearken: therefore hear, ye nations, saith the LORD, and know what great things I will do unto you: Behold, I will bring upon the people grievances, the fruit of their thoughts and devices, because they have not heard my word, and have rejected my law.

We also offer you this, in virtue of the Almighty God and our Lord Jesus Christ, whose governor we are on earth, that you will not remain unpunished in this world, and that you will have to await eternal fire as a result. Pope Adrianus and the most God-fearing Emperor Carl, his most beloved son and foster child in Christ, 4) live in good agreement with each other, whose truly Christian mandate against Lutheran unbelief, and which was well suited to such an emperor, you were not afraid to break, not without grave insult and diminishment of imperial majesty.

We do not want to do such evil that we, Pope Adrian and Emperor Carl [V], now 5) those who were born in Christ in the past by Pope Adrian and the great 6) Emperor Carl, wanted to let them perish under the schismatics and the 7) heretical tyrant, through the poison of the schismatics, division and disruption. Therefore, convert again, and repent, you and your

3) Here we have the words "confessor and" getil-1, for 60Qk "88or68 here means only: confessor.

4) alurn "u8. Emperor Carl V had been Hadrian's pupil.

5) The words: "the pope Adrian and the emperor Carl, now" are missing in the German editions.

6) The words "in Christo" are missing in the German editions.

7) In the German editions "den", in Latin" tvi-Lnno. This can be understood to mean both the Elector and Luther.

1) "and" put by us instead of: "in"; Latin: novaque creaturea.

2) We have rendered the preceding part of the sentence according to the Latin, because it is very difficult, indeed almost impossible, to find the meaning according to the old translation.

unblessedly seduced Saxons; you will then learn about both swords, the papal and the imperial, in the following.
1) At Antorff, by Michael Hillemo, at the Ruben.

717: The Elector Frederick of Saxony's response to this papal decree. 1523.

From Spalatin's Annals, p. 78 f. There Spalatin notes that in 1523 in the name of Pope Hadrian VI a print had gone out Against D. Luther and his teachings, in which Duke Frederick, Elector of Saxony, was also mentioned by name, which prompted the Elector to write this letter. There, on p. 80, Spalatin says: "Shortly thereafter, however, before Pope Adrianus gave an answer, closer than a year later, Pope Adrianus died. Because the papal breve was written in such an unbelievably impudent manner, the Elector initially doubted its authenticity, until, as we learn from this letter, it was handed to him by the papal orator.

Dear God the Father! I have caught your present brew by sending your orator, Mr. Franciscus Cheregattus, elected in April &c. with born honor. And two things not, E. H. have not done such a thing of their own motion, but of my own misfortune, for E. H. shall, if God wills, never find out nor decide otherwise, than that my will, mind, and opinion has never been otherwise, not even with God's grace, nor should it be otherwise, than to keep me as a Christian man, and obedient son of the Christian Churches. I also hope that God, the Almighty, will grant me, therefore I also ask, his grace, that, which is conducive to the fulfillment of his holy word, service, peace and faith, in this my age, which has a good year, until the end of my life, faithfully, and so much in me, to continue. I ask you to report the same to Your Highness, who will undoubtedly report it to Your Highness. I ask your Lordships to acknowledge this in my cousinly opinion. This I am willing to do, as the obedient son of the Holy Christian Church. And I hereby beseech H. H. God's mercy to keep me in grace. Dat. &c.

1) The following is missing in Latin. It is the indication of the place and the printer where the breve was printed.

D. What the pope had his envoy, Franciscus Chieregati, who had been dispatched from the Imperial Diet, give to the imperial estates for reprimands on account of Luther, against which they in turn handed over to him the complaints of the German nation.

Most of the writings in this section, namely numbers 718, 719, 720, and 722 (as previously in no. 104), are contained in the booklet: "Was auf dem Reichstag zu Nürnberg Anno 1522 bis 1523 von päbstlicher Heiligkeit an kaiserlicher Majestät Statthalter und Stände Lutherischer Sachen halben belangt, und darauf geantwortet worden ist" 2c. To this Luther wrote two prefaces, which we have already communicated in the 14th volume of our edition, Col. 418 and 422. One should read the remarks made there. The title of the Latin edition (Col. 422), which we have taken from the Erlangen edition, is to be corrected as follows: 6ruvuruinu ekutu w u kontiücüdu s^o-r^r/ ?or siAuiüoutu 6te.

718: Pope Hadrian VI's instruction for his legate at the Imperial Diet in Nuremberg, in which, with the transfer of what he fervently opposes to Luther, especially the papal confession of the miserable decay of the church and the highest necessity of a reformation is remarkable. 1522.

This and the following associated documents have been published in Latin and German in many individual editions, and have also been included in many collections. Latin in IVolüi lection. Iueworulz., com. II, p. 195; in Ooldusti "tut. 6t resoript. imperut. a Ourolo V. U8HU6 uä UutloIxU. II, x". 27 and eonstit. imperut., tom. I, p. 450; in Uiekerii kistor. oonoil. K6N6r., lib. IV, purt. II, oup. 5, p. 123 and in Lünig's 8picül6S. 666168th, tom. I, p. 389. German in the Wittenberger Gesamtausgabe (1569), vol. IX, p. 162; in the Jenaer (1585), vol. II, p. 163d; in the Altenburger, vol. II, p. 240 and in the Leipziger, vol. XVIII, p. 327. In einer anderen Uebersetzung in Hortleder "von den Ursachen des deutschen Krieges," vol. I, lib. I, oup. I, p. 4, which Walch has included. In it, we have improved several gross errors according to the older translation. - This instruction was read by the papal nuncio on January 3, 1523, after he had delivered his lecture before the Imperial Diet and handed over the pope's breve (No. 719) to the governor and the estates of the empire. (Weim. Ausg., Vol. XII, p. 58.)

First, you will explain to them the great pain we suffer from the increase of the Lutheran sect, and most of all because we realize how countless souls, redeemed with the blood of Christ and commanded to be cared for by us as a shepherd, have been taken away from us by Luther.

The people will be perverted to the right faith and spirituality, and will come under condemnation. And that this should happen in a nation of which we have the origin according to the flesh, which has always been the most faithful and spiritual from the beginning, when it was converted to God, until these next 'appeared years, and therefore our most eager desire is that such a plague be met with haste, before it happens to the German country, as it did to the Bohemian country in former times. And that in such a case we are most willing to do everything that may be hoped or expected of us, desiring with the utmost diligence that each of them, according to his ability, do the same. To this end, the following causes should induce them.

2. first of all, it is to move the honor of God, which is to be set before all things, to be greatly offended by these heresies; for the ordinary custom and adornment of it is not only diminished, but utterly broken.

3 Secondly, the love of one's neighbor should stimulate them, and each one should work diligently to lead him from error. And whoever does not do this, such ruin, neglect and diligence God will require from his hands.

Thirdly, they should be moved by the shame and disgrace of their nation, which has always been considered the most Christian before other nations, and now has an evil cry from everyone because of those who follow Luther's sect.

(5) Fourthly, they should be admonished by the reputation of their own honor, which is greatly offended if those who preside over others in the German nation with power and authority do not make every effort to expel these heresies. For in this way they would fall away from their forefathers, who were Christian people and were present in large numbers at the Concilio at Costnitz during the condemnation of Johannis Hus and the other heretics, some of whom (as it is said) led Hus to the fire with their hands. It will also be detrimental to their honor that they, or several of them, have made, confirmed, approved, and granted the imperial commandment to execute and enforce the papal sentences against Luther and his followers, and have done so with their power. If they would not do so to the best of their ability, they would either be considered unstable, or favorable to Luther and accidental, so that it would seem that they could easily expel him (if they wished otherwise).

Fifthly, they should be moved by the injustice or injuria that is done to them and their parents by Luther, since their parents and forefathers are the same.

They themselves have always followed the faith confirmed and approved by the Holy Roman and Christian Church, but Luther and his followers hold and contradict it far differently. From this it is evident that they are condemned by Luther as unbelievers and heretics, and thus, according to Luther's opinion, all their forefathers and ancestors who differ from us in faith are in hell, since error in faith makes people liable to damnation.

(7) Sixthly, they should well consider the end that the Lutherans put forward: namely, that under the color of evangelical freedom, which they hold up to the people, all the upper parts of violence are accepted. For although Luther at first intended to destroy or suppress spiritual power altogether (as if it were tyrannical and conquered against the Gospel), he did not intend to do so. However, since their reason and foundation is set on their given liberty, and that in virtue of such liberty also the temporal power by no commandment, however just and sincere they may be, may bind men to obedience in mortal sins: so the same liberty against the temporal power has not less, but more, place, neither against spiritual power. And it is openly evident that they also want to separate such secular authority, although they have glossed over and protected it with cunning, so that the secular princes should believe that their malicious plot is not directed against them, but only against the clergy (to whom the laity are commonly hostile), and if they thus bring some of them to their part, or else to watch and tolerate, they might the more easily disturb the clergy. If they accomplished the same, the common man would undoubtedly undertake and attempt the same against the secular princes.

(8) Seventhly, they shall signify the great disgrace and dishonor, riots, insurrection, robbery of goods, deathblows, quarrels and discords, which this most wicked sect would arouse, and daily arouses throughout the whole of Germany, and also move up the swearing, blasphemy, curses, foul talk, frivolous speeches and bitterness, which this sect has for and for in its mouth. And where they do not stop this, it is to be feared that the wrath and abandonment of God will come upon Germany, which is thus divided in itself, and also that such punishment will come upon the princes themselves, who will use the force and the sword to punish the evil of God.

and did not prevent their subjects from doing so. Cursed is he (says the prophet) who is negligent in carrying out the word of God, and contains his sword from the blood of the wicked.

(9) Eighthly, they should note how Luther uses a way to deceive the Christian people that is almost more despicable than the most despicable man, Mahomet, who deceives many a thousand souls by admitting that which carnal men are inclined to do and by freeing them from that which is considered the most serious in our law, because only Luther's action is seen as somewhat more abominable and leading to even more deception. For when Mahomet admits to taking more women, and to driving them away at will, and again to taking others, this Luther pretends, so that he may make monks, monastic virgins and priests, so eager for carnal pleasure, favorable to him and draw them to him, that the vows of eternal chaste abstinence from the pleasures of the flesh should not only be non-binding, but also unseemly, and that they, out of evangelical freedom, may take women and men. But he is unmindful of the apostle's word, since he speaks of the young widows, who, having become unchaste against God, want to be free, 1) thus: they have condemnation, because they falsify or mislead their first faith.

10. Now, if this and other things on this opinion, which you may then partly think out of our letters, also out of your own understanding, are brought before them by you, you will admonish reported princes, prelates and peoples, so that they finally wake up, 2) and such great harm and violence, which the Lutherans prove to God and His holy faith, also the great disgrace, which they inflict on the whole German nation and the princes themselves, together with the great shame and desecration, which they seem to have inflicted on their ancestors, which they inflict on the whole German nation and on the princes themselves, together with the great shame and disgrace which they apparently and publicly inflict on their ancestors, who (as we have said) finally condemn them to hell, and resist them, and finally proceed and proceed with the execution of the papal sentence and the imperial commandment. And yet, those who come to their right mind and vow to put away their error shall be forgiven; for they [the princes] shall always be more inclined to mercy than to vengeance. Just as God Himself did when He said: "I will not the death of sinners, but rather that they may be converted and live. But those who remain obstinate in their error are to be punished, so that the others may receive a likeness of it and remain in the right faith, or, if they have fallen, turn back to the right way.

(11) Whether anyone might say that Luther was judged unheard and unaccountable by the papal see, and that he should therefore be heard in all ways, and not be condemned before he is overcome. Answer: As far as faith is concerned, since God has established it, we are to believe by divine imputation and authority, and not to prove it. Ambrose says: Take away the arguments where faith is sought; one believes the fishermen and not the dialecticists. Indeed, we confess that one should not deny him responsibility in what concerns the deed (whether he has spoken, preached or written it or not). But about the divine right, and about the matter of the sacraments, we are to remain with that which the saints and the church have instructed us. To this end, you may indicate that almost all things in which Luther is divided from the others were previously rejected by various conciliations, and that which is confirmed by common conciliations in the common Christian church is not to be doubted further, but is to be held as a credible thing. For he does an injustice or violence to the assembly of the church who wants to cast doubt on what has once been established. For how would anything certain and lasting be decided between men? Or when would the disputations and squabbles come to an end, so that every free and perverse man should again be allowed to deviate from that which has not been established by one or by a few, but long ago, by the approval of so many highly knowledgeable men, and confirmed by the Christian church (which God does not allow to err in matters of faith)? And if every city desires to keep its statutes unbreakable, how would all things, which have been established not only once, but often with considerable knowledge, be destroyed without disruption, annoyance and disorder, and not kept unchanged by men? Since Luther and his followers condemn the conciliation of the holy fathers, burn the holy laws, and destroy all things according to their will, and in addition grieve and distress the whole world, it is evident that they, as enemies and destroyers of a common peace, are of no consequence to the world.

1) Here the old translation has: "who, after having been unchaste, want to marry in God".

2) In the old translation: "that they will never awake".

all of the same peace lovers are to be exterminated.

(12) Thou shalt also say that we freely confess that God allows this persecution of His church to take place because of the sins of men, and especially of the priests and prelates of the church. For surely the hand of the Lord is not shortened, that he may not make us blessed; but he may also divide the punishment of sins among us and them, and keep and hide his face from us in dishonor. The Scriptures write that the sins of the people flow from the sins of the priests. Therefore Chrysostom says: "When our Savior wanted to cleanse the sick city of Jerusalem, he first went to the temple, so that he initially punished and healed the sins of the priests (like a good physician who heals the disease from the root). We know well that for some years now in this holy see there has been much impropriety with abuse of spiritual things, transgression in the commands or commandments, and otherwise all things have been perverted to vexation: therefore no wonder that the disease has descended from the head into the limbs, as from the popes into other, lower prelates. All of us (that is, prelates and spiritual persons) have left, each of us has gone his own way, and for a long time not one, not even one, has been found who has done good, therefore it is necessary that we all give glory to God and humble our souls to Him. Let each one of us consider by what he has fallen, and judge himself rather than be judged by God in the day of His wrath. As much as it behooves us to do in this matter, you may agree that we will make every effort, first of all, to reform this Roman court, from which perhaps all this evil has emanated, so that, as the disease has flowed out from there into all the subjects, so that healthy reformation may also ensue from it for all of us. We consider ourselves so much more strictly bound to accomplish this, as much more we see that the whole world is eager for this reformation. For, as we discovered to you earlier, we have never sought to possess this papacy, but when there was much in us, we would much rather have led a separate life, and served God in a holy, quiet being. We would have truly rejected this papacy, if the fear of God and the special pure way of our election, as well as the worry of the division of faith (which, if we had rejected it, would have been before our eyes), had not urged us to accept it.

So, we have not undertaken this supreme dignity for the sake of pleasure or the desire to rule, nor to enrich our friends, but to follow the divine will, and to help his deformed bride, the Christian Church, with reform, to come to the aid of the oppressed, to elevate the learned and the virtuous (who have long been despised), and otherwise to do everything that a good pope and a true successor of St. Peter is obliged to do.

But let no one be surprised if we do not correct all errors and abuses from the beginning. For this disease is almost obsolete, and not a few, but many, therefore to cure us in it foot by foot, and to meet the serious and more dangerous diseases first, lest we ruin all things with hasty reforming of all things. For all hasty changes (says Aristotle) are dangerous in the common way of doing things; and he who snaps too hard forces blood out.

14 As you write to us in your last letters that these princes have complained against you that the concordats and treaties (established between the See of Rome and the German nation) have been acted upon by this See, you may indicate that we may not be accused in the matters that have come before us. That such things, because we were still in an inferior state, have displeased us in every way, and that according to this (although they did not seek it) they actually have the opinion before us that at the time of our papacy each one should retain his justice. In addition, equity and kindness require that we not only not offend our laudable German nation, but also show neighborly favor.

(15) As to the processes which the princes request from the Rota and wish to be expelled again, let it be said that we are willing to oblige them in this, as much as we may do with honor. But because of the auditors' absence in present mortal runs, we can have no instruction of the same processes half this time. As soon as the auditors return, however, which we expect to happen shortly after the deaths have ceased, we will show ourselves to them as much as is always due to us.

16) Will you diligently solicit and urge a response to our letter, and request those to whom we write to inform us of the means by which they think these vicious sects may be most effectively countered, so that we may, as to

We will do the things that are to be provided for by us. In all of this, you should actually inquire and fully attribute the same to us.

In the collections of Luther's writings shown above, one finds the following words appended to the resolution of this Instruction:

Item, because we note that in German lands there are many pious and learned men who are therefore opposed and repugnant to the papal see, that not they, but rather fools with sticks and money and stable servants, are provided with ecclesiastical fiefs, we therefore request that you inquire who they are and send us their names listed, so that we, if German fiefs become vacant, may lend them to them of our own accord. For we know how much it has harmed God's honor 1) and the souls' salvation and improvement that for a long time now the spiritual fiefdoms, especially the pastoral care, have been granted to unfit people.

In order to obtain help for the Hungarians, we give you no other instructions than those we gave you when you left us, and we urge you to attend to these matters with the utmost diligence, as you are doing.

We also take care that the princes and communes of the French do their duty and help with their property.

At the end of this writing, the Jena edition (the Wittenberg edition almost as well) has this note: "Kaiserlicher Majestät Statthalters und gemeiner Reichsstände Antwort; item, der weltlichen Reichsstände Beschwerde 2c. findest du, christlicher Leser, in bemeldtem Büchlein vom Reichstag zu Nürnberg, Fol. 18 und 27 mit einer Vorrede D. M. L.". These are here numbers 720 and 722; the preface is in our edition vol. XIV, 422.

719 Pope Hadrian VI's breve to the estates of the Holy Roman Empire assembled at Nuremberg, Nov. 25, 1522.

This document is found in the collections shown in the previous number, immediately before the "Instruction" (No. 718). Also in Latin in the Wittenberg edition (1551), tom. II, fol. 352; in the Jena (1566), tom. II, fol. 536b; and in the Erlanger, opp. var. ar^h, tom. VI, p. 460. German in the Wittenberger (1569), vol. IX, p. 159b; in the Jenaer (1585), vol. II, p. 161; in the Altenburger, vol. II, p. 237 and in the Leipziger, vol. XVIII, p. 324. Here, too, Walch has followed the translation in Hortleder I. o. p. 2. We have improved this extremely poor translation according to the Latin.

To the venerable brothers, dear sons, noble lords, princes of the Holy Roman Empire and other ecclesiastical and secular princes, also to all the estates of the noble German nation, assembled at the Diet of Nuremberg,

Pope Hadrian VI

Venerable brethren, dear sons, salvation and papal blessing! Since we have been admitted to the apostolic office by the decree of Divine Providence, we have as a witness that He has required us, as one who is undeserving and not waiting for such, to be mindful day and night of nothing else than to fulfill at all times the duties of a good shepherd in caring for the flock that has been commanded to us, both in common and in particular; We have not considered any of our sheep to be so mangy, frail, or wandering and lost that we have not sought to bring them back to the Lord's sheepfold with all our diligence.

2 And truly, from the time after the beginning of our papacy, as we considered best at that time, we have not ceased to accept peace and unity among the Christian princes, who are unfortunately all too divided among themselves, and to lay down their arms, or to turn them (if they could be obtained) against the enemies of the Christian faith, to admonish, to remind, and to plead by various messages of ours, as well as by almost daily letters.

In order that we may prove an example to this desire of ours not only by words but also by deeds, God knows with what inconvenience of our own and domestic nature we have sent money and other aid to the Rhodian knights, strict defenders of the Christian faith, who are cruelly besieged by the most atrocious tyrant, the Turk, even to other places that are in danger from the same enemy's maw.

(4) Immediately thereafter, we turned our minds from external things to internal ones, and we noted with sadness Martin Luther (whom we may not call our son because of his own fault), after he had been seriously and paternally admonished by the papal see, as a man who brings up again the old and long since condemned and condemned heretical articles. And that the same, on the verdict of the best and most learned men and manifold

1) "GOD's glory" put by us instead of: "GOD's, their".

The fact that he has not relinquished his right to the high schools' counsel against him, that he has not relinquished his right to the most beloved Roman Emperor elected in God by our son Carl, King of Rome and Hispania, and that your imperial edict, together with the decision to enforce it, was made well known at the recently held imperial diet at Worms and proclaimed throughout all of Germany, has remained unpunished by those to whom it is due. And that he still does not desist from his wicked presumption, but, as a forgetter and rejecter of all Christian love and evangelical goodness, sends out new books full of error, heresy, disgraceful speeches and outrages, through himself and his helpers, into German and other surrounding countries, and strives far and wide, like a plague, to poison and corrupt the good hearts and morals with the arrows of his poisoned tongue. And the aforementioned Luther has not only the common people, but (which is even more evil) much of the nobility, as supporters and followers, so that (which may have been the main cause of such rebellion) to take hold of the priests' goods, to despise the obedience owed to the ecclesiastical and secular, is raised, which would subsequently grow among some of you to neighborly revolt and war. But what evil will result from this, especially at this time, for the Christian community, your minds and thoughts can easily judge. For although the apostle said before that heresies must be, so that those who are righteous may be revealed, nevertheless one would not see a more unfavorable time for this matter, or in which such heresies would be more urgently needed to be purified and eradicated. For since the eternal enemy of the human race, the devil, under the form of a roaring lion, rages on and on against the sheep of Christ through the great power of the Turks, we do not see how such great impetuosity can be resisted as long as we nurture this devil in the form of the deceitful dragon, who sows this heresy in our houses (and arouses discord and indignation among our extremely brave Germans). And even if we would dispute and overcome the foreign enemies, all our work and costs would be in vain, and completely useless to the souls for their salvation, if we were to subdue the external enemies and be afflicted with heresy and divisions at home.

5 We are also mindful, since we were of lesser standing in Spain, that we were often told a great deal and many things about Luther and his false teachings. Although such things were hard for us to hear about him ourselves, it is not

It would have been much more difficult for us that this would have come from the lands from which we have our origin after the body. However, we were first comforted by the obvious wickedness of this matter (because of which they do not last long and are respected by us), we also considered it, and hoped without a doubt that after these poisonous plants were brought to German lands from elsewhere, they would not bear fruit in this country, which has always produced the greatest enemies of heresy and unbelief.

6. But because this evil tree (either because of God's decree to punish the sin of his people in this way, or because of the negligence of those who were guilty of punishing it and were able to do so, and did not forestall it in the beginning) has begun to spread its branches far and wide, as you see and hear: You German princes and peoples must take care that you are not regarded as accomplices to this evil, which has arisen from elsewhere and for which you might easily have been excused in the beginning, by merely allowing it and watching it (because you do not resist it), and that they forget their old virtue. We refrain from this impropriety, that such a great and so God-fearing nation, through a little monk, who is said to have professed and followed the Christian faith and religion from his youth, and to have preached and taught it for many years, has recently departed, and become false to God, from the path which was pointed out to us by our Savior and his holy apostles, and which so many martyrs and excellent men, with doctrine and holiness, have also followed, and all your forefathers have walked it, and should think that Luther alone understands it, and that he has only now (when the heretic Montanus has also made himself famous) received the Holy Spirit, and that the church, with which the most gracious Redeemer of the human race has promised to be until the end of the world, has erred in the darkneses of ignorance and in the ways of destruction, until it is enlightened by Luther's new light. All this, even though it is mocked by the intelligent, is most harmful to simple hearts, and gives those who are eager for new things and great change in any order great cause and stimulus to perpetrate what we are now experiencing. Do you German princes and peoples not note that Luther's and his successors' teachings are nothing but a kind of prelude to these evils? Do you not see clearly that the Lutheran doctrine, which was initially given

Is the protection of Christian truth now revealed to be nothing but a robbery of your goods? Or do you believe that these sons of wickedness are directing their minds elsewhere than to withdraw all obedience under the name of liberty, and to give every one liberty to accomplish what he would desire? Do you also imagine that these, who not only despise the spiritual laws and the decrees of the fathers, together with the most holy councils (to which the imperial laws have always gladly yielded and been obedient), but also tear and burn them without fear out of devilish rage, and in addition deprive the priests, bishops, and the pope of their due obedience, will be obedient to your orders and laws? Or do you hope that they will refrain from their piratical hands from the goods of the laity, and will not rather appropriate all that they like to themselves, who daily carry away and lead away the things that belong to God in your sight and presence? Will even those spare your necks who have taken upon themselves to injure, strike and kill the anointed ones of the LORD, who shall not be touched? Against you, against your goods, houses, wives, children, authorities, dominions and temples (which you honor) this wretched plague is directed, if you do not meet it in time.

(7) Therefore, in the Lord, venerable brethren, noble and devout lords, we admonish you in general and in particular, and implore you by the Christian love and religion, which has so often been protected and strengthened by your forefathers' blood, but in virtue of the holy obedience which all Christian men owe to God, St. Peter and his governor. Peter and his governor, we demand of you to put down the enmities that may exist between you, and at least now to devote your whole diligence and heart to extinguishing this common conflagration, that you endeavor to restore Martin Luther and other instigators of these seditions and errors to the right path of faith and life by all wholesome means (which would be exceedingly pleasant to us). But if they would not listen to this (which God wants to avert) with blocked ears (like snakes), then, lest the remaining part, which is still pure and fresh, be poisoned to the great defilement of your nation and obvious danger of the whole Christian community, you shall, according to the holy orders and laws made by your emperors and recently commanded in your imperial edict, use against them the rod of severity and punishment.

8 He to whom the secrecy of all men's hearts is evident, knows that we are by nature and custom, even after our pastoral office, much more inclined to forgive than to punish. But because this cancer had spread so much that it could not be cured with gentle and mild medicines, sharp and biting agents had to be used, and the harmful parts had to be completely cut off from the healthy body. Thus, God Almighty sank the brothers Dathan and Abiram, who had caused division, alive into the depths of the earth, and ordered to punish with death those who would not obey the priest's commandments. Likewise Peter, the apostle prince, proclaimed that Anania and Sapphira, since they had lied against him against God, should die immediately. Thus, ancient and godly emperors killed the heretics Jovinian and Priscillian with the secular sword. Jerome also desired that the heretic Vigilantius be given over to the corruption of the flesh, so that the spirit might be retained. Thus your forefathers finally carried out the due punishment on John Hus and Jerome of Prague, who seem to have come back to life in Luther and are highly honored by him, in the Concilium at Costnitz. If you now follow your forefathers' holy and praiseworthy deeds in this case, since it cannot happen in any other way, we do not want to have any doubt that the divine mercy will, for the help of the Christian Church, which is plagued by the unbelievers, turn its eyes on your nation, which is easily the first in martial valor and number of people, with all its strength, and inspire your minds and hearts, of which you, after you have received through us the blessing of the almighty God and St. Peter, and after you have been able to take over the dragon, will be able to take over the church. Peter through us, and have triumphed over the dragon and the lion and the devil, that is, after the heresies have been removed at home and the enemies of the faith have been completely defeated outwardly, you will receive a glorious victory and, in the world to come, the reward of eternal bliss.

As far as we are concerned, however, you should consider it certain that whatever wealth and authority the Almighty has bestowed upon us, we will offer everything, together with our lives, for such blessed works and the salvation of our commanded sheep. What we desire to communicate to you in this Lutheran and other matters, we have entrusted to Franciscus Chierigati, elected Bishop of Apruz, whom we appointed in the month of September to act on our behalf with you in matters of faith and religion, as our and this Holy See's nuncio.

tius, ordered to go to this honorable Diet of yours, to inform you of its length and further, and exhort you to believe its words, as ours. Given in Rome at St. Peter's, under the Fisherman's Ring, this 25th day of November, Anno 1522, in the first year of our Papacy.

The response of the common estates to the above papal petition, in which Archduke Ferdinand as governor and the estates thank the pope for the promise that he will keep the old treaties or concordats, but at the same time ask the pope to diligently reform the complaints and abuses that they have submitted in specific points, otherwise peace and harmony cannot be hoped for. February 5, 1523.

This writing is found in Latin in the collections indicated in No. 718, in Wolf 1. e. p. 197; in Goldast p. 30 and p. 452; in German in Hortleder 1. 6. p. 6 and in the Leipziger Gesamtausgabe, Vol. XVIII, p. 330. We have set the time according to the Weimar edition (Vol. XII, p. 58), where it is reported that this answer was handed over in draft form by the narrower committee to the larger committee of the Estates on January 15, 1523, and after some changes was handed over to the papal legate in Latin translation on February 5. On February 7, the nuncio gave his replica, No. 723.

1. Namely, after Papal Holiness Orator has now delivered a papal decree 1) to Imperial Majesty's governor, princes, princes and other estates of the Holy Empire here at the Imperial Diet, and has also made an advertisement thereon, and in addition has also delivered his ordered advertisement in writings 2) concerning the Lutheran trade: All this has been received by Imperial Majesty's governor, as well as by princes, princes and estates of the Holy Roman Empire, from Papal Holiness, as a faithful father and supreme shepherd of the Christian flock, with considerable reverence and gratitude.

(2) And since Imperial Majesty's governors, princes, princes, and estates of the empire have good knowledge that papal holiness was born of the German nation and blossom, and also, since their holiness was in a lesser state, that much praiseworthy virtue and good came from him, and that he was a good man and a good woman.

They have been highly gratified by his unanimous, laudable election to the apostolic office of the papacy, in the consoling hope that through such a divine bestowal much salvation, blessedness and good will befall the holy Christian church. It is a good indication of this that her holiness is so highly and faithfully committed to the same. As such is apparently found in many places in this letter, advertisement and instruction.

3. Namely, when the papal holiness in her letter, soon after its receipt, reports with what faithful diligence and compassion her holiness has taken to heart and considered the discord that exists between the Christian princes, and how her holiness is bringing them to peace and unity, and to turn the Christian arms (if ever they could be won) against the enemies of the Christian faith, has faithfully sought so far, and is still in unceasing work, with report of what her Holiness has sent and done to the Rhodis knights, against the siege of the Turk, for graces and good.

4 Governors and estates have understood this from their holiness to great comfort and gratitude, and can well appreciate that first of all unity of the Christian princes, heads and power of the whole Christendom is of great and high importance, that in the same warlike outrage good police and order in the Christian kingdoms cannot be preserved, much less the Turkish tyranny, which at this time is exercising itself especially grievously against Christendom, can be resisted.

5) As the royal dignity of Hungary, and its landlords and countryside, and besides the Crabats, 3) imperial majesty's governors and imperial estates have miserably indicated and complained here, what great, excessive trouble and final destruction they have encountered from the Turks, and still stand in daily dangers and worries; as the papal orator himself has clearly indicated all this in his petition, for the sake of Hungarian help.

Therefore, Imperial Majesty's governors, princes, rulers and the empire's estates ask and exhort Papal Holiness to the highest, that their holiness, as a faithful father and shepherd of the Christian people, to whom such things are also appropriate and due, from their diligent diligence, promote the Christian princes, heads and authorities in Christian union,

1) The previous paper, No. 719.
2) Document No. 718.

3) That is, croats.

or at least to bring them into peaceful decency, and thereby to take further emergency measures, so that the tyrannical Turks may be resisted, and the deprived Christian lands and kingdoms may be conquered again, as much as God may grant, and the souls, bodies and possessions of Christians be saved from such cruel tyranny, for which governors and estates, in addition to and with other Christian heads and powers, will advise and help in their part in a Christian and faithful manner.

7. Furthermore, the papal letter introduces in the following advertisement and instruction of the papal orator what great harm to the German nation and the Christian people will result from Martin Luther's and his successors' teachings and writings, and even further, where this is not resisted with due diligence, and what should move the German princes and nation to avert or seriously punish them, with high admonition, papal sanctity's judgment and imperial majesty's mandate, which went out against Luther and his followers, to execute 2c.

(8) Imperial Majesty's governors, princes, princes, and estates of the Holy Roman Empire say that they, as Christian estates, are extremely sorry and disgusted by any harm, error, or evil that may arise in the Holy Christian Church, and that they are also highly inclined and willing to prevent it with punishment or other measures.

9. also declare themselves guilty of being obedient to papal holiness and imperial majesty, as their supreme heads, which they are no less inclined to do in a Christian way than their forefathers. But the fact that papal sanctity has suggested as burdensome that the papal judgments and the imperial mandates, which went against Luther, have not yet been applied, has not been omitted without noticeable cause. For all the estates of the German nation are so unmistakably burdened by manifold abuses of the Court of Rome and ecclesiastical estates, and are now so much informed by Luther's letters, where one should act against them in earnest or in fact, according to the content of reported judgments or mandates, that it would certainly be considered by them as if one wanted to suppress evangelical truth by tyranny, and use unchristian abuses, from which a great indignation, apostasy and resistance against the authorities would undoubtedly be awakened, as one can see from manifold display and daily cases can seemingly decrease.

For the reason for which God Almighty has imposed such persecution of His Church is quite praiseworthy, clear and well indicated by Papal Holiness Orator's advertisement and delivered instruction. Your Holiness also recognizes, praiseworthily and well, that for some years there has been much impropriety in the See of Rome, as well as grievous abuse and transgression in spiritual matters, therefore it is no wonder that the disease has descended from the head to the members, and from the popes to other, lower prelates. Therefore, good knowledge and correction is necessary for all of us, in which her holiness, as much as is due to her, will make every effort, so that first of all the Roman court, from which perhaps such evil all originated, will be reformed, so that the disease, from there flowed out into all subjects, from which again good reformation takes place, and because of such divine honor and reformation, her holiness alone has accepted the papacy 2c.

(11) The Papal Holiness also graciously informs the German princes in response to their previous complaint that their Holiness has never been pleased or pleased, but has always been opposed to the fact that the Concordats or Treaties have been acted upon by the See of Rome, and that it is therefore their will and intention, although no request has been made to avoid this and to keep everyone, and especially the German nation, by their justice.

12 Who would not notice and understand from all this that papal holiness, in such a paternal indication and admonition, omits nothing that a faithful father and chief shepherd of the Christian flock should do, and not so much as recognize his own sin and infirmity beforehand, and be moved to Christian correction? Especially if the papal holiness would carry out the same their sovereign command with beneficial, apparent works, by divine bestowal, for which purpose imperial majesty governors, also electors, princes and other estates of the holy empire, as sons obedient to their holiness, have asked and admonished most earnestly and most humbly, for the sake of divine honor, praise, and the betterment and blessedness of Christian people, and have also hoped that the same will happen in desperation. For without a just settlement of such complaints, as the secular estates have handed over, 1)

The German people were not to hope for good peace and unity between the ecclesiastical and secular estates or for the suppression of this indignation among the Germans.

13. Imperial Majesty's governors and estates of the empire of papal holiness, in great necessity, do not want to refrain from the fact that, due to protracted wars that have taken place in and near German lands, as well as due to manifold burdens imposed on German lands, the same German people are so depleted of money that they need to maintain peace and justice with them, and even more so with Hungarians and Czechs, German lands, the same German people are so exhausted of money that they have a great shortage of it for the necessary maintenance of peace and justice with them, and even more so with the Hungarians and Crabats, to do requested and eager help against the Turks.

14. And since Papal Holiness himself knows that years ago the German nation granted that the annals of the ecclesiastical prelates alone should follow the Roman See for some years, so that they should be used for nothing else than to resist the Turk, and such years have long since disappeared, also these annals, according to the aforementioned grant, by papal holiness ancestors against the Turk, that gives reason, if for the resistance of the Turk an emergency help should be established in the holy empire of the German nation, that such is highly attracted by the German people and said, why the imperial majesty and the German princes do not require and use such long-saved annals, which have been saved for the said emergency, for this purpose; and therefore do not think that they are obliged to let themselves be burdened further, since the ecclesiastical prelates take from their secular subjects what 1) they pay to Rome on account of the same annals.

(15) Accordingly, it is the high and diligent request of Imperial Majesty and other imperial states that Papal Holiness will not require or collect such annuities as may become due through the death of archbishops, bishops and other ecclesiastical prelates and benefices, but will have the Holy Roman Empire's Fisco pursued. Without this, it cannot be hoped that peace, justice and other good order will be maintained in the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, much less that other nations will be helped and assisted against the Turks.

16 And when Papal Holiness finally and finally requested from Imperial Majesty governors, also princes, princes and other estates of the empire to give information by which

The Lutheran error can be countered most effectively by means of their own discretion: governors and estates say what they can advise and help in a Christian and possible way, and they find themselves quite eager, willing and inclined to do so.

17. Since, however, among Christian people, both clerical and secular (as papal holiness itself best recognizes), not only because of Lutheran doctrine and Scripture, but also in many other ways, such manifold great confusion, disorder, and repugnance has taken root, therefore, because of the great destruction that the Turk did to Christendom about many years ago, and is still in daily practice, imperial majesty's governors, and also princes, princes and other estates of the empire, cannot or may not devise any more consoling, helpful means, than that the papal holiness, with the approval of the Roman imperial majesty, as both such Christian heads have power and it is their duty to do, proclaim a free Christian concilium, as to Strasbourg, Mainz, Cologne, Metz, or another convenient city of the German nation, for the most conducive as it is always possible; and that such concilium, for the longest time possible, if it is possible, started in one year, is also approved and announced in such a way that no duty should bind any state, be it ecclesiastical or secular, which will be in such concilium, in such a way that he may be prevented from speaking the necessary truth, as much 2) for divine and other charitable things, but should be obliged and bound to do the same for the most beneficial and highest, for the salvation of his souls 2c. For without this, such a council would be considered suspicious and more harmful than useful.

18 But besides this it is not considered with little diligence how it should be kept in the meantime, before such a concilium may come to its progress, because of the mentioned confusion and disorder, on which not little, but much and great is at stake. And for this reason, Imperial Majesty's governors, as well as princes, lords and other estates of the empire, want to act in such a way with the Elector of Saxony, in whose principality the aforementioned Luther and some of his followers are, by which they completely hope to occur that Luther and his followers then shall not write, make or have printed any more, in addition also without any doubt the Elector of Saxony, as a pious, praiseworthy, kind, Christian Elector of the Holy Roman Empire.

1) In the old edition: "White".

2) "as much - and" - both - and.

Roman Empire, will be helpful to all intents and purposes.

19. In addition, governors and estates want to order with all faithful and possible diligence that all preachers speak and act in a proper and fair manner, to avoid in their sermons what might cause the common man to move against the authorities or lead the Christian people into error, but to teach and preach nothing else than the right, pure, clean, holy gospel and proven scriptures, kindly, meekly and Christianly, according to the teaching and interpretation of the proven scriptures accepted by the Christian church.

(20) As for matters of dispute, which are incomprehensible to the common man, even without need of knowledge, they are not to be preached or taught, but are to be decided in the above-mentioned Christian council. And the archbishops and bishops shall ordain especially understanding, pious men, experienced in the Holy Scriptures, who shall diligently take notice of such preaching and teaching; and if they find error therein, that they then reject such preachers or teachers amicably, Christianly, meekly, modestly, and in such a way that it shall not be understood as if one wanted to prevent the evangelical truth (which also cannot be suppressed) in some way. But whichever preacher does not want to let himself be rebuked, the ordinarii may seek and think against him with due punishment, as they know how to do.

21 They also want to take diligent and possible precautions in all printing houses and with all bookkeepers, so that nothing new is further made, sold, printed, publicly or secretly sold, but what is therefore further printed or sold, that should be inspected beforehand by every authority, and reasonable, pious and experienced men of the Scriptures, and where deficiencies are found, the same should not be allowed to be printed or sold.

22 If the papal sanctity of the above-mentioned imperial estates now carries out their proposal and request, in considerable modification of the complaints complained of, and the appointment of the aforementioned free council, they are of good hope that by the means indicated above this indignation, confusion and displeasure of the common man should almost be quenched and rejected.

23 And even if all things could not be brought to an immediate improvement by this, it would still be possible to do so with less harm and damage.

The Council and the Estates do not know how to find possible ways by which such outrage could occur and be brought to a halt. But outside the execution of that which is requested by papal sanctity, as stated above, governors and estates do not know possible ways to find, by which such outrage might occur and be brought to a standstill.

(24) As for the clergy who take wives, also for the sake of the religious who have left the church, which the papal orator has also suggested, it is considered that since no punishment is ordered in the common laws of the secular authorities, the Estates consider that the punishment of the clerical rights, namely the forfeiture of their privileges and liberties, benefices and others, should be left at this time. If, however, they would otherwise have acted improperly and punishably, they would then also be punished according to the order of established rights.

(25) Upon all this, it is requested that Papal Holiness and their orator understand and accept such Imperial Majesty's governors, as well as princes, princes, and other estates' proposals and requests, not otherwise than in faithful, Christian, and good opinion, as well as that their will and mind be not otherwise than to hold themselves at all times as pious, Christian princes, princes, and estates, and to show themselves to Papal Holiness, in Christian obedience, in all dignity. Nota: It has also been moved that the secular princes and estates, who are now all here at this Imperial Diet, over their complaint, which they brought forward at the most recent Imperial Diet at Worms, may order some prudent persons to further inspect, reduce or increase the same, and to formally present it, and also have it handed over to Papal Holiness, or to their sent embassy, with a rather urgent request.

Nota: The following articles concerning the preachers at Nuremberg were said orally to the papal orator and were not included in the written papal answer.

26 When the papal orator, in addition to the instruction, asked in the resolution to imprison some preachers at Nuremberg, for the reason that they should have preached against the holy Christian faith 2c. Now the estates could not find out that this had happened, but because the papal orator had perhaps reported too far in some of the things reported. And because the same preachers are held in great esteem and reputation in this city and elsewhere, the estates, where they are unheard and un-

If they were to accept the unchristian doctrine invented by these preachers, not only would nothing good come of it, but great turmoil and indignation would ensue, and nothing else would be considered, because the evangelical truth would in fact be subjected to suppression and harmful abuses would be practiced. If, however, some articles of credible truth were later brought before the estates, which were supposed to have been preached in an unchristian manner by said preachers, they would order persons of understanding and skill to do so, hold them up to them, and hear their answer. And if they found this to be the case, they would then punish them with due punishment, as is proper for pious Christians.

721: Luther's testified pleasure with Spalatin over this answer given by the imperial estates to the papal envoy.

See Appendix, No. 124.

722 The secular imperial estates' gravamen, or grievances they have against the See of Rome and other ecclesiastical estates, which were handed over to the papal orator at the Diet of Nuremberg. 1523.

This document is also to be found in Latin in the collections mentioned in No. 718 and in other collections; in German in Hortleder 1, e. p. 10 and in the Leipziger Gesamtausgabe, Vol. XVIII, p. 335. Before this document, the original will be found in Luther's preface, which we have included in the 14th volume of our edition, Col. 422 ff. - Essentially, these complaints are the same ones that the imperial estates, at the Emperor's request, had drawn up for the Emperor at Worms in 1521, with the request that they be stopped; here, however, the Emperor (through his governor) and the imperial estates bring the same complaints with the same request before the Pope.

Preface.

After the letters of papal holiness, as well as the advertisement and instruction given by their orator to the Roman imperial majesty, governors, princes, princes, and other estates of the holy empire, arrived at the above-mentioned imperial diet at Nuremberg on account of the Lutheran action, all such estates of the empire have written a common answer, in which it is reported, among other things, that the secular estates have their special complaint, which they have against the see of Rome and other ecclesiastical estates, in addition to the above-mentioned common answer.

The papal orator has received the answer of the secular estates, and has asked for its removal; as is found in the answer given by the common imperial estates. Therefore, after this, out of many other annoyances, this time alone, in haste, several high, great complaints of the secular estates have been taken up in the shortest possible time, but without being confessed or given up, what of it remains unreported now, and, by the gracious, fatherly, Christian and praiseworthy request of papal holiness, have been handed over to their orator, to be brought to their holiness for the best, as follows.

Complaining about the chair of Rome, and firstly:

Dispensing with the popes for money.

1) Namely, that some things based on human statutes, which are not based on any divine commandment or prohibition, such as, with honest marriages, by reason of the scales and degrees of consanguinity, affinity, and gevatterschaft, forbidden food, and other such things (of which many examples are to be set, but are now in the best of cases omitted), as especially with the poor, are set for damnable sin, and yet are permitted and allowed to the rich, who have to pay such, for the sake of money. As a result, not only has an unspeakably large amount of money and goods been brought to Rome from German lands, but other great spiritual burdens and seductions of consciences and souls have followed in countless ways.

From the forbidden time.

2) Item, it is also forbidden by the popes or their laws for the common man to have marital weddings between Sunday, when the Alleluia is laid down, and Shrove Tuesday, which is otherwise the time when the ecclesiastical and secular classes are most accustomed to worldly merriment, without penalty, so that they must therefore buy permission for money from the bishops or their archpriests. This is a special money trick and burden for the poor common man, as without money it is forbidden and a sin, but for money it is allowed and good.

Of great vexation of the papal indulgence.

3) Item, it is too often in the form of some church buildings, and from other good appearances, indulgence of sins, indulgence of usury, robbery, murder, fire and all other damage to the neighbor, in German lands for money to remit.

and money from German lands to Rome, thereby depriving many a poor, simple man of the food he himself needed; And, what is even more harmful, through such indulgences and indulgences, even frivolous and unskillful preachers, who proclaimed and proclaimed the same indulgences with great annoyance, and from the fact that the people were thereby allowed to commit many a sin through unceasing indulgence, were induced and strengthened to commit many grave sins, perjury, swearing, deathblows and others, and were also seduced in a damning manner. And such indulgences have at times extended not only to the present and future sins of the living, but also to the souls in purgatory, where money was deposited for them, so that they would certainly be redeemed. And even though such indulgences have been sent out and publicly preached on several occasions, as if they were to be used for the salvation of Christians against unbelievers, they have not been used for this purpose, but for other worldly and selfish purposes, to raise and keep their friends and family, which, together with the above-mentioned great annoyance and seduction of the Christian people, brought such unbelief among the Christian people, so that they are now expected to help against the Turks in great need, that they suspect that such desired help should again be abused in such a way. And that is why it is difficult to obtain help from the common man against the Turk. What great, unspeakable damage to the soul and to temporal goods will result from all this, papal holiness, as the highly knowledgeable and highly enlightened one, knows well and sufficiently without any doubt.

The pope and the bishops also reserve the right to absolve certain sins and cases on their own. And if such or similar cases occur, the people will not be absolved, unless much money is spent for it. Nor shall any dispensation be given for necessity in respectable, respectable matters, unless it is weighed out with gold. And if a poor man does not have money to give, he will not be absolved, nor will he be dispensed with in his duties.

But some rich people, for money and money's worth, are given letters of indult by papal sanctity, if they practice murder, perjury, or such abuses in the future, so that every bad priest can have them.

The first thing is that the evil-doer may be absolved from it. So that one gives cause to great vices and sins only for the sake of good and money.

Concerning the Stationirer.

4) Since the stationers, 1) who seek their collection in the country from time to time, bring much money from the people with their writing and begging and preaching of the Holy 2) Punishment and plagues, and pretend great indulgence and indulgence, which is only estimation and deception of the poor, simple man. St. Anthony's Embassy alone has been moved, and now there are St. Anthony's, St. Hauprechtz³) St. Cornelia's, St. Valentine's, and other new churches. Valentin, and other new imaginary envoys, thereby depriving the poor, simple people of what they have worked hard for in their blood and sweat, which continues to be done in various ways uselessly, shamefully, and blasphemously, which the poor are in great need of for their own and their children's nourishment, and which the archbishops and bishops allow for the sake of money.

From mendicants.

5) Item, the poor people are also excessively burdened with mendicants, which the mendicant orders, against their rule, practice in the cities and towns. For often there are two, three or four mendicants in a town; so that the house-poor people, who feed themselves with their hard work, and thus honestly, honestly and well kept, also have a wife and child, and due to old age or illness can never feed themselves with work, are duly deprived of their alms and help, and given elsewhere; which is also granted by the bishops for an annual allowance.

For this reason, the secular imperial estates ask papal holiness that they put an end to such a nuisance of indulgence, also of dispensation, stationirer and terminirer⁴), and that they do so, that no sins, which are not sins according to divine law, are made for the Christian believers, and for this reason absolved and dispensed for money, but that the Christian believers, as Christ's sheep, may be saved from their sins.

1) Stationirer - Reliquary collector.

2) In the old edition: "saints". For our reading, compare St. Louis edition, vol. XIV, 1475, § 2V: "St. Anthony, St. Valten, and the like, have plagued the iniquities."

3) "Huprechts" is found in No. 539, that is, St. Hubertus.

4) Terminirer - mendicant monks.

The church is to be left free to exercise its Christian liberties, and in Christian love, according to Christ's command, it is to be pastured free of charge, and if it is transgressed, it is to be punished meekly with good spiritual instruction, so that it may be seen that the shepherd seeks the salvation of the sheep, not their wool and his own profit. That secular matters may be brought to Rome in the first instance and otherwise justified without justice.

6) Item, our holy fathers, the popes, have cited and summoned, at the request of other clergy, some secular persons to Rome for inheritance, pledge and other such secular things. This is not only to the noticeable detriment and damage of these persons, but also to the detriment and violation of the secular jurisdiction of the secular authorities. For this reason, the secular estates of the Holy Roman Empire request that such complaints be stopped and that no secular person in any secular matter be excluded, nor that the clergy be cited to Rome in the first instance, but that they be left in the right before their ecclesiastical and secular authorities, under which they have been seated, and that they not be demanded further.

Of the conservators and papal judges.

7) The archbishops, bishops and prelates obtain from papal sanctity some elders or other ecclesiastical prelates, who are subject to them or otherwise well related, as judges of all their matters, which they complain of before them, and call such judges conservatores. Before them, they take secular persons, noble and ignoble, to court over matters that are completely secularly forbidden, although they have never before been denied or refused any right before the secular authorities. And those who for this reason do not want to appear or answer before such supposed judges are banished unfairly and voidly, as many examples could be counted. This again deprives the secular authorities and their courts. And if this were allowed, it would in time lead to all secular persons and things being brought before such and other ecclesiastical judges, who are completely partial and inconvenient to the secular ones. This is not acceptable in any way, and is also publicly contrary to the order of the Holy Roman Empire, which clearly states that each must let the other remain in the right before his proper judge and court. Therefore, the estates of the Holy Roman Empire request, as stated above, that such complaints be completely abolished. ,

Of Papal Delegates and Commissaries.

8) Papal holiness also gives the ecclesiastical persons, at their request, judices delegatos and commissarios as ecclesiastical judges in German lands, which the laity (be they of whatever dignity or rank they wish) take before the same judges for secular matters, and are subject to compel them to do so with the ban; all to abort and diminish secular jurisdiction, also to special dangerous detriment and damage of the secular persons.

How the popes draw some prelates out of the bishops' compulsory jurisdiction and other patrons' help.

9) Papal holiness is subject to expropriate some monasteries, and to withdraw from their bishops, as ordinary judges, jurisdiction, and also other of their secular patrons. This will not only diminish and destroy the bishops and patrons, but also the Holy Roman Empire, in their actions and assistance, which the bishops and other patrons have at times placed on their offices, and which they will continue to place on them, and which will help the Roman Empire even more. For this reason, the imperial estates ask that such complaints be stopped and that all such monasteries remain with their bishops and patrons, so that they may also help and serve the Holy Roman Empire in a more noble way.

From diminution of justice juris patronatus.

10) Item, if by deaths benefices are settled, which are patronatus of a layman or ecclesiastical juris, then papal sanctity, also of the same ambassadors and legates, are subject to derogate the same rights, and thereupon confer the benefices to curtisans 1) and others, of their liking, by which the ecclesiastical and secular patrons are deprived and taken away their due presentation. And it is said from time to time that the prevention has taken place, so whoever bestows before, he shall proceed, over and against that such patrons have de jure patronatus some time, in which they may bestow their benefices from male unseasoned, from which then follows all such ecclesiastical and secular patrons noticeable disadvantage and damage. For this reason, the estates of the Holy Roman Empire request that such complaints be stopped and that, for the time being, such benefices be granted to their patrons.

1) Curtisans == Roman courtiers.

Let the ordinary patrons' conferrals remain. Also not to allow the courtesans to accept such benefices, neither judicially nor in any other way, but finally to set and order, if anything is made and obtained again, that all this shall be void, null and voidable in all ways.

Of the clergy who die in Rome or on the way.

11) Item, in former times the popes of ecclesiastical persons, who were relatives of their saints or relatives in service, or went to Rome in the jubilee year or otherwise, and died in Rome or outside Rome on the way, granted beneficia, and officia, large and small, as fallen home to the curtisanis and other incompetent persons, as mentioned above, regardless of whether such benefices were de jure patronatus; thereby the ecclesiastical and secular patrons and feudatories have again been deprived of their justice.

How, under the appearance of the papal court, names of many benefices are accrued, and otherwise the priests, as long as they are entrusted with such benefices, are challenged by the courtesans.

12) In addition to all of these, several excellent beneficia, often under officialibus or familiaribus Papae and the papal court servants' names, have been accrued by unlearned and unskilled persons, and have been subject to bring such beneficia into commission (as they call it), also regressus, reservationes, pensiones, and many other incompatibilia, on it, by which such beneficia, come into waste and diminution, and thus remain for and for at the papal court, and the skilled capable persons of Germans have been little provided with it. Item, the Germans often encounter a lot of trouble from the Curtisans, who thus accrue ecclesiastical beneficia in German lands, so that they are subject to expel pious, honorable, old priests, if they have quietly possessed their beneficia for many years with good title, without distress. They are also to penetrate into other ways, where they want to be otherwise quiet, so that they must agree with the same curtisans for an annual pension or reserve, according to the ability of their Roman statutu and regalia, which they daily deny to their liking, and derogate the old ones. Thereby not only those pious priests, who are not reported to the Curtisi, but also the feudal lords are deceived. And even if such a priest does not get along with the Curtisans, they still make war on him; and if the priest dies in such a war, the Curtisan would then be appointed, regardless of the right feudal lord's justice. For this reason, the imperial estates again humbly request that papal holiness put an end to all such complaints by the Curtisans and not allow them to fill some German benefices.

How to provide the spiritual dignities to be drawn to Rome.

13) Item, what good beneficia, as provostries, decaneries, cantries, or other similar dignitates and officia, also canonicat, vicarei and parishes are left in mense ordinario, except the city of Rome, so here before ecclesiastical and secular patron to confer, The Pope and the Cardinals shall be entitled to confer, consecrate, present and nominate such dignities and benefices in Rome, especially if the holders thereof have been officiales or officiantes of the Pope or of the Cardinals. Also some, who have much good beneficia, are summoned to dinner in the Cardinals' Court in Rome for the sake of fraud, and secret notaries and witnesses are brought to it, so that later, if it comes to a case, it is testified as if these summoned persons were servants of the Cardinal, with whom they thus dine safely, regardless of the fact that this has happened with great fraud. Therefore, the Estates of the Realm ask that such a complaint be stopped, and that the ordinary patrons remain in the conferring and granting, presentation and nomination of such dignities and benefits, regardless of whether the familiares or officers of the Papal Court are in hand, or have had or still have regressum, accessum or other supposed justice, as the names have or gain, so that their supposed justice is harmless and irrelevant to the ordinary patrons now and henceforth.

Of rules of papal aancelei, new finds, and reserves on future cases.

14) Item, not only have the rules at Rome, in the chancery there, been set and often changed for the benefit and advantage of the Curtisans, but also many new findings and offices have been devised, so that the ecclesiastical fiefs of the German nation may be brought into Roman hands and occupied the sooner.

The ecclesiastical fiefs are not only reserved and insured for future cases for the ecclesiastical and secular lords of the fiefs, but also for their benefices and ecclesiastical fiefs, to the noticeable deprivation, complication, disadvantage and damage of their justice. For when those to whom such reservations are given obtain the ecclesiastical fiefs, they continue to practice 1) permutation, reservation, subrogation, ingressum, regressum, accessum, and others, so that the same fiefs never or hardly return to the right ordinary patrons and fief lords.

Of the harmfulness of the papal sold offices.

15) The popes have many offices belonging to the courts and other institutions, which offices are sold and abandoned by the popes to the same officers or officials for large sums of money and in such a way that the Germans and others, who need the use of such officers or officials in judicial or other actions in Rome, must pay for them with much higher rewards. With this and many countless other things noted, how at the Roman court after the secular money so with various dangers is put up to now, and for unfairly averted.

Of parishes and benefices in general, and therefore of the Roman abuse.

16) Item, not only have many gratuities and reservations pectorales, mentales, generales and speciales, regressus, accessus, incorporaciones, uniones and Concordat, as all these have names, been given to prelatures, parishes and benefices, especially in German lands, for the sake of money and temporal enjoyment, but also at times such prelatures and benefices have been given to the great companies and merchants, with some supposed embellishment (for sale), and by practice almost all benefices, or the best ones, have been drawn from the German nation and lent to unlearned, unskilled and careless persons, so that many from foreign nations come to prelatures and God's gifts 2) who are unlearned, and for this purpose not are of the German tongue. From this follows that they may not possess and govern such benefices themselves, as is especially proper for pastors, that they should present good examples to their parishioners, and feed and provide them with Christian doctrine and instruction for the salvation of their souls as Christian sheep; but this does not happen. Rather, such pastorates are filled by those who obtain them, as if they were obvious, with other unlearned, unskilled persons, who only give the most money for absences, as one gives the secular building yards and tithes, who then preach to the Christian people, for the divine word and proven holy scripture, useless and unproven legends of the saints, and other fictitious, annoying, pagan fables, and cannot do better. Thus, the Christian people are led by such unlearned and unskilled parish priests away from the right Christian faith and trust in God, in which alone our salvation and our souls' blessedness stands, to other superstitions and human works, which serve them, the parish priests, for their temporal enjoyment. In addition, they are burdened with all kinds of drudgery, so that they may also maintain and enrich themselves in their great absence, and thus money is given annually to other nations from German lands, from which nothing comes back to the German nation in eternity, nor is any gratitude or goodness shown, although such benefices are endowed by the Germans to their own, and not to other nations. For this reason, the imperial estates request that such complaints, which cause so much, excessive money and property to come from German lands and to be uselessly used, be completely stopped, so that the benefices in German lands are not lent to anyone other than native Germans who reside there themselves, as is due in equity and respectability.

As the archbishops and bishops are obliged by their capitula, granting of benefices half.

17) Item, such parishes and benefices are not only provided at Rome, for the sake of money, merit or favor, with unlearned, harmful, frivolous and annoying persons, but also such things are done by archbishops and bishops, who are so bound by their chapters that they usually have to confer all large parishes that bear much use, and no doubt endowed by the founders on pious, learned men, on their chapter lords, however unskilled they may be at it, who for the time being have to take care of such parishes.

1) In the old edition: "Partiten".

2) "God's gifts," another name for benefices bestowed by special grace.

The same is true of all chapters of high and low monasteries, which are called cathedrales and collegiatis, and which are called cathedrales and collegiatis. The same thing is done by all chapters of high and low monasteries, called cathedrales and collegiatis.

The same ones, who have the best parishes and benefices, also let the parish and benefice houses collapse with great use, so that the parishes and benefices are endowed by the laity, so that they only ask for a lot of money, from which they can have their splendor all their life long in various sinful and annoying ways, and nothing at all about the founders' and other parishioners' bliss. Therefore, the secular estates of the Holy Roman Empire ask papal holiness to put an end to such annoying disorder and complaints, to let the archbishops and bishops do their duty, and not to allow them to associate with each other, but to ensure that no one is lent a parish or similar benefice that has pastoral care, unless he is learned, skilful, and of an honorable way of life; that he also resides there, and thus has no more than one parish, which he provides for in a Christian and unruly manner.

Of Commenden and Incorporation of Prelatures.

18) Item, as is known, many abbeys, monasteries, and other ecclesiastical houses, imperial and princely foundations have been commendated and incorporated to cardinals, bishops, and other prelates, and through these cardinals, bishops, and prelates the foundations have been diminished to such an extent, where formerly in the same foundations one, forty, fifty or more persons were held, that now often not five, six or ten of them are held and accepted, all for the benefit of their own use, which is an annoying, unsolvable thing and high complaint. And therefore it is hereby also requested that such abbeys, monasteries and other ecclesiastical houses be restored to their former status, and henceforth to avoid giving such commendations or incorporation to anyone.

Of the foundations that are based on the nobility alone.

19) Item, although some monasteries in German lands, which are founded by and on high and lower nobility, on which, according to old custom, only princes, counts, lords and others of nobility should and may come, nevertheless, these same

The Pope's papal liberties, old conventions and laudable statutes are not applied, but it is subordinated to prevent the free elections of bishops and provosts, deans 1) and canonici; to make some coadjutors against the approval of the Chapter, and also to bring Curtisans, even if they are not noble and unlearned, to the monasteries, and therefore to act against ancient custom and laudable statutes, so that the benefices of the nobility of the German nation are withdrawn, and the ignoble, and bestowed upon the unprecious, either for money or for temporal services, although the unprecious are allowed to do so, so that princes, counts, lords, and others of nobility have to buy such benefices from the unprecious or pay interest on them, with some fictitious embellishment, although they are given other names; which then causes such high and low nobility of the German nation great discomfort and disadvantage.

Old Privilegia to Handle.

20) To all this: although ecclesiastical and secular estates, as mentioned above, have been given privileges and liberties by papal sanctity to confer and sanctify provostries and other affected benefices and offices themselves, nevertheless, in the same by new federations from the See of Rome all kinds of practices have been used to derogate and cancel such liberties, and in other ways various entries have been made. For this reason, the estates of the realm ask that such things be stopped, that they be abolished, and that each of them be allowed to exercise his liberties as is fair.

From the annates.

21) Item, for the sake of the annuities, which they, the ecclesiastical prelates, give and let follow the Roman See through the German nation for several years, granted in such a way that they should be used for nothing else, but only to resist the Turk, and the same granted years have long since passed, also as the given annuities are used in other unauthorized places. In the other common imperial estates, the papal orator is given the answer to such unseemly complaints, 2) and first of all, the imperial majesty himself writes to the papal sanctity, 3) sufficient notice is given; and this time, the secular estates leave it alone.

1) In the old edition: "Dechnat" and immediately following: "Canonic".

2) No. 720, on 5 Feb. 1523.

3) No. 713, dated Oct. 31, 1522.

The fact that the people of the city will live an angry life will cause a whole outrage and revolt among the common people, 1) not only against them, the ecclesiastical estates, but also against all authorities, because they will see such trouble and will not be moved to avert it.

Therefore, necessity and equity require that such freedom as is supposed for consecrated persons be abolished, removed, and for their sake some laws be ordered and made that they, they find consecrated in majoribus or minoribus, 2) with one or more consecration, 2) with one or more consecrations, shall have no liberty in their maltreatment before secular persons, but shall have equal judgement and right, and whoever, for his maltreatment, shall be punished in the court in which he is entered, according to the occasion of his misdeed, like other common evil persons, according to the laws of the realm. This will undoubtedly not be burdensome for the pious clergy, and will urge the wicked to piety and obedience of their authorities, also cut off and prevent sedition and antagonism between them and the seculars, and give the seculars cause to honor and love the pious clergy all the more.

From weighting of the ban.

25) Item, many Christians in Rome, as well as in other places, are banished by the archbishops, bishops or their ecclesiastical judges for the sake of temporal things and goods, and thereby many weak consciences are weighed down and led into despair, also for the sake of temporal money and goods, and often deprived of soul, honor, body and goods for very little, contrary to divine statute and law, so that no one, but only because of overcome heresy, should be banished or considered evil. For this reason, the secular estates of the Holy Roman Empire ask that Papal Holiness, as a faithful, Christian and God-fearing father, finally put an end to such complaints of banishment from the Roman See, and also abolish them from the other archbishops, bishops and their ecclesiastical judges, and decree in such a way, that no one shall be banned and considered evil for any reason whatsoever, but only for publicly conquered heresy affecting the holy Christian faith, and that no one shall be separated from God and His Church for temporal goods or other such human proceedings, apart from unbelief.

How to cast a spell on many others who sit and dwell in spots with the banished, yet are quite innocent.

26) Item, if at times some persons in a village are banished, not only with equity, but also often with inequity, allegedly, so that not only these, but also their neighbors, who have nothing to do with such things or are related, are also banished, so that the officials get their way sooner, and the self-sacrificers 3) can bring their property to contract. For whether the self-made man is driven away with his wife and children by such unreasonable, burdensome conduct, in which no measure nor distinction is made as to the poor man's property or fault, nor is it considered, The neighbors are not to be considered whether they intentionally or wantonly participated in or had contact with the banished Selbsacher, nor whether they were therefore obliged to drive him out of their village or not, but are nevertheless obliged, which is not possible in the case of the Selbsacher, to enforce this from the others, however innocent they may be. And if it is pointed out to the ecclesiastical judges and they are reminded that their own ecclesiastical rights forbid that for monetary debts or the like no one shall be banished, nor shall an interdict be held, then they do so nevertheless, and say that it is for the sake of disobedience, which should be so much greater than it stems from lesser things, so that they may think that they are covering their unreasonable conduct with unreason.

Further, from unseemly interdicts.

27) If a priest or other consecrated person is slain, not only the perpetrator is banished, but also the town, village or hamlet is interdicted unreasonably, and as long as the interdict is held, no Christian work is performed until the perpetrator or the congregation of the same hamlet has repented or decreed the matter; Regardless of how wickedly the consecrated person has acted and given cause to strike, the papal laws themselves make a distinction in several such cases, which is contrary to law, all equality and equity.

From Abthuing of several holidays.

28) Item, it is not little, but highly burdensome for the poor people that so many holidays, outside of divine laws, but commanded by popes and bishops to be kept under the ban, thereby the poor people lose much necessary work.

3) "Self-maker" - the one whom the matter actually concerns.

1) Added by us.
2) That is, in higher or lower consecration.

and for this reason they often have to let their fruits in the field become damaged and spoiled because of thunderstorms, which they would otherwise like to bring home. Moreover, even on holidays, which should be kept solely for the praise and blessed improvement of mankind (as is evidently the case), most blasphemies, deaths, wounds, gluttony, unchastity, discord, gambling, other eating of the poor, and otherwise innumerable sinful and shameful things are done. Nevertheless, the bishops, officials and priests are hard on the poor man for such celebrations, so that the spiritual pleasures, with offerings, church services and others, may be increased all the more by the celebrating people gathered together, which is against God and the common good. For this reason, the secular classes consider it necessary that such holidays should be kept apart from Sundays and high festivals, and that whatever other holidays remain should not be celebrated longer than the time it takes for the people to hear the early morning sermon and mass.

Of the bailiwicks and houses in Apulia, in Sicily, which were stolen from the chivalrous German Order.

29) Item, although the German Order of Prussia 2c. out of the benevolent providence and gifts of the Roman emperors and kings of high lordly memory, also of the princes, counts, lords and nobility, of some estates and usufruct in the kingdoms of Sicily and Apulia, also of other French lands, happened in former times, so that they might have the more stately disposition against the infidel and the more honest entertainment of the German nobility, From such estates and usufructuaries they made several bailiwicks and commanderies, which they quietly possessed and held for several centuries, but by the previous popes such estates were withdrawn from the mentioned Order and delivered to several cardinals, archbishops and bishops who were neither German nor of the Order, so that the chivalrous German Order still lacks such estates.

In addition, the previous popes of the German Order gave houses in Venice to a born whale and clothed him with the habit of the Order, all contrary to the statutes of the said German Order, in which only the German nobility is to be, and therefore contrary to papal, imperial and royal confirmations. Similarly, the Roman curians of the German Order have touched houses in Italy with papal bulls and commission, as at Bononia 2c., and the

The Order of the Holy Roman Emperor has insisted on taking legal action against the Order, which is no small diminishment of the Order and of the German nation.

Item, the German Lords of Stablora 1) St. Benedict's monastery, on which they were founded, has been taken away for a short time and given to Cardinal Columna in commendations, all to the detriment and diminishment of the German nation, against law and all equity. Therefore, the Estates also request, as before, that Papal Holiness restore and reinstate such stolen goods and usufruct to the chivalric German Order without delay, or decree that it be done as is due by right and equity.

Of complaints which the secular estates have against the archbishops, bishops and other prelates, chapters and their courts.

30) Item, among other many burdens of the archbishops, bishops and prelates, is the one, as reported before among the Roman infirmities, that they obtain from the See of Rome conservatores, delegatos judices, and such ecclesiastical, inconvenient and entirely partial judges, before whom they, 2) not only to deprive the secular of their ordinary judges, courts and authorities, but also to deprive them of their souls, honor, bodies and goods by means of an alleged ban, and by the violent use of the same.

How worldly goods are transferred into the hands of the clergy and not into the hands of the worldly again.

31) Item, the clergy is provided with constitution, statutes and orders by the See of Rome, that it never has to sell or change the property of the churches, called bona immobilia, to lay persons, and yet the clergy, without any necessity, by various unspeakable and hidden ways, seek without ceasing to get hold of the worldly goods, as much as they like and as much as they like. Even the seculars have so far acquired so much that they have only a small portion and so little more that they are unable to maintain peace and justice in the empire and to resist the Turks, and it is unpleasant to tolerate such a long period in the secular estates if they want to perish completely with the ecclesiastics.

1) In No. 539 "Sublack". See Col. 1743.

2) In the old edition: "before".

How the bishops of the clergy are subject to take secular inherited property.

32) It is also sometimes the case that ecclesiastics have inherited hereditary property that they inherited from their parents, along with other heirs, and if these ecclesiastics die without a will, that such worldly property is required by some bishops to be taken from their rightful heirs. This is quite burdensome and unpleasant for the seculars to endure.

How some secular goods, sold or transferred to the churches or cloisters, are to be brought under ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

33) If it ever happens that secular goods, situated in secular jurisdiction, are sold, transferred or delivered in other ways to churches and cloisters, together with interest, fees 1) and usufruct, or at times behind the secular jurisdiction, charged with interest or taxes against such churches or cloisters, the clergy are subject to take such secular goods out of secular jurisdiction; therefore the bishops and prelates also hold and act contrary to law and all equity.

Of conferring the new endowed benefices.

34) If a new benefice is founded by the secular, high or low, some bishops want to have the first granting of such benefices, and not allow the founders beforehand, nor confirm such benefices, unless the founders and patrons grant them such.

Of unnecessary confirmation of benefices, and others.

35) Item, if someone wants to establish and confirm a new endowed benefice, brotherhood or something else of the kind; although such confirmation is not required by law and equity, they are nevertheless valued and taken over excessively in money, and by their statutes and other practices they insist that such endowments, however small they may be, be confirmed. This is also a great burden.

Of certain unjust burdens imposed on clergymen who have been enfeoffed by the seculars.

36) Item, if the priests are enfeoffed and presented by the seculars, and request investiture from the bishops or their vicars, some want to have as much of it as the fief has one year, in some places two years, income; so that half the part is demanded to the bishop, and the other half part to the archidiacon or archpriest, for giving the possession.

Moreover, such ecclesiastical benefices are so highly and excessively burdened with subsidies and other treasures (without there being public and honest causes for which the common rights to take such subsidies yield) that the priests are not allowed their necessary abstention, from which the same priests take cause to recover such of their complaint and lack of the laity, and sell the sacraments and other Christian gifts, which according to the commandment of the holy Gospels they are obliged to give free of charge, to the laity for money.

How to ordain too many and often unlearned and unskilled priests.

37) Item, the archbishops and bishops, or their suffraganei, too often consecrate unlearned, clumsy and quite frivolous persons, who also partly have no benefice, nor any other certain provision for their sustenance, but only, or often no apparent title at all, so that they often, out of innate malice, frivolity, clumsiness or poverty, engage in all kinds of dishonorable dealings, thereby despising the right, true spiritual state, and giving the common people evil examples and annoyance. Thus, some bishops believe six alleged witnesses who give evidence of the person to be ordained, who say that he is worthy and skilled for it, but at the time none of them has ever seen or recognized him before; and thus they dare to do enough for the Christian statutes with a pretense alone.

From expenses, so one consecrates the churches or churchyards.

38) When the consecrating bishops consecrate churches, altars and churchyards, they burden the poor people with much food and many other expenses. And even though they themselves confess that they should neither take nor demand any reward for this, they

1) In the old edition: "Gulden". "Gülte" is so much as: Tax, land rent. Cf. St. Louis edition, Vol. III, 8.

The seculars must give them money for their consecration in the guise of a fictitious donation, which they also have their servants solicit and demand from the poor people in such a way that the poor people cannot have it. In addition, the seculars buy some special vessels or dishes for such consecration, and after the consecration they have to redeem them from the consecrating bishop or his servants, or leave them with them, and with all this they do not bring a little money from the seculars everywhere in the bishoprics of German lands. Such other burdens on the seculars should also be stopped.

That the churchyards have to be consecrated at times in an unnecessary way.

39) If two people beat or fight with fists, without any other weapons, in a churchyard, so that one of them becomes a little bloodthirsty, the priests are obliged to keep an interdict and not to practice the Christian works until the community has the churchyard consecrated again, with heavy costs and expenses, as stated above; all to the detriment of the secular persons.

From expenses of the Aebte and Aebtissinnen consecration.

40) If an abbot or abbess is elected, they must, although they are consecrated and ordained for monks and monastic women according to necessity, have the consecrating bishop consecrate them anew, dearly transfer the same consecrating bishop and his servants, and give money for this, in the guise of a donation; This results in much expense, and is detrimental and damaging not only to the same monasteries, but also to the secular authorities to whom such monasteries belong and serve.

From consecration of many other things, belonging to the blaze.

41) If secular persons buy chasubles and many other things belonging to the mass in their churches at their own expense, to the praise of God, they must be consecrated by the consecrating bishops before they are used for the mass, and therefore given to the consecrating bishop for veneration or donation. This inconsistency is also justified. But if the consecrating bishops do not want to have such an effort in vain, then they allow every prelate or priest to do this for free, so that unseemly stinginess is not noted among them.

From bell consecrations.

42) Item, the ordained bishops or sub-bishops have also devised that they, and no other priests, supposedly baptize their bells to the laity, who do not understand it better. And the poor simple-minded man is persuaded by them that because of such alleged baptized bell ringing the devil and the harmful weather should be driven away. Therefore, as many people as are able to give money are asked to be the godparents of such bells, who in the supposed baptism of the bells attack a long rope tied to the bells, and repeat the name of the bells (as used with baptized children) to the consecrating bishop. For this purpose, after the supposed baptism of the bells, a vestment is put on the bells as baptized Christian children, and in such supposed baptism of the bells, the consecrating bishop together with his clergy and servants must be deliciously laid, and special rewards, which he calls a donation, must be given to the consecrating bishop, and all invited godparents of the bells must be fed with apparent food and drink. So that often in a bad village several hundred guilders are raised on such a supposed baptism of bells; which is first of all an unchristian, seductive superstition of the simple-minded people, and in addition a protection of the laymen. In these and other such drudgeries, the highest wealthy bishops handle their consecrated bishops or sub-bishops, so that they may otherwise give them very little for the decay of their episcopal offices, and this is stopped in an equitable manner. If, however, it should ever be good to consecrate the bells (as the consecrating bishops call it against the prudent who question them about it), it is decreed that this consecration be done by any priest, as used with water, salt, palms or roots, in this case also free of charge and without the expense of the laity, so that the poor common people are not thus seduced and brought to harm, and for this reason unseemly suspicion of avarice is prevented.

How the bishops and parish priests desire and take part in the sacrifices and gifts of the pilgrimages.

43) Item, in some monasteries, where there is a pilgrimage, the bishops or prelates want to have the third, or at least the fourth penny of all the offerings that are made, which their own papal rights do not allow them to have, but such offerings are used for help against the Turks, or otherwise for the needs of the next Christian.

How the bishops covet unseemly money from the virgin monasteries.

44) Item, if some virgin monasteries are governed by provosts, who are removable at will and are not perpetual, the bishops do not want to allow such removal and taking in of other provosts, so the monasteries give them some florins.

Of the archpriest officials and other ecclesiastical judges.

45) The officials of the archpriests are commonly unlearned and unskilled, also partly frivolous, greedy persons, and how they themselves sit in open sins and disgraces is found from daily experience; Thus the secular persons, whom they should duly punish for sin, are almost annoyed also in spiritual matters, 1) and in addition are miserably damaged and ruined in their goods by such frivolous persons, in whom nothing but avarice and no Christian conscience appears. Which the archbishops and bishops, if they were right pastors and shepherds of the Christian flock, should put a stop to, and not order such flocks of Christ to such annoying persons.

How the laity are unreasonably dragged before spiritual judgment.

46) The laity are unreasonably dragged into the spiritual courts; for if the plaintiff is spiritual, and the answerer secular, the clergy want to drag such secular answerers into the spiritual courts for the sake of any matter whatsoever; which is publicly against the law, and not convenient for the secular.

How Secular Subjects are Dragged Before Spiritual Courts for Guilt.

47) Item, the clergy also very often take the secular subjects for debt with spiritual rights, before they are denied some cheap help by the secular authorities. And so the poor people, who cannot follow their spiritual rights in many ways, and are also too often not obliged to do so, are brought into supposed banishment, and also ruinous costs and damage, quite wantonly and miserably.

How to cause the seculars unreasonably to demand their subjects in ecclesiastical courts.

48) Item, there are also many other unseemly things that go out by summons and admonition in the ecclesiastical courts against secular persons, regardless of the fact that such ecclesiastical judges know beforehand publicly and undoubtedly that such a matter does not belong before them, and must also dismiss it afterwards; which is also highly burdensome for the secular subjects. For although such matters are subsequently referred to secular ordinary courts at the request of the defendant and secular authorities, the persons unreasonably summoned nevertheless suffer considerable expense and damage as a result. For they must therefore petition their secular authority, which they nevertheless cannot always get near, bring writs and demands from them, and send them to the ecclesiastical judge. On this they also receive a lot of messenger's wages, expenses, board and lodging. And if at any time such a summoned person cannot find his secular authority immediately, and cannot bring about the above-mentioned demand and send it to the ecclesiastical judge before the reminder to the ecclesiastical courts goes out, the ecclesiastical judges do not want to dismiss such secular matters for that reason, no matter what it may be.

That the ecclesiastical judges do not want to reject some special lay matters.

49) If a lawsuit is filed in the ecclesiastical courts for the sake of virginity or unworthy children, for wages or for the sake of a widow, they will not dismiss or dismiss such a lawsuit, which is quite unfair.

From unreasonable costs of secular matters, so drawn to ecclesiastical courts, and sanctified again.

50) Item, if at times secular persons are tried by ecclesiastical courts, as even with public inconsistency, that the same ecclesiastical judges cannot refuse them their requested and desired remission and instruction before their ordinary judges, which they do reluctantly and with difficulty, then the plaintiff's procurator demands his reward for the proceeding to the same answering party, which, as stated above, has been unfairly tried, and therefore legally sanctioned. And the same innocent person must, to

1) In the old edition: "annoy".

2) "Answerer" put by us instead of "Answer" in the old edition.

The judge shall pay the unstable proceedings, which, as reported, have been brought against him, to the extent that he has previously incurred unreasonable neglect, expense, and damage, until he obtains favorable instruction from the ecclesiastical court. For this reason, the judge is also urged to take unnecessary letters and charged with alleged banishment, ut afflicto afflicto addatur, irrespective of the fact that the damage caused to him, who has thus acted in an irregular manner and has therefore been reprimanded, should by law be paid by the opposing party. But the ecclesiastical judges need such a contradiction of rights so that all the more unreasonable plaintiffs adhere to their courts, and they thus bring unreasonable benefit from the people.

How to urge several new tithes to be given.

51) Item, if the laity do not give small and large tithes of some properties for many years, they are so oppressed in ecclesiastical courts (since they have no profit) that they must give the tithes or other things demanded of them, or suffer supposed excommunication; considering, even if they appeal to Rome from an evil judgment, how heavy, impossible, and unequal a discharge they might receive there.

As the ecclesiastical officers and commanders, the laity are also subject to the ecclesiastical courts.

52) The ecclesiastics do not only bring the laity before the ecclesiastical judges on their own behalf in such and such cases, but also the ecclesiastical officials, mayors, servants and subjects are subject to the same use as their sovereigns.

Of shameful things done in the spiritual court.

53) If it ever happens that ecclesiastical persons have to sue for iniquities and abusive words against laymen, the ecclesiastical judge shall also be the judge of these matters, so that the answerer is forced by his ordinary judge.

How to bring secular matters before the ecclesiastical court on account of a committed crime.

54) Item, the Officials shall take, so in secular matters and between secular per

If a contract is made between two people, by oaths or oaths, a bodily or written obligation, a proclamation or a promise, then such things should be settled before them. And if this should be the case, all secular contracts and letters, which are usually made with such stipulation and obligation, would have to be settled in the ecclesiastical courts, and the secular courts would have to be held in vain; which is unpleasant to all secular authorities, and also contrary to law and equity. If, however, the ecclesiastical courts are to be allowed something on account of perjuries sworn in person, they could not thereby become judges of the main secular matters for which a perjury was sworn, but would have to punish the perjured persons solely for the sin of public perjury, and atone for it with ecclesiastical penance, but the secular judges, who have to atone for the perjuries with penal punishment, would not be able to break off such punishment on account of their punishment.

How the ecclesiastical estates do not keep nor handle their self-made reformation of the ecclesiastical courts.

55) Item, the ecclesiastical estates not only despise and override common established rights, but also make, for example, the bishops and prelates, because of the ecclesiastical courts and sends, especially supposed reformation, statutes and laws, which in some parts are contrary to common rights, and especially to all secular jurisdiction and authorities, also to their subjects, and are almost harmful. But regardless of the fact that these reforms and laws are mostly based on the advantage of the clergy over the seculars, and that the seculars are not obligated to accept them by law, they are not kept by the clergy themselves, according to right and reasonable understanding. For, although the same reformations are usually based on the fact that secular matters should not be brought before ecclesiastical judges, that before such judges and courts not only secret but only public, grievous, spiritual sins should be dealt with, and that in all this not money but only our Lord Jesus Christ and the salvation of souls should be sought, nevertheless, from public works of this kind, and almost many pieces, there is quite a contradiction, as is partly touched upon in, before, and after the reported articles with brevity. And if a bishop would be inclined to put an end to such iniquity, his oath, which he swore in his election, obliges him to do so.

How they impose more monetary than spiritual penance on sinners.

56) Item, although the ecclesiastical judges and officials are to set only ecclesiastical penances for ecclesiastical manifest sin, so that, as has been stated, it is noted that they alone seek the salvation of souls, and not money, yet they set the same ecclesiastical penances all the more heavily, so that the laymen buy them from them with money; thereby they value and bring almost a lot of money from the people, and are thus parties and judges for their own enjoyment, which is nevertheless against God, right and all fairness.

Now often are weighted down by unfounded, dressed-up slander because of honorable men and women.

57) If, because of sins or vices, a man or woman is reprimanded before the official or ecclesiastical court, such a person must, if he or she does not otherwise wish to be judged guilty, purging himself or herself with his or her oath. If he has thus cleared himself and is then to be held innocent, for which reason it is also proper to release the person from his damage, he must give the official or ecclesiastical judge two guilders for this purpose, and a place of one guilder for an unnecessary letter of judgment, which he is urged to take. Therefore the officials and ecclesiastical judges also seek out such unjust reprimands, and bring them before them; from this then follows much great complaint. If a woman is reproached by another for being an adulteress or sorceress out of anger or envy, and comes before the official, he also charges the same women to excuse herself with her oath. Now everyone can well appreciate that in these cases a woman must swear that she is guilty or innocent, if she wants to keep her worldly honor and temporal life otherwise. From this, not only evil enjoyment of money, but also much foreknowledge of perjury can be sought and will follow; this will also at times prevent the secular judge from his due punishment.

How the spiritual judges unreasonably seek interest from divorced matrimonial cases.

58) Item, if a man and a woman act with each other on account of holy matrimony in such a way that they provide that there shall be a marriage between them, and therefore one of them gives the other clothes, jewels or other things to keep, and then on account of the marriage they dispute, also from the Official, he wants to have an unfair interest, namely all that one has given to the other to keep, which is against all rights, even all respectability and equity.

Of some things that may be done in ecclesiastical and secular courts.

59) Item, although there are many things that can be done, judged and punished according to the ability of the rights with ecclesiastical and secular courts, nevertheless many things happen when the secular judges, as they have power, use their judicial power, that they are forbidden to do so by the ecclesiastical judges with the ban. And so, where it is to take place, the ecclesiastical judges may take whatever they want from the secular courts and authorities; this is highly burdensome and unpleasant for the Emperor's Majesty and her secular members. And even though, according to the law, public perjury, adultery, sorcery, and the like are subject to civil punishment by ecclesiastical and secular judges, whichever comes first, and thus prevention is permitted, the ecclesiastical judges alone are entitled to inflict such punishment against the law. This is very burdensome for the secular authorities, and it is not easy.

How secular matters, for lack of secular assistance, are brought before the spiritual courts.

60) If secular persons apply to the ecclesiastical judges for a summons in secular matters and claim that the secular authorities do not want to help them legally, the ecclesiastical judges shall grant the same plaintiffs a summons and other process before they first thoroughly show or prove that they have been denied justice before the secular authorities. And if the matter is then referred and dismissed at the request of the secular authorities or the defendant, the secular judge is given almost four weeks to finally help the plaintiff. If in that time the final judgment and its execution are not issued, the ecclesiastical judge shall allow the plaintiff to continue to proceed before him in accordance with his rights. It is quite unreasonable that a case before a secular judge should be completed in four weeks, but not in three, four or more years before the ecclesiastical judge. The same is done in Rome by the papal judges, and such plaintiffs are believed on their oaths; for this reason, too, they often cause the opposing party to suffer noticeably and to be dismissed.

The court shall be entitled to take legal action in cases where there is a lack of legal assistance from the secular authorities. And the ecclesiastical judges say that in such cases they may bring secular matters before them if there is a lack of legal assistance from secular authorities. And yet they will not tolerate it if a cleric or a secular person sues in clerical matters and feels a lack of legal assistance from the clerical judge, so that he may apply to the secular authorities for justice in the same way. However, the written laws generally make the same distinction, as the papal rights are to come to the aid of the secular, and again the secular rights are to come to the aid of the papal rights.

That the ecclesiastical judges are attempting to use the presumed statute of limitations to impose secular judicial constraints on themselves.

61) Item, the ecclesiastical estates in some places are also subject to drag secular persons and things before them in justification from protracted use, quasi possessione and statute-barred prescription, thereby diminishing, withdrawing and averting from Imperial Majesty and the Roman Empire their highest dignity of secular jurisdiction and judicial compulsion; However, it is evidently right that against the high authority of the pope and Roman emperor no one may prescribe or make use of some statute of limitations, regardless of whether someone has used and brought something quietly for almost many years. As the ecclesiastical judges impose double punishment on death-rowers and other sinners.

62) Item, after often and much happens, also in some cathedral churches statutes or abuses are that the death-strikers and other sinners of male and female persons, and especially in Lent, in the holy week of martyrdom, after done confession, for death-strikers and other cases, which are reserved and reserved to the bishops, must obviously do penance, as such is kept in use, and even though they do their penance publicly, which brings them no small disgrace in the eyes of the world, they must nevertheless at times, after such open penance, give the officials much money to pay off, and thus suffer two punishments for one deed, by which many a man is highly burdened, that he must give friendship to the official more for punishment than for payment of the deprived, or the same ordinary worldly jurisdiction. All this is against divine and common written law.

How the ecclesiastical judges and officiales tolerate unseemly attendance and usury for the sake of money.

63) If priests or other consecrated persons have public wives who have given birth to children in a condemned birth, or if two persons are otherwise in adultery, or if in these cases another person's wife commits adultery, the officials and ecclesiastical judges shall take money and let such wicked persons sit quietly in sin and disgrace for the sake of an annual interest (which they receive for this). They do the same with usurers. In this way, other Christian people are easily angered, moved to sin and shame, provoked and led, and thus many people are miserably ruined, not only in their temporal goods, but also for the sake of their souls. If at times it is doubtfully stated that one of two spouses may have died in a foreign place, the officials take money and allow the desired spouse, without knowing the right reason, to have residence with [another] person, and take such toleration, from which much spiritual and temporal damage often follows.

How the senders demand unreasonable interest from the houses.

64) In some places, the lords of the church demand money from houses in towns and villages every year, and if this is not given to them, the poor people are banished and thus forced to pay such and many other such unreasonable amounts.

How to require weekly allowance from craftsmen.

65) In some places, they take weekly wages from millers, innkeepers, bakers, butchers, shoemakers, blacksmiths, tailors, shepherds, cowherds and other craftsmen. And if they do not pay it, they are forced to do so with a supposed ban.

Of unreasonable arrests and punishments of ecclesiastical judges.

66) Item, in many places it is an abuse that upon a layman's request in secular matters the ecclesiastical judge issues inhibition and prohibition letters against other laymen, before the ordinary secular judge not further, but before the ecclesiastical judge.

to be legally executed by him, the ecclesiastical judge. If the opposing party desires to be tried before his own ordinary judge, the ecclesiastical judge will have to decide whether the matter belongs before him or the secular judge, and the same judge, as a party in this case, will recognize himself as the judge, and will also handle it with increased banishment. Should such laymen appeal to Rome for this reason, it is not in their power. Moreover, the ecclesiastical high courts in Rome are also partial in such and similar matters; thus the ecclesiastical estates inflict much innumerable damage on the imperial majesty and the secular estates, and deprive them of their authority.

Of the great disadvantage that the laity have to deal with the officials in their ecclesiastical courts.

67) Item, if an ecclesiastical judge or official brings a layman before his ecclesiastical court, he has for such rights advocates, procurator and clerk free of charge, but the layman must transfer the right out of his pocket at great expense; thereby the laymen are pressed into many highly burdensome, unfair contracts, according to the will and prejudice of the ecclesiastical estates.

For what reasons external advocates and procurators are not allowed to be used in the ecclesiastical courts.

68) Item, the ecclesiastical judges want that all parties, who hang before their courts, do not take other advocates or procuratores, than in the city, where such courts are held. They also often set as short dates that lawyers or procuratores who are not available may not be used, and they use bogus reasons for this, as if it would be too good for the rights, for which the same lawyers and procuratores should be obligated; and yet this usually happens for a repugnant reason, as one finds publicly in daily experience. For the same judges know that such advocates and procurators, who sit with them, must have such great fear and awe of them and their sovereigns that they must not give advice or speak to the parties for legitimate defense and exception against their, the judges' and the parties', unreasonable authority; and for this reason the ecclesiastical prelates and others who live there know well, when they or theirs have to do with ecclesiastical rights, how hard every advocate and procurator has to work.

curator, a stranger, a foreigner, must fear the necessity of counseling and speaking against them. And even if someone does not want to confess to such timidity and fear of advocates and procurators, public, daily experience proves it, and it is very seldom that an advocate or another is so perfect and steadfast that neither fear, hope, love nor sorrow prevents him from all diligent promotion of justice, but may be fortunate, if an advocate or procurator has none of the aforementioned hindrances, that he nevertheless does not spare necessary diligence: how much more so if he is surrounded by the aforementioned fear. And this is to be done, so that the parties may take advocates or procurators within quite a few miles of the court of their choice, who would therefore do their due duty, like the other advocates and procurators who sit in the city where the court is held. And in this way, one would be able to avoid all the more unseemly encumbrances in one's rights.

How the sacraments are reserved for the poor for almost minor reasons.

69) Item, if ever someone owes the priest or the church, and cannot pay because of poverty, and therefore asks for quite a goal, the sacraments are withheld. And yet the secular rulers often have patience in such cases with the poor, impossible people, because of owed payment, much more this is due to the clergy, who for the sake of God and merciful works are endowed superfluously by the secular, but who, contrary to this, use great harshness against the poor with alleged banishment and otherwise, even without reasonable request of the ordinary authorities.

How the sends are used unformally.

70) Item, the mission, which according to the legend of the rights should be prepared once over several years, is now prepared 1) and practiced every year in some bishoprics, for the sake of the treasures of the secular states' subjects. Thus, even the mission is not kept, as it is established in the papal laws, nor is it ordered in the Reformation made by the bishops and their chapters themselves, in which they do not forget their advantage, but it is publicly directed and acted against and contrary to the same, for the unreasonable treasury and the oppression of the poor, as public daily history gives (and is also reported before).

1) In No. 539, Col. 1768 it says: "mounted".

Of cathedral and choir canons, priests, and other clerical persons in general.

71) Item, the ecclesiastical courts and the above-mentioned office usually belong to the canons of the same cathedral monasteries, and the canons of the cathedral monasteries do not elect a bishop, likewise the canons in the collegiate monasteries do not elect one as their prelate, He had previously bound himself to the highest degree with oaths, and had committed himself to them in such a way that he would not turn against them or their appointed judges and officials (whether he would otherwise be inclined to do so) their burdensome, unreasonable conduct and actions, nor would he punish them himself for their misconduct. This is undoubtedly not a small cause of many unseemly abuses of the monasteries, and should not be tolerated by papal sanctity, and should be stopped.

That the poor people are burdened with taking money for the sacraments, burial, soul utensils, and many other things.

72) Item, although the seculars endowed many parishes with them and usually so endowed that pious, spiritual, better pastors should and would like to maintain themselves honestly, stately and well, also especially the holy sacraments are highly forbidden to sell, so also the same parish priests with the administration of the sacraments of the altar and baptism, also the dead Begängniß, Seelgeräthe, The parish priests and their vicars, vice-parish priests, chaplains, and journeymen priests are also pressed for a lot of money and highly burdened, so that it partly follows that some parishes, monasteries, and convents are incorporated, or very highly graved, retired, abandoned, and translated with absences by other ecclesiastics, prelates, canons, canons, and Roman curtsians. Some of them also retain the associated benefices and tithes of the parishes, on which they, according to the statutes of the rights, should reside personally. Many vicars or parish administrators may not have their due abstinence, but must make do and live with the same sacrifices, confessionals, sepultures, funerals, spiritual devices, and similar impositions, which they have increased in some places in recent times, and with alleged banishment and pressure from the poor. Also because of this, the parsonages and parsonage houses in western buildings 1) cannot be preserved. Thereby they force the poor, so their friends the first,

1) "in western buildings" ----- in structural condition.

2) and anniversaries, and also to perform memorial services in the pulpit, are not able to make money from the masses they sing and read. From this they make not a little, but considerable money, if they sell their mass not only once or twice, but often three times, four times or even more, and intend to earn two or three fiefdoms with one mass.

From unreasonable prohibition of grape harvesting.

73) Item, if the poor people want to pick their grapes in the fall, as this is convenient and cheap for everyone for his benefit; if such is not pleasing to the ecclesiastical estates, which have the wine tithes in the same places, they forbid the same ecclesiastical estates that they should not pick such grapes until they allow them to do so. And so, from time to time, these poor people must suffer great harm and damage to their grapes, which they have cultivated all year with hard labor, for the sake of such ecclesiastical estates' tithes and unseemly, self-seeking benefits, or perhaps for the sake of envy; which is publicly contrary to God, right and all equity, and should not be tolerated, but stopped.

How the pastors require money from their parishioners deduction.

74) If someone moves from one parish to another and is honestly confirmed there, the first parish priest demands one guilder from his parishioner for a letter of permission. And if the parish priests refuse to do so, they forbid them the sacraments. From this it appears publicly that the sacraments, mass and other things touched upon by the seculars, on which the clergy endowed, and for this reason previously highly endowed with tithes, interest and fees, must be purchased anew by the clergy. How one must buy the churchyard of some deceased.

75) Item, [if] at times some laymen, without previous confession and desire of the sacrament of the altar, perish approximately, and thus are found drowned, slain, or otherwise dead, these dead bodies the ecclesiastics want, regardless of the fact that such deceased persons are not to be found in any other place.

2) Compare St. Louis Edition, Vol. XXII, 773. Table Talks, Cap. 24, § 126.

3) "honest" put by us instead of: "conjugal". Compare No. 539, Col. 1754.

If the deceased's relatives are not of public condemned status (because of which the papal laws forbid reported burial), they may not be buried in the consecrated churchyards, unless their wives, children or friends have previously made an agreement with them for money. And if such relatives of the deceased do not want to suffer worldly shame and disrepute, they must buy the churchyard in such cases. But whoever has money or money's worth to give for it, may have his friends (regardless of how much public sin and disgrace they have lived in) buried not only in the churchyard, but also in the churches, and like the saints. That is also one of the spiritual money snares.

How many in the spiritual state keep themselves unspiritual, also practice much bickering, on the promise of spiritual freedom.

76) Several priests and other priests mingle with the common man in taverns and taverns, drinking, playing and dancing. Some of them also go out at night with murderous weapons, and about in worldly clothes on the gaff, and start a lot of quarrels and quarrels with the laity, taking and putting off their consecration and the same freedom, by which they give the laity cause for violent action. And if then one of the same priests is wounded by the laity, or made bodiless (regardless of what good causes this may be), not only the perpetrators, but all are suspected, held in contempt, from which they must buy themselves with great, heavy costs. If, however, the laymen are wounded by them, they must always suffer injustice and damage from the ecclesiastical judges. This is a great, unpleasant inequality.

How some clergymen 1) keep house and 2) take scholars.

77) Item, there are also some clerics who keep open businesses, and in the places where they want to have sovereignty, they or their servants, who are also priests, set up dice, ball and card games at the church consecrations, and take the profit and pay from it, and impudently say that it belongs to them out of sovereignty. This, however, is highly forbidden in papal and secular laws, and is most repugnant to the clergy.

How they move the sick to deprive their rightful heirs of their goods.

78) The terminators, also other monks and priests, persuade the sick, with whom they know money or property, with seductive words, as if they should thereby pay off divine punishment and buy the kingdom of heaven, that after their death, they should confiscate or legate their possessions and goods. Thereof often lay children and rightful heirs of that which they are entitled to in the sight of God and out of all fairness, have to go without with miserable great lack, and because of that they have to suffer misery, poverty and ruin.

As the Order of the Temple brings a lot of money to Rome, the monasteries of the Virgins are also burdened.

79) Item, because from some mendicant orders many things, and at times unnecessarily, are drawn to Rome in justification, so that the ordinaries, pastors and laymen may be hard-pressed, also such justifications may not be maintained without money, and in addition their general (as one says) cannot become cardinal without noticeable expenditure, and then the same monks over the virgin monasteries of their order, It is to be feared that they will take much money from the same virgin monasteries for the above-mentioned and other reasons, and lead to pernicious troubles, and also forbid them, with eternal imprisonment, to disclose their concerns and needs to anyone but them. In order to improve this, it would be good and fair that the same mendicant monks and virgin monasteries would all be staffed and provided by the lordship in whose jurisdiction they are located with caretakers and administrators who would have knowledge of all their income and expenditures, and thus the aforementioned complaints would be prevented and averted.

That due to the above-mentioned complaints, action was also taken at the most recent Imperial Diet in Worms.

80) Item, the aforementioned complaints concerning the See of Rome, also the archbishops, bishops, prelates, oficiales, sends, ecclesiastical courts, and other persons of the ecclesiastical estates, have also been submitted in writing to the several parts of the Roman Imperial Majesty by the secular estates of the Empire at the recently held Imperial Diet at Worms.

1) In the old edition: "spiritual".

2) "Scholder" --- profit, or share in it.

1) and to fall away in a gracious and reasonable way, to murder in the most submissive way. This complaint also remained unanswered at that time by the archbishops, bishops and other ecclesiastical estates, but for this reason no improvement has been found among them so far. Therefore, the secular estates have decided to report the unpleasant complaints to Papal Holiness, at the gracious Christian request of His Holiness, and to ask for a gracious remedy, so that further harm may be prevented.

That there are more complaints before your eyes, which will be omitted this time for the sake of brevity.

81) And although the secular estates of the Holy Roman Empire would have to report their complaints against the ecclesiastical estates much more, they want to refrain from reporting them for this time, for the sake of brevity, and because they are sure that many of the other unnamed deficiencies should fall through the resolution of the above-mentioned complaints, and reserve the right to end them at another time, if necessity would require it.

Request of all estates to papal holiness.

After all this, it is the humble request of all secular high and low estates to papal holiness that their holiness graciously stop and abolish all the aforementioned complaints against the Roman See and other affected ecclesiastical estates and persons, as has been requested in part above, also, and bishops are obligated to do by their chapters, to settle them by necessary Christian commandment and absolution, and to show themselves in all this as fatherly and gracious, that such complaints are all and especially, finally and permanently averted for the most beneficial. As the secular estates, first of all for the sake of divine praise and honor, also according to necessity and fairness, and especially on the basis of their sanctity, will certainly and undoubtedly put themselves in praise of their Christian heritage, and in turn will hold themselves against their papal sanctity as obedient sons, and against the other ecclesiastical estates as Christian brothers and members. If, however, such complaints are not resolved within a certain period of time, which the secular estates do not provide for, they do not want their sanctity to be restrained from such unpleasant actions.

1) No. 539 in this volume.

The people of the city, who could not tolerate this pernicious complaint any longer, would be urged by necessity to think of other suitable ways and means for themselves, how they might escape and be discharged from such complaints and tribulations by the ecclesiastical estates.

723 The papal legate Chieregati's replica or counter-answer, in which he rebuked the estates, but singled out the pope immensely, insisted on the execution of the edict of Worms, and accused the estates of acting so foolishly in God's cause, and so violently offending God, the apostolic see, and the emperor.

Feb. 7, 1523.

This document is written in Latin in Goldasts stat. st rssript. irapsrat. a Carol. V. aa Ruäolpntira, toa. II, p. 33 and sonstit. imprial., toa. I, p. 455 and in VVolui lsetion. nwmorad. tom. II, p. 200. for the time determination, see no. 720.

Translated from the Latin by M. Aug. Tittel.

Most Serene Imperial Majesty Commissarius, Most Reverend Fathers, Highborn Princes, and the entire Holy Imperial Council of Respectable Estates 2c.

Since, after my long wait, I finally received an answer from you the other day in the Lutheran matter, I wanted to indicate to Your Serene Highnesses and Glories, not only verbally but also in writing, how little such an answer pleased me, and consequently how little it could please the Roman Pontiff and all of Christendom. And, that I for now pass over much that is said immediately at the entrance of your answer about your reverence, loyalty and respect towards our most holy Lord and the apostolic holy see, therefore I nevertheless thank you kindly in the name of their holiness towards your majesties and glories, I will only come to that which seems to require some addition, improvement and explanation, and the rest, however, as it reads, I will place and leave to our most holy Lord's favor,

(2) First of all, as regards the fact that Your Serene Majesties say and apologize that, because the people of Germany imagined that the Roman Court was causing them great hardships, and that they were still suffering daily from it many annoyances and inconveniences, they were not responsible for

The Council considers it expedient to execute the sentence of the Apostolic See and the imperial order, lest greater and worse evils arise from them,

(3) The answer to this is that neither our most holy Lord, nor imperial majesty, nor any Christian prince would have assumed such an answer from you. For if Luther erred before the apostolic judgment (which is based on the judgments of so many illustrious men and universities), and also before the imperial command in one piece, he erred after such judgment and command in much more, and omitted nothing to throw the whole orthodox religion overboard. Therefore, if the punishments are to be made equal according to the crime, but he and his followers have erred more and more every day, as is evident, then the punishments must be increased and augmented, but not reduced, as is done according to your present conclusion. For as for the answer itself, therein the divine majesty is offended, whose cause is so ill taken to heart. The reputation of the pope and the apostolic see is insulted. The imperial highness is insulted, whose conclusions and decrees are so freely inhibited, abolished and struck down. It also offends your common honor, since you were all present when the imperial decree was made, and you lent it your prestige.

(4) And the pretext is bad that, in order to avoid the astonishment, the aforementioned apostolic decree and the imperial order are not to be executed. For one must not tolerate evil so that good may result from it, and one must look more to that which belongs to the salvation of souls than of the body. And those who want to adhere to Luther are not to be excused by saying that because of the annoyances and burdens given to them by the Roman court (even if such were true) they should therefore separate themselves from the unity of the Catholic faith and plunge into the abyss of all misery. For they should rather suffer everything patiently and willingly than plunge themselves and their souls with such great danger. And if they should have done this at all times, how much more should they have rejoiced, since they saw that the kind and almighty God has now given His Church the best shepherd, the most holy shepherd (I say), and a German, who will not only faithfully maintain and improve the whole Church, but also bring Germany back to the old godliness, and honor it with many glorious gifts in everything that can be rightly done.

Therefore, I heartily and most diligently ask you, most noble and excellent lords, to let yourselves be moved by these truthful reasons, before this noble Imperial Diet comes to an end, to conclude and to become councillors, so that the aforementioned apostolic sentence and imperial command will be executed and come into effect, without any diminution, because Germany's welfare is largely, indeed, entirely based on it. And if the German peoples, as it is said, are in some respects adversely affected by the Roman court, that they indicate such. For the apostolic see, which is the most benevolent mother of all the oppressed, will show itself willing to help them and to protect and defend them to the best of its ability.

(6) Concerning the settlement of the disputes and discords among the ecclesiastical and secular princes, and the articles to be indicated and moderated, it is answered that if our most holy Lord hears of such disputes and quarrels, he will certainly see to it, according to his duty, that they are settled and resolved, because he is just as kindly disposed toward his and the church's sons, the ecclesiastical princes, as toward the ecclesiastical ones. He will also arrange everything among them so that what is his may happen to everyone and no one may be wronged.

As for the annata, which are not to be paid in Rome, but are to be kept in Germany for the handling of the Imperial Regiment, since some difficulty was found in my oral explanation, the answer is reserved for the Pope himself, which will be given either to the Imperial Court or to the future Imperial Assembly, as Her Holiness may find best.

(8) As for the advice given by Your Serene Majesties that, in view of the legitimate causes they cite, Our Most Holy Lord should convene a general council, the answer is that they hope it will not displease Their Holiness, especially because of all the same causes; but they ask that such a council be given another, better name, and that what can bring some harm to Their Holiness be removed: e.g. that it be called by the will of Their Imperial Majesty, that it be free, and that oath and duty be enacted; likewise that it rather be called by one than by the will of Their Imperial Majesty. For example, that her Holiness appoint such a council with the will of her Imperial Majesty, that it be free, and that oaths and obligations be issued; likewise, that it rather be established in one city than in another, and the like. For if this were not omitted, her Holiness's hands would seem to have been touched by your

The court has been informed orally that it is to be bound to the illustrious lordships.

9. Concerning the preachers who henceforth have to preach the Word of God among the faithful, the answer is that our most holy Lord has recently decreed in a most holy and godly manner, with his most reverend brethren's (the Cardinals') counsel and approval, to the following effect: that, during the harmful sect in Germany, no one may henceforth preach the Word of God in any city or district, unless he has been previously examined by the bishop or his official because of his learning and efficiency, and such has been approved by them and found to be godly and Christian; and he has likewise been appointed to such preaching office by the very bishop or his official, who shall also have the power to remove him again and to chastise him if he falls from the right path. For the rest, everything that Your Serene Majesties otherwise say about the said preachers is right, that they preach the Gospel with an interpretation of the Scriptures that the Church considers good.

(10) Concerning the printers and sellers, or other distributors of Lutheran books and others, who cherish and protect his sect, it is replied that one cannot be at all satisfied with the answer given, that Your Serene Majesties will see to it according to their ability and will decree that such books are not printed or distributed 2c. For here I say, as in other matters, that the sentence of the Apostolic See and of the Imperial Highness shall be executed entirely and without diminution, but that those who print or sell the said books, and otherwise distribute them, shall be punished according to the said sentences. And here I ask that special attention be paid to this, for everything depends on restraining this harmful sect, so that such books are nowhere tolerated. For it is from the reading of them that all this misfortune has sprung.

(11) As for the point that no one can print such books from now on unless they have first been examined by a learned man, I say that in this respect the statute of the latest Lateran Concilii, which is now in use, is to be adhered to, and is to the effect that no one can print some books, under the penalty set therein, unless the ordinary bishop of the place or his official has read and examined them and found them to be Christian and has declared them to be so.

(12) Concerning the clergy who marry, it is replied that what is given in reply does not seem to be displeasing, if the clergy marry.

there is nothing evil behind it. Therefore, it is requested to explain the words that are at the end of the point of said answer: 1) but if otherwise such transgressors of the vows sinned in the dominion and territory of a secular prince or sovereignty, that they would then be punished and chastised with proper and due punishments 2c.

For I say that if these words are to be understood according to the foregoing, namely, that such should be punished by their spiritual judges, then I allow it. But if they aim at the punishment of secular princes or authorities, then I say and implore that such an answer, which runs counter to the freedom and right of the church, be corrected and put into its right mind. For if secular princes were to punish and judge such things, they would be encroaching on a foreign office and touching those that are especially reserved for Christ. And the princes must not think that such fell into their power and jurisdiction because of transgression of vows or apostasy, if they sinned in their territory or dominion; for because of such transgression or abuse of their estate they do not cease to remain under the church's jurisdiction. Because they still retain their priestly character and status, they still remain under the church. Therefore, if they sin in the territories of the princes, they shall report them to the bishops or other superiors, so that they may discipline and punish them; and, if necessary, they shall faithfully help and assist said bishops or superiors with their arm. About all of which the apostolic nuncio asks that, after mature deliberation of your noble lordships, a better, clearer, more thoughtful, and more sufficient answer be given.

E. From the Elector of Saxony's advice to Luther, Planitz reminded him to moderate his violent style of writing.

724 Luther's response and offer to the Elector of Saxony's request that he refrain from harsh writing. Wittenberg, May 29, 1523.

The original of this letter is found in the Weimar Gesamt-Archiv, and after the same printed in Seidemann's "Lutherbriefe", p. 18; then in Spalatin's

1) In No. 720, § 24 z. E.
2) In the old edition: "his".

Annales, p. 71 and thereafter by Walch. Complete also in De Wette, vol. II, p. 335 supposedly according to the original, but several of Spalatin's false readings are found in the text; thereafter in the Erlangen edition, vol. 53, p. 163. Incomplete, with omission of the first half of the letter, in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 175d; in the Jena (1585), vol. II, p. 247d; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 348 and in the Leipzig, vol. XVIII, p. 480. We give the text according to Seidemann. The flyleaf with the inscription and Luther's petal is no longer present.

Grace and peace in Christ before. Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Lord! After E. C. G. has informed me in the past days how the Roman Imperial Majesty's governors, princes and other councillors of the Imperial Regiment have written to her: When, at the next Imperial Diet at Nuremberg, the Pope, through his nuncio, ordered the Crown of Hungary to appear with assistance, advertised and interceded, the same nuncio, orally and through a papal breve and also an instruction, subsequently admonished and reminded me and my followers of my manifold writings and teachings: that necessity would require, with due concern, to see to it that such letters and doctrines, which are to serve as a cause for rebellion, occur, with the appended request that the imperial states mentioned open and communicate to the pope their discretion and advice as to the means and ways by which such a thing might be countered. And thereupon highly-named governors, princes, princes and estates, upon much thought and consideration, form and occasion of all things, have been able to produce no more consoling, ugly means at this time, than that the pope, with the approval of Roman imperial majesty, should procure a free Christian council to be held in the situated stables of the German nation and to be approached for the longest possible time within a year, as the above-mentioned governors, princes, princes and other estates have submitted and sent to the pope their advice and discretion against Christianity, and have also offered to use and have used all diligence in the meantime for such a council, and in particular with E. C. G., because I and some of my followers in E. C. G. countries, to act diligently, so that I and my followers henceforth neither write nor print anything new in a certain period of time.

Confidence, E.C.G. would, as an honest Elector, be helpful to do so, just as every Elector, Prince and other Estates of the Realm should decree in his supremacy that nothing other than the holy Gospel, approved and accepted by the Christian Church according to the interpretation of the Scriptures, should be preached in the meantime, and that nothing new should be printed or sold, unless it has first been inspected and approved by learned persons who should be specially instructed to do so. And because then the same governors, electors, princes and estates, by hurriedly going away, have ordered E. C. G. to write such things and to take all possible care. and to use all diligence to ensure that I and my followers do not write or have printed anything new until the future Council, they have prevented this from happening, they have made a promise to the Imperial Regiment, and that they will attribute such a promise, made to the Pope, and also the decision of the Estates in the case to E.C.G., and that all this will be done by E.C.G., as far as they are concerned, as far as they are concerned, most diligently, with attached request that E.C.G. will order, occur and prevent, so that I and my followers of the place in the above-mentioned case in the meantime of the future Concilii, as determined above, will not have anything more written or printed, so that the presumed and provided promise, made to the pope, that such things will be hopefully brought to the attention of E.C.G., will be fulfilled. C.G., and that in this case, the above-mentioned farewell may be carried out with all the more certainty 2c. And thereupon let E. C. G. act and speak with me with diligence, that her desire is to keep me in that of the fee and unreprimandable, so that, because the imperial mandate let E. C. G. now go out to such an extent, that one would not have to complain that in the things something unfair would be done with attached manifold well-considered causes, all of which would be too long to tell and annoying to E. C. G. to read. 1)

Therefore, most gracious sir, E.C.G. I do not wish to be of the humble opinion that I have accepted such a request from E.C.G. with all due respect: Thank you, and may E.C.G. write with good reason, that my

1) Only here the letter starts in the above-mentioned editions.

I have never been, nor have I ever been, in my mind and opinion, to write without glory, according to some of my previous offerings, nor have I ever been, nor have I ever been, to revile anyone of high or low estate, or to write or teach or preach anything that might give cause for movement, disobedience, dissension and sedition in the holy realm, or to lead the Christian people astray, against which I have also often written and preached harshly, but my intention has always been and still is to write, teach, preach, do and promote nothing else than what is necessary and useful for the strengthening of God's word and honor, also of the holy true faith and the love of neighbor, and thus for the salvation of common Christianity, as I also know with divine help to excuse myself before my God with a good conscience. However, the fact that I have so far written so harshly and earnestly against a number of different people is not without cause, but has happened without hatred and an unchristian heart on my part, even though I know almost well that such my harsh writing has been and still is against many of my friends and enemies, even E. C. G. himself. In addition, E. C. G. has repeatedly defended and persuaded me to refrain from doing so, as well as when I, without E. C. G.'s advice, knowledge, and will, first had to write this letter. C. G.'s advice, knowledge and will, I first set out on the plan, and last year I went to Wittenberg again on my own adventure, not with the opinion of burdening anyone on earth, but of waiting for the crowd that my God commanded me to have, and to serve the whole Christian community with my poor fortune, as I am obliged to do out of Christian duties.

I would also be heartily inclined to refrain from further writing, before the hard writing. However, because some of my detractors, especially Johannes Faber, vicar of the bishop of Costnitz, wrote a large Latin book 1) against me, which recently went out in print in Leipzig, and also Emser wrote a German book based on the one in German.

1) Ioannis l'apri Oonstantisnsis in spiritualidus Viearii Opus adysrsus nova Hiasdahn st a kristiana rvliZionk prorsus ališna doZnaata Martini l'uttikri. Preprinted Dpistola nuncupatoria ad Adrian. VI. ? . M. - Leipzig by Melchior Lotther 1523 in the Marci DvanAklistak (April 26). Small folio. (Seidemann.)

who against me, though not nearly useful, nor harmful to me, goes out with many a blasphemy, not only of my Christian name, but also of the holy gospel, will ever be difficult for me, as E. C. G. and all Christian people can judge, that I should endure such blasphemy against God, my Lord, and that my opponents' wanton writing should be honest, and my necessary and forced rewriting by them so wickedly dishonest and forbidden, but I want to be of strong confidence and hope in God, because the imperial mandate, which has now gone out, among others, clearly holds, that only the holy gospel is to be preached and taught, and the teachers or preachers are to be instructed in an authoritative manner and in such a way that it may not be understood from this as if one wanted to prevent or suppress the evangelical truth, and that I should also be unbidden and unprovoked against all men, if I had to place myself under written responsibility, more for the sake of divine evangelical truth than for the sake of my innocence.

All of which I have no longer to leave undisclosed, in humble obedience to E. C. G., asking in all due respect to graciously note this humble answer of mine, and also, if it pleases E. C. G., to let it continue to reach me. For praise be to God, I am not ashamed of my actions and do not know how to be ashamed of things and of God's word. May the eternal God enlighten and strengthen E. C. G.'s heart through His divine grace and mercy, Amen. At Wittenberg, Friday after the Day of Pentecost [May 29] Anno 1523.

E. C. G.
servant Martinus Luther.

Of the futile proposals made at this Diet to settle Luther's case amicably.

725: In July 1523, a proposal came to light to settle Luther's case amicably.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 175; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 246; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 343; and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 479.

(1) There should be a day, approximately around Michaelmas, at Zerbst or Naumburg, whichever place is most convenient to my gracious lord, the Cardinal and Archbishop of Magdeburg and Mainz, or else, if His Grace does not like this place, another one suggested by His Grace, which may also be convenient and acceptable to D. Martino. On such day and place the Cardinal and Archbishop of Magdeburg and Mainz, and the Bishop of Merseburg, and also D. Martinus should appear, and there each party should draw four or five persons to and next to him, for such action, and there in the most amicable and conciliatory way, D. Martini's matters and articles should be discussed, his answer and instruction graciously heard, and it should be tried whether the same articles should be united and settled in whole or in part, according to the reasons and indications of the Holy Scriptures that have been led on both sides.

2 And for such a day and action, two secular princes, if they were able, should be asked to be present at and next to such amicable action and information, and to listen to the same, as it happens. As Duke Hans and Duke George of Saxony are considered convenient, if their graces are able to do so. If not, however, two other secular princes, or at least two counts, should be requested and asked to do so.

In the meantime, Martinus was to refrain from sharp writing, especially against the authorities. Also, Martinus should be provided with a sufficient escort to and from such a day.

4 And what was then done on that day, and not decided by the two ecclesiastical princes and princes together with the two secular princes or counts, that [it] should be disclosed, that such should remain undisclosed, and be kept secret, without danger. Anno 1523.

The devil and Christ would like to be put in the same bed. Just as worldly people always try to make a comparison in matters of religion, as if they were worldly matters, to put Christ and the devil together in one bed.

2 And this was the proposal: one should appoint an election site, as Zerbst or Naumburg, since approximately around Michaelmas the Cardinal and Archbishop of Mainz and Magdeburg, and the Bishop of Merseburg, also D. Martinus Luther should come and appear. Martinus Luther should arrive and appear. There, each party was to draw four or five persons to and next to them for such an action, and to speak and act in the smoothest way possible about D. Martini's doctrine, matters and articles, to hear his answer and instruction, and to try whether one would like to unite and compare the same articles, all or in part, according to reasons and indications from the Holy Scriptures introduced by both sides.

3) For such an amicable action, two secular princes, if they were able, should be called in to hear how this action would proceed. Thus Duke John and Duke George of Saxony were proposed for this purpose. And since they are not able to do so, other secular princes or at least two counts should be used.

In the meantime, however, Martinus was to refrain from harsh writing, especially harsh writing against the authorities. Also, M. Luther was to be provided with sufficient escort to and from such a trading day. And what was then acted upon on this day, and not decided by the two ecclesiastical princes and princes together with the two secular princes or counts, that [it] should be disclosed, that such should remain undisclosed, and be kept secret.

5. Martin Luther also made his reply, at the request of Elector Frederick of Saxony, 1) and excused his harsh letter, also complaining about D. Joh. Fabri, the bishop's vicar at Costnitz, and Emser's blasphemy books, which had gone out against him, and indicating "that he was not ashamed of his things, nor was he ashamed of them; but wanted to preserve them against all devils". But nothing came of this trading day.

726 The same according to Aurifaber's narrative.

This writing is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. I, p. 180; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 491 and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 473. The same is only a recapitulation of the proposal contained in the previous number.

1 In the meantime, some have also thought of means by which the division of religion between D. Mart. Luther, also his

1) Here Aurifaber says of Luther's letter (No. 724) that it is an answer to the proposal contained in the previous number; but the beginning of the letter (missing in the old editions) shows that it was written with reference to the Reichstag's farewell at Nuremberg.

G. About the decree of the Neichsregiment at Nuremberg (1322) and how Chursachsen and Luther behaved, also about the Neichstagsabschied 1323.

It is obvious that the following four documents, No. 727 to 730, which Walch has inserted here, have nothing to do with the Imperial Diet at Nuremberg, because they are earlier in time than this and belong to the first section of the eighth chapter.

727 The imperial regiment at Nuremberg issued a resolution ordering all bishops to investigate and punish priests who have changed anything in the mass or other church customs, as well as monks who have left the church and those who have entered into matrimony.

Jan. 20, 1522.

This document is a part of the mandate of Philip, Bishop of Freising and Naumburg. Walch has separated the beginning and the end of it, and brings these pieces afterwards in No. 730. The whole document is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), Vol. IX, p. 139 d; in the Jena edition (1585), Vol. II, p. 66; in the Altenburg edition, Vol. II, p. 87 and in the Leipzig edition, Vol. XVIII, p. 284.

I. Frederick, Count Palatine on the Rhine, Duke in Bavaria, Roman Imperial Majesty, Governor, Electors, Princes, and other decreed Regimental Councillors in the Holy Empire, to the venerable and highborn Prince, our friendly dear brother, uncle and friend, Mr. Philipsen, Bishop of Freisingen, Administrator of the Abbey of Naumburg, Count Palatine on the Rhine, and Duke in Bavaria, our brotherly loyalty and friendship, and also friendly and subservient services beforehand.

2nd Venerable, Reverend Prince, kind dear brother, uncle, friend and gracious Lord! It has come to our attention that in recent times some priests, against the long-established order and usage of the Christian Church, have been saying mass in lay habit and dress, in part also outside of the priestly vestments, and in addition, with a noticeable break in the essential parts, ceremonies and other order, as they are and have been used, to change the mass, also to publicly consecrate the reverend sacrament in the German tongue, and that subsequently, in a lewd manner, masculinely, who wants to take it, without prior preparation of some confession or imposition of penance, firstly in their lay

They shall hold out their hands and let them drink to their liking, regardless of whether they are sober or have eaten beforehand.

3. also in the same form, that [they], if in our Christian order, arrangement, and assembly of the church only the priesthood is permitted to administer the holy blood of Christ, nevertheless not in a chalice, but also possibly other drinking vessels, and thus communicate under both forms, also give the sacrament to the children in the same way; that also some persons shall be subject to forcibly driving away from the altar the priests who want to read mass according to the proper customary use.

4. furthermore, that the clergy and religious, beyond the vows and obligations made to the same order, and in forgetfulness of the obedience with which they are bound to the order, without the permission of their superiors, freely, wantonly divest themselves of their monasteries and orders, throw off the clerical garments from them, and subject themselves to and accept secular clothing of other things, trades, and businesses, in addition to some annual [vheliche] servitude against their superiors.

5. that also the same religious and other clerics and priests, even against the order of the Christian church, enter into matrimony, and thus take wives without shyness.

6. which novelty and wrong use, if it breaks in bluntly, should be allowed and permitted, would bring not a little insanity and fickleness of faith among the Christian believers, and otherwise frivolity, annoyance and other things among the common man; and such a thing is more important and greater, the more it requires well-timed consideration, and certain experience and order.

Since there is nothing higher and more important than the soul, and since faith affects the soul the most, we want to be careful 1) and cautious not to easily attach ourselves to such harsh innovations and changes against the constitution and use of the Christian church, which have been unchanged by our forefathers for many hundreds of years, without good proven and accepted reason, and without special regulation and determination of the church 2c.

8) And the above-mentioned pieces, and other such innovations, before the same sufficient common explanation and discussion, whether they are suitable, honorable, good and in accordance with the faith or not, thus to let them take root and grow, is by no means useful nor convenient, as then your

1) "pfentlich" probably the same as "vhelich" shortly before.

May your love and grace judge this for themselves, and bear such abuses, as we do not doubt, but fretful displeasure:

(9) Thus we have considered and found that great necessity requires that the same current innovations and abuses should be favorably countered, so that they are not permitted, but rather stopped and prevented; that then, since they have not yet spread or become widespread, but rather are exalted and appear in few places and by few persons, this can be done well and easily.

10. Therefore, and for this reason, we hereby earnestly request and entreat your love and grace, ex officio and otherwise for ourselves, in a friendly and humbly manner, that they, if touched or similar innovations against the traditional Christian usage have arisen or occurred in their principalities, lands and territories, or would arise in the future, not to let them take root, but to seriously prohibit them with severe punishment, to diligently prevent them, and, if it be good, to have them proclaimed in the pulpit by skilled preachers, so that no one will adhere to them or practice them in any way, and proclaim them in the pulpit by skilled preachers, so that no one will adhere to them, follow them, or practice them in any way, and not to follow the Christian usage and nature as it is understood by the common church and has been practiced up to now, 1) and be satisfied, until such time as a deliberate, well-considered, well-founded, certain declaration, discussion and determination is made and decided by the common estates of the realm, Christian assembly or concilia, for the sake of such matters.

(11) Nevertheless, those who have introduced such innovations and still want to adhere to them shall be expelled amicably, or, if that does not help, with seriousness, and, if necessity requires it, with due punishment, according to the occasion of the case, where it is found, shall proceed and act against the same.

In this your love and grace do a good, necessary, Christian work, to which, as we do not doubt, they themselves are inclined, which would be rewarded by the Almighty in a most glorious way, and would be justly thanked and praised by all men of respectability. Given at Nuremberg, on the 20th day of the month Januarii, Anno 2c. in the two and twentieth year.

728. Duke George of Saxony's writ against Luther, that monks and priests who adhere to Luther's cause, and those who have

1) perhaps saturate. (Walch.)

The new doctrine is to be practiced in the universities where the new doctrine is being practiced, and the students are to be recalled.

February 10, 1522.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 140d; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 65; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 79; and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 282.

Georg von GÖttes Gnaden Duke of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia, and Margrave of Meissen.

Dear Faithful! We have no doubt that you have heard and heard for some time what Doctor Martin Luther and others, adhering to his doctrine, have subjected themselves to by their preaching and reading now and then in countries and elsewhere, which has given rise to suspicion and suspiciousness against them, as disobedient and resisting the holy Christian church and its ordinances and statutes. For this reason, the late Papal Holiness, 2) Most Sublime Memory, and the Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, as the highest Christian leaders, to whom all of Christendom is subject, have caused us to command that Luther's teachings and writings be respected and noticed, so that the Christian people will not be led into error by them.

2. because of this, their papal holiness and imperial majesty also carried out several actions with Doctor Martino, from which it was found that the same Doctor Martinus did not want to desist from what he had erred in his outgoing writings. For this reason, he was considered and held as disobedient by Papal Holiness and Imperial Majesty at that time, and also commanded by their Holiness and Majesty that everyone refrain from reading his writings, and that they no longer be printed.

3) But the said Martin Luther, above all this, has persisted in his presumption until now; from this also his doctrine, and that of those who cling to him, has arisen, that the clergy of his order at Wittenberg and in other places have gone out of their monasteries, have laid aside the habit or clothing of their order, have let the plates grow together, and are going from one place to another, preaching against the office of the holy mass, the same as the holy Christian church.

2) Leo X had died on Dec. 1, 1521.

1) not to be kept for the time being; instruct the people to receive the holy sacrament in both forms, contrary to the order of the sacred churches, regardless of who in holy Christendom has hitherto submitted to such a thing, that he has been regarded as disobedient and a heretic. They also preach that it is unnecessary that one should first confess before receiving the holy sacrament; it is also not necessary that one receive the body of Christ sober, but one may well eat soup beforehand.

4. From their teaching and instruction it further follows that before, and while we have now been in regiment here at Nuremberg on account of the Holy Roman Empire, as we believe, many people in some surrounding cities, touching our lands and principality, have taken the Holy Sacrament under both forms. The same monks, who have left, consecrate the holy sacrament with German words in their secular garments, and give it into the hands of those who have taken it, and let them use and act it themselves. Similarly, they shall also consecrate the wine in a pot with German words, give it into the hands of the laity, and let them drink from it as they please. In the same way, the priests are forbidden to take wives, contrary to the order and constitution of the holy Christian church.

5. Because this and other much unchristian doctrine and works, in places as indicated, [which] abut our lands, of which much is to be written, taught, preached and practiced; we are also ascribed and commanded by the kingdom's regiment to give heed to it, and to avert and perish such as much as possible: It is our Christian duty, as well as the obedience of the Holy Roman Empire, to prevent, as much as possible, so that our dear faithful subjects are not poisoned with Martin Luther's and his followers' forbidden and unchristian teachings, by the monks who have left, or otherwise, to the detriment of their souls.

(6) Therefore, our request to you is that you take good care of this matter, and where you see such runaway monks in worldly clothes, likewise worldly priests, or others who, with Martin Luther's or his disciples' forbidden unchristian doctrine, as touched, intend to seduce your subjects, or anyone who takes the Holy Sacrament under both guises.

If any of them should come to you or to your courts and be found there, accept them all in custody and keep them in safe custody until further orders from us, so that we may inflict due punishment on them, and do not let them come from you in any way.

(7) Wherever you or yours have someone in universities, schools, or other places where these unchristian works are learned and practiced, demand them from there, and do not send or allow anyone to be sent there, so that the youth, who are inclined to evil, may not be led into these unchristian works and error. And let nothing hinder you in this, nor let you err, but please us in this, as we want to leave ourselves Christian, and otherwise according to your duty, completely to you, and in this un-Christian matter, as a Christian prince, not let you and our obedient, dear, faithful subjects see to our body and goods, and our complete and serious opinion is done on this. Given at Nuremberg, Monday after Dorothea Virginis [Feb. 10], Anno 1522.

729: Duke Henry of Brunswick's mandate against Luther. January 12, 1522.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 139; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 58; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 79; and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 282.

1. to all and everyone of whatever dignity, rank or nature, and this open letter is shown, occurs and is read, we, Henry the Disciple, by the Grace of God Duke of Brunswick and Lüneburg, 2c. after offering our favor, graces and all good things before, hereby declare:

2. after one, called D. Martin Luther, writes out and indicates in many articles that something is detrimental to the Christian faith and the holy church, and that thereby a misguidance, abuse or otherwise might arise among the common Christian people, and that because of this, at the Imperial Diet held in Worms, the Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, also the princes, princes and estates of the Holy Roman Empire, commonly and by the majority of them resolved to support the twelve Holy Roman Emperors, our most gracious Lord, as well as the Princes, Princes and Estates of the Holy Roman Empire, have commonly and by the greater part resolved to adhere to the twelve articles of the holy Christian faith, as well as the ordinances and statutes of the holy Christian Church, as brought to us by our forefathers and parents.

1) This is written in the margin in the Jena edition; in the text in the Wittenberg and Jena editions: "ausgesetzt".

3. Thus we, as a Christian prince, wish to remain with the heads of holy Christendom, as Papal Holiness and Imperial Majesty, and therefore request each of them amicably, according to his own dignity, and by virtue of our princely sovereignty, hereby earnestly command ours not to allow themselves to be brought into other ways, nor to be held in any other way than our Christian forefathers and parents have been doing up to now, by 1) denouncing or expelling Martin Luther, which might be contrary to or burdensome to the Christian faith and statutes of the Christian Church, not to be brought into other ways, nor to keep differently than our Christian forefathers and parents have done so far, not to make any secta nor alliances or unions, which could be against the holy Christian faith and the statutes of the holy church, or give birth to sedition and discord between the Christian people, while avoiding our punishment, which is punitive and severe.

4 We will therefore provide for each one of them, and pay a favorable debt, recognize in all good faith, and our serious opinion of them will be carried out. Date Wolfenbüttel, under our pitschaft expressed here below. Sunday after the holy three king day [12. Jan.], Anno 1522.

730: Count Palatine Philip, Bishop of Freising and Naumburg, Mandate against Luther. Feb. 24, 1522.

See the introduction to No. 727. In the editions given there, January 20, 1522, which is the date of the resolution of the Imperial Regiment contained therein, is set as the date of this mandate.

By the Grace of God, we Philips, Bishop of Freisingen, Administrator of the Naumburg Abbey, Count Palatine of the Rhine, and Duke of Bavaria 2c., offer our favorable greetings, grace and all the best to all and any of the now reported elders, provosts, counts, freemen, capitels, prelates, deans, parish priests, co-parish priests, vicars, altarists, knights, servants, captains, officials, ruling mayors, councils, cities, markets, villages, municipalities, and all other of our relatives and subjects.

Venerable, noble, well-born, worthy, highly esteemed, honorable, special dear ones and devotees and faithful! We are herewith honored by the Roman Emperor's Majesty, our most gracious sten Herrn 2c., Statthalter, Churfürsten, Fürsten, und anderen Ständen des heiligen römischen Reichs, so jetzt zu Nürnberg versammelt sind, mit einem schriftlichen Mandat und Gebot ersucht worden, und mit Ernst exhortet, demselben in unsern Bisthumen und Landen zu leben, wie ihr von Wort zu Wort folgt befinden werden.

This is followed by No. 727; the conclusion of the mandate is as follows:

Since we are now highly moved that this undertaking, on the demand of necessity, be done for the good and benefit of the poor, simple Christian people, we also recognize ourselves guilty of doing obedience and due obedience to this commandment without diminution, therefore to all of you, and to each one in particular, whatever his state or nature, is our earnest request, commanding that you keep firmly and without prejudice yourselves to the mandate and commandment written down.

And you parish priests, pastors and preachers shall diligently proclaim this in the pulpit and on the pulpit every Sunday between here and Easter, and faithfully remind your parishioners and Christian people of it, and not act against it in any way, while avoiding our severe punishment and disgrace. Each one is to be guided by this. Date Freising, under our secret imprinted here below, Monday St. Matthiä Apostoli [24. Feb.], Anno 1522.

731 Roman Imperial Majesty's mandate in Doctor Martin Luther's matters, together with the exhortation to do so every Sunday against the Turks in the pulpit. The

March 6, 1523.

From Spalatin's Vurrakle, p. 81. The imperial mandate alone, with omission of the exhortation preceding it here, is found in the Latin Wittenberg edition (1551), tom. II, col. 3575. German in the Eisleben, vol. I, p. 145; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 288; and in the Leipzig, vol. XVIII, p. 474.

The common Christian people are to be told this by all preachers at the top of the pulpits every Sunday, as it is written in the letter.

Since our Lord Jesus Christ was commanded and sent by his holy Father to unite us in one faith and baptism through his bitter death and joyful resurrection, so that all of his commandments are condensed into one, namely, love your neighbor as yourself, and love your neighbor as yourself.

1) "by" put by Walch instead of "the" in the old editions.

By this it will be known that you are my followers, and that you will love one another, just as the apostles, in all the lands where they came from, had gathered together to keep the Christians in the Jewish land, from whom all our possessions and goods had been taken for the sake of the Christian faith, so it is only right and proper that we should be called Christians, and do nothing of the kind, Sunder hören, wiffen, sehen zu, vnd thun, ob es uns nichts angehe, das der wuttend feindt der Turck teglich, vnd lenzer yhe mher, des Christlichen volcks, vnserer bruder, Landt vnd wonung bekrieget, and many lives miserably murdered, young women, women and children taken away with horrible monstrosities, kidnapped, and abused in the same way as the people, then in famine, If we do not have mercy on them out of Christian brotherly love, God will not have mercy on us again, and will send what is left to them above us tomorrow, when it is to be assumed that the afflicted will not have anything to worry about before a few years, because it is still much further with their neighbors, Therefore, all of you Christian believers, in the love of Christ Jesus, are urged to take care of such harsh punishment of our brothers, which they have to endure from the Turkish rage, to show mercy to you, and to call upon God for mercy and remission. Also, for the sake of the same Christian love, be inclined and willing, according to the decree of our authority, to help, assist and protect the afflicted Christians, if our Lord Jesus Christ will take care of the least thing that happens to His own, as it happened to Himself, to humbly call upon and ask the same of the Almighty, to take the error, which arises and grows everywhere, from all Christian authorities, spiritual and secular, and also to give grace to other Christian people, so that they may live in courage of the holy Christian faith and peace, and thereby attain the way of eternal salvation.

¹⁾ We Karl der sunfft von gots gnaden Erwelter römischer Kayser, zu allen zeyten merer des Reichs, In Germanien, zu Hispanien, baider Sicilien, Jherusalem. Hunger, Dalmatia, Croatia 2c. Künig, Ertzhertzog zu Österreich, hertzog zu Burgundi 2c.,

Graue zu Habsburg, Flandern vnd Tirol 2c., To all and any of the princes, princes, princely and secular, prelates, graves, freemen, lords, knights, servants, lords of the manor, bailiffs, governors, stewards, bailiffs, mayors, magistrates, judges, ranks, citizens and municipalities, and in general to all other subjects of ours and of the realm, judges, townships, burgesses, citizens and communities, and all others of our own and the realm's subjects and tribes, in whatever form, state or nature they may be, to whom this imperial letter is addressed, our friendship, grace, and all good things. Highly esteemed, noble, highborn, dear friend. New [nephews], grandees, electors, princes, well-born, noble, respectable, and faithful. As at our Imperial Diet and Assembly, recently held here at Nuremberg, the Papal Holiness, by its authority, in addition to the advertisement and furbishment of the Crown of Hunger, to appear against the enemy of Christendom, the Turk, with help and salvation, on account of Luther's and his followers' manifold writings and lessons, by means of a baptismal breue, 2) and an instruction, which also served as an effortful reminder, and announced that the necessity would require a great deal, to be understood with timely intent, so that such letters and writings would serve as a refresher, and to be forwarded, with the request that our imperial governors, princes, princes, and other imperial sovereigns may well inform and advise you by what means! and ways in which such a lament might be met, to open and inform your holiness, so that your holiness, what you felt for such a purpose, would not appear to be lacking. And now, in response to this, our imperial governors, electors, princes, and sovereigns, on important advice, according to the circumstances and opportunities of all the matters of this time, could not have sought or found a more consoling means of help than that of the papal sanctity. Holiness, with his permission, to organize a free Christian council at a convenient place in the German nation, such as Strasbourg, Cologne, Mentz, Metz, or any other place where the Papal Holiness and we might unite, and shall be begun at the latest in the year's term, as then the said our governors, also electors, princes and sovereigns, have put and sent to His Holiness such counsel and good will again in writing in reply. 3) The same is also true of some other places. Likewise, also several other articles and complaints,

2) The Breve No. 719; the Instruction No. 718; the oral admonition and reminder of the papal legate Chierigati on 3 Jan. 1523.

3) The Imperial Estates' Reply No. 720; the Complaints No. 722.

¹⁾ The following is the Reichstag Edict, the so-called Nuremberg Edict.

As they were sent to the Council of Rome by the secular princes, rulers and sovereigns at the last Imperial Diet at Wormbs, with the request that they be given all due attention and understanding, to Your Papal Holiness. In addition to such their counsel and good intentions, they are also to use all diligence in the meantime until the time of the Council, and to ensure that, when the said Luther and some of his followers refrain from acting in a bad manner, the same Luther or his followers do not write or press anything new. That also every elector, prince, and other sovereign of the realm shall decree in his sovereignty that nothing else than the Gospel, according to the interpretation of the creeds, approved and accepted by the Christian Church, shall be preached in the meantime. 1) That nothing new be preached, or had any sect, unless it is first approved and permitted by learned persons, who are to be specially ordained for this purpose, 2) as then the Scriptures of our Holiness have decreed. In addition, every elector, prince, prelate, count, and other authority in the kingdom shall order and decree with all possible diligence that all preachers be spoken to and acted upon in a sensible and proper manner, so as to prevent in their preaching what may lead to agitation, disobedience, dissension, and sedition in the holy kingdom, or cause the Christians to be led astray, but that they alone may preach and teach the Holy Gospel, according to the interpretation of the Scriptures, approved and accepted by the Holy Christian Church, as presented, and that they abstain from preaching and teaching the same, but await the decision of the aforementioned Christian Council. And that the archbishops and bishops decree certain experts of the Holy Scriptures, who are to take careful note of such preaching and teaching, and where they are in error, that they are then to point out to such preachers or teachers amicably, decisively, and to such an extent, that it may not be understood from this, as if one would want to prevent or suppress the Protestant truth. 3) Which preachers, however, did not allow themselves to be instructed that the ordinaries should punish them with legal sanctions.

and how they intend to do so. Furthermore, our governors, electors, princes, and sovereigns of the realm shall, during the time of the Council, take all possible care in all pressures, and with all booksellers of any authority, that nothing new is printed, carried to fine purchase, or issued, unless it has been ordered and inspected by any authority, as stated in the next article. But if nothing has been done about it, or if it has been found wanting, that the same, and in particular also abusive language 4) shall not be permitted with great punishment, but shall therefore be strictly enforced and kept. Then, for the sake of the clergy, who take weights, and also for the religious who leave their monasteries, since in the common laws of the secular authorities no punishment is ordered, it shall remain with the punishment of the clerical law, so that they may exercise their freedom, priuilegia, rebend, and otherwise, and that the ordinaries are not prevented from such punishment by the secular authorities, 5) but that they prove help and assistance to them for the protection of the ecclesiastical authorities. If, however, these ecclesiastical persons hold themselves above the natural and punishable, they shall be punished according to the rules of the law, as then all such articles have been decided by the electors, princes and other rulers of our state, at the above-mentioned first Diet of our empire, and are included in the common agreement of ours and the empire. So that these articles, as aforesaid, may all and sundry hereafter be more properly executed, we have thus in open edict manner to strike and declare them everywhere, And thereupon we earnestly charge all of you, together with all of you of the Roman Catholic Church, with our open edict, and we wish that all of you, and every one of you, may understand and see in your own hearts that only the Holy Gospel is to be taught in the Council of the Lord, according to the interpretation of the Scriptures, approved and accepted by the Christian Church, preached and taught, and ordered with all diligence, so that all preachers may speak and act in a sensible and proper manner, to avoid in their preaching anything that might lead to disobedience, dissension and sedition in the holy kingdom, or to lead the Christian people into error, and to preach and learn those things that were useless and disputable.

4) In Latin: 1ibkHo8 tarri0808. In Spalatin's Annalen-, "seine schriften".

5s The preceding in this sentence forms the fourth article in No. 733.

1) What is contained in the preceding sentence forms the first article in Luther's writing "Wider die Verkehrter und Fälscher des kaiserlichen Mandats," No. 733.

2) The preceding forms the third article.

3) The preceding sentence forms the second article in No. 733.

but to await the aforementioned Christian Council's decision. That we, the archbishops and bishops, have ordered some of the holy scriptures to diligently observe such preaching and teaching, and if they find any error therein, then to inform these preachers or teachers in an orderly, authoritative manner, and in such a way that it will not be perceived to hinder or prevent evangelical worship. And which preachers would not allow themselves to be rebuked, that you ordinaries should take action against them with severe punishment. That also all of the above-mentioned Stendt, with the said time of the Council, should take care in all matters of printing, and in the case of the book keepers, that each of them, with all possible diligence, should see to it that nothing new is printed, or carried or laid out for fair purchase. 1) Then, beforehand, by each of the above-mentioned Stendt, the person ordered, deceased, and paid, should be inspected and approved. If, however, anything is pressed and laid down about it, or if it is found to be defective, we will not allow this to be done, nor will we allow any disgraceful deeds to be carried out, but we will strictly forbid them, as we hereby declare by reason of this letter, with our and the kingdom's severe reprimands and punishments. Then, for the sake of the clergy who take wives, as well as the religious who leave their monasteries, we think and decree that they have violated their freedom, priesthoods, prebend and other rights according to the law of the land, and that they shall be punished according to the order of the law. We also hereby sincerely request that the secular authorities do not prevent the ordinaries of the clergy from such punishment, but rather that they assist and support the clerical authorities, and that they receive all favors and benefits, And that all of you, family, and friends, may be helped and proved, and that all of you, family, and friends, may be guided by the above articles in all of their contents, as they have been guided by, so that the ascription of the divine sanctity, as well as the above decision, and our and the kingdom's end, may be carried out, as dear to all of you, and as dear to every friend of ours and the kingdom's, to avoid our and the kingdom's grave misfortune and punishment. Given in our and the kingdom's city of Nurmberg, on the sixth day of the month of March, after the birth of Christ, five hundred and twenty-three. Our empire, the Roman in the fourth, and the others all in the eighth year. 2)

1) In Latin: venäsänra sxponntnr.

2) In Latin it is still written underneath: By order of the Emperor. In the imperial council. Frederick, Count Palatine, Imperial Majesty's Governor. Heinrich, HeHvg zu Mecklenburg.

732: The Electors Frederick and John, brothers, Dukes of Saxony, order to the von Einsiedels at Kohren regarding the imperial mandate issued from the Imperial Diet at Nuremberg in Luther's matters. Luther's affairs, as well as the exhortation to be given in the pulpit every Sunday against the Turks.

May 25, 1523.

From Kapp's Nachlese nützlicher Reformationurkunden, Theil II, p. 583.

By the Grace of God Frederick, Elector 2c., and John's Brothers, Duke of Saxony 2c.

Dear faithful. We inform you that a few days ago we received an open mandate from the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most noble lord, governor and regiment of Nurnbergk, in the name of the Roman Imperial Majesty. Maj. and of His Majesty's Regiment. We hereby transmit to you a copy of this mandate, signed by a notary public, so that you will know its contents. Because we then have the honor to write against the Roman Majesty in all matters concerning the matter. Majesty in all matters of interest and equity, both now and in the past, as obedient princes and rulers, as we then, with the help of the Almighty, still do not wish to be found otherwise, we have not wished to hold you to this at the behest of Imperial Majesty. Majesty, so that you may know what such a Royal Majesty's mandate holds in store for you. Majesty's mandate. It is our request that you publish and announce such a rulings to the pastors, preachers and other clerics of our church. In addition to the above-mentioned royal mandate, there is also a note 3). Mandate, a note 3) has been issued, which is to be read by the preachers over the pulpits, every Sunday, as stated in the letter, therefore we order that you, together with the preachers of the above mentioned ecclesiastical church, read such notes every Sunday, as mentioned above, to the people, and that you order all of this to be done with a note, and do not keep it any other way. This is our opinion. Date Monday in Pentecost [May 25] Anno 2c. XXIII.

Vnnsern lieben getrewen, den vom Einsidel zu khorn, gebruders.

3) The first piece of this number.

733 Luther's "against the traffickers and forgers of the imperial mandate". Letter to the governor and the imperial regiment. Shortly before July 11, 1523.

This writing, which refers to the imperial mandate (No. 731), appeared in Wittenberg in the Office of Cranach and Döring in the first days of July under the following title: "Widder die Uerkerer und felscher Keyserlichsmandats. Martinus Luther. Wittenberg. M.D.xliij." 6 leaves in quarto. In the same year, a second edition was published in the same office. In addition, the Weimar edition lists six reprints, all of which belong to the year 1523, including one by Matthes Maler in Erfurt, which inadvertently bears the year 1522 on the title, which gave Walch cause to remark that there is also a print from the year 1522. The time determination results from Luther's letter to Spalatin of July 11, 1523, in the appendix of this volume no. 102. In the collective editions, this writing is found: in the Wittenberg (1553), vol. VI, p. 606; in the Jena (1585), vol. II, p. 214; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 290; in the Leipzig, vol.; in the Leipziger, vol. XVIII, p. 476; in the Erlanger, vol. 53, p. 182; in the Weimarschen, vol. XII, p. 58 and in De Wette, vol. II, p. 367. We give the text according to the Weimarschen.

To the illustrious and highborn, noble princes and lords, imperial majesty . Governor and Estates of the Imperial Regiment at Nuremberg, my gracious dear Lords.

Grace and peace in Christ our Savior, Amen. Sublime, highborn, noble princes and lords! I humbly confess to Your Grace that I have accepted the imperial mandate recently issued by Your Grace with great gratitude and have diligently proclaimed it to our people. I humbly accept the imperial mandate recently issued by His Holiness with great gratitude, and have diligently proclaimed it to our people, completely hoping that 1) God has given it to His Holiness; and would also have been seriously minded to follow it with all my might, as it should not be an obstacle to the holy Gospel, but rather a furtherance of it, as it also says from word to word.

But as by God's decree the evil enemy always perverts the best and adorns the worst, this mandate has also succeeded in causing many, even princes and lords, not only to show no obedience to it, but also to presume to thumb their wild noses at it and, wherever they want to go, to interpret it, regardless of the bright, clear words contained in it.

nice E. G.'s opinion and will are very clear to anyone who understands German differently. Because they even reverse the meaning, and contrary to the Gospel make us an unpleasant gloss, it has been necessary for me to answer for myself and my sense comrades, and to warn those who are deceived, to let our understanding go by the way, and to indicate how far it is to suffer us; hope comfortingly, it should be nothing against this mandate, nor E. G.'s opinion. And so that we do not have to endure the G. with long chatter, let us put it into four articles 2).

The first article.

Preach the gospel according to the interpretation of the teachers, accepted and approved by the Christian Church.

They interpret this article to mean that the gospel should not be preached in any other way than the way it has been preached up to now by the high schools together with the monasteries and convents with their teachers, Thomas, Scotus, and what the Roman church has approved.

We find nothing in the mandate about the Roman church, nor about St. Thomas or high schools, but it says: "The Christian church", and according to the clear words, it means the oldest teachers, as Augustinum, Cyprianum, Hilarium and the like. Although it is also known that these teachers have not always written and held correctly, they insist that the Christian Church could not have been higher and further than St. Augustine. Augustine, the special light of the Christian church, is accustomed to accept and teaches, since he says: "I give the holy books alone, which are called canonici, the honor that I believe that none of their writers has erred; all the others I read in such a way that, however high they seem with art and holiness, I do not consider them right because they hold thus, but where they prove it to me with the sayings of holy scripture or clear reason. 4)

2) We have identified the four articles above in No. 731.

3) Thus Walch. In the original "none" instead of: "that none". It is possible that in the original, due to a printing error, "habe" is set instead of "have" (haben).

4) August. epist. I^oXXXII, 3. (Weim. ed.)

1) Thus Walch. Weimarsche: verhofft; Wittenberger and Jenaer: verhoffe.

3 Here we see that St. Augustine has a goal in accepting the teachers, and throws them all under the judgment of the holy Scriptures, how reasonable that over this goal it is not proper to accept anyone, however holy and learned he may be. Such a mind of the teachers, which the Christian church has accepted and approved, we also consider to be in the mandate, do not want to and cannot suffer any other, let it be as God wills.

4 It also follows that this understanding is to be kept, for since the mandate finally went out that a free concilium should be instituted, and while the matter is being settled, it is not necessary that we should be silent, and preach with those the former deed, as they interpret it. For if this were to be, what need would there be for a concilium? Why then should we pretend to postpone the matter for a concilium, if this mandate, according to opinion, had already passed a judgment much greater and broader than perhaps the future concilium would set, even if it were to set itself completely against us in the worst way? This mandate would do nothing more with the way it played with words, and led people by the nose in an all-too-cruel way, that I do not see any way to E. G..

5 Therefore I have interpreted it to our people in this way, that the imperial majesty with this mandate makes the matter rest, that they do not continue until the concilium, and command our adversary that they leave their school quarrels and pagan art, sucked out of St. Thomas and high schools, at home. Thomas and high schools, which serve nothing, as St. Paul says [1 Tim. 6, 4. f.], but to cause strife and trouble, and should preach nothing before the people but the true gospel. I also have no doubt that the opinion of our Lord is thorough and serious, and I can feel it in the fact that some princes, who were too much in the past, did not grant this mandate, and are now ashamed to apply for it.

(6) For this I have desired with all my heart that such a commandment be kept, and lament that unfortunately our opponents do not have those who could preach in this way, for they, drowned in their sophistry, do not know what gospel or teacher is. We want to keep it fine, if God wills it. The thing should also stand still, wherever they hold it. But, they

They cannot, therefore they go on and interpret this mandate of theirs against us, which is so thoroughly set against them. It is briefly and easily said: Preach the gospel, as Christ also commanded. Yes, where are they who do it? "The harvest is great, but the laborers are few" [Matth. 9, 37. 38.]. Who will create them? The imperial majesty should do it, yes, how can she? Ask the father of the house to create them. They must come from heaven; high schools and monasteries do not bear them on earth.

The other article.

That archbishops and bishops should decree that learned people, who understand the Holy Scriptures, take notice of such preaching, and that those who err in this should be amicably and modestly rebuked, but those who do not want to be rebuked should be punished with due punishment, so that one does not feel as if one wants to prevent or suppress the evangelical truth.

(1) This article lacks nothing, for the fact that no one will keep it makes it far too good. If it were the time when the 68th Psalm, v. 12, says, "God will give the word to the evangelists with great multitudes," it would be kept. But now the saying goes [Matth. 9, 37.]: "The harvest is great, the laborer few", yes, when I worry that it is about the time when Christ says [Luc. 17, 22. 21, 8.]: "The time will come that you would see the Son of Man one day, and will not see, [Matth. 24, 5.] "For many shall come under my name, and shall deceive many," we may meanwhile take this apostolic and most Christian article, will and good opinion for the deed, and ask God that he himself keep it; the bishops will do it slowly.

For where will they take those who understand the Scriptures, if in so many hundreds of years neither in monasteries nor foundations nor high schools have the Scriptures been read honestly, and only blued themselves with sophistry? So it will not do them good to humble themselves so deeply and to amicably and modestly call the erring ones to order, since up to now they have banished, cursed, burned, and been accustomed to all bluster; I would like to see where it happens. If I had been treated like this before, perhaps things would be better for them. But the faithful advice and commandment of this article is still available; God grant that they still do it.

The third article.

That nothing new be printed or sold in the middle of the time of the Council, unless it is inspected by reasonable people at every authority.

This article would have been long time. I will certainly keep it, because we ourselves put such an article in our university last year. But that is not to say that it is forbidden to print and sell the holy scripture, or what has already gone out. So I may also not be forbidden to translate the same, although I have no interest in it. For since everything is to be inspected beforehand by ordained persons, it pleases me quite well that I omit nothing, unless it has been inspected beforehand; except for the righteous word of God, which must and shall be unbound.

The fourth article.

The ecclesiastical persons who take wives and leave the orders shall be punished according to the ecclesiastical law, namely they shall have forfeited their freedom, privileges and benefices, and secular authorities shall not prevent such punishment.

This article seems too harsh, but if the others were kept, it would have to suffer as well. The priests would suffer the most, but monks and nuns, who have no benefices, may lose no liberty, because they must now support themselves and become married, which they had before and were free to do. Thus the spiritual punishment is quite tolerable to him who understands the gospel. For since one is to preach the true gospel, the spiritual punishment must be directed according to the gospel, in which Matth. 18, 17. Christ thus teaches punishment, that one who does not want to obey the church is to be banished and put away from the church. Now, whoever would be banned because of his marriage or leaving the church, it would be on his conscience to suffer the wrongful banishment.

(2) However, if this article is to be judged by its severity, it has too much flesh, and does not agree with the previous three. For where the gospel is to be preached more loudly, our own essays and our works must perish, as I have often taught. Therefore, whether I can suffer that we, according to this article, are punished before God innocently, because of works, which are considered sinful and yet good, I would also like him not to be so placed. For though such punishment is harmless to us as to the innocent, yet it is a fault, and not harmless to them that punish us with wrong; because to suffer wrong is profitable, but to do wrong is injurious.

Help God from Heaven, will it not even occur to us that impossible vows are not vows, nor are they to be kept? Who will vow to fly like a bird and keep it, unless God's miraculous sign is there? Now it is so much, if a man or a woman vows chastity. For it is not created for chastity, but, as God says, "Grow and multiply," that chastity is an impossible thing where God does not perform miracles. So the vow of miracles is not valid, which is not in my power. Therefore I have done foolishly, and am not obliged to keep it, and God does not demand it.

4 Oh dear sirs! Let God's will soothe you in this. No one can believe what the devil is doing in this case, what he is doing in his abominable, blasphemous, disgraceful will to be brave, of which no one has known anything publicly until now, and which is now coming forth through the gospel. Why do you want to share all this with yourselves without need, and burden your consciences? O Lord God, it must and should hold, and yet it cannot hold; what good will that do? Whoever must keep his dung or urine, if he cannot, what will become of him? I fear that those who are now my bitterest enemies, if they knew what I learn daily from all countries, they would help me storm monasteries tomorrow. I am almost forced to cry out too loudly and say: God wanted to quickly skin Satan and bring him to the day, so it will help what we are crying out now.

(5) Let this article be interpreted and enforced in the strictest possible way, since princes and bishops have not acted imperially, princely, or episcopally (let us not say Christian or divine), who have tyrannically imprisoned such ecclesiastical persons, who have forfeited themselves in this, 1) so shamefully with

1) This will refer to the imprisonment of Johann Apel and Friedrich Fischer in Würzburg. Compare St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIV, 258, Note.

They were treated as if they had been worse than murderers, robbers or adulterers, and were tormented and martyred before God and the world not according to worldly or spiritual law, but only according to their bloodthirsty sin and willfulness. Who should now be ashamed in their hearts when they see this mandate and realize that spiritual punishment is so far from their rage. Where is the kind and humble wisdom of the princes and tyrants, who have captured their worldly subjects unheard, treasured them, chased them away, and created all plagues? Where are they now, the Christian princes, who obey imperial commandments? Yes, God cannot find such hypocrites! when they thought.

6th About this, I consider that according to this mandate, I, Martin Luther, should be under papal and imperial ban and guard until the future council; otherwise I do not know what such a postponement should be, especially if I grant to keep such articles. But well, there is not much in me; the world has had enough of me, and I of it again; whether I am in the ban or not is of equal importance. But for the sake of the poor bunch, I beg you, my dearest lords, to hear us graciously; we do not want to ask anything unreasonable. Since you leave those unpunished who do not keep these first three divine articles, nor will you keep them, nor do you inflict any punishment on them, for which they are now bound by God's commandment, even by your human commandment, and nothing impossible is commanded them: may you also show mercy to us poor, miserable people, and treat us carefully, whether we keep the first three divine articles, and only the fourth, human article, could not be met so evenly, since impossible pieces of human nature are included in it. It is ever to be lamented and pitied that we poor, weak, sinful people should be so severely touched for the sake of a human article, and the strong, great people, in public transgression of three divine articles, yes, of all God's commandments, should live so gloriously, freely, safely (as one sees their public fornication, and all kinds of vices raging), not only unpunished, but also in great honor and power.

7 We hope that your Lord will take such a request to heart, and mean that such a request will be granted.

would not be denied even to Turks and pagans, let alone to those who want to be and be called Christian princes. I have humbly informed Your Lordship of my understanding and interpretation, so that Your Lordship can be assured that the matter will not become worse from such a fine mandate than it was before, through evil intermediaries and interpreters. May God grant grace, strength, and help to our Lord in this matter. Amen.

734. farewell to the Diet of Nuremberg, May 8, 1522.

From Lünig's Imperial Archives, pari. genral. continuLt. I, x.433.

We Carol the Fifth, by the Grace of God, elected Roman Emperor, at all times Major of the Empire; King in Germania, in Castile, in Arragon, in Legion, 1) in Sicily, in Hierusalem, in Hungary, in Dalmatia, in Croatia, in Navarre, in Grenades, in Tollsten, in Valentz, in Gallicia, Maioricarum, Hispalis, Sardiniae, Cordubae, Corsicae, Murciae, Giennis, Algar- bien, Algezirae, in Gibraltaris, and of the Islands

Canariae, also the islands Indiarum and Terrae firmae, the sea Oceani etc., Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy, of Lotterich, of Braband, of Steyer, of Carinthia, of Carniola, of Limburg, of Guelders, Wirttemberg, Calabria, Athenarum, Neopatriae; Count of Habsburg, of Flanders, of Tyrol, of Gorizia, of Parsiloni, of Arthoys, of Burgundy, Count Palatine of Hanigaw, of Holland, of Zealand, of Wert, of Kyburg, of Namur, of Roßilion, of Ceritani and of Zütphen; Landgrave in Alsace, Margrave of Burgaw, of Oristani, of Gotiani, and of the Holy Roman Empire Prince of Burgundy. Roman Empire Prince of Swabia, of Cathalonia, Asturia 2c., Lord of Friesland, of the Wendish Marches, of Pertenaw, of Biscay, of Molin, of Salins, of Tripoli, and of Mechelen: confess and proclaim manly: When we have received a report from time to time, not without some difficulty of our minds, how then it has come to light that the enemy of Christ, the Turk, has overrun the kingdom of Hungern with considerable war and violence, has besieged it, and, in addition to much considerable damage, has conquered several towns, castles and villages, and especially the Greek town of Weissenburg, which up to now has been a special stronghold and shield against the Turk.

1) Leon in Spain.

The German government has occupied and occupied a part of the country, and is seriously engaged and working on this and other such war exercises. 2c. We take all this to heart, as not the least burden and burden of holy Christianity, and in our Imperial mind the highest need to be anxious to resist it (for the protection and handling of the Christian name and faith) in the most beneficial way. And have therefore, for their sake and for the sake of other public movable causes, the Holy Roman Empire and the German Nation. And therefore, for these and other public causes, concerning the Holy Roman Empire and the German Nation, this present Imperial Diet has been held in Nuremberg, where Princes, Princes and other Estates have also appeared by their embassy. In order that we may initially be aware of the Turk's actions, and open our minds to them, and that we and our brother, the King of Hungary, may await the further report and notification of the Turk's tyrannical actions, the messages ordered to us and our brother, the King of Hungary, After the advice we had received, and in order to save Christian blood, we finally decided and united, with the help of the Almighty, to assist our brother, the King of Hungary, in resisting the Turk, and to show Christian brotherly comfort and support. And after the princes, princes and estates of the Holy Roman Empire have sent us four thousand on horseback for our and the German Nation's final undertaking, and for the attainment of the Imperial Crown. Crown, we have been granted four thousand on horseback and twenty thousand on foot for six months, and our will and spirit have finally agreed to use them for our march to Rome. But because we feel and find that such help will be somewhat more necessary at this time against the enemy of Christ, the Turks, we have of our own free will allowed, granted, and also united with princes, princes and estates and the same embassies, that such four thousand on horseback and twenty thousand on foot shall be sent to Rome, and twenty thousand on foot, to the full extent that the same have been pledged to us by the estates of the empire, and thereafter further declared, to resist the Turks in whole or in part, or as they otherwise deem best and most needful, shall be turned and used for urgent aid.

(1) In order that such assistance may be used more expediently and in accordance with necessity, and that it may be known in what form, measure and time such assistance may take place, it is resolved that such assistance be attributed to our brother, the King of Hungary, and that it be indicated to the same message in farewell white, that now reported to our brother, the King in Hungary, on his occasion, but as quickly and urgently as possible, it be sent one day to the king of Hungary.

Vienna, announce the same to our governor and regiment at Nuremberg, whereupon the princes, princes and estates of the Holy Roman Empire, also the said our brother, King of Hungary, and on account of the two kingdoms, Hungary and Bohemia, and their landscapes and principalities, as well as the Highborn Prince, Mr. Ferdinandus, Infant of Hispania, our dear brother, as Archduke of Austria, also the Upper and Lower Austrian lands, together with all our embassies, shall send together to consult, to act, and finally to decide, according to their given authority, on the resistance to the Turk.

2. on this day, on account of us, also princes, princes and estates of the holy empire, the highborn prince, our dear cousin Ludwig, count palatine of the Rhine 2c., and with him the nobles, Ludwig von Leostein, Hanß zu Schwarzenburg, Marx Sittig von Embs, Philips von Felsch, Bastian von Rotenhan, Leonhard von Eck zu Näck, Christoph Schewelin, assigned as war councilors; Thus, as soon as the day to Vienna, as mentioned above, is scheduled by our brother, the King of Hungary, they shall be required by the governor and regiment to attend a convenient banquet, and shall be executed on the same day with the credences, powers and instructions as they are then proposed and appointed at this Imperial Diet.

And if our cousin, Duke Ludwig, or one or more of the above-mentioned warriors or scholars, on account of his inconvenience, were to go to such a day, write it off or propose it: our governor and regiment, in our stead and for our sake, shall look for other suitable and skilled people, and act with the same to be used and sent there; and in this shall use all diligence, so that, if the day is named, there will be no lack of persons.

4. item, the transfer or delivery of such skillful embassy, from the current one and a half quarter stop, made on account of the hurrying ordered war people, as will be noted below, shall take place.

Item 5: It is considered that after such embassies and councilors may encounter and arise in the course of action all sorts of things that are not understood in the Instruction, and perhaps for this reason require further notice: between Nuremberg and Vienna they are to be posted by day at a convenient place, so that at any time what they encounter and do, they may hurry and bring it to our governor and regiment.

Nuremberg, and therefore should receive further information.

(6) And what is thus acted upon and decided at such a day, our governor and regiment shall make known to all princes, princes and estates of the empire, as much as is necessary. And if, at the meeting in Vienna, it is deemed necessary and good, and it is decided to provide further assistance this summer, this shall also be announced and required by our governor and regiment. Accordingly, every prince, duke, and the estates of the empire shall send their due number of aid, and to our campaign in Rome, as much as remains to them (after deduction of the one and a half quarters, which is in the subsequent estimate, for the preservation of the ordered warband); so that he may also be prepared, upon our further description, to render the same remaining aid this summer in the most conducive and expeditious manner.

Item 7: The payment of such warriors on horseback and on foot shall remain as it was at our recent Diet of Worms, namely ten guilders a month for a man on horseback and four guilders a month for a man on foot.

Item 8: In the meantime, our governor and regiment shall diligently accept and appoint such action of the day in Vienna with the princes and other persons who are considered by us, the princes, princes and estates, to be suitable and skilled for captain of the field of war, war councillors, and other war offices, and who are listed and handed over to them, and finally act and agree, so that, where it would come to a trade, so that one would be certain of all of them. And if no prince would allow himself to be able to do so, that governor and regiment act with another, be it count or lord, who runs the war, understandably; the same, where it would be inconvenient for the war councils to act with the other.

9 However, it would have been necessary to discuss and decide at this Imperial Diet how and to what extent a public, emergency, persistent help and power should be maintained and used against the above-mentioned unbelievers. However, because of the absence of some estates, which the arriving estates did not want to expect until the end of the day in Vienna, and what had been done there, some articles of farewell had been placed in such a way that necessity required that they be brought to an end, and therefore, for this and other reasons, they could not be: therefore, we have agreed with the churl to hold a meeting in Vienna.

Princes, Princes and Estates of the Realm, and of the same embassies, now assembled here, united at another Imperial Diet, namely on St. Aegidii's Day [Sept. 1]. The Council of the Holy Roman Empire and the German Nation, as we will further indicate in our notice of the now united Imperial Diet, to finally deliberate, act and decide on the above-mentioned and other public matters. That all estates shall also be required by us to the utmost, and shall be commanded and admonished, with heavy and severe penalties and punishments, not to appear in their own persons on account of matrimonial matters, and then to send their embassy with full force, and finally, as aforesaid, to decide together with the other estates of the empire.

10) Furthermore, after our brother, the King of Hungary, had sent an embassy here, he indicated that the Turk was already in retreat 1) and had now, while the embassy was on its way, captured a fortified castle, and thus doubtlessly assumed that he would approach several castles and passes for his own benefit, and take them, which would then be extremely burdensome. And therefore, that the same come before, a stately urgent help requested, for occupation of the same castle and pass, that we have granted by Electors, Princes and Estates and their embassies, on further and sufficient report, and for movable causes, to the King of Hungary on his embassy request, from the above-mentioned great help, to maintain one and a half quarter of the foot soldiers for three months. But that our brother, the King of Hungary, also give so many Bohemian servants to his maintenance, and that such servants be provided with emergency ordinance.

(11) And such servants shall be accepted by our and the common imperial authorities and sent down to Vienna; so that they will certainly be there on the day that our brother, the King of Hungary, shall name them there as above, and there await the above-mentioned embassies of ours and of the city, which we have ordered to Vienna as above, further decisions, and where they will be used.

Item 12: The estates have united with us, and we with them, because such a hasty addition of estates of the realm is not possible at the right time, even with a needy order of people to send; as then of that

1) Maybe: Suit?

The court has set up a money system for the maintenance of such servants for three months, namely, that each estate is to pay a quarter and a half of the above-mentioned large amount of the foot soldiers, as stated therein, for its part, and has set out and written out in the common notice which quarter and a half of the large amount of the foot soldiers is to be paid out to it afterwards.

Therefore Count Helfreich of Helffenstein, as well as Gangolff of Geroltzeck, Marx Sittig of Embs, have written that each of them sends a skilful captain here to our governor and regiment, who shall continue to act with the same captains on their order, agree with them and accept them.

14 Each prince, duke and estate shall also deliver its due portion within one month, the next after the date set forth in the above mandate, to the mayors and councils of the cities of Augsburg, Nuremberg and Frankfurt, whichever is most convenient to each, certainly without delay or any remedy, with the penalties and punishments stipulated in the same mandate; the same mayors and councils shall be ordered to receive such, and to acknowledge them accordingly. And for payment of the same money or money's worth 26 wheels of white pennies, 15 batz, 30 half batz, 40 kreuzers, 21 Meissen twelfths or 42 half Meissen twelfths for one gold shall be accepted. And both cities, Augsburg and Frankfurt, shall deliver to the mayor and council of Nuremberg on due receipts what they have paid and what they have received. All of which the Nurembergers, together with what they have received, shall deliver by bill of exchange to Vienna at a certain place, where the captain, muster-master or paymaster is sure to have it, and may procure it for him. The same captain, muster-master or paymaster, mayor and council of Nuremberg, or whoever will deliver it on their behalf, shall acknowledge it properly.

15 Accordingly, a skilful, trustworthy, reasonable and honest paymaster shall be appointed and assigned to the counter-scribe, who shall spend and pay such money together with the captain on their duty, which they shall therefore do at the behest of our governor and regiment, for the entertainment of the people of war, make the actual account, and give the governor and regiment an honest account of it, which account shall be handed over to the Estates of the Realm at the next Imperial Diet thereafter.

16 In order that there may now be a beginning and no delay in taking up and appointing such servants for the sake of money, the Electors, Princes, and Estates, who have appeared here by themselves and their embassies, have, out of good faithful opinion and promotion of the cause, granted their share of such a request to the next within a month.

(17) All preachers are also to be commanded to declare and tell the people above the pulpit the masses of which God Almighty has often severely punished the sin of men with the sword of their enemies, and therefore to exhort them to amend their lives, so that they may also avert such guilty punishment, and thereby humbly and diligently pray for a merciful victory against the said enemy of Christ, from God, in whom alone stands our salvation.

18 Furthermore, as the princes, princes and estates of the empire at our recently held imperial diet at Worms have granted themselves to our submissive! We are pleased that, for the sake of peace and justice in the Holy Roman Empire, they agreed to postpone for a time our appointed governor, regiment and chamber court, according to an established plan, so that in the meantime a way may be found to maintain such our regiment and chamber court, with our advice and assistance; how then our governor and regiment, first of all, are to search for and advise on all their actions. As then our governor, also electors, princes, estates and regiment distinguished several means and ways, and to accept one or more of them, are in our concern. However, because the same means and ways cannot be hastily established and put into operation, and so that our established regiment and chamber court may exist in essence, and the Holy Empire and the German Nation may remain in peace, law and unity, the Electors, Princes and Estates and their skilled embassies have once again freely granted that both our regiment and chamber court be maintained for one year, which will begin on St. Michael's Day and end in 1522. Michaelmas until the 1522nd year, and from the same Michaelmas day for one year of the 1523rd year, on a previous money deposit at Worms, so that in the meantime one may think, act, and bring both of them into being in a steady way on future Imperial Diet. And such an approved deposit shall also be made at every Frankfurt fair there to Frankfurt or Nuremberg.

19 Accordingly, our governors and regiment, with the approval of princes and estates, give serious orders to those who, for the maintenance of the Regiment and the Court of Chambers, were established, laid out and named at the recently held Imperial Diet at Wormbs, and who have been in the lists from time immemorial, to proceed and act for the payment of their share. If anyone then has a reason why he should not give his share, they may be brought before our governor and regiment, whereupon they shall, if they find the form, keep all charges.

(20) Thereupon, we promise to keep and perform all and everything as written above, and which concerns us, by our royal dignities and words, steadfastly, firmly, unbreakably, and sincerely, and to comply and live with it strictly and without refusal, and not to do, undertake, and act anything contrary to it, or to let it go out, nor to allow anyone else to do anything for our sake, except all danger. In witness whereof, we have hereunto affixed our Imperial Seal.

We, the Princes, Prelates, Counts and Lords, as well as the Princes, Prelates, Counts, and the Imperial and Free City Envoys and Authorities, do hereby publicly confess. Reichs Frey- und Reichsstädt Gesandte und Gewalthaber, confess publicly with this farewell, that all and each of the copied points and articles have been made with our good knowledge and will and counsel, grant those also in force of this letter, speak and promise in right, good, true faithfulness, which, so far as each of them is or may be concerned with his sovereignty or friends, of whom he is sent or ruler, shall be true, steadfast, firm, sincere, and unbreakable, and to perform and live up to them to the best of our ability, without any danger.

By the Grace of God, we Albrecht, of the Holy Roman Churches. Roman Churches, of the title of St. Peter ad Vincula Priest Cardinal, of the Holy See of Mäynz and of the Magdeburg Chapter Archbishop of Halberstadt, Margrave of Brandenburg. Archbishop, Administrator of Halberstadt, Margrave of Brandenburg, of Stettin, Pomerania, Duke of the Cassuben and Wenden, Burgrave of Nuremberg, and Prince of Rügen. Given in our city and the city of the Holy Roman Empire, Nuremberg, on Thursday Philippi and Jacobi [May 8], 1) after the birth of Christ 1522.

1) In our template: "Thursday after Philippi and Jacobi", which would be May 15. But because Philippi and Jacobi was a Thursday, it is not likely to us that the octave of this day would have been designated in the manner given above. We have therefore assumed with De Wette, vol. II, p. V, the 8th of May.

735 Protestation of the Saxon envoy, Philipp von Feilitzsch, against the draft of the imperial treaty at Nuremberg of 1523, concerning the gospel and the word to be printed and written. February 11, 1523.

From Lünig's spielK. eeeles. eoutin. I, x. 111.

Most gracious, gracious, favorable lords and friends.

After I was burdened with weakness of my body, and could not have been at the parting, when it was conceived, decided and read, I have nevertheless, as much as the Gospel and Word of God touches to print and write, before Your Electoral [and] Princely Grace, favor and friendship of the great committee and common estates, as a skillful one of my most gracious Lord, the Elector of Saxony 2c., and I am confident that my most gracious and merciful lord will not be bound further and more severely than other electors, princes and authorities in the Holy Roman Empire, but will leave the word of God free, and without doubt their electoral and princely graces will hold and show themselves in this and other as pious, Christian and youthful electors and princes of the holy realm, Christian, praiseworthy and princely of all nobility and Christian dignity unavoidable. From all of which I hereby publicly protest and testify, on the eleventh day of February, Anno Domini 1523.

H. The breve of Pope Hadrian VI sent from Nuremberg to the council of Amberg against Luther around this time, and how Luther answers for it.

736 Pope Hadrian VI's Breve to the Council of Bamberg against D. M. Luther, dated 3V. Nov. 1522, translated by Luther himself, with his glosses, subsequent speech and reply. 1523.

This writing came out in 1523 in several eirgel editions. The title is: "Eyn Bepstlich Breue dem radt zu Bamberg gesandt Widder den Luther. Dhr torhevt wyrrt yderman offinbar werden. 2 Timoth. 3." At the end: "M. D. xxiii." 1^ sheet in quarto. In German editions: in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, Bl. 164b; in the Jenaer (1585), vol. II, bl. 167; in the Altenburger, vol. II, p. 243; in the Leipziger, vol. XVIII, p. 358 and in the Erlanger, vol. 64, p. 410. Latin in the Wittenberger (1551), tom. II, fol. 354; in the Jenaer (1566), tom. II, fol. 538b; and in the Erlanger, opp. var. arA., tom. VI, p. 466. The glosses in Latin several times concern the poor Latin in the breve.

2 Tim. 3, 9.

Their foolishness will be revealed to everyone.

To the honorable and famous mayor and council of the city of Bamberg, our dear friends.

Honorable and illustrious gentlemen, as dear brothers! Our Lord the Most Holy,^a) has ordered us to send a letter of His Holiness to your congregation, and has commanded us by his letters to send it to E. E., and with the same procure that they respond to it in the most favorable manner. Since we are sending such a letter, we urge them diligently and ask them to answer it as soon as possible, since they have diligence and service toward the Most Holy Lord and the Holy Apostolic See, and to send us the letters so that we may provide them through our messengers to the Most Holy Lord without fraud. With this, E. E., whom we implore and command without ceasing, is well pleased. At Nuremberg, January 12, 1523. 1)

E. E. as a brother, Frantz Chiergattus, elected Bishop of Aprutz, Prince of Therm, Papal Embassy.

a) Christ is badly holy, the pope is the most holy.

To the dear sons, mayors and council of the city of Bamberg.

Adrianus Pabst the VI.

Dear Sons, Hail and Apostolic Blessings beforehand. We could not help but be very surprised, and even saddened, when we see that Martin Luther, a German (whom we cannot deny to be our sheep^b), however nearly mistaken he may be, has fallen into such nonsense, even diabolical presumption, that he despises the common Christian doctrine and the holy fathers' teachings, spurns the whole common church custom, and again casts doubt on everything that has been customary up to now, and brings up many new repugnant doctrines and new heresies, 2) or rather, renews the old ones, and is not afraid to lay a foundation different from that which has been laid, and to teach a faith different from that which our fathers held.

b) Not the shepherd's me.

2. just as if he alone had been gifted with the Holy Spirit, and he had first seen the evangelical truth at the end of the world, and our fathers, together with the whole collection of the faithful, should have lain so many hundred years in damned error and dark ignorance, who knew nothing of such Luther's faith, and were willing to fight to the death for the repugnant, that is, the common faith, which we hold. It is truly a strange thing that such presumption should have risen in a man's heart that he lets himself think he is wiser than all the teachers of the church and the holy fathers and the whole collection of the faithful.

3. But it seems to us even more reasonable to wonder that the same Martinus, after he fell into the maw of hope, by God's doom, for his and our sins, not only one or a few, but (which we say with great heartache) countless people, both male and female, in our country, the Germans (who, since the time it was converted to the Lord^c), have always been the most spiritual, and have held to the common faith most strictly, and in addition have been in the service of God and in love and righteousness towards the neighbor the very purest nurse), who not only patiently listen to his most foolish and harmful teachings (which are often condemned by the church and its masters, as is known), but also willingly accept them, and, what is even more, are also stubbornly prepared to defend them with weapons, and his and his own most harmful and poisonous books, which are full of scolding, shameful and malicious words, with quarrels and bitterness everywhere, even after they have been burned often and in many places by the power of apostolic judgment and imperial commandment, nevertheless buy them frequently, read them eagerly and listen to them gladly. ^{d)}

c) the pope.

d) The pope does not scold here, they are vain sugar words of the Holy Spirit.

(4) But from the fact that they are such books as we have now said, it is easy for anyone who obeys only a little of God's reason and Spirit to understand that the same Spirit of God (who is sweet, kind, gentle, the lover of truth and peace, and the reconciler of grievances) is the same Spirit of God,

1) Wittenberger: "on the last of November D. 1522"; Jenaer: "on 12 Januarii D. 1522."

2) Erlanger: to raise.

The evil spirit, which has pleasure in these pieces of contradiction, and begrudges the German country the happy course in the way of the Lord,^e) has driven such books masters to spit out such things. Who should have recognized them by their fruits, and fled and shunned them like death, together with their perverse teachings.

e) of the Pabst.

(5) For what do such people seek but trouble? To what do they advise, but only to unruliness, discord, robbery of goods, slaughter 2) and carnality; and, that we may say it in one word, to the rejection of the holy obedience, which is better than all sacrifice? And do the same under the appearance of freedom, when they are found servants of destruction. But it is not, dear children, it is not the freedom that the Lord promises to his elect in the Gospel, by which we want to belong to his law, and his governors on earth (which he also as himself^f), because they sit on Mosi's chair, It is the freedom that Lucifer sought, because he wanted to be like the Most High, to whom he was to be subject, and he sat down on his throne at midnight, from where he was thrust into the depths of hell. The same end will undoubtedly befall Martin Luther and all who follow him, if they do not amend as quickly as possible and make every effort to return to the unity of the church, from which they have condemned themselves, and apart from which, as apart from Noah's ark, no one can be saved.

f) That was time, so that one lets the bad tyrants firmly sit.

For there is no doubt that such and such like them are those of whom the holy apostle Peter speaks [2 Ep. 2, 1], when he proclaims that false teachers would arise among the believers, who would introduce damnable orders next to them, and deny the God who bought them, and lead a swift 3) condemnation over themselves. And afterwards [v. 2] sets that many would follow their destruction. By whom (he says) the right way will be blasphemed, and by covetousness with invented words they will deal with you, which judgment from long ago does not fail, and their condemnation does not sleep. ^{g)} And about a little later he speaks [v. 6]: But rather those (hear, God will punish) who walk according to the flesh, in unclean lust, and despise the rulers, hold low, high of themselves, are not afraid to establish orders, and are blasphemers. All these things, whether they are not the same, we leave to you to judge. ^{h)}

g) Where the various orders and the avarice in the spiritual state come from, ask any conscience. The pope does not want to know.

h) The Pabst's people do nothing about this; note that, for here one should judge the Pabst's art.

7. Therefore, beloved of all, we admonish you in our Lord Jesus Christ, and through his heartfelt mercy we beg and implore you, who have you in the bottom of our hearts, not to let yourselves be led into that error, which the papal prudence has shown you as with a finger,ⁱ) but rather, as the chosen children and the acquired people, to follow in the footsteps of your fathers and all the saints, who have ever walked the right highway of evangelical truth, and shun those [people] most harmful, faithless, blasphemous, devilish, and, that we say it at once, the doctrine that leads to death, together with their masters, like hell, and not only leave their poisonous books unread, but also do not listen to those who read or teach them, and also do not greet the Lutherans who do not want to get right again. ^{k)}

i) But not with God's finger nor tongue.

k) Sweet, sweet, sweet words are these, which Luther spoke, he would not have to speak out of a good spirit.

8 But you should not be moved by the fact that the Lutherans add the word of the Holy Scriptures to their doctrine. For you know that all heretics have always avoided this, and no one has ever introduced a new doctrine that he has not undertaken to confirm with sayings of the holy Scriptures. ^{l)} For just as those who want to soothe the bitterness of poison cover it with honey, or otherwise with a good taste, so also these smear their own poison with the sweetness of heavenly words, and give it to drink to the evil, simple-minded souls, that they may thus poison them the more easily.

l) That is why the papists are so pure, because they take great care that they do not lead much scripture, but only human doctrine.

9. although we hardly believe that anyone would be so foolish as to look at the light of the divine countenance.

1) Wittenberg and Jena: "a judge". Latin: paaiueatorsM.

2) "Slaughter," which is bloodshed. In Latin: OLkākS.

3) Erlanger: "about a self quickly".

If you do not want to see the doctrine that is marked on all people, do not immediately understand that such people are false and lying teachers, and do not approach the truth and innovation,^m) not that they seek the salvation of souls, since they publicly condemn their own, but that they only say what one likes to hear, and do away with it. They do not seek the salvation of souls, since they publicly condemn their own, but only say what is readily heard, and leave out what seems too difficult to the carnal and sensual man in the narrow way of the Lord, and make their deadly doctrine all the more pleasant and believable to the same carnal man (who is always the greatest number), and entangle them with them in the guilt of eternal damnation, which is prepared for them and other unbelieving children.

m) How finely the pope interprets the Scriptures, who calls the divine light natural reason!

(10) But there is no doubt that these teachers will encounter what their forefathers, the masters of these or other heresies, encountered, as is known, as often as they presumed to raise their trustworthy minds against the knowledge of God; who for a time, by God's decree, were to be considered blissful, and, like the Cedars of Libya, exalted, for the sake of people's sin, but in the end truth has always overcome lies, and wisdom, which graciously supplies all things, has displayed wickedness.

11. But because we see how great harm such poisonous books printing, selling and reading have done to the right faith and worship in length and breadth, we admonish you in the Lord, to whom this famous city's sovereignty is commanded, and in virtue of holy obedience; and by the divine judgment we demand that you remember your habitual godliness towards God and His faith, and your excellent prudence, that you procure in all ways that in you or in your city areas such printed books are not sold henceforth, or which are not yet printed, are not printed henceforth, but as much as you find of them in named your city, let them be burned, according to the judgment of the papal see and imperial command.

(12) But if you would be negligent to correct your perverse printers, who, as is to be believed, are maddened with money by the Lutherans (is it otherwise true,ⁿ) that we have heard), willingly print the books of the Lutherans, and will not print the books that are written by the right Christians, against them, for the truth: then we proclaim to you that you will not escape the divine and terrible vengeance, even if you are the most Christian.^o)

For you must not think that you satisfy God by keeping His faith whole and unchanged for yourselves, if you do not also, as much as you are able, work diligently to have everything put away from you as quickly as possible, which annoys your brothers and is capable of leading them into such error.

n) A beautiful article of papal faith.

o) Behold, behold, shall even the most Christian be damned?

(13) For he that is not with the Lord is proved to be against him. And he that casteth not out such evil, if he be able, shall be counted in the sight of God, as if he had wrought it and driven it in. Now is the time for those who have been chosen and proven among you to reveal themselves, so that every one of you, if he is pious, may build a wall for himself for the house of the Lord, so that he may be worthy of the crown of honors promised to those who keep themselves upright by the same Lord. Given in Rome at St. Peter's, under the Fisherman's Ring, on the last day of November 1522, in the first year of our papacy.

T. Hezius.

Luther's Follow-up Speech and Response to Preceding Papal Breve of Pope Adrian VI 1)

Martinus Luther.

To all Christian readers grace and peace in Christ, and no papal blessing before.

No pope has ever done what this pope does, who gives the verdict out of his own hand to those in Bamberg, so that they may judge whether St. Peter's sentence has been rightly introduced and interpreted by him. And I also humbly ask, not only the Christians of Bamberg, but all over, to accept such a given verdict, and to judge between me and the pope, whether Luther or the pope has instituted sects, estates and new orders, apart from the common Christian faith; item, whether Luther or the pope teaches something more than God's word alone: then it will be found who the lie masters are called here by St. Peter. Peter, and how finely Pope Adrian of Louvain learned to interpret the Scriptures.

2. item, whether the Luther, or the papists, by avarice with false words at the Christians and lead a free, unchaste, insolent life, and do not want to be subject to the rulers; item, whether Luther or Pope despises kings and princes, banishes them, and curses them into the third, fourth, ninth generation, and so henceforth everything that St. Peter says in the introduced saying.

1) This heading is found in the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

But, praise and thanks be to God, the folly and foolishness of the Pope and the Papists will come to light, and they will become a mockery and a disgrace, and they will make themselves contemptible before everyone, so that Daniel will be fulfilled, when he speaks of the final Christ: He shall be destroyed without hand, Daniel 8, 25., and Paul 2 Tim. 3, 8. 9.: "But they shall not perform it; but their unwiseness shall be made manifest unto all men, as happened unto Jannes and Jambres."

Is it not a sin and a shame that the pope, who wants to be master over all Christians, does not know how to say more than: Luther alone wants to be wise, should we have erred with so many of our ancestors? These are feminine, childish, monkish and sophistical complaints. A pope should lead the Scriptures, and thus bravely say: Behold, here stands God's word, thus and thus Luther has spoken against God's word. But now he is quite silent about it, and says: "Luther has spoken against long custom, against habit, against the teachers; just as if our faith were based on long custom and habit, and the teachers' word.

If habit and long custom alone is enough, why do we not believe with the Jews, Turks and pagans? Why do we not believe with the devil, who always has the habit 1) of being evil? But if habit alone is not enough, why does he not point to the right reason of this habit? Or, why should we not ask about the arrival of such habit, whether it is right or not right? Our God is not called habit, but truth, and our faith is not based on habit, but on the truth, which is God Himself.

6 He also boasts that truth has always been superior to falsehood. It is true that

The truth is finally incumbent on the people, but it is often suppressed; for it must sometimes die, just like Christ, but still rise again. Thus, under the papacy, Christian truth was suppressed, as Daniel 8:12 proclaimed that in the time of the last Christ, truth would be publicly suppressed. But the suppression has now come to an end. The truth has lain long enough under the lie, and was buried with Christ; now it must once again come forth, and suppress the papal lies again, so that here the pope, like Caiphas, prophesies against himself, that the truth should at this time bear witness to the lie.

I also think that they have started to do it honestly. Methinks the pabstry with its scales has become a spectacle to the world, with small honors, that their debauchery, hitherto practiced secretly and openly, is sung even by the children and by the scoundrels, as it was to the idols in the days of the apostles and martyrs, that they might be recompensed for their arrogance, which before was terrible even to the highest kings and princes (who were also most despised by them), but now is despised and a mockery even to the most despised and least of men; so that the saying of Isaiah Cap. 33:1, "Woe unto thee, thou robber, thou shalt be robbed again; and, thou despiser, thou shalt be despised again; if thou hast robbed, thou shalt be robbed; and if thou hast despised, thou shalt be despised"; and as Christ says, Matt. 7:2, "With what measure ye measure, it shall be measured to you again."

8 And I am sorry that I had to give such a breve so good German, because such miserable merciful kitchen Latin would be well worth a little German. But God is surprised at the final Christian that he leaves him no more happiness, that he can no longer speak or do art, and that he has become a child and a fool. It is a shame that such Latin is also written to the Germans, and such a foolish interpretation of the Scriptures is allowed to pretend to reasonable people. It is all right and fine papist, and monkish, and Lovanian. 1523.

1) Erlanger: "gewonet"; in all other editions: "gewonheit", also in Latin: consuetudo.

737: Two letters from Hans von der Planitz to Elector Frederick of Saxony concerning the action at the Imperial Diet in Nuremberg. Nuremberg, Dec. 27, 1522 and

Jan. 8, 1523.

These two letters are found in the Wittenberg edition <1569>, vol. IX, p. 167b; in the Jena edition (1585), only the second letter, vol. II, p. 187b; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, pp. 276 and 369, and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 366.

I.

Most Serene, Highborn Elector! Your Electoral Grace is willing to accept my submissive, obedient and always willing services with diligence. Most gracious Elector and Lord! E. C. F. G.'s letter, given to Lochau on the 5th day of this month, I received and read it yesterday, the 26th day. I hereby inform your Lordship that I have also written to your Lordship how some have been ordered to express an opinion as to what should be carried to the Estates for Luther's sake, and who should do so is also not known to your Lordship; and that nothing has been done about it for a long time since I reported it to your Lordship.

But in a few days past, when I was ordered to act on other matters, along with some from the imperial states, the Lutheran matter, and the notel that had been set up, was again taken up, and some reverend persons spoke almost sharply and harshly. However, as I noted by others afterwards, there was little, and to say the least, no reason at all, how one should act and proceed against Luther and his supporters and followers.

When I came in again, however, and the same one had not yet finished his speech, he broke it off from hour to hour almost shortly and decided in such a way that I could not hear what the matter was, therefore the survey would be; until such time as I noted such from the following in the surveys, who were almost all of a different opinion 2c., and the one of which I wrote approximately three weeks ago 2c.

When the survey was completed, the governor would have liked to give chance to the lesser and uglier, and in my opinion also the most clumsy part, especially at this time; which he also did. For this reason I was also induced and moved (truly out of good opinion) to report my misgivings, in the opinion that this was their intention.

the way would not be to avert indicated complaints, because this action would not let itself be dampened by force, but other ways, for this purpose official, would have to be used, which could be found, where one wanted to hear about it 2c.

From this and other things came that we had much talk, conversationes and disputationes with each other, that also the governor and Cardinal were somewhat moved against me, but afterwards again almost amicably. So I had to suffer a great punishment; the matter is still at rest as long as it lasts.

6. those of the estates, so appointed to the great committee, are somewhat more modest in this matter, than ours of a part in the regiment.

7 However, as far as the copy or note is able to present to the estates, I hereby send E. C. F. G. a copy out of a submissive confidential opinion, from which E. C. F. G. may note the good will of some of them. God send it for the best; unfortunately, I fear that the majority of us are obdurate and blinded in all our actions. For even if something good and fruitful comes along at times, it is still despised, sought only: Sic volo, sic jubeo, sit pro ratione voluntas. Would that one might become gray over it. And I profess to be far too little and unskilled in these great dealings; I need experienced, wise, cautious, and thoughtful people.

8. evil newspaper has been said here, but in secret; hope to God that there is nothing to it, namely that Rhodes should be conquered and taken by the Turk; which is indicated by many, but do not want to be publicly known, say they would rather it came from others than from them.

9 If this were so, it would not be a contemptible disadvantage to Christendom, for the other islands, kingdoms and countries, situated in the middle sea and nearby, would, as is to be feared, also soon come under his control. How hard God attacks us, nor do we want to call upon Him for grace and mercy, but think (like blind people) that we can prevent it by our own prudence. We will certainly miss that. God be with us.

10. otherwise knows E. C. F. G. I have nothing new to write, because I hope that where E. C. F. G. were here, many unpleasantnesses would remain. All of which E. C. F. G. I did not want to keep out of obedience, because the same E. C. F. G. in all obedience to E. C. F. G. is not to be expected.

I am willing to do so without hesitation. Date Nuremberg, on the 27th day of December, Anno Domini 1522.

E. C. F. G.

subservient, obedient Hans von der Planitz, knight.

Notes.

Most Gracious Prince and Lord, the Papal Nuncio has indicated to me how he wanted to send E. C. F. G. several new newspapers from Rhodes, France and the French lands; he has asked me to send E. C. F. G. the same letters, which were preserved in a bundle.

But because I came to know that there was a Breve Apostolicum with the certain letters, and I did not know what the content is, I did not want to accept the letters, but said that I did not know any message to E. C. F. G., which E. C. F. G. I did not want to leave undisclosed out of humble obedience. And, in my opinion, the matter of Luther is being diligently promoted by Imperial Majesty's governor, the Cardinal of Salzburg 2c., and they are almost in a hurry with it, perhaps worrying about E. C. F. G.'s future, which would perhaps prevent and destroy much of the project.

Date ut supra.

II.

Most Serene, Highborn Elector! Your Electoral Grace is prepared to accept my submissive, obedient and always willing services. Gn. Elector and Lord! To E. C. F. G. I hereby send the Instruction, 1) which the Papal Nuncio has had read before the Estates of the Empire, of which I also wrote to E. C. F. G. before. It is not, however, the one of which I first reported to C.C.F.G.; for it was almost short, barely half an ares 2) long, and a bit sittig, nowhere as broad as the present one.

2 And although the nuncio promised to hand it over in writings, it has not yet been done; and now that this present one has been handed over, many people have the delusion that it was made here at Nuremberg, or that there was the least notice and instruction given as to how it should be placed.

3 Today, the Papal Nuncio has once again suggested, in a document that he has sent to the Archduke, that the preachers be instructed to

St. Lawrence, St. Sebald, in the hospital and Augustinians, should accept imprisonment. The same applies to the monks who have left the monasteries and Carthausen, have learned a trade, and wear secular garb.

This is what the governor sent to the committee of the estates. As Mr. Philipps von Feilitzsch reports to me, there has been much and various talk about it, and everything contrary to Luther has been highly cursed and maligned by the clergy, nothing else has been shouted but crucifige, crucifige.

5 No one of the seculars has spoken against this, except Lord Philip of Feilitzsch and Margrave Casimir to a certain extent.

(6) But because they were afraid of a riot, where they would attack the preachers (as they certainly would), they decided not to accept them unheard, but to humble them beforehand, to hold against them what the papal nuncio had announced that they should have received for the sake of their preaching.

(7) But the monks and Carthusians who had left were to be taken into custody and handed over to their superior. However, beforehand, some should be appointed to a small committee, who would consider the matter, and what should be done and carried out everywhere. The Cardinal of Salzburg, the Bishop of Augsburg, the Vicar of the Bishop of Freisingen, and the Vicar of the Bishop of Bamberg have been appointed for this purpose; and Mr. Hans von Schwarzburg and Mr. Sebastian von Rotenhain have been appointed with great complaint, but they are nowhere the same.

8. go wildly, it is well suited to a displeasure and turmoil in the kingdom. God send it for the best. The malice and envy of this matter is so ingrained that I fear no good will come of it. For God-fearing, experienced, cautious and wise people are lacking in my sight; it will come to pass, as in the days of Pharaoh king of Egypt, that God will prove His honor and power through their hardened and obdurate hearts, amen.

9 Likewise, I am sending E.C. F.G. a copy of Imperial Majesty's letter, written to the Regiment, from which E.C.F.G. will hear Her Majesty's mind, from the articles attributed to Her Majesty by the Estates and the Regiment. In addition, there is also a copy of how Her Majesty writes to the Pope about the annotations and other things, in which Luther is also remembered; it is in Latin. 3)

3) No. 713.

1) No. 718.

2) The Jenaer writes: "Arcks".

10. otherwise knows E. C. F. G. I have nothing new to write; for the only thing to worry about is that if the monks who have left were to be attacked, it would become a wild game here.

The shouting goes through the whole city that the C. F. G. are coming and are to be in Coburg; yesterday I was addressed by the Bishop of Mainz, by Margrave Joachim, and others, and also today by Archduke Ferdinand, to let them know when the C. F. G. will come; I answered: I would have no knowledge of this, nor would I know whether the Almighty GOD would send E. C. F. G. would again have granted perfect health, so that E. C. F. G. would again be able to travel. The

The common people and the majority of the estates would almost like to see the future of the C.C.F.G.. It is said that the Turk has not left the island of Rhodes yet again.

12. all of which I have not wanted to do out of submissive obedience to E. C. F. G., because I am willing to serve the same E. C. F. G. in all submissiveness. I have not wished to obey, for to serve the same C. F. G. in all submissiveness, I am quite undauntedly willing. Date Nuremberg, January 8, Anno 1523.

E. C. F. G.

subservient, obedient Hans von der Planitz, knight.

Chapter Nine, Section Two.

The new Imperial Diet at Nuremberg, which was to begin on December 11, 1523, was attended by the Elector of Saxony at the beginning of December, but was not opened until January 14, 1524.

A. From the Campeggi's attachments in Electoral Saxony.

738. the breve of pope Clement VII to Chursachsen, dated Dec. 7, 1523, in which he reminds the Elector to behave in a way that is appropriate for his house.

This breve is found in the Latin Wittenberg edition (1551), tom. II, fol. 407 k; in the Jena (1566), tom. II, loc. 571; and in the Erlangen, opx. var. urZ., tom. VII, 61.

Pope Clement VII.

Beloved Son, Blessedness and Apostolic Benediction. The other day we wrote to your Serene Highness, when we heard that she would either have already left for the Imperial Diet in Nuremberg or would still be leaving, that we, who at that time had dispatched our beloved son Jerome Rorarius, our housemate and chamberlain, there, wanted to send an apostolic nuncio as soon as possible, so that he would be helpful in our stead in matters concerning the apostolic see, in taking care of everything that can promote the peaceful state of this country and the salvation of souls.

We have decided to send our beloved son, Cardinal Campeggius, an exceedingly intelligent and very learned man, also knowledgeable of this country and hopefully quite pleasant, to the higher honor of the nation we have always loved, who, through the help, favor and reputation of your Serene Highness and other princes and princes, will do and accomplish what seems to be beneficial and useful everywhere.

3. In dispatching this and leaving it to us, we exhort your Serene Highness in the Lord to travel to the Diet itself, where it has not yet happened, according to her duty and the requirements of the cause, which will not displease the Almighty God, and there to take every care that our Legate, which we send to you with such dignity, will not only arrive safely, but will also be received reverently and listened to most graciously by you and others, as is due to Your Serene Highness (who has had so many Roman popes and emperors as advocates of the popes), and we hope that this will happen. Given in Rome at St. Peter's, under the Fisherman's Ring, Dec. 7, 1523, in the first year of our papal dignity.

To the beloved son, the noble man, Frederick, Duke of Saxony, Elector of the Holy Roman Empire 2c.

739 A somewhat more extensive breve of 15 Jan. 1524.

This breve is found in the Latin Wittenberg edition (1551), tom. II, toi. 408.

Translated into German.

Pope Clement VII.

1st Beloved Son, Blessedness and Apostolic Benediction. When we heard that a famous imperial assembly of the ecclesiastical and secular princes and estates of Germany had been announced at Nuremberg, at which your Serene Highness would also appear according to her duty and obligation: we took good hope in the Lord, that by the joint appeal of the praiseworthy German nation, and especially by the power of those who have always meant well with God and His cause, and have sighed at the daily misery of all Christendom, as well as of Germany in particular, the confused state of affairs would be counteracted and remedied.

(2) So that we do not miss anything in this, we sent ahead a few days ago the beloved son, Jerome Rorarius, of the Emperor Maximilian, of glorious memory, but now our housemate, and we are now also preparing the beloved son, Laurentius, of the title of St. Anastasia Cardinal, Campegius, our and the apostolic See's Legate de Latere, a man of great skill and wisdom, to be present in the assembly itself.

Anastasia's Cardinal, Campegius, our and the Apostolic See's Legate de Latere, a man of great skill and prudence, that he may open in the Assembly itself, and wherever else it may be necessary, our efforts, counsels and concerns which we bear for the tranquility and benefit of all Christendom, and especially of this country, and, after your consultation with him, find a means of establishing tranquility and peace.

3. Although we do not doubt that your Serene Highness will faithfully assist our legate, the Cardinal, as we know that according to your exceptional spirit you are like your ancestors in their glorious virtues, we have no hesitation that you realize that the peace and security of all, especially of those who are your equals, rests on peace and harmony in this country: we have not thought it superfluous to ask you cordially and to remind you paternally that, if the benefits of God remind you otherwise of thanksgiving to Him, where you consider the welfare of the Fatherland and of the German nation, upon which your welfare also depends, let us remember

We hope that the misery of the whole oppressed Christendom will be close to your hearts, as indeed it is and should be close to your hearts, and that you will all show your loyalty, honesty, respectability and power in the execution of this most sacred business, so that the disputes in Germany may be settled and the noble and wholesome peace and harmony may be established in this country, but that those who live in it, and especially rulers and authorities, may remain in their dignities. Our love for this famous nation is indescribably great, to such an extent that we would like to see its benefit promoted as our own, and wish that mighty Germany, after the domestic disturbances have been settled, may regain its former glory by asserting the common and Christian welfare, which has almost completely fallen into disrepair.

(4) Accordingly, in this important matter so pleasing to God and affecting the common good, we remind your Serene Highness in the Lord that by diligence and Christian good counsel she may bring about glory and praise for herself, and that she may heartily please us, who desire it most of all, and in so doing direct both her eyes to God's and her honor. For which important service we promise to be grateful, as the above-mentioned Cardinal-Legate will speak to your Serene Highness in our name, to which you will attach all faith. Given in Rome at St. Peter's, under the Fisherman's Ring, the 15th of January, Anno 1524, of our Papal dignity in the first year.

Yes. Sadoletus.

To the beloved son, the noble man, Frederick, Duke of Saxony, Elector of the Holy Roman Empire 2c.

740 Letter from Campegius to the Elector Frederick of Saxony, February 29, 1524.

This letter is found in the Latin Wittenberg edition (1551), tom. II, toi. 408 d.

Translated into German.

Most Serene, Most Reverend Prince, Most Esteemed Lord, Hail and a will inclined to all obedience beforehand.

When I came to Nuremberg on the fourteenth day of this month and heard that Your Serene Highness had already departed from there, I regretted this very much, partly because it happened against my suspicion, partly because I foresaw it,

The intention of my delegation would be greatly diminished if I could not speak with Your Serene Highness. For apart from the short breve 1) which I had to hand over to you from Her Papal Holiness Clement VII. I received many other orders from you during my dispatch, which are now either to be postponed to another time, or to be delivered by me through ambassadors and letters, and of which the former is not convenient, but the latter is very burdensome for my legation, for this matter cannot well be postponed, nor can it easily be delivered by letters, otherwise it would have been better if I had not undergone this so arduous journey at all.

Because the circumstances of the time have brought it about in this way, and, as we all know, one must send oneself into the time, I will endeavor in this letter to satisfy to some extent both the request of His Papal Holiness and my office, and therefore send with the same to Your Serene Highness His, our most holy Lord's, breve, together with a solicitation of many blessings and assurance of a sincere love in the Lord. Although some things have been said about Your Serene Highness, which seem to speak for the new heresies emerging at this time, neither the pope nor I think of such things. For from the day that I first saw Ew. Serene Highness, I have perceived, in addition to other excellent qualities and those befitting a righteous prince that I have encountered in your Serene Highness, this one, which is indisputably the greatest and most brilliant of all, that they hold above godliness and bear a special zeal for the apostolic chair, which has made such an impression on me that I will never let go of this good opinion of them, let others see and speak what they will.

(3) And I am not distressed by Germany's unheard-of change and turning away from true godliness to new customs and unrest, with which some people, as I myself have seen and experienced, are infected, because I am well aware of what a great difference there is between the minds of the rabble, which is always eager for innovations, and those of princes and illustrious men, from whom rights and laws flow as from their sources. That His Serene Highness is at the top of the list is clear to me both from their

The people of the city are not only aware of their own conduct, but also of their special virtues. For what outstanding services and monuments they and their ancestors have rendered to the Holy Apostolic See and the Christian religion is so well known that no testimony is needed.

4) Such virtue and godliness are required by His Serene Highness the Most Holy Lord [Clement VII.2) to an even greater degree in these times, when, because of all kinds of tearing unrest and innovations, the princes should have such a religious timidity and elevation of mind that they not only cannot tolerate without pain the perverse manner and the courageous will of the people against the laws and authorities, but also wish to oppose them and emphatically punish their nonsense. Such aids and means have never been taken in most places in your country, since the further and deeper this evil, if neglected, can spread, the more resolutely and steadfastly one must oppose it. For what can princes or authorities expect if they go by the head of the mob and allow it to know the customs and sacred ordinances? This is, indeed, a most dangerous and extremely ruinous thing, if it is not stopped.

5) What damage this evil could cause is more than evident, as we have recently had great examples in Bohemia and Hungary, where these things have caused such disorder that ecclesiastical and secular, public and private matters have been mixed up, and everything has been thrown into confusion, and unrest has arisen that has not yet been able to be settled. And who would doubt that the same thing would happen in Germany, if one did not put a stop to the ungodly undertakings of those who start such innovations, and oppose, not the freedom, but rather the insolence of the foolhardy mob, which, since it has raised its head against the holy orders and the holy religious decrees, and has unabashedly fallen away from them: what will it do to the princes and authorities, against whom it anyway harbors a constant aversion? How beautifully and happily in this case those will act who laugh at those who have such things in mind and undertake them against the Roman church, a blind man can see. For one

1) No.738.

2) In Latin, instead of the name, it says: "X."

It must not be thought that because of 1) such confusions and ungodliness the ecclesiastical reputation or freedom has been diminished or overthrown, but that the honor and reputation of all German princes will fall completely.

When Pope Clement VII, who by divine grace sits at the helm of the regiment, saw this storm, he sent me out from his side (a latere suo) to this cause as his legate to these lands, that he, like all German princes, so also Ew. Serene Highness in particular, to remember the great danger posed by me, to protect against such great unrest by means of his help, service and assistance through me, and to incite them to restrain and curb this rage; not with the intention of leading his cause, or that of the Roman court, but yours, that of the whole of Germany, of the common people, indeed, of Christ.

For this reason, he gave me this letter on my departure, 2) to your Serene Highness, and ordered me to remind her, according to its contents, to do everything that can bring peace to Germany, prestige to the church, and glory and benefit to your dignity. For what else I could do for you, I do not see. For we wish nothing but all that is holy and good for all Germans and their noble nation. We are also sent to them to raise up the fallen, to rebuke the erring, and to keep all those who return in the bosom of love and of the Church, which we herewith publicly testify and steadfastly affirm. As I have confidently taken upon myself the burden of such an important office, although aware of my weakness, trusting in your Serene Grace's goodness and godliness, so also in carrying it out I will make every effort to be of service, zealous, faithful and diligent to your grace.

8 It will therefore not be contrary to Your Serene Highness's goodness and godliness to receive me, who have come here with this intention, and to assist me with their favor, help and advice, as it will be beneficial and advantageous to my cause, which I request from Your Serene Highness. And although I do not doubt their goodwill towards me and the Holy Apostolic See, it should be very dear to me if they, after their kindness, communicate to me in writing what seems good to them in the matter and expect from me all that is necessary.

I would like to do what they can expect from a man who is eager to serve them and to maintain their reputation and benefit, as I hereby offer all my work and services and myself to Your Serene Highness and recommend them in the best possible way. May God keep Your Serene Highness in good health and prosperous well-being for a long time to come. From Nuremberg, the last day of February 1524.

Your Serene Highness Most Sincere Laurentius Campegius, Legate.

To the most illustrious and highborn Lord, to be highly esteemed by me, Lord Frederick, Duke of Saxony, Elector of the Holy Roman Empire 2c.

B. About the passing of this Diet, and how the making of it has caused great opposition, as well as about other actions taken at this Diet.

741. farewell to the imperial Diet, held at Nuremberg on April 18, 1524, in the names of the emperor, his governor and brother Ferdinand, and the emperor's envoy, Joh. Hannart, as well as the electors, princes, prelates, counts and estates.

From Lünig's Imperial Archives, xart. Zensral. oout. I, x. 446.

We Carol the Fifth, by the grace of God chosen Roman Emperor, at all times Major of the Empire, Grain in Germania, in Castile, in Arragon, in Legron, in both Sicily, in Jerusalem, in Hungary, in Dalmatia, in Crvatia, Navarre, to Granada, to Toledo, to Valence, to Galicia, Majorca, Hispalis, Sardinia, Cordova, Corsica, Murcia, Gien, Algarbia, Algezira, to Gibraltar and the Canary Islands, also the Indian Islands and the Terra firma of the Sea Oceani etc. Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy, Lorraine, Brabant, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, Limburg, Guelders, Wirtenberg, Calabria, Athenarum, Neopatriae;

Count of Habsburg, of Flanders, of Tyrol, of Görtz, of Parsiloni, of Artois, of Burgundy; Count Palatine of Hainault, of Holland, of Zeeland, of Wert, of Kyburg, of Namur, of Roussillon, of Ciritani

1) ad stands in the Wittenberg instead of od. (Walch.)
2) No. 739.

and Zütphen; Landauf in Alsace, Margrave of Burgundy, of Oristanr, of Gortiani, and of the Holy Roman Empire Prince of Swabia, of Catalonia, Asturia 2c. 2c., Lord of Friesland, of the Wendish Mark, of Portenaw, of Biscaya, of Molin, of Salins, of Tripoli and of Mecheln: confess and declare manly: After at our next Imperial Diet held in Nuremberg by the illustrious Prince Don Ferdinanden, Infante of Hispania, Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy 2c. 2c., our friendly dear brother and governor in the Holy Roman Empire, also princes, prelates, counts and estates of the same, in a brave number and some important matters incumbent on the Holy Empire acted and conferred, and in part of the same of their performed and -held points and articles, as namely: The maintenance of peace and justice, with the establishment of a common train in the Holy Roman Empire, decided, until our approval, to establish part of the same as the execution in the Holy Roman Empire. Item, to show a plot to a constant persistent help against the enemy of the Christian name, the Turks, 2c., and to bring them behind them to their countryside and subjects, so that they will meet another day on St. Margaret's Day [13. July 1523], they united and settled, so that on the same day we should first send our message and have to open our will and mind on the above mentioned points of peace and justice, and for the sake of this and other articles, together with our Electors, Princes, Prelates, Counts and Estates, Councils, which they should then also have at Nuremberg, certainly with complete authority, to finally decide all the contents of the farewell taken at the same Imperial Diet. But our message did not arrive at Nuremberg on the above-mentioned St. Margaret's Day, due to noticeable hindrance, nor did the lesser part of the councils of the princes, prelates, counts and estates of the time appear, so that nothing final or fruitful may have been acted or decided on account of the above-mentioned points. Since the aforementioned our brother, for urgent movable causes, as well as for the noticeable benefit and necessity of the Holy Roman Empire, has again called a general Imperial Diet in our name, for the final execution and resolution of the above-mentioned points and articles, as well as others of the Holy Roman Empire, at Nuremberg, on which day a large number of Electors of the Holy Roman Empire will again be present.

Princes, Prelates, Counts and Estates in their own person, also their full power embassy, obediently appeared. To this end, we hereby declare the noble, our and the Holy Empire's dear faithful, Johann Hannart, 1) Burgrave of Limbeck, Knight of the Order of St. James, our counselor, supreme secretary, and the Holy Roman Emperor. We have also ordered our council, supreme secretary and at this time orator in the Holy Roman Empire, with complete authority and instruction, together with the above-mentioned our brother, as governor, also our and the Holy Roman Empire's princes, princes and estates, and their embassies, to act, advise and seriously decide on the aforementioned articles, as well as other burdensome duties incumbent on the Holy Roman Empire at this time; How they then all with special, high diligence took such unordered and unresolved points and articles again before themselves, sat about them with timely council, discussed and decided, as follows:

First of all, after we have not considered it good and fruitful, due to many movable causes and requests, that we should erect the common imperial customs for the maintenance of peace and justice this time, we have graciously requested through the above-mentioned orator sent by us to the Electors, Princes, Prelates, Counts and Estates, to search for other means and ways for the maintenance of the Regiment and Chamber Court. However, since after much diligence they cannot this time find an adequate, Since, however, after much diligence they may not find a suitable or convenient way this time, our governor, our orator, upon our authority and order given to them, have, with our and the empire's princes, princes and estates' subsequent maintenance of the regiment and chamber court, for the next two years, amicably and benevolently agreed and united, namely that princes, princes and estates shall be friendly to us, Princes and Estates, as a friendly and subservient favor, shall and will maintain and transfer to us half of the maintenance of our regiment and chamber court in the Holy Empire for the above-mentioned two years, and we as Roman Emperor shall and will maintain and transfer the other half of the regiment and chamber court, in which our Houses of Austria and Burgundy shall be counted with their due imposition. The first year shall begin at Whitsun in the near future [May 15, 1524], and the laying of the present charge by us and the estates of the same first year shall be accomplished in two ends, viz.

1) In Walch's old edition here and in the caption: "Hannart".

Frankfurt fairs. And the first target of such payment shall fall at the next Frankfurt Autumn Fair [Aug. 29]. The first target of such payment shall fall at the next Frankfurt Autumn Fair [29 Aug.] and shall be immediately and irresistibly deposited and paid behind the mayor and council of the cities of Augsburg, Frankfurt, Nuremberg or Esslingen, and all this shall be delivered and handed over to the collector, who shall then, at their request, give a thorough and clear account of his income and expenditure to these and other governors, princes and estates of the Holy Roman Empire, or to whom they may order it, every two years.

2. On the other hand, our governors, with the knowledge of our orator and the common estates of the realm, have established at our first Imperial Diet in Nuremberg, in accordance with our regimental regulations, that our regiment and court of justice have been moved and changed from Nuremberg to Esslingen for mobile reasons, and thereupon ordered the administrators of both, regiment and chamber court, to dispose of the chancery acts and actions, together with the persons belonging to them, to the best advantage in Esslingen. So that they are most certainly all there in Esslingen before the holy day of Pentecost. And since there will be a good time for the change of such places in the outward journey and with the preparation of the lodgings and other things useful for the regiment, we, our governor and orator, have suspended all regimental and chamber court matters, trades and business until Tuesday after the holy day of Pentecost, and have therefore graciously allowed the present regimental persons to move to Esslingen.

3. However, if between Pentecost and the date of this farewell, or the time before the regiment, content of the above described order and settlement is set, in these swift runs and uprisings, some serious uprising would arise in the holy realm, or something brave would happen, our governor shall and may require one of the electors, two, three or more of the twelve princes, who are at any time seated nearest to his beloved, to come to him at a place and time convenient to him, and describe them, but that such shall not take place via Augsburg or Cologne, who shall also appear at his beloved. Or, if they are prevented from doing so due to matrimonial reasons, they may nevertheless send a public council to his beloved, and together with it advise him on such matters for the best. However, if the matters or otherwise be so contemptuous or needy that they do not want to await the request and arrival of the princes, and the same princes therefore do not come or send their advisers at the request of our governor, nor shall it be necessary to trouble such princes for that reason, our governor shall and may then act for himself, as if the regimental persons were even with each other, for the best and most skillful, in accordance with our regiment's order and farewell.

4. Likewise, our governors and orators, together with our and the empire's princes, princes and estates, have unanimously agreed that our regimental order, as initially established at Worms, with the timely and courageous advice of all princes, princes and estates of the empire, Princes and Estates of the Empire, assembled there at the time, shall be and remain in force in all and every one of its points, articles, contents and opinions, as it stands in the letter, and the contents thereof shall be acted upon, excluding the following points.

And most importantly, according to the same order, the number of two and twenty persons in the Holy Roman Empire of Princes, Princes and others shall remain in the regiment next to our Governor, so that the greater part and at least fourteen persons of the Council shall always be with the above-mentioned Governor. Thereupon, princes, counties and estates, their councils belonging to the regiment, are to be summoned on the next Whitsun Tuesday [17. May 1524] without further trial, so that [the same appointed councillors] may take into their hands on the following Wednesdays, or on Thursday at the latest, all or some of the matters incumbent upon us and the Holy Roman Empire, and may most faithfully deliberate and act upon them, in accordance with the order of the regiment and its farewell. And for the most beneficial, since the maintenance of the Regiment and the Chamber Court is not granted for more than two years, to consider in the meantime other means and more convenient ways, how such maintenance may be carried out after the end of such two years, without any special complaints of the Estates.

6th And since the six electors and twelve princes and prelates ordered to sit in the regiment in their own person, for movable causes and other their excellent business, and especially in these rapid runs, is burdensome, our governor and orator, also electors, princes and estates have united, if a elector, prince or prelate, whom the order to sit in the regiment concerns, does not sit in his own person.

may appear, that then the same Elector, Prince or Prelate may send an excellent councilor, with full authority, to sit in the regiment at the beginning of his fourth year, until the end of the same, and do his duty like other regimental councilors; half the pay, which would have been due to the Elector or Prince by whom he was sent for the same fourth year, shall also be given to him. And in order to keep the regiment stately and respectable, also in good reputation, and to attract the attention of men, our governor and orator, princes, princes and estates, so that every quarter of the year a prince, ecclesiastical or secular, sits next to our governor at the reported our regiment, have agreed to the following opinion of the session of princes and princes. Namely, that the Archbishop and Elector of Cologne and the Bishop of Strasbourg, as well as Duke Heinrich of Mecklenburg, as reported co-princes of Cologne, shall personally sit at the said regiment during the first quarter of the year, which is to begin on Whitsun Tuesday, and each of them shall send a public council.

The other quarter of the year, which is called the sixth in the treaty of Worms, in which Margrave Joachim, Elector, the Bishop of Augsburg sit in his own person, and the Elector of Brandenburg and Margrave Philips of Baden send their advisors.

The third quarter of the year, in which the Cardinal and Archbishop of Mainz, Elector, sits, and the Cardinal of Salzburg, and Duke Frederick, Count Palatine, as associated princes, Duke Frederick shall sit as the secular prince, and Mainz and Salzburg shall send their valiant councils.

The fourth quarter of the year, in which the order concerns Palgrave Ludwig, Elector, the Bishop of Bamberg and Duke George of Saxony, Palgrave Ludwig shall sit in his own person, and Bamberg and Saxony shall send their advisors.

The fifth quarter of the year in which the Bishop of Trier, the Bishop of Würzburg and Duke Wilhelm of Bavaria are to sit, the Bishop of Würzburg shall sit in person, and Trier and Bavaria shall send their councils.

The sixth quarter of the year, in which Duke Frederick of Saxony, Elector, the Bishop of Speyer, and Margrave Casimir of Brandenburg shall sit, the reported Bishop of Speyer shall sit in his own person, and Saxony and Brandenburg shall send their councils.

12. the seventh quarter of the year in which the bi-

In turn, the Archbishop of Cologne, the Bishop of Strasbourg and Duke Henry of Mecklenburg shall sit, the Duke of Mecklenburg shall sit in person, and the Archbishop of Cologne and the Bishop of Strasbourg shall send their advisors.

In the eighth quarter of the year, the Elector of Brandenburg shall sit in person, and the Bishop of Augsburg and Margrave Philips of Baden shall send their advisors.

And the personal sitting of the Electors and Princes at the Regiment shall now follow the indicated measure and order of the two years, and thus be kept irresistible, also thirteen weeks shall be counted for a quarter of a year.

15 If, however, one of the princes or rulers, ecclesiastical or secular, should have to provide his fourth year for marital and honest reasons and should not wish to sit personally in the aforementioned regiment, the said prince or prince shall request another prince or prince and ask him to take his place for the fourth year of the same once, so that the order established at Worms remains in force.

16 If one of the aforementioned electors or princes were to come and sit in the regiment in person, he shall be permitted to take one of his councillors with him into the regiment, who shall also do his duty. Likewise, our governor shall be permitted to take two councillors into the regiment. However, the same councillors whom the governor, elector or prince take with him into the regiment shall have no vote.

17. Our governor, orator, princes and estates have also united so that no delay or default may appear in the filling of the regiment: If any Elector, Prince, District or Estates should fail to appoint or send his Councillors to the Regiment in accordance with the Regulations and this moderation, our Governor or Regiment may then appoint and reimburse the same persons at the place where they would be lacking, in all measure as the Councillors of the Councils of the Councils, established in accordance with the Regulations at Worms.

18. our Governor and Regiment shall refer all judicial proceedings and justifications to the Court of Appeal and other ordinary courts.

19 And this improvement and settlement of our regimental order, established at Worms, shall otherwise be unbroken in all other articles, of which no special report is made here, and shall especially exist and remain with their dignities and powers.

(20) Further, our judge in chief in the realm, the content of our order, shall be established at Worms, be-

1) In the old edition: "des".

and all this is ordered and provided here according to good inquisition and investigation of necessity.

21. Item, although at the next Imperial Diet at Nuremberg, at the vehement pleading of several princes and estates of the empire, a special article in the same treaty, should the urgent aid of the four thousand men of the next crazy year against the Turks be granted, stipulated: that for this no estimate shall be made, nor shall anyone be obliged to give it, unless those who complain of being excessively afflicted had first been given a fair measure of moderation in their imposed fee. However, such moderation would not be possible for half the time, nor for more than half of the complainants, absentees, and other causes; nor would it be possible for this present charge to be granted for the entertainment of the Regiment and the Court of Appeal for more than half the time, and thus for the Estates of the Realm to be discharged of half the burden, and for each of them to benefit from it in a way that is suitable and unburdensome.

22. However, in order that the aforementioned agreement on its points may be followed, and that the complainants may not complain any further, and that they may therefore make some withdrawal or cause for their non-payment: Our governor, orator, electors, princes and estates have agreed and united that the complainants and complainants shall therefore be granted moderation according to their ability and opportunity, on their sufficiently thorough and constant presentation of their assets; and our governor and regiment shall, upon each complainant's request and presentation, as now reported, ring-fence and mediate his or her tax and assessment of the fee; however, each complainant shall apply to our governor and regiment at Esslingen within two months, the next after such assessment has been made known to him or her and announced to him or her. Then, if such two months pass and he does not apply, he shall not be heard any further, but proceedings shall be taken against him for his tax, which he shall also be obliged to pay.

Item 23: As many of the princes, princes and estates have now brought up and complained to our governor, orator, princes, princes and estates about all kinds of complaints, our governor, orator, princes, princes and estates have invited the honorable scholars of ours and of the kingdom, Rudolffen of Ehingen, Johann Vogt, Heinrich Heiminger, both teachers of law, and the Electors, Princes and Estates Hieronymum Enckhorn, the Archbishop and Elector of Cologne, Simon Reibesen, Provost, the Bishop of Worms, and Johann von Dockheim, the Duke of Jülich, Cleve and Berg Embassy, also the teachers of law 2c., who will act in kindness between the plaintiff parties, and if it does not take place, then inspect all acts and complaints of the same parties, and at Whitsun in the near future will make a report of it to our governor and regiment at Esslingen. The same our governor and regiment shall decide in these matters the parties of their error, together with those now affected, who have inspected such action, in the most beneficial way, and these are the same complaining parties: the Archbishop of Trier, Count Palatine Ludewig, both Electors, and the Landgrave Philips of Hesse, against Frobin's judgment pronounced by Hutten. Duke Wilhelm and Duke Ludwig of Bavaria, against our chamber judge and assessor. The city of Augsburg and its several special citizens, content of their handed over writings, the common city against the regiment. Lorraine on account of the accusations against the Fiscal and Doctor Friesen. Item, the counts' complaints, which they have brought forward now and at the previous Imperial Diet, or still have, to be acted upon after the present and next session. Item, the bishop of Würzburg with his handed over writing.

24. And after we, together with princes, princes and estates, have decided at our Imperial Diet held at Worms, after many actions and counsels, from no final execution in the Holy Roman Empire, on the concept and chamber court order, but have ordered our appointed governor and regiment to issue a concept about it with timely counsel, As a result, an opinion was reached, which was then presented to the next Imperial Diet held before it by our governor, princes, princes and estates, who made several necessary changes to it, discussed it, but nothing was finally decided, but was taken into further consideration by all the estates of the empire until this Imperial Diet.

(25) Although now, by virtue of the present Imperial Diet's decree, it should finally have been acted upon and decided upon once again, it may not have been done here for honest reasons.

1) In the old edition: "shall".

26. To ensure that there is no lack of due execution of sentences pronounced 1) in the Holy Roman Empire, and that no one may complain about this, our governor and orator, as well as princes, princes and estates, have decided to execute and enforce the sentences pronounced against their subjects and countrymen, and other sentences pronounced with execution, according to the content and by virtue of our Court of Appeal, recently established at Worms, the content of which our governor and regiment, whenever the case of disobedience arises in this way, shall enforce seriously and keep strictly to it; Also, if necessary, other princes and twelve princes shall be appointed to the regiment, or shall require their councilors to join them, and together they shall deliberate how the execution should and may be carried out in the most tolerable manner.

27. For all sorts of reasons, nothing definite could be done here, and therefore it was decided that our governor and regiment, at the next meeting, should take the advice of several princes and princes, mintmasters and guards of the past summer and present it to them, They shall take it in hand, together with some mintmasters and guards, as well as the twelve princes' councils, which they require for this purpose, inspect it, consider it according to necessity, and then announce their decision to the realm, and order to mint according to it. However, the princes and other estates are not bound by the laws and regalia of the mint. Even if our governor in the holy realm of time would not be at the reign, nothing final shall be decided for this reason without the knowledge of his love. But if his love is not within the country, then his love shall not command anyone else to decide it. And when the permanent coin has been found and established, it shall then be duly established, so that no coined silver or gold is taken out of the holy realm, and also with our governor, such as the Elector of Saxony, Archbishop of Salzburg and others who have mines, it shall be most skilfully negotiated for a permanent silver purchase, for the permanent preservation of such coin.

28 Item, since the bats of this time are of an excessively low value, and are also dragged down much more wickedly among the good, which is then a noticeable secret complaint of the common man in the holy realm: therefore it is resolved, at all the to order those who coin coins with seriousness not to coin any half or whole coins until further notice; as our governor is now to declare immediately at high penalty and to keep serious order about it.

29. item, because by our instruction, besides others of the monopolies and forbidden purchase, our mind and opinion so declared, soern of the same forbidden cause, according to and according to the ability of our next letter given to the estates, namely, as is right, and that acted according to legal knowledge, we also let ourselves like such opinion. But after we have heard how some articles are to be made for this reason, it is our opinion that such articles should be sent to our governor in the holy realm and to skilled orators, who should examine these articles in our stead and on our behalf and then act according to equity and necessity. Thereupon the said our governors and orators shall and will, collectively and especially, or will, upon special diligent request and remonstrance now made at Nuremberg, the princes, princes and estates of the Holy Roman Empire such monopolies, as much as is in them, in the most favorable way, in accordance with the law, so that no one may complain and complain about it in a legal or reasonable way, and this shall be done in the most favorable way, as between here and Frankfurt Lent. If, however, this is not done in due time, it shall be set up in accordance with imperial law and according to the decree of 1512 at Cologne, among others, and shall be kept in place so that such complaints are stopped.

30. As our instruction, so that we dispatched our message, Johann Haunraten, to this Imperial Diet, also contains, among other things, that we provide that the estates of the Holy Empire, as protectors and guardians of the faith, should have obediently lived and complied with our mandate issued at Worms with the approval of the electors, princes, prelates, counts, and all estates, and that they should have administered the same, and that this should not have happened, so that the common Christianity of the German nation would have no small complaint; For this reason, we have again made our request and demand that every prince, count, prelate, and city for itself, as well as for its subjects, be willing to do this and be obedient, so that our mandate issued at Worms may be followed obediently again. To this

1) "Urtheils" put by us instead: Urtheil.

Upon such request, our and the Holy Roman Empire's princes, prelates, counts and commoners, as obedient members of the Holy Roman Empire, have united and resolved to obediently live, observe and comply with our mandate as much as they are able.

(31) To this end, every authority shall exercise due care in its printing works and elsewhere, so that disgraceful writings and paintings are for the time being completely removed and not spread further; and that for the sake of the printing works, the contents of our mandate are kept. If, however, anyone encounters or is prevented from doing so, he may report this to our governor and regiment; they have orders from us, as we also hereby earnestly command them, to provide assistance and advice to those requesting it, to uphold it, and to execute our mandate with all diligence. And so that the good may not be suppressed next to the evil, and finally it may be discussed how each one should behave in this matter: We have governors and orators, as well as princes, prelates, counts and estates of the empire, present here, as necessary, of a common free universal council of Christendom, which, by papal sanctity, with our permission, may most beneficially take place, if such can always be done, to be proclaimed and advertised in appropriate places in the German nation, as is proper, and considered hereupon with papal sanctity legation acted upon, which accepted to bring such to papal sanctity, and to promote it most faithfully; and shall, nevertheless, in the meantime on St. Martin's Day. Nevertheless, a general assembly of the German nation is to be held in Speyer in the near future on St. Martin's Day, where, as mentioned above, it is to be considered and discussed how a general council is to be held, at which each prince, prince, prelate, count and other estates of the empire are to appear in their own person. If, however, this does not happen, then he shall send one or more of his brave and excellent councillors with complete authority to act and conclude the matter.

32 And thereupon it is written and commanded to princes, rulers, and estates, and especially to those who have high schools in their principalities and cities, to make through their learned, honorable, experienced, and understanding councils an abstract of all new teachers and books, what is found disputable therein, and to submit the same to us, or in our absence, to our governor,

The more we advance at the above-mentioned assembly, the more fruitful and beneficial it will be for us to proceed in trade at the future Council 1). Our governor and regiment, as well as the princes, prelates, counts and estates of the empire, shall also take special care that the holy gospel and the word of God are preached and taught in the meantime according to the true understanding and interpretation of the teachers accepted by the common churches, without turmoil and agitation. The complaints of the German nation by the secular princes and estates against the See of Rome are also to be reported at the next Imperial Diet held here, and then the secular complaints against the clergy are to be reported to the councils and persons ordered by princes, princes and estates as mentioned above, to be deliberated, assessed, and, together with their discretion as to how the same should be directed and brought to a satisfactory course, to be brought before us or our governor, princes, princes, and estates at a future general assembly of the empire, and in such a case the necessity shall be considered and decided.

33. Item, as also at the present Imperial Diet Papal Holiness, likewise our brother, the King of Bohemia and Hungern, with our governor and orator, also princes, princes and estates of the Holy Empire, again, with narration, in what nobility and armament the Turk stands, minded, this future summer to overrun the crown of Hungern violently, and to bring it under his tyrannical power; With attached report, in which way the Hungarians are completely incapacitated by the protracted war they waged against the Turk many years ago, so that they are unable to resist the Turk on their own without the power and help of other Christian believers, and therefore they have once again requested and asked for substantial and most diligent help. Since our governor and orator, as well as the princes, princes and estates, have found it necessary for our brother, King of Bohemia and Famine, to be skilful in this matter, and also for the Crown of Famine to appear with assistance, for many excellent reasons, they have judged it necessary with public counsel: So Princes, Princes and Estates have granted to the most illustrious Prince Don Ferdinand, Prince of Hispania, Archduke of Austria and Burgundy, our Governor in the Holy Roman Empire, after his love united with the crown of Hungern this summer, of a brave resistance on horseback and on foot against the Turk and compared, the two fourths of the foot soldiers of the 20,000 men, which granted us to our Rome march, and of the next year, contents of the same held imperial diet attack, The two-fourths of the 20,000 men granted to us for our march to Rome and promised to the Crown of Famine for urgent aid, reported to our governor, to the Crown of Famine for consolation, and so that they on both sides might resist the Turk all the more sturdily, have now been granted and promised anew for urgent aid, but in men and not in money.

1) Maybe: Handle?

34 And every city of the realm shall deliver the two-fourths of the money due to them, as it was announced last year, between St. James's Day and the mayors and councils of the cities of Augsburg, Frankfurt, and Nuremberg, and our governor shall issue mandates in our name for this purpose and notify each of them of his due share, according to the previous estimate, to be paid between the aforementioned times.

Because such help of the two fourths has a specified time, namely six months and no longer. So that this help is not used in vain, nor other than to resist whether the Turk wants to make a mighty move this summer, so much shall be done with our friend and cousin, the Bishop of Augsburg and Duke Wilhelm of Bavaria, that they shall, at the request of our governor, take the money deposited by the estates from the mayors and councils of the above-mentioned cities, at the request of our governor, to require, collect and receive from the mayors and councils of the above-mentioned cities where it has been deposited, to take in and appoint captains and servants, to send such people to our governor and to have them accounted for at the future assembly of the Holy Roman Empire of princes, lords and estates.

If the Turk sits still this summer and does not do anything to starve the crown, so that this urgent help of the two fourths will be unnecessary, the same money shall nevertheless remain behind the mayor and council of the above-mentioned cities until the next future meeting, when other persistent help shall be given. And if the same is found, or if this urgent help will not be needed or used in the meantime against the Turks, each town shall certainly be given its money again.

37 Further, after our governor, orator, and also princes, princes and estates have been highly praised, the

Because the Turk is so serious in extending and expanding his power into Christendom with daily, careless pressure, that a mighty, powerful, persistent army is needed to resist him bravely and fruitfully 1). And this time, at the present Imperial Diet, for manifold, mobile, valiant reasons, necessity and finally nothing of it may have been done; and especially considering that the Turks' power by sea and land is somewhat valiant and great, and that such a noble resistance cannot well be made without the help and assistance of other Christian powers, and that above all it will be necessary to first make a common peace in the Holy Empire, and especially between the Christian chiefs: Our governor, orator, and princes and estates of another common assembly of the holy realm have, on St. Martin's Day, most earnestly desired that a common peace be first made in the holy realm, and especially between the Christian heads. The same has been sent to each of the estates, and on the above-mentioned day, our governor, orator, and electors, and estates of the Holy Roman Empire have agreed with another common assembly of the estates on St. Martin's Day, most recently at Speyer, on a note of common assistance for such persistent and brave resistance and action, but on further consideration, and to bring it to the attention of each subject and kinsman. And on the above-mentioned day and time, each prince, duke and estate shall appear in its own person, or through its authorized attorney, and open its permanent opinion on the matter, so that it may finally be decided with timely counsel how such persistent action against the Turks should be taken.

Item 38: The imperial treasurer is to be ordered with seriousness to proceed against the disobedient who have not yet paid their share of the one and a half quarter of the foot soldiers who were granted and provided for urgent aid against the Turks in the past, and also against those who have not yet paid their fee for the maintenance of the regiment and the chamber court for the past two years, so that the same may be brought about by the disobedient. And what is paid out of both outstanding amounts shall first be delivered to Duke Frederick of Bavaria two thousand, and Adam, Count of Beichling, to our chamber judge one thousand gülden, of which they are promised, content of the next parting, as for worship. And that Duke Frederick of Saxony, Elector, and the Bishop of Wuerzburg, of their resignation, which was done to them during their session, also Count George of Wertheim and others, who are still indebted to them.

1) "Heerzug" put by us instead: Herzogs.

and paid, and the rest, deposited behind the mayor and council of Frankfurt, will not be moved from there without the knowledge and will of the estates, but will remain and be kept on further notice of the place 1).

Thereupon we promise and promise to keep and execute all and everything as written above and which Emperor Caroln touches us with our imperial dignities and words steadfastly, unbreakably and sincerely, to comply and live with it strictly and without refusal, and not to do, undertake, act or allow anything contrary to it, nor to allow anyone else to do it for our sake, except all danger. In witness whereof we have hereunto affixed our Imperial Seal.

39. We Electors, Princes, Prelates, Counts and Lords, as well as the envoys and rulers of the Holy Roman Empire and its free and imperial cities, hereafter called, also publicly confess with this farewell that all and every of the above-written points and articles have been made with our good knowledge, will and counsel, which we also grant in force of this letter; We do, in good faith and in good faith, promise to keep and perform as truly, steadfastly, firmly, sincerely and unbreakably as each of us may concern or be concerned with his sovereignty or friend by whom he is sent, or by whom he has been given power, and to comply with and live by them to the best of our ability, without any danger.

40 And these are the following written, we the princes, counts and lords, the free and imperial cities, embassies and rulers of the Holy Roman Empire:

By the Grace of God, we Reichard, Archbishop of Trier, of the Holy Roman Empire, through Gaul and the Kingdom of Arelat, Archchancellor and Elector. Ludwig, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria, Archchancellor and Prince of the Holy Roman Empire. Cardinal and Archbishop of Mainz, Archchancellor and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire through Germania 2c., Doctor Caspar von Westhausen, Chancellor. The Archbishop of Cologne, Elector 2c, Diether, Count of Manderscheid and Blankenheim; Hans, Lord of Schleiden and Hieronymus Enkhorn, Doctor of Laws and Canonicus of Cologne. Duke Friederich of Saxony, Churfürst 2c., Philipps von Feylitsch, Knight. Margrave Joachim, Elector 2c., Doctor Gangloff Rodwig 2c. Ecclesiastical princes, so allhie personally appeared: Albrecht, Hofmeister in Prussia, German Order, Margrave of Brandenburg, of Stettin, of Pomerania, the Cassuben and Wenden Duke, Burgrave of Nuremberg and Prince of Rügen. Weigand, Bishop of Bamberg. Conrad, Bishop of Würzburg. Bernhard, Bishop of Trent. Sebastian, Bishop of Brixen. Dietrich of Cleen, Master of the German Order in Germany and the French lands. These are the messages of the ecclesiastical princes. The Archbishop of Salzburg, the Elector of Trier. The Bishop of Worms, Doctor Simon Reibaisen, Provost. The Bishop of Eichstädt, Philipps Hildebrand, Canon. The Bishop of Speyer, Georg von Schwalbach, provost there. The Bishop of Augsburg, Wilhelm von Knöringen. The Bishop of Freisingen, Magnus von Schellenberg, Doctor, and Melchior Sottor, Licentiate of Law. Of the Bishop of Passau, Hieronymus Meyring, Doctor. Administrator of Regensburg, Georg Brenner, Doctor. The Bishop of Ratzenburg, Balthasar Schmid, Canon there. Bishop of Constance, Jacob Croll, Doctor.

Secular princes who appeared in person. Duke Wilhelm and Duke Ludwig, Palgraves on the Rhine, Dukes in Upper and Lower Bavaria. Duke Frederick, Count Palatine on the Rhine, Duke in Bavaria, and as counsel to Duke Otto Henry, and Duke Philip of Bavaria. Casimir, Margrave of Brandenburg, of Stettin, Pomerania, Duke of Cassuben and Wenden, Burgrave of Nuremberg, and Prince of Rügen. Messages of the secular princes: Duke George and Duke Henry of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, Doctor Ott von Pack. Duke Johann of Cleve, Jülich and Berg 2c., Doctor Johann von Dockheim, called Frieß, and Johann Ganwgref, Licentiate. Duke Otten and Duke Ernten of Brunswick and Lüneburg, Friedrich Burdirn, provost at Ysenhagen. Duke Ott and Duke Philipps, Count Palatine of the Rhine and Duke of Upper and Lower Bavaria, Duke Heinrich of Bavaria, Duke Johann, Count of Spannheim, Hieronymus Veysen, Doctor of Law. Duke Ludwig zu Veldenz, Doctor Hieronymus Veysen. Of the Landgrave of Hesse, Johann Teigen. Margrave Ernst and Margrave Philipp of Baden, Doctor Hieronymus Veysen. Duke Albrecht and Duke Heinrich of Mecklenburg, Balthasar Schmid, Canon of Ratzeburg. Count Wilhelm von Henneberg, Ludwig von Beimelberg zu Lembsfeld. On behalf of the prelates: the coadjutor at Fulda, Doctor Caspar Westhausen, Mainzi.scher chancellor. Gerwig, abbot of the church of Weingarten, for his own sake. And Heinrich, Abbot of Markthal, by force Sebastian of Kempten, Rudolph of Freidingen, Lendcommenthur of the Ballei in Alsace and Burgundy, German Order. Conrad of Kaisersheim, at Salmonsweilen. Johann at Elchingen. Andreas zu Ochsenhausen, Peter zu Irrsung. Johann at Rod. Jakob at Mindemau. Johann of Schussenried, all abbots of the Abbot of St. Heimeran at Regensburg. Gerwig, Abbot of Weingarten, and Georg Brenner. Of the Abbot of Weißenburg, Doctor Simon Reibsen, Provost. On account of the counts and barons: Count Bernhard of Solms, of the counts who sat in and around the Wetterau, and of whom he has command. Count Georg von Werthheim and the von Gerolzeck, of all the counts in Swabia; of Count Reinhard von Bitsch, Simon Reibsen, provost and doctor. On behalf of the free and imperial cities: Augsborg, Conrad Herbard, mayor there. Frankfurt, Haman Holzhausen. Regensburg, Goslar, Doctor Krauß. Offenburg, Gengenbach and Zell, Johann Justenhpfper, town clerk at Offenburg. Ulm, Bibrach, Gemünde and Älen, Bernhard Besserer, Mayor of Ulm. Freiburg, Lorenz Quol.

1) In the old edition: "love".

And for further evidence We Reichard, Archbishop of Trier, of the Holy Roman Empire, Archchancellor of Gaul and the Kingdom of Arelat, Ludwig, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria, of the Holy Roman Empire, Archduke, both Electors; and we Albrecht, Grand Master of the German Order, Margrave of Brandenburg, Stettin, Pommern, Duke of the Cassuben and Wenden, Burgrave of Nuremberg and Prince of Rügen, of our and all spiritual; and we Friederich, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria, on behalf of ourselves and all the secular princes, also affix our seal to this farewell letter, given in our and the Empire's city of Nuremberg, on the eighteenth day of April, after the birth of Christ, fifteen hundred and in the fourth and twentieth, of our kingdoms, of the Roman in the fifth and of all others in the ninth year.

742 The protest of the Electors and Princes of Saxony, and also of the Counts and Lords, against the Imperial Decree at Nuremberg, April 20, 1524, and its § 28.

From the Hofrath's Brother Collection of Various, Mostly Unprinted Writings, p. 26.

Protestation Herr Philipsen von Feylitzsch, exhibitum et lectum die Lunae post Misericordias Domini [April 20] Anno 1524.

1. ewren Churfl. Princely. I have asked for more than one favor and friendship before.

shows that my most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony, has left me here at the Imperial Diet on account of his and his Elector's brother. The most gracious Lord, the Elector of Saxony, on account of his brother and his Elector's Grace, has left me here at the Imperial Diet after his leave, and has given me permission and authority from His Electoral Grace and the same brother, that I am to be married to the Elector of Saxony. I am to act and decide with the Imperial Stendencies, as he then indicates and brings my authority, to which I then also willingly and obediently pledge myself. However, of other articles, which are not reported in the letter, and of the order at Wurmb, by Kays. Mt.'s own person, all princes, rulers and common sovereigns of the Holy Roman Empire, I would not nor would I want to be accepted in the same. Since my power does not extend as indicated, I will not allow it, nor will I grant it on account of my most gracious and gracious lords. Hereupon I again rely.

2. on the other hand, I will also, for the sake of my most gracious and gracious lord, in no way approve of the fact that Cays. Mjt. Highness to harm, peace and justice in the Holy Roman Empire, 2) to cause uproar and indignation, and to oppose those who decided on the recently held Imperial Diet, which I hereby publicly protest and denounce.

Where, however, something is taken and to be acted upon, which is reported in the letter with 3) which is to the praise and honor of God the All-Mighty, King of Bavaria and the Holy Roman Empire. Mjt. and the Holy Empire, and such would reach my most gracious and gracious lords, I do not doubt that your princely and princely lords will be represented herein as Christians. I have no doubt that your Lordships and Princes will herewith present themselves as Christian Princes and Princes in praise of the Almighty, in honor of the Holy Roman Emperor, and in honor of the Holy Roman Emperor. Mjt. to honor, and to the empire to use and wolfarth to know how to keep. I ask that my protestation and counter-submission be considered and forgiven, for I do not intend nor am I willing to exceed the measure of my authority, which I also protest against.

4) Thirdly, that my most gracious lord the Elector should have his deputy at the regiment in Essling at Whitsun in the near future, and if this does not happen, that my most gracious lord the Duke of Ertz, as the key city governor, should have the power to appoint and order another in his place. If this is not the case, then my most gracious lord, the Duke of Ertz, as the key city governor, should have the power to appoint and order another in his place, 5) and I do not want to grant it, because I protest.

Philips von Feylitzsch, Knight.

2) That is, disruption. In the old edition: "to disruption".

3) Maybe: nit?

4) Maybe: "who" [would be]?

5) This refers to § 17 of the previous document.

Graven and Mr. Protestation.

Most Illustrious Prince, Holy Roman Emperor, Our Lord Most Gracious, City Holder. And your Mt. Orator, Most Reverend, Most Illustrious, Most Illustrious, Most Gracious Lord and other sovereigns of the Holy Roman Empire! 1) Previous days, when E. F. Durchleuchtigkait, Churfürstlich, Fürstlich Gnaden und ander Stend des hailigen Reichs zu Underhaltung Regiments und Khamergerichts zwey Jhar, die nechsten khommend, gewilliget,

Likewise, concerning the mandates that are to be issued against Martin Luther and his doctrine, we two have acted on behalf of the counts and lords, because of which we have all here, at this Imperial Diet, let ourselves be heard beforehand loud and clear, that we, on behalf of our friends, have not submitted to it and in such a way that such a thing would not be appropriate, but too contrary, to the most recent Imperial Diet held at Nuremberg, and therefore we could not or would not consent to it,

If, however, there is good hope that our friends in their complaints will be averted and accepted, as is fair, and after the above-mentioned farewell, you will keep to it without question and in accordance with justice 2c. We note, however, that such a thing will be set forth unseen in the parting of the last Imperial Day. As we three have protested 2) we have consented; therefore, on behalf of our cousins, brothers, and friends, we have submitted ourselves to the F. F. D. and to the Imperial Orator, Elector, and Prince. We therefore, on behalf of our cousins, brothers and friends, before E. F. D. and the Imperial Council, Princes, Princes and other sovereigns, have caused ourselves to protest and testify that we do not want nor consent to this parting. 3) We hereby protest and testify publicly, now as then, and then as now, that we do not want nor consent to this in any way, nor therefore with anything in disobedience to Kays. Mt., E. F. D., nor to anyone else. With submissive pleas, we do not wish to consider this in any other way than in accordance with our great necessity, graciously and kindly, and we intend to provide ourselves with this graciously and kindly, and to deserve it. 2c.

Bernhart Graue to Solms.

Georg Graue at Werthaym.

1) In our template, there is only one comma here.

2) It seems to us that the word "protest" is too much here.

3) "gehelen" - gehellen, to give our consent.

C. How enraged the emperor was by the papists' blowing in about the parting, and by the letter of complaint and very sharp edict sent by him to the estates on this account! Letter of complaint and very sharp edict.

743 Act on the Roman Catholic religion, at a convention in Regensburg, by the governor of the empire and some Catholic estates on July 6, 1524.

From Lünig's Imperial Archives, part. general. covtin. I., x. 454 - Walch has erroneously placed this document here with the wrong information in the heading: "at the Imperial Diet in Nuremberg" instead of: at a convention in Regensburg". It actually belongs in the third section of this chapter, before No. 748.

We Ferdinandus by the Grace of God, Imperial. Majesty in the Roman Empire Stadtholder, Prince and Infant in Hispania 2c.

Mattheus, Cardinal of the Holy Roman Churches, Archbishop of Salzburg.

Wilhelm and Ludwig, brothers, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Upper and Lower Bavaria.

Bernhardt, Bishop of Trento.

Johanns, Administrator of the Regensburg Abbey, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria,

And we, the most illustrious, high-born princes and lords, Migandt, bishop of Bamberg.

Mr. Jörgen Bischoffe zu Speyer, Pfaltzgrafen 2c.

Mr. Wilhelm, Bishop of Strasburg.

Mr. Christoffen, Bishop of Augspurg.

Mr. Hugo, Bishop of Costnitz.

Mr. Christoffen, Bishop of Basel.

Herr Philips, Bischoff zu Freysing, Pfaltzgrafen.

Herr Ernst, Administrator, Pfaltzgraffe bey Rhein, Hertzog in Obern- und Niedern-Bayern.

And Mr. Sebastian, Bishop of Brichsen, herein charged with but violence, and therefore for our Principal's ratification, promised counselors, publicly confess with this letter, and announce it to all:

1. when the most powerful prince and lord, Mr. Carl, Roman Emperor 2c. our dear lord and brother, most gracious lord and cousin, also most gracious lord, at the recently held Imperial Diet at Wormbs, with councillors and of the H. Roman Empire electors, princes and estates. Roman Empire, Princes and Estates, at the request of Pope Leo X, against the seductive and heretical doctrine, which was condemned long ago by the Holy Fathers and the Christian Church, but which has now been abolished by Martin Luther.

In the year of the death of Luther, his successors, and others, an edict and mandate has been issued, on which it was also decided in the Imperial Diets held at Nuremberg in the M. D. and xxjij. and now in the xxijij. year. Year, and in the same decrees it is understood that the Kayserl. Edicts shall be obediently lived and complied with, as far as the Imperial Estates are able. Which edict we and our principal not only recognize as Christian, but also consider necessary for the suppression of all rebellion and evil, which result from the touched and condemned doctrines and which have to be taken care of daily.

Therefore, at the request of the Most Reverend Lord Lorentzen 1) Copey, of the Holy Roman Church of the title of Anastasia Cardinal, Papal Holiness Dean, who has also given his authority, will and approval in place of Papal Holiness, we have resolved and agreed that we and our Principal shall be the above-mentioned Cheys. Edict of Wormbs, and also the decrees passed and issued at the two imperial congresses at Nuremberg for this reason, in our and our gracious lords' principality's sovereignty and jurisdiction, will keep and execute them, and will act and proceed with punishment against those who violate these edicts and decrees, as follows.

3. firstly, that we and our principals praise God Almighty and the Mother of God, and all the dear saints, and also the heavenly host in honor of Papal Holiness and Imperial Majesty and the edicts, mandates, and decrees that have been issued. Majesty and the edicts, mandates and decrees issued therefrom, and for the benefit of our and our Principal's subjects and relatives, 2) the Holy Gospel and other divine Scriptures, in accordance with the common Christian principles. The Holy Gospel and other divine scriptures, according to the common Christian understanding, as the teachers accepted by the Holy Church have taught them. They also accept and keep their doctrine with good, merciful customs and conduct, confirmed by the shedding of their blood, and do not want to suffer or allow such a gospel to be preached in order to prevent laudable Christian customs and traditions, good words and deeds and true Christian brotherly love, nor have they ever interpreted it in any other way.

4. and whether anyone has committed damned heresies or blasphemies against Christ our Savior, His most blessed Mother, the Virgin Mary, and the dear saints, or otherwise, that appears to be the case

1) Laurentius Campegius, papal legate.

2) In the old edition: "Hayl, to God".

If a person may stir up, preach, or otherwise spread sedition among the common believers in Christ, and is found guilty of this by his own confession or credible knowledge and experience, he shall be punished for this, in accordance with the Imperial Edict, and according to the nature of his fault, crime, and conspiracy.

5. And so that the holy word of God may be understood and interpreted according to the right belief, without fear or excitement, but rather preached with humility, we want to and shall order in our and our gracious lords' principalities and bishoprics, so we will and shall order in our and our gracious lords' principalities and bishoprics, provinces and territories, that no one shall be admitted to preach in the church unless he has been examined by his ecclesiastical ordinaries and declared fit and sufficient for this purpose, and has to produce a credible certificate.

6 Similarly, the preachers who have preached up to now shall be examined as to their suitability, and no Winckel preacher shall be permitted.

7. Thus the Papal Legate, with the advice, consent and approval of us and the envoys in place of our principals, has adopted and decided upon an order for the abolition of abuses and the establishment of a merciful, chaste conduct and behavior in the clergy, which we want to bring into the truck, and in our and our gracious lords' principality, prebendalships, archidiaconates and capitularies, and keep it, so that such order may be lived obediently and in a good image by the clergy and priesthood, so that the unrighteous may be brought to obedience and punished according to the commandment.

8 We and our principals do not want to change anything in the holy mass and sacrament. We and our principals do not wish to have anything changed in the Holy Mass and the celebration of the Sacraments, nor in other Christian ordinances and customs, such as fasting, prayer, confession, and sacrifice, but we wish to keep it as it has been praised to us by the holy fathers and elders. Therefore we, and our gracious lords, also want to punish seriously all Läysche persons who go to the most reverend sacrament of the altar without prior prayer and absolution according to the form of the churches, or who commit or abstain from taking the same sacrament under different forms, contrary to the order of the holy churches.

(9) Because the old custom of eating meat and other verpoten food during the fast and other days, out of good and sensible Christianity, is not to be followed.

If the law of the land, which was established by the holy fathers, our forefathers, for a number of reasons, and according to the custom of every country, has been a praiseworthy custom until now, we do not want to let the offence, which arises from the transgression of the same law and custom, be tolerated in our, and our most gracious lords' lands and territories, but we want to punish the transgressors seriously.

(10) We will not suffer or tolerate the expired religious, female and male, nor the priests, dyacones and subdyacones who marry in our lands and territories, but we will punish those in our upper citadels and territories.

(11) We find that up to now the damned and seductive heretical doctrines, shame and disgraceful writings have mostly been practiced through trucking, and have not been kept everywhere, as should be the case, because of the provision of the Imperial Edict. Thus we have decreed, and we want, that from now on, in our gracious lords' lands, territories and bishoprics, no book printer shall be allowed to truck any book or painting, unless such has first been brought to us and our gracious lords, or to our and their graces' decrees, diligently examined, and allowed to be trucked. But whoever would abstain from trucking outside of such permission shall therefore be punished according to the disgrace and fortune of the Imperial Edict.

12) Luther and his followers, as well as other heretical, seductive, and mocking books, shameful and disgraceful writings and monuments, shall not be sold, given away, or practiced in any other way by anyone in our and our lords' lands, bishoprics, and territories. Edicts, and other punishments.

13. We have also agreed, with the full consent and authority of the Papal Legate, that all those who have come from our and our most gracious Lord's lands and territories, and who are currently attending school in Wittenberg, shall dispose of themselves from there or in other universities where the Lutheran doctrines are not condemned and seduced, within three months after the announcement of this settlement, dispose of themselves from there or in other universities, where the Lutheran condemned and seductive doctrines are not held, and shall not come to Wittenberg again, with loss of all their benefits, God's gifts and inheritance.

14. that neither a foreigner nor a foreigner who is still studying at Wittenberg, in all of our

We also do not want to allow them to read in our high schools. We do not want to admit them to any ecclesiastical divinity, nor to any benefice, neither to papal holiness ordinaries, nor to any patronage, nor to have any geniuses of it, but they should be despised. We also do not want to allow them to read in our high schools.

15. In order that this Christian understanding of ours may be executed and carried out more effectively, we want to appoint several commissioners in each of our countries and territories, who, together with our town councillors, regency councillors, court councillors, captains, governors, stewards, and other of our officials, will diligently take notice of and make known to us and the aforementioned town councillors, regency councillors, court councillors, captains, stewards, stewards, and other of our officials, who will then report them to us or to the aforementioned officials, who will then report them to us or to the aforementioned officials, and to report them, be they of spiritual or secular standing, to us or to the aforementioned city officials, councillors and bailiffs, who shall then accept them as venal [imprisoned] and keep them in good custody, as long as and so that we may punish the same objectors according to their fault, which we and our gracious lords also do, and do not want to spare anyone in this.

16. And so that our understanding and reason may be kept, handled, and carried out in an expedient manner, we have for ourselves, and on account of our principal, all made a friendly settlement with one another: We also hereby knowingly agree, by virtue of this letter, that we will abide by the much-publicized imperial edict issued at Wormbs at the Nuremberg Diet, and by the above-described articles, and that we will severely punish the violators, and if anyone is punished for Lutheran and heretical actions and expelled from the country, he shall not only be punished for the principality of the country or the ecclesiastical ordinariate bishopric in which he has acted criminally, but for all of us and for every principality of our country, provinces, bishoprics, upper chapters and territories. And those who, out of fear of punishment, escape and commit a fugitive offense, shall neither be admitted to our custody nor contained, but shall be accepted in punishment upon the other's [request to punish] 1). And if one or more of us, on account of the Christian intercession of ours, should be entitled to anything repugnant or disobedient, or to insurrection on the part of his subjects, then we shall be mutually helpful and righteous. However, this excludes all agreements, alliances and contracts that we may have with other princes or anyone else, faithful and honorable.

1) Added by us.

744: The imperial edict against the Nuremberg imperial decree, to the city of Burgos in Castile, to the estates of the empire.

July 15, 1524.

This edict of the Emperor concerns the mandate of King Ferdinand on the basis of the Nuremberg Imperial Treaty, which concerns Luther and is known as "the Nuremberg Edict". The same is found in No. 747. - This same writing is also addressed in the form of a letter to the Elector Frederick of Saxony with some insignificant changes, as Titulatur 2c., and a very substantial one, of which the Elector himself writes in No. 746 to Ebner and Nützel. This letter of the Emperor to the Elector is printed after the original in Förstemann's "Neues Urkundenbuch", p. 204. We have included the variants in the text, which seemed to us to be a real correction. On the address of the original is noted: "Einkommen zu Loch vltimo Septembris."

Karl von Gots gnaden Römischer Käyser zu allen Zeiten Merer des Reichs.

Dear faithful, We have, on various days, heard, acted upon, and decided upon all that has been proposed, acted upon, and decided upon at the recently held Imperial Diet in our and the Empire's city of Nuremberg, by you and the common stand of the Empire, and in particular what you, together with the other wretches of the Lutterian sects and Jrsal, have done for order and understanding, and have heard, and how much we consider it to be of the utmost importance that you 1) of the mind, of Christ's spirit, and of his being, should not do anything that would be contrary to our Christian constitution, empty of faith, and contrary to our will. We are not a little relieved, and because of this, we are also grateful to God of the Almighty, for our own glory, We are not a little relieved, and out of what we owe to God of the Almighty, His Holiness, our own glory, mandates, and decrees, we will not bear a clear grievance and displeasure, that I and the common sovereigns have let in. 2) Inasmuch as, not only the said His Holiness, but also ourselves, have been minded, and because we, at the next Imperial Diet at Wormbs, unanimously advised, knew and agreed with the princes, rulers and other sovereigns of the Holy Roman Empire, to publicly proclaim these Lutheran emptiness and insanity as heretical, evil and poisonous, with great, severe punishments and penalties, and to this end, to declare all of this to be a crime.

1) "you" put by us instead of: "also".

2) In Cyprian: "so vereingelassen". - "so ver" is - "so far", as can soon be seen from what follows.

Luther's writings and books, after they had been so rightly rejected and condemned by the bishops. The Holy Roman Emperor and the Holy Roman Empress, after they had been so rightfully and Christianly rejected and condemned, murdered, destroyed and burned, have accepted and given at the recently held Diet of Nuremberg only the Luther's "Dishonor and Shame Booklet" and also the unruly deeds and the same order, and have given it to each one as much as he is able, We have ordered to keep it as much as possible, no matter if in the previous mandates and promises we have taken and imposed something new, burdensome or impossible, and it would not be less and more important to keep the previous all praiseworthy and Christian preachings and orders, than to freely accept and keep unheard mispronunciations. We are also pleased and moved by the fact that the same common stenants have been compared with each other and are willing to establish and maintain a general or common council in the German nation, and for this reason we have requested the bishop's heyligk. We have therefore requested the bishop's sylvan legates to act on this with their holiness, as if such a thing were more incumbent on them than on our holy father the bishop, or on us as Roman emperors, their rightful lord, and had not been more prudent, if it were thought that they and the common German nation would be so excellently and greatly interested in it, that they would have welcomed us for it beforehand, so that we could obtain such a thing from the bishop's holiness. Holiness, and how we recognize what the Holiness of Bavaria, and even our own authority, means to us. Holiness, also our own authority and authority, decides from this acceptance and action, and yet, besides, consider that it may not be at all unnecessary or unfruitful, we therefore want to prove ourselves more noble in this and not refuse such concilium, but if and so far as it is with the aforementioned authority and approval of the Holiness of the Holy See. If and so far as it is accepted with the authority and consent of His Holiness, even at an occasional and appropriate time and place, it will be suitable and in such a way that we may also be there with reason and without common harm and damage, as we want to be there with the help of the Almighty, and therefore act with His Holiness, confident that He will not refuse it, as much as is felt, but that you, together with the Stenden, have in the meantime considered and resolved for yourselves, on the next day of St. Martin's Day, to hold a general and common meeting of the German nation in our and the Empire's city of Speir, and thereupon to consider and accept the way and means and order, how and in what measure and form it is to be done with the divine and that because highly learned men of the Holy Scriptures and other understanding persons put into writing everything that is not contrary to the faith, and decide the doubts and other things according to their ability, we can neither admit nor permit such things, but, as is most due to us as a protector and guardian of the Papal See, we will not allow such things to happen. We will neither admit nor permit such a thing, but, as we are most entitled to do and feel to be a protector and guardian of the papal stature, we will most strongly condemn it, so that we may provoke the wrath and displeasure of God's almighty, also papal holiness. Holiness's wrath and displeasure, then what great injury, dishonor and dishonor to the holy divine and Christ's church might be inflicted. Churches could be inflicted, as if Christ's divine right and obedience were so violated and diminished, and that the German nation alone, which has been considered the most divine for this reason, which has also obediently kept the Christian Churches' law and statutes for a long time, would accept such a thing and be subjected to it, which, however, all the other princes of Christ, including the pope, would have to accept. The same is true of the pope, who has obediently kept the rules and statutes of the Christian church for so long, that all other princes of Christ, including the pope, could not begin nor accept to reject and abolish the divine and common Christian order, law, statutes and preaching, which have been kept for so long and for so long in the whole of Christendom, to the trust of all Christian souls and people, unquestioned and unchallenged. From this no one has departed whom the righteous divine judgment and court has not severely punished for this. However, the inhuman and unchristian lout thinks that he alone can escape this, and with his unholy evil [evil] 1) deeds, he tries to poison as much as possible, and to ruin both soul and body, and to make himself great and respectable in the eyes of men through his deceitful deception, which many others have failed to do, and most of all, the villainous and great leader of Mahomet, who alone has done more harm and damage to common Christendom with his sect and evil, than all other nations and peoples in the whole world could not have done, which errors, falsehoods and misrepresentations, so ingrown in the hearts of men under the guise of truth, are not easy to eradicate; God Almighty wants to annul and prevent such practices and thoughts in the German nation, which we love with but grace, so that we do not see such evil in the time of our government, and because we recognize and find such evil and common practices and actions to be unjust, where we would not see and perceive them in time, which would cause great

[illegible]

745. Ebner's and Nützel's letter to Chursachsen from Nuremberg, in which they send to the Elector a letter from the hand of a good friend of

2) Here the Emperor's letter to the Elector continues thus: "auch bei der peen in vnsern kayserlichen Mandat und Edict begriffen", with omission of the intervening.

3) Instead of what follows in this sentence, the letter to the Elector reads: "Daran thut Dein lieb vnser ernstliche mainung." - At the end of the letter it says:

CAROLUS

V. waltkirch. Ad Mandatum Caesaroao ac
Cath.oe M.tis propriuw Brantner.

1) with Förstemann: "suessem".

Send the copy of this imperial Castilian mandate received from Esslingen, and also enclose other news. September 23, 1524.

From Cyprian's Documents, vol. II, p. 300.

Most Illustrious, Highborn Prince and Lord, our submissive willing service synt Ewern Churfürstlichen Genaden mit Bleis voran bereit, Gnedigster Herr. Your Elector. We have received your letter, which is now addressed to us, in respect, we are grateful to your Electoral Grace. We are grateful to your Lordship. And the next day, a copy of a key legal mandate was brought to us by a good friend from Esslingen, of which we hereby send your Lordships a guarded copy. To what advantage or disadvantage such things may be in the Holy Roman Empire, the end was indicated. We wish to send this to your churl. Gl. as a noble, understanding Elector. We also send to Your Electorate a list of all the documents we have received. Gl. a list of what has recently been done in Vienna. Thus, the Bishop of Bamberg, as we have informed Your Electorate. Gl. the provosts of the parish churches there, as well as the prior of the Augustinian monastery, on account of the termination of some ceremonies that had been performed. The same provosts have been examined in court, one in the absence of the other, and have been asked to give a uniform answer as to what should be held against each of them. The bishop is also asked if he can prove from the Holy Scriptures that they have done the right thing by making such a statement, and they will gladly accept and carry it out. But outside of the protested, that they might let or recognize his Genad in this matter for a key judge, then as much as the divine word instructs them. Then the matter is too sacred for any human being to judge from human inventions, and several writings have arisen against each other because of it. But in the end, neither the Bishop nor his Fiscal has shown me any reason from the Holy Scriptures to revoke your name. Neither do they want to hear your reasons and motions, so that they would have been something stately, but go solely to the facts. In the meantime, the termination is known and against the old custom, it is necessary to act further. The provosts have appealed against this. We did not want to deny this to E. Churfl. Gl. not to refrain from doing so. Furthermore, most gracious saint, have vnnser Herr vnd Freund, ein Erberer Rath, auf Ewer Churfl. Gl.'s most recent letter, concerning the sum of E. Churfl. Gl. concerning the Turkish draft, to which he replied that Ewern Churfl. Gl. shall be notified. When the same sum of money is to be returned to the Leipzig court. Accordingly, our lord and friend Moritzen Bücher, citizen of Leipzig, have agreed, and for this reason have also submitted a quid pro quo. To this our Churfl. Gl. will pay the same sum and receive the receipts. With this we do to our Lord Privy Councillors. Gl., whom we are willing to serve only, in obedience. Date on the third and twentieth day of September, anno 1524.

Jheronimus Ebner vnd Caspar Nuzel zu Nurnberg.

746 The Elector's answer to Ebner and Nütze, in which the Elector reports that in the copy sent by the Imperial Regiment some very alarming and threatening words of Imperial Majesty were omitted, which are nevertheless in the copy sent by them, whereby he also answers the other overwritten messages. October 3, 1524.

From Cyprian's Documents, vol. II, p. 311.

Our greetings to you, dear friends, dear friends. We have read all the contents of your letter, and have received the copy of the Kay. Mandate, which was brought to you by a good friend from Esling, and give you your gracious opinion that the same mandate came to us four days ago [Sept. 30] from a regimental messenger from Esling, only that the words, "in avoiding Criminis lese Majestatis, our and the kingdom's attention, also in privirung und entsetzung aller gnaden, freyhaiten" 2c. 1) not to stand in the way, and because in such Kay. Mandate, among others, it is stated that Kay. May. has heard the parting and all the other things that have been brought up, acted upon and decided upon at the last Imperial Diet held at Nuremberg, and yet Kay. May. to the same no answer fell, allain what dy Handlung mit D. Lutter anlangen thut, kann wir nit ermassen aus welchen Ursachen solchs verbliben.

1) In Document No. 744 towards the end.

We have also graciously accepted the verzeichnüs, what has recently been traded at Wyen, and in what way the priest of the parish churches, as well as the prior of the Augustinian monastery, are responsible to you against our friend from Bamberg, for whom they have been cited, for the alteration and other ceremonies. Concerning the sum of our money for the Turkish train, we have determined that Moritz Bücher zu Leiptzk, whom you 1) have told us, if God wills, such money, according to our previous request, should be handed over to him in this march at his request, which we, in your gracious opinion, do not want to do, but we are graciously obliged to you. We also have no doubt that you will know how to keep this letter of ours secret. Date Lochaw on the third day of Octobris anno Le. XXIII.

747 "Two imperial discordant and repugnant commandments concerning Luther," with Luther's bor- and nachrede. After April 1524.

This manuscript contains the Worms Edict against Luther of May 8, 1521, and the Nuremberg Edict of April 18, 1524; the former with Luther's marginal glosses. It appeared in several individual editions under the title: "Zwey Keyserliche vneinige vnd wydderwertige gepott den Luther betreffend. Im 1524. Jar." At the end: "Im Jar 1524." 5 quarto sheets. In the collective editions: in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 190; in the Jena (1585), vol. II, p. 398b; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 762; in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 303 (without Luther's Nachrede); in the Erlanger, first ed. vol. 24, p. 210 and in the second ed. vol. 24, p. 220. In Latin Uebersetzung in the Wittenberger (1551), tom. II, fol. 410. About the twofold printing of the Worms Edict in all German editions, except the Erlangen edition, see what was said in No. 585. Since the original printing offered in the Erlangen edition is often inaccurate and incomplete, we have often followed the Wittenberg and Jena editions, especially in their first redaction, as Walch has already done.

I, Martin Luther, wish all dear Christians in German lands grace and peace in Christ Jesus, our Lord and Savior.

I have had these two imperial commandments printed out of great compassion for us poor Germans, whether God, out of His mild mercy, wanted to move some princes and others so that they would grasp and feel (for there must be no seeing, no sowing, and no pestilence).

and donkeys could well see) how blind and obdurate they act. It is shameful that emperors and princes deal publicly with lies; but it is more shameful that they all at once let out repugnant commandments; as you see here that it is commanded that one should act with me according to the eight that went out at Worms, and earnestly carry out the same commandment, and yet at the same time also accept the repudiation that one should first act at the future imperial diet at Speyer as to what is good and evil in my teaching. I am condemned at the same time and saved for the future judgment; and the Germans shall hold me as a condemned man and persecute me at the same time, and yet wait how I am to be condemned. They must be drunken and mad princes to me!

We Germans must remain Germans and the Pabst's donkeys and martyrs; even if we are pounded in the mortar (as Solomon says [Prov. 27:22]) like porridge, foolishness will not leave us alone. No complaining, teaching, pleading or begging helps, not even our own daily experience of how we have been maltreated and devoured. Now, my dear princes and lords, you are almost hastening to death with me poor few people, and when that is done, you will have won. But if you had ears to hear, I would tell you something strange. How if Luther's life were so valid before God that, where he did not live, none of you would be sure of his life or dominion, and that his death would be the misfortune of all of you? It is not [to] jest with GOD. Only continue fresh, choke and burn. I will not depart, whether God wills. Here I am! And I ask you kindly, when you have killed me, not to wake me up again and kill me once more. God has not given me (as I see) to deal with reasonable people, but German beasts shall kill me (am I worthy), just as if wolves or swine tore me apart.

(3) But I advise anyone who believes that there is a God to refrain from this commandment. For although God has given me the grace not to fear death as I did before, and will also help me to die willingly and gladly, let me not be afraid of it.

1) "her" put by us instead of: "he", which has probably been read from "ir".

they will not do it sooner, my hour is here, and my God calls me, no matter how much they rage and rage. For he who has now brought me to the third year against their will, and kept me alive beyond all my hope, may well keep me longer, though I do not greatly desire it. And if they kill me now, let them do such a killing that neither they nor their children shall overcome. I would rather have warned them of this, and I truly do not begrudge them it. But it does not help, God has blinded and hardened them.

4 But I ask you all, my dear princes and lords, both gracious and ungracious (I do not begrudge you any evil, God knows that; so you cannot harm me, I am sure of that), I ask you (I say) for God's sake, you want to have God before your eyes, and attack the matter differently. Truly, truly, there is a calamity, and God's wrath is coming, which you will not escape if you continue like this. What do you want, dear sirs? God is too wise for you, he has soon made you fools; he is also too mighty, he has soon destroyed you; be a little afraid of his wisdom, lest perhaps, out of disgrace, it has put your thoughts into your heart in such a way that you should be burned; as he is always in the habit of doing with great lords, and has this very glorious thing sung and said of him in all the world, Ps. 33:10: "God puts an end to the plots of princes"; and Ex. 9:16. to King Pharaoh: "I have raised you up for this purpose, that I may show my power in you, and that my name may be proclaimed in all the earth." A piece of his rhyme is called: Deposuit potsvt68 de sede [Luc. 1, 52.]. This also applies to you, dear sirs, now that you see it.

I.

We Carl the Fifth, by the Grace of God, elected Roman Emperor, at all times Major of the Empire 2c., in Germania, Hispania, both Sicilies, Jerusalem, Famine, Dalmatia, Croatia 2c. King; Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy 2c., Count of Habsburg, Flanders and Tyrol 2c., Dismissing all and any Electors, Princes, ecclesiastical and secular Prelates, Grasen, Freeman, Lords, Knights, Servants, Captains, Landvögten, Vitzthumen, Vögten, Pflegern, Verwesern, Landrichter, Schultheißen, Schöpfen, BÜRGER

We would like to express our grace and all our good to the mayors, judges, councillors, citizens and municipalities, as well as to the rectors and regents of all common universities, and to all other subjects and loyal persons of ours and of the empire, as well as of our hereditary principalities and lands, regardless of their dignity, status or nature, to whom this imperial letter or a trustworthy copy (made by an ecclesiastical prelate or a notary public) of ours is presented or shown.

2. reverend and honorable, highborn, honorable and noble, dear friends, nephews, grandparents, princes, devotees and faithful! Since it is the duty of our Roman imperial office,^a) not only to expand the territory of the Holy Roman Empire, which our ancestors of the German nation, for the sake of the Holy Roman and common church protection, have brought to themselves by divine grace with their heavy bloodshed, in the extermination and suppression of the infidels, ^b) but also, according to the rule which the Holy Roman Church has hitherto kept, to take care that no taint of heresy or suspicion, in the Roman Empire, contaminates our holy faith, or, if some of these have now begun, to eradicate them with all the diligence, good means and modesty that are to be undertaken in such matters:

a) Where is this written? In the smoke hole.

b) The clergy should do this with the word as the apostles did.

(3) Therefore we consider, where it is ever due to one of our ancestors, that the burden of it is laid upon us much higher and more, since the Almighty God's immeasurable kindness, for the protection and increase of His holy faith, has provided and endowed us with many kingdoms and lands and more power than many years ago any of our ancestors ever had in the kingdom.

4. because we are also of paternal lineage from the most Christian emperors and archdukes of Austria and dukes of Burgundy, and then of maternal lineage from the most Christian Hispanic, Sicilian and Jerusalem kings, whose clear deeds, practiced by them for the Christian faith, will never depart.

Therefore, where we have allowed some heresies, which arose within three years in the German nation, and were formerly condemned by the holy councils and the Pope's statutes, with the consent of the common church, and are now drawn anew from hell, to take deeper root, and to be imposed and tolerated out of our neglect:

our conscience would be noticeably weighed down, and the eternal glory of our name in the blissful entrance of our government would be surrounded by a dark mist.

6. Since it is undoubtedly not known to all of you how far the errors and heresies deviate from the Christian way, so one, called Martin Luther, of the Augustinian order, in the Christian religion and order, especially in the noble German nation, as an incessant destroyer of all unbelief and heresy, in such a way, where it is not conducive to it, that the whole German nation [and] later, through such entrenchment, [all other nations] would come into an inhuman separation and] into a miserable apostasy of good morals, peace, and Christian faith. 1)

7 For this reason, our holy father, Pope Leo the Tenth, the highest bishop of the holy Roman and common Christian Church, who is especially responsible for the care and supervision of matters pertaining to the Christian faith, was moved to initially warn and admonish Luther fatherly and mildly to refrain from such evil beginnings and to revoke the widespread riots.

When he failed to do so, and the longer he did so, the more evil he became, his Holiness undertook to implement appropriate and not unusual means and ways, and on several occasions required and appointed cardinals, bishops and other prelates, as well as priors and generals of the regular orders, ministers, and many other excellent, honest people, experienced in all honor, art and knowledge, as well as many other Christian doctors and masters.

9) And the same Martin Luther cites, +) and when he disobediently remained out, [are] all his writings, which went out in Latin and German, and will still go out, as harmful and quite repugnant to the faith and unity of the church, condemned, and out of papal power, with the council and will of the said Cardinals,

2) Bishops, prelates, doctors and masters, to be burned and completely destroyed everywhere.

c) That is, with vacation! not so.

(10) And the same Luther, unless within a certain time, after the opening of His Holiness' decree, he proves that he has repented of his error, also that he has changed and revoked, as a son of disobedience and wickedness, and to be shunned as a divider and heretic of males.

11. And according to the statutes of the rights, with the penalties contained in the papal bull, which his Holiness has sent to us, as the true and supreme protector of the Christian faith,^d) and of the Holy Papal See and of the Roman and common Christian Church, through his and the same See's orator and embassy, which his Holiness has therefore specially ordered to us, with request and demand, according to our duties and from the authority and justice of our imperial office, to inform His Holiness in this matter of our assistance with the secular sword for the salvation of the Christian faith, and to command and enjoin everywhere in the Holy Roman Empire, also as befits a Christian king and prince, in our hereditary kingdoms and principalities and lands, and especially in the German nation, to keep everything and anything contained in His Holiness' bull unconfidel and to execute and carry it out.

d) "Protector." O of the wretched faith that has such a supreme protector! What is God doing in the meantime?

12. And although we have proclaimed such exhortation, after overruling the papal bull, and finally the condemnation of Luther in many places in the German nation, also in our Lower Burgundian lands, and especially in Cologne, Trier, Mainz and Liège, we have commanded it to be executed and carried out: Martin Luther has not only not recognized, 3) corrected, nor revoked his insanity, nor sought absolution from papal holiness, and again grace in the holy Christian church,^e) but of his wrong mind and spirit much evil fruit and effect, like a raging man in an obvious suppression of the holy church.

1) Without the brackets we have the reading of the German Wittenberg and the Jena edition, with which also the Latin translation agrees. Walch has completed the original (here without doubt incomplete) of this writing from the original of the Wormser Edict (Wittenberger Ausg. Bd. IX, Bl. 119) as we give it. The first Erlangen edition has retained Walch's text; the second offers, according to the original: "and later, through such rootlessness and wretched apostasy of good manners, of peace 2c. would come".

2) In Latin: xsnsations spisoovoruva ste. - "Masters" according to the Latin are the heretics.

3) "erkenet" is missing in the original of our writing, but is in the Worms Edict.

The first of these is a book that has been published daily in Latin and German, made by himself or at least under his name, and which is full not only of new heresies but also of blasphemies that were previously condemned by the holy churches.

e) Luther does not desire to be in the church because the pope is a head.

Therein he, held by the holy church for so many years, destroyed, reversed and violated the seven sacraments in number, order and use^f), and disgracefully defiled the indestructible laws of holy matrimony in wonderful ways. He also says that holy matrimony is a fictitious thing. He also wants to draw the use and enjoyment of the unspeakable holy sacrament to the condemned^g) Bohemia habit and use, and initially entangles the confession, which is most useful to hearts that are stained or burdened with sins, in such a way that no foundation nor fruit can be taken from it.

f) It is not long custom that applies here, but what God says; to this you dear sirs shall respond.

g) Damn those who live according to Christ's appointment. - This gloss is only in an original edition.

14) Lastly, he urges^h) to write so much about confession (where this is permitted) that not only would there be no one who would not dare to say from such his absurd writings that confession is unfruitful, but there would also be few who would not preach that it is not necessary to confess.

h) My books show this differently.

15 He not only holds the priestly office and order in the least, but also dares to move the secular, lay persons to wash their hands in the blood of the priests,ⁱ) and calls the supreme priest of our Christian faith, St. Peter's successor and Christ's true vicar on earth, with slanderous and shameful words, and persecutes him with manifold unheard-of enemy writings and abuses.

i) There be GOD for!

16 He also confirms from the pagan poets[^]) poem that there is no free will, the opinion that all things are in a certain statute; and writes that the measuring attitude never comes to anyone's good but to the one who accomplishes it:

For this purpose, he reverses the practice of fasting and prayer that has been established by the Holy Church and kept until now. ^l)

k) Poets are called here: John, Paul, Peter.

l) O Lord God, how blind are the people!

17) In particular, he also despises the holy fathers' authorities, which are accepted by the church, and completely removes obedience and government, and casually writes nothing else at all,^m) which is not enough and does not serve for rebellion, division, war, deaths, robbery, fire, and the entire apostasy of the Christian faith. For, as he teaches 2) a free, self-willed life, which is excluded from all laws, and completely animalistic; so he is a free, self-willed man, who condemns and suppresses all laws; as he then has had no horror or shyness to publicly burn the decrees and spiritual laws. ⁿ) And if he did not fear the secular sword more than the pope's ban and penance, he would have done much evil to the 3) secular laws. ^o)

m) Contrarium est verum [The opposite is true], n) They well deserved it.

o) Read the booklet of the secular authorities.

18. He is not ashamed to speak publicly now against the holy councils, and to belittle and violate those according to his will, from which he especially touches the council of Constance everywhere with his stained mouth, and calls it, to the shame and diminishment of the whole Christian church and German nation, a synagogue of the devil, and because those who have been in it, and have ordered Johann Hussen to be burned for his heretical act, namely our ancestor Emperor Sigmund, also the princes and common assembly of the Holy Roman Empire, final Christians and the devil's apostles, death-rowers and Pharisees,^p) and says that all that is condemned in the same Concilio because of Hussen's insanity is Christian and Protestant, and renounces 4) to accept and prove it. But he will by no means accept the articles that the same council has adopted and decided. 5) And has fallen into such nonsense with his mind that he glories in being the

2) Erlanger: lernet.

3) Erlanger: dem.

4) "verzicht", in Latin proutetur - he makes himself anheischig. - In Walch's old edition: "veracht" according to the Wittenberg, Vol. IX, p. 121.

5) This sentence, which is missing in the original of our writing and in the Latin translation, is in the Worms Edict.

If Hus had been a heretic once, he was a heretic ten times over.

p) O that I had lied about it, or could still lie!

19. And so that all other of Luther's innumerable wickednesses, for the sake of brevity, remain untold: this some one, not a man, but as the evil enemy in the form of a man with assumed monk's robe, has gathered many a heretic's most condemned 1) heresies, which remained hidden for a long time, into a stinking puddle, and even devised some of new ones, in pretense, that he preaches the faith, which he imagines manly with such high diligence, so that he destroys the true, righteous faith, and under the name and appearance of the evangelical doctrine reverses and presses down all evangelical peace and love, also of all good things order, and the very noblest Christian form.

20. We have taken all this to heart, and in virtue of our imperial office and dignity,^{q)} so that we are provided by God, and out of special love and affection, which we, like our forefathers, have and bear for the protection, preservation and administration of the Christian faith, and also for the honor of the Roman bishop and the Holy See: that especially about the above-mentioned papal holiness admonition and request, without our noticeable reproach and the whole of Christendom's disgrace and damage, it is not due to us to be negligent in such a great and frightening action, as we should not do, nor has it been our will and mind, but rather we want to follow in the footsteps of our forefathers, the Roman emperors, and follow their highly praised deeds, which they accomplished for the protection of the Christian church,^{r)} and adhere to the praiseworthy constitutions, which were made for the punishment and extermination of heretics.

q) God grant that it may prosper.

r) Christ says: He who does not follow me wanders in darkness.

21) And especially for the sake of this matter, our and the Holy Roman Empire's princes, princes, and estates have now summoned us here in Worms several times, and with great diligence, as the noticeable necessity requires, have excellently considered this matter, and with unanimous counsel and will have united and resolved us to this following opinion, in the form of: "Although such a condemned and in his obdurate perversion

1) In all German editions except Walch: "damned", but the Latin confirms our reading.

s) (2) that many books are printed and written in Luther's name which are not supposed to have been written or originated from him, and also that some think that Luther should be heard beforehand and before we proceed further against him, that we should demand that he come to us and that he should be given a free escort.

s) Ex. 23:2: "Do not deviate from the right of the multitude."

22. Thereupon we also summoned him to our court, and by one of our heralds with written escort let him come here to us, and in our and all the above-mentioned our and the realm's princes, princes and estates, personal presence let him 3) ask: Whether he has made the books which were laid before him at that time, and also other books which are carried over in his name; and whether he wants to revise the things which are contained in such books, contrary to the holy councils, decrees, customs and habits, which have been kept by our forefathers up to this day, and to come again to the peace and unity of the holy church.

23) And this was held up to him with such opinions and admonitions,^{t)} which would soften and move the most obdurate man, and harder than a stone; and as soon as he heard the same books, he confessed and affirmed them to be his books, 4) and then protested that he would never deny them, and said in addition that he had made many other books, which we have not indicated here, because we have no knowledge of them,^{u)} . But concerning the revocation, he has at one time requested it; and although it would have been justly refused to him, yet against the innovation and error in faith, action is to be taken without any delay, and he has clearly understood from our previous mandate and our letter sent to him, both of which have certainly been delivered to him, for what cause he is required to come to us, and for that reason he should not have come before us and the estates without a ready answer.

t) They meant well, because they had already condemned Luther before he arrived at Worms.

u) Protect us from the prudence, condemnation, of which one bears no knowledge.

2) Erlanger: "to negate"; in Latin: eontsnckant.

3) "him" is missing in the Erlanger.

4) In the old editions: "provided", that is, affirmed.

24. Nevertheless, out of charity and kindness, we granted him one day; And after the appearance of the same day he appeared again before us and the kingdom, and with diligent exhortation, as before, was requested to go into himself, with our promise, if he revoked that which was condemned and evil in his books, that he should again come into our holy father Pabst's favor and grace, and we also want his holiness to have two good men from every Christian nation, of good life and high doctrine, diligently survey his books and do the evil from them, and what would be good, the papal holiness should approve.

25) But over all this he did not want to do such a revocation, 1) nor did he want to accept our gracious offer, but rejected it completely, and with such unseemly words and gestures, which are by no means appropriate for a sensible and regulated clergyman^{v)}, he publicly said that he did not want to change a word in his books. And thus, in our and the estates' presence, he mocked, condemned, reviled, and completely despised the holy councils, and before that, he restored peace and unity to Constance, which has given eternal honor to the German nation^{w)}, so that he would be overcome with disputations, which he requested out of our good will, regardless of the fact that he has good knowledge 2) that they are forbidden in divine and human rights.

v) But befitting a God - clergyman. - This gloss is only in one original edition.

w) If the Germans have no other honor, they may well remain silent.

26. And although we had undertaken to take further measures in response to such an impolite answer, which had not been heard without some slight aggravation of our and the estates' minds, and also of the common people's anger, for mobile reasons, we had had him leave again and go home, inasmuch as we had our opinion, written with our own hand, opened the following day: we have been moved by the above-mentioned electors, princes 3) and estates' high request, since we have given him three more days 4) to convert; and in the meantime two electors, also two ecclesiastical and two secular princes, and then two of ours and the

1) Erlanger: than.

2) Erlanger: conscience. Latin: nou iZnorans.

3) "Princes" is missing in the Erlanger.

4) Erlanger: after three days.

The authorities of the Holy Roman Empire have been ordered to summon Luther before them by order and on account of the general assembly of the Empire, and with good warning, admonition and instruction, and all that is possible and expedient to convert him, to refrain from doing anything, and to indicate, if he does not convert, to what severe punishment he will fall in our country and in the Holy Roman Empire, even according to the order of the law.

27. And when such diligence and earnestness had been unfruitful with him, our Elector took two kind and skilful doctors to him, and together with them, also alone in particular, not only with 5) high exhortation, but 6) also with apparent indication of many things of his, Luther's insanity 7) to persuade him to consider more our [Holy] Father Pabst's, as well as our and all imperial states, and also other Christian believing nations' use, which they have brought according to the order of the Christian church for so many years, than his common sense; with the proviso that if he deviates from his unanimity and turns back, he will find and recognize that this is done from a laudable example of many holy fathers, and for the preservation of his soul, honor and body.

28) To this, when we are credibly reported, Martin Luther is said to have answered: that he not only considers all the persons now reported, but also 8) [a] common concilium (whether or not there would be one) suspicious and distrustful; and that he does not want to change the fewest syllables from his writings, as he had also done before in our and the empire's estates, unless he is overcome by a learned man, but according to his rule,^{x)} and not from the concilium, nor from imperial or ecclesiastical laws, nor even from some fathers' authorities, however holy they are, but only from the words of the holy Scriptures, which he supposes to be understood according to his sense, to satiate his random mind 9); about which it is clear and evident that from the same authorities, which are for the fulfillment of that which is not reported or expressed in either testament, the holy Christian church has hitherto been governed.

x) How mockingly they call the Holy Scripture Luther's Rule!

5) Erlanger: in.

6) "but" is missing in the Erlanger.

7) Wittenbergers and Jenaers: that many are Luther's errors.

8) "also" is missing in the Erlanger.

9) Latin: Lā SUUIL arditrium.

29. Because 1) the matter has now become so muddled,^y) and Martin Luther thus remains completely obdurate and perverse in his openly heretical opinions, and is thereby regarded and held by all those who have the fear of God and reason,^z) nonsensical, or that he is possessed with the evil spirit: According to our will, on the twenty-fifth day of April, next to the moon, we let him depart from our presence by the hour, and again assigned a herald to him; so that he, to be reckoned from the same twenty-fifth day of April, shall have our free safe conduct for twenty days, the next following, and that the same our conduct, after the appearance of such twenty days, shall be over, and shall not tolerate him longer, and at last to proceed to suitable remedies against this heavy poisonous addiction; as follows:

y) Which is still unproven.

z) If they had reason, they would act more reasonably in this.

30. First, for the praise of the Almighty, and the protection of the Christian faith, and also of the Roman bishop and see of due honor, in virtue of the office of our imperial dignity, majesty 2) and authority, and also with the unanimous counsel and will of our and the Holy Empire's princes, princes and estates, now assembled here: we have, in perpetual remembrance of this act, for the execution of the decree, sentence, and condemnation, according to the bull which our holy father Pope, as the ordinary judge of these matters, has issued, recognized and declared the said Martin Luther, as a member set apart from God's church^a), and an obdurate disruptor and open heretic, to be respected and held in special esteem by us and you all and everyone.

a) God's church here is called the end Christian.

31. And do so knowingly, by virtue of this letter, and thereupon command all of you, and each in particular, by the duties that you owe to us and to the holy realm, also avoidance of the penalties of Criminis laesae Majestatis, and of our and the realm's respect and disrespect, and, in addition, the privation and release of all regatta, fiefs, graces and liberties, which you have hitherto had from our ancestors, from us and from the Holy Roman Empire in some way, from the Roman imperial power, earnestly with this letter, and wish that you all and especially, after the appearance of the

1) Erlanger and Wittenberger: "If"; Wormser Edict: Weil. Latin: Huanuoyuictoril.

2) "Highness" is missing in the Erlanger.

The above twenty days, ending on the fourteenth day of this present month of May, do not house, court, feed, 3) or abstain from the aforementioned Martin Luther, nor show him any help, support, assistance, or encouragement, either by word or deed, secretly or publicly, but, where you then arrive and enter him, and may be able to do so, accept him in custody, and send him to us in good custody, or order him to do so, or at least (if he is brought to us) announce and notify us of this immediately, and in the meantime keep him in custody until you have been informed by us what further action you should take against him in accordance with the law, and you will receive a fair amount of satisfaction for such a sacred work,^b) including your efforts and costs.

b) Behold, the murderers called people strangle a holy work!

32. but against his kinsmen, followers, retainers, advisers, patrons and successors, and their movable and immovable goods, you shall, by virtue of the holy constitution, and our and the kingdom's attention and disregard, act in this way, namely, to cast them down and see them, and take their goods into your hands, and turn them to your own use and keep them, without male hindrance. Unless they show by credible appearance that they have left this way and obtained papal absolution.

33. Furthermore, we also command all, and yours in particular, by the prescribed penalties, that you not condemn any of the above-mentioned Martin Luther's writings, by our holy father Pope, as stated above, and all other writings, which have been made or will be made by him in Latin and German, or in any other language, 4) as evil, suspicious and suspect, and emanating from a manifestly obstinate heretic, buy, sell, read, keep, copy, print or have copied, nor fall into his opinion, which also does not hold, preach, nor protect, nor that in some other way, as man's sense can consider it, subordinate, regardless of whether in it something good is introduced to deceive the simple man with it.

34. For as the very best food, mixed with a little drop of poison, is shunned by all men, so much more should such writings and books, in which so much of the souls are poisoned, be shunned.

3) Erlanger: esset. - To "höfet" the old editions have the marginal gloss: "herberget".

4) "or be made to go away" is missing in the Erlanger, also in the Latin.

and condemnation are not only to be avoided by all of us, but also to be removed and eradicated from the memory of all men, so that they may not harm or kill anyone eternally, since everything else that is well written in his books, which have been accepted and approved by the holy Christian Churches, has been repeatedly referred to, and may be read and acted upon without all concern and suspicion of any harm.

35. To this end, you are to order, punish and order all and everyone, regardless of their dignity, status or nature, and especially those who have and use authority and judicial power, to avoid penalties throughout the Holy Roman Empire, including our hereditary principalities and lands, order and command that all and any of Luther's poisoned writings and books, as those that serve to cause a great uprising, harm, disruption and heresies in God's Church, be burned with fire and completely destroyed, annihilated and annihilated in these and other ways.

Likewise, you shall assist the Papal Holiness' embassies, or their appointed commissioners, in such matters at their request with all diligence and fidelity, and nevertheless, in their absence, do and act all and everything thus to be done, to be executed, and to be accomplished, by our command and order. In addition, we earnestly enjoin all other subjects and faithful of the kingdom, including our hereditary principedoms and lands, with this letter, that you be helpful, obedient and willing in the above-mentioned estates and authorities, like ourselves, in such matters, avoiding the above-mentioned penalties, punishments and fines.

37) And since it is necessary to prevent and prevent Luther's books or extracts 2) or evil excerpts from them, which are in other names than the poet's name is not reported, from going out, nor many other books, which, as we report with discomfort to our minds, have been made and printed in Germany, and are full of evil teachings and examples, from now on will no longer be written or printed. So that the believers in Christ do not fall into greater insanity of faith, life and good morals from reading them, and anger, envy and hatred in God's church spring from them, as has been the case up to now.

1) "in such" is missing in the Erlanger.

2) "or Extract" is missing in the Erlanger and in the Latin.

The more time goes by, the more we have to worry about rebellion, division and disobedience in kingdoms, principalities and countries.

38. Accordingly, to eradicate such harmful, pernicious addiction, we again command, with the advice and will of our and the empire's princes, lords and estates, with foreseen heavy fines, penalties and punishments, you the same our and the empire's and our hereditary principedoms and lands' subjects, all and yours, as Roman Emperor and hereditary Lord, that henceforth no one of you may read such defiling and poisoned books, nor any other notes or copies, as those which give birth to insanities to our holy faith, and to that, which the holy Christian church has hitherto held, as well as writings of enmity and dishonor against our holy father the pope, prelates, princes, high schools and the same faculties, and other honorable persons, and what they contain, which are contrary to good morals and the holy Roman church, and the Holy Roman Church, not to write, print, paint, sell, buy, nor to keep secretly or publicly, nor to print, copy, or paint, nor to permit, impose, or procure this in any other way, however conceived.

39 Likewise, we seriously command, at the indicated penalties, all those who are ordered and appointed to the judiciary, that they accept, tear up and burn with public fire, for our sake, all now reported writings, books, notes and paintings, which have been made up to now, and will be written, printed and painted in the future, wherever they may be found, throughout the entire Holy Roman Empire and our hereditary lands, in virtue of this commandment of ours. Also the poets, writers, printers and painters, as well as sellers and buyers of such shameful writings, books, notes and paintings, who, after the proclamation of our present imperial commandment, persist in it, or for that reason are subject to it, where it is evident, body, Goods and righteousnesses, where you may get them, accept, see, and keep, and therewith act according to your liking, you shall have good reason and right, and therewith against no one have done, nor anyone therefore, neither inside nor outside of law, not be liable to answer.

(40) So that all this and other causes of future insanity may be cut off, and the poison of those who write and make such writings may not spread, and the highly famous art of printing may be used and practiced only in good and praiseworthy things, we have continued, out of imperial and royal authority and right knowledge, also with the unanimous advice of our and the Holy Roman Empire's princes, rulers and estates, with our and the Empire's attention and disregard, and other pre-touched pleas commanded, also such knowingly in force of this our edict, which we hereby acknowledge to be an unbreakable 1) law, that henceforth no printer or anyone else, whoever or wherever he may be, in the Holy Roman Empire, also in our hereditary kingdoms, principalities and lands, shall publish any books or other writings in which anything is understood that touches the Christian faith little or much,

41. first prints, reprints, without the knowledge and will of the Ordinary of the same place, or his substitutes and deputies, with the approval of the Faculty of the Holy Scriptures, of one of the nearest universities. But other books, in whichever faculty, and understanding what they will, shall by no means be printed, sold, nor subjected to printing or selling, procured, nor permitted in any way, with the knowledge and will of the Ordinary, and outside of the same. 2)

42. If, however, anyone of any dignity, rank or nature, contrary to our Christian and imperial opinion, decree, statute, law, ordination and commandment, which are also to be wholly and indestructibly observed, in one or more of the prescribed articles concerning the subject matter of Luther or printing, in any way that man's mind may conceive, shall act and do so unlawfully, [that] 3) we shall destroy and render void such: Against the same we want that with the prescribed, also the tones in the rights, and according to form and shape of the ban and imperial attention and disregard acted, proceeded and continued. Only men are to be guided by this.

43) And that all this may be accomplished and believed, we have sealed this letter with our imperial seal, which is given in our city of Worms, and in the city of the Holy Roman Empire, on the eighth day of the month of May, after the birth of Christ, fifteen hundred years, and in the one and twentieth year, of our kingdoms, and of the Roman Empire in the second, and of all the other kingdoms in the sixth year. Ad mandatum Domini Imperatoris proprium.

1) Erlanger: unbreakable.

2) Instead of the following, the Wittenberg edition, vol. IX, p. 122 d only says: "etc."

3) Added by Walch.

II. 4)

1. we Carl the Fifth, by God's grace chosen Roman Emperor, at all times Major of the Empire 2c., in Germania, in Hispania, both Sicily, Jerusalem, Famine, Dalmatia, Croatia 2c. King; Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy 2c., Grase of Habsburg, Flanders and Tyrol 2c.. Offer our grace and all good to our and the empire's dear faithful, Günthern, Ernsten, Hoyern, Gebharden and Albrechten, Counts and Lords of Mansfeld, and Lords of Heldrunen.

2 Dearly beloved, dear faithful! When the illustrious Prince Don Ferdinand, Infante of Hispania 2c., Archduke of Austria 2c., our friendly dear brother and governor in the Holy Roman Empire, out of a noticeable and great need for some grave and important articles concerning that same Empire and the Christian faith, which were not finally decided at the next Imperial Diet, but were taken into further consideration by the estates of the Empire, he has called for another Imperial Diet on St. Martin's Day, next to be held, here at Nuremberg in our name. in his own person, and we through the noble our council and supreme secretary, Johann Haunart, Burgrave of Lumbeck, Knight of St. Jacob's Order. Jacob's Order, whom we have appointed with instruction and full authority, and also princes, princes, prelates, counts and estates of the Holy Roman Empire, obediently appeared in their own person, and with their message having full authority, acted with brave, timely counsel on the needy matters and concerns of the realm, and finally resolved much of the same:

3. besides other two articles, and not the least, as namely the Lutheran and other new doctrine and preaching, and on the other hand the frightening, serious action of the enemy of Christ, the Turk, against common Christianity, have been put forward: on this, after much deliberation, nothing has finally been acted upon, but for the sake of these two points and articles, after considering all their necessary circumstances, the following opinion has been decided, and namely on the first one:

4) In this mandate, to which Förstemann in his "neue Urkundenbuche", p. 190, gave the title: "Mandat, von dem Erzherzog Ferdinand im Namen des Kaisers Karl V. an die Fürsten und Stände des Reichs erlassen" (Mandate, issued by the Archduke Ferdinand in the name of the Emperor Charles V. to the Princes and Estates of the Empire), of which he had the original copy issued to the Elector Frederick of Saxony, we have used the corrections given by him to Walch's text. Luther used the copy that was addressed to the Counts of Mansfeld.

4. After the Lutheran and other doctrines and preaching have almost and highly gained the upper hand, leading the believers in Christ into a sorrowful and troublesome doubtful opinion of our holy Christian faith, in such a way that, if not taken care of with timely counsel, there is nothing but noticeable annoyance of the common people, nothing else than noticeable annoyance of the common people, to wresting of God's love and fear, extinction of good, honorable, Christian discipline and custom, and noticeable disobedience and rebellion against their authority, to severe damnation of their souls and ruin of body and goods, would arise;

5. Therefore, and so that such a serious case may be dealt with salutary and with well-considered, timely, courageous advice, the good may not be suppressed next to the evil, the Christian believing subjects may be brought into a steady opinion of a unanimous faith: Our governors and orators, as well as the electors, princes, prelates, counts and estates, have deemed it useful and necessary that a free common council be established by papal sanctity, with our approval, for the most beneficial purpose, be advertised and proclaimed at the appropriate place of the German nation, to act thereon on the above-mentioned and other matters of common Christianity, and accordingly all legates have now been sent to this Imperial Diet with His Holiness, who has acted most diligently to bring such to His Holiness and to promote it most faithfully.

6. And so that every Christian man may know how he should keep to the Concilii in the meantime, our governor and orator, as well as princes, prelates, counts and estates of a common imperial diet and assembly at Speyer, have united, as reported hereafter, united to advise and act on such of necessity, so that also at the future Concilio the new doctrine may be advised the more conducive, more stately and more tolerable, what is good, accepted, and what is evil, shunned.

7. That every prince, sovereign and estate, and especially those who have high schools in their dominions, should now order some learned, honorable and understanding persons to take such Luther and other new teachings, sermons and books in hand, to examine them with the utmost diligence, to debate them, to make an extract, to separate the good from the evil; likewise the complaint of the German nation by the secular princes and estates against the See of Rome at the next Imperial Diet held here, and for the secular

The Council of the Holy Roman Catholic Church is to inspect and assess the complaints against the clergy with all due diligence, and then to decide at its own discretion how these complaints are to be judged and brought to an end, to us or, in our absence, to our governor, and to the princes and estates, and also princes, princes and estates, so as to advance at the subsequent Imperial Diet and Assembly, the more peacefully to proceed in trade to the future General Council, as mentioned above, and also that the necessity in such may be considered and decided upon by all.

8. Therefore, we hereby order you to take before you, in the manner indicated, and in the most beneficial way, some learned, honorable and reasonable persons, such action of the new doctrine, also the complaints against the See of Rome and the clergy, who, as mentioned above, are ordered to inspect, examine, discuss and deliberate, to make extracts and advice with all due diligence, and to hand them over at the above-mentioned time.

9. And because our Imperial Instruction, with which we dispatched our aforementioned Imperial Commissarius and Orator to the Imperial Diet in question, 1) contains, among other things, that we provide that the estates of the Holy Empire, as guardians and protectors of the holy Christian faith, should have obediently lived, complied with, and administered our mandate issued at Worms with the approval of the Electors, Princes, and Estates; and that this will not happen, we of the common Christianity of the German nation will not bear a small burden, and for this reason our request and demand will be made once again that every prince, prelate, count and estate for itself, as well as for its subjects, will be obedient to the mandate issued at Worms; and, at our request, our and the Holy Roman Empire's electors, princes, prelates, counts and common estates, as obedient members of the Holy Empire, have united and resolved to live obediently to our mandate (as they acknowledge themselves guilty of doing), as much as possible, and to comply with it.

10. that every authority at the printing houses and elsewhere should have the necessary insight, so that disgraceful writing and

1) In the German editions: "und unter". Walch has deleted the "and", as has the Latin translation.

The governor and the regiment are also under serious orders from us to give advice and assistance to the applicants, to hold them to it, and to execute our mandate with all due diligence, all with the contents of the above-mentioned farewell.

11. Accordingly, and so that such a decision and union may be carried out all the more: We herewith earnestly command you by imperial power, and want you to obediently live, comply and keep in accordance with the above-mentioned mandate issued by us at Worms, also to live and comply with it with your subjects with all diligence, and also to take necessary care with the printers and otherwise, so that disgraceful writings and paintings will be completely stopped and not spread any further. We sincerely believe that this is the case.

12) Secondly, after the papal legate, also of our dear brother, the king of Hungary and Bohemia, 2c., message to our governor, orator, electors, princes and estates, with a lamentable mood, how the Turk, in his tyrannical manner, also insatiable, raging desire, which he practices and carries for the extermination of Christendom, has armed himself with a mighty military campaign, and is in the mood to overrun, besiege and bring the Crown of Hungary under his power this summer; and how the Hungarians, as people of the faith of Christ, have long benefited the German nation and Christianity by shedding their blood and by suffering loss of body and property, and how they are now in such a state of decline of the people and their food that they cannot continue to hold out without other help, and how they have been exhorted to the utmost and implored and begged not to abandon them with comforting and noble help.

13. Since it is now obvious how great, noticeable and damaging a loss of people and land Christianity has suffered from the Turks up to now, he has also, with his cruelty and power, recently seized and conquered Stuhlweissenburg, and many other cities, castles, markets and towns in Hungary and elsewhere, as well as the city and island of Rhodes, which had not been the least fortification and comfort for Christianity: Our governors and orators, together with princes, princes and estates, have thought of the high, great, unavoidable necessity of his being.

The Turkish authorities are to be resisted in time and in the most favorable way.

14) And since this is not possible to do without the help and assistance of other Christian authorities, and since it is not possible for a group of common Christian believers to do this properly, they have united with each other in a number of a common group, which we are sending to you herewith, but which they will bring behind them and consider further, and have therefore decided to hold a common imperial diet and assembly of all the members and estates of the Holy Roman Empire on St. Martin's Day 1) in the near future in our and the Holy Roman Empire's city of Speyer; which day we hereby proclaim to you by the Roman imperial power. We hereby proclaim this day to you, by the Roman imperial power seriously commanding, also commanding by the duties, so that you are related to us and the empire, that you appear on the above-mentioned St. Martin's Day in Speyer in your own person.

15 Or, if you should not appear in your own person for matrimonial reasons, then one or more of your excellent councillors, with complete authority to finally act and decide, will certainly be ordered and sent away at the above-mentioned time, and will not be delayed any longer. For we want that the next Monday after that such a day and Imperial Council shall be started without further delay, together with other states, which we, by virtue of the aforementioned farewell, have described in the same way on the aforementioned day, to deliberate in the above-mentioned articles, concerning the new doctrine and persistent help against the Turk. Also to open your minds to the common system, to resist the Turk, on account of your and your subjects, to finally decide on it and to carry it out, and if you do not remain outside, nor refuse or forgive anyone else, so that the matters may be acted upon all the more favorably for the welfare of common Christendom, and may be decided without delay.

1) Here and again in this paragraph Förstemann brings the alleged correction: "St. Michelstag. This is certainly based on an error of the writer. For both the Imperial Decree (No. 741, § 37) and the Imperial Edict against it (No. 744) name "St. Martin's Day" as the day of the assembly at Speyer.

2) Walch changed this "auf" into "auch", and the second Erlangen edition is of the opinion that "auch" should be read. But the Latin translation gives a good sense for the unanimous reading of all printings: nso proptsr tsrxivsroatiollsva alioruru vsrürs äudltstis ant äiLerLlis.

16 You do this, together with the fact that you owe this to the empire in the cause of your relationship, also our sincere opinion. Given in our and the Empire's city of Nuremberg, on the eighteenth day of the month of April after the birth of Christ in the fifteen hundred and twenty-fourth year, of our Empire, of the Roman Empire in the fifth, and of all others in the ninth year 2c.

Martinus Luther.

In the end, I ask all dear Christians to help God for such wretched, blinded princes, with whom God has undoubtedly plagued us in great wrath, so that we do not follow to go against the Turks or to give, since the Turk is ten times wiser and more pious than our princes are. What shall such fools succeed in doing against the Turk, who so highly tempt and blaspheme God? For here you see how the poor, mortal maggot, the emperor, who is not sure of his life for a moment, brazenly boasts that he is the true supreme protector of the Christian faith.

The Scripture says that the Christian faith is a rock too strong for the devil, death and all power, Matth. 16, 18.

And such strength shall be protected by a child of death, whom even a bruise or a leaf can put to bed. Help God, how nonsensical is the bet! So the king of England also boasts of being a protector of the Christian church and of the faith, yes, the Ungern boast of being God's protector, and sing in the Litania: Ut nos defensores tuos exaudire digneris: You wanted to hear us, your protectors. If there were a king or a prince who would be Christ's protector, and then another who would be the protector of the Holy Spirit, I think that the Holy Trinity and Christ and the faith would not be badly protected.

I lament this from the bottom of my heart to all pious Christians, that they have mercy with me on such mad, foolish, nonsensical, raving, insane fools. If one would rather be dead ten times than hear such blasphemy and disgrace of divine majesty; yes, it is the deserved reward that they persecute the word of God, therefore they shall be punished with such horrible blindness, and start. May God deliver us from them and give us other rulers by grace, amen.

Section Three of Chapter Nine.

The first of these was the Regensburg Private Convention of Papal Princes, Bishops, and Estates, which took place soon after these two imperial congresses, and the constitution drawn up there.

748 The papal nuncio in Germany, Cardinal Laurentius Campegius, as well as King Ferdinand of Rome and most of the Catholic ecclesiastical and secular princes of the Roman Empire, issued a constitution concerning the reformation of the abuses committed by the clergy in Germany. Regensburg, July 7, 1524.

This document is found in Latin in Goldast's constitut. imperial. tom. III, p. 487 and twice in Lünig's spieiiKA. eeewsiast., Theil I, x. 395 and x. 768.

Translated from the Latin by Joh. Frirck.

Laurentius, by divine mercy of the title sanctae Anatasiae of the Holy Roman Church.

Cardinal-Presbyter, to all Germany and the kingdoms of Hungary, Bohemia and Poland, as well as to other places where we may arrive, our Lord the Pope's and the Apostolic See's legate, for the constant remembrance of the cause.

By virtue of the office of legate conferred upon us by the Apostolic See, we are bound to consider carefully how we may improve the condition among the clergy, as far as our legation extends, in such a way that we undertake a necessary reformation in matters in which they have departed from the ordinances of the Holy Fathers, and that we may be concerned about such reformation with all seriousness. Recently, our most holy lord, Pope Clement VII, considering both his pastoral office and the affection which he has for the praiseworthy German nation

The heretics' perceived fickleness and their godlessness, which is increasing day by day, prompted him to send us to all of Germany as his and the apostolic see's legate a latere, for no other reason than that he might care for the peace of the country and the salvation of souls, which are in the greatest danger because of the aforementioned recent outbreak of all heresies, and that he might promote this. Although we are not equal to this important office, we have nevertheless dared to obey his command and have taken it on trusting in the grace of our Savior, whose cause it is, whereby we do not attribute anything to our own strength and do not wish more than that we do complete justice to this office. And because we noticed some months ago how many things had fallen into disrepair and how much difficulty was involved in their restoration, we consulted with the most illustrious Lord Ferdinand, Infante of Spain, Archduke in Austria, Roman Imperial Governor, and came to the unanimous conclusion to set up a special meeting in the city of Regensburg.

The aforementioned most illustrious prince and archduke attended this event along with us.

The Most Reverend Matthew, of the Holy Roman Church of the title sancti Angeli Cardinal-Presbyter, Archbishop of Salzburg.

And the Highborn Lords William and Ludwig, Palgraves of the Rhine, Dukes of Upper and Lower Bavaria, brothers in the flesh.

The venerable Fathers in Christ, Bernhard, Bishop of Trent.

John, Administrator of the Church at Regensburg, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke in Bavaria.

And all the authorized nuncios or oratores of the venerable in Christ fathers and most illustrious princes:

Wigands, Bishop of Bamberg.

George, Bishop of Speyer, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria.

Wilhelm, Bishop of Strasbourg. Christoph, Bishop of Augsburg.

Hugh, Bishop of Constance. Christopher, Bishop of Basel.

Philip, Bishop of Freisingen, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria.

Ernst, Administrator of the Church at Passau and Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Upper and Lower Bavaria, and Sebastian, Bishop of Bressanone.

With whom, when we talked about one thing and another, and especially about how and in what way the aforementioned German nation, which is in danger, should be helped: they unanimously held that this fundamentally pernicious heresy, which so seemingly caught the eyes of the simple-minded rabble because of the freedom falsely assured to them under the pretext of evangelical love, had been brought about without a doubt, partly by the evil conduct and dissolute life of the clergy, partly by the abuse of the holy statutes and ecclesiastical ordinances, which could no longer be restrained, and it would therefore contribute greatly to the eradication of the Lutheran heresy and its adherents if the clergy were instructed to lead an honorable life and to conduct themselves in such a manner as St. Paul requires and prescribes, and if the abuses, which cause great offense to the laity, were abolished. We have therefore found it necessary, after careful consideration and Christian advice from the above-mentioned Lords, Prince Ferdinands, Cardinals, Dukes and Bishops and their nuncios named below, to prescribe, draw up, order and issue some salutary articles for the necessary reformation of the clergy. Accordingly, by virtue of our apostolic power, which we exercise in this matter, we wish to enforce the statutes and ordinances made by us, as intended, from all and any archbishops, bishops, abbots, provosts, deans, archdeacons and other persons holding ecclesiastical offices, as well as from the heads of the parochial churches and other ecclesiastical benefactors, We hereby decree that the above-mentioned laws, as well as those of the parochial churches and other ecclesiastical benefactors, head priests, monastery preachers and clergymen throughout Germany, insofar as they are or can be affected by them, shall be observed inviolably in the future, and we recognize it as invalid wherever anyone, by whatever power, should knowingly or unknowingly do or attempt to do anything against them. And we hereby command, notwithstanding, all and every archbishop, bishop, and other persons standing in ecclesiastical offices, as well as the bishops in the capitals and other cathedral canons, and the archbishops' and bishops' officials and vicari generals, that they themselves and each of them, if it is sought by them, who are concerned about it or will be concerned about it in the future, to have such statutes and ordinances and each one of them kept inviolably, and to punish the criminals by church censures and other legal means, also, if it would be necessary, to appeal to the secular authorities for help,

Notwithstanding the Constitution of Pope Boniface the Eighth of blessed memory, according to which it is forbidden that anyone be summoned outside his city and diocese, except in certain cases, and in such excepted cases over a single district court (dietam) from the boundaries of his diocese, or that the judges appointed by the apostolic see, or by its prestige and authority, outside the city and diocese in which they are appointed judges, or others, take the liberty of acting against anyone, or of entrusting their office to others; and notwithstanding that in the General Council of two regional courts mention is made, and that persons are not required to appear before the court in excess of a certain number, also notwithstanding other apostolic and repugnant statutes and ordinances. But because it would be difficult to send the present original to all places where it will be necessary, we want and decide that the copy of this letter signed by a Notario publico and provided with the seal of a person standing in the ecclesiastical office shall be considered as credible as the originals themselves, which may either be handed over or only presented. And in order that such laws and ordinances may be made known to everyone, we command all ordinaries in the places, according to the aforesaid apostolic authority, in virtue of holy obedience, that if they publicize or cause to be publicized these articles and ordinances either themselves or through one or more others in their churches or cities, they shall, after such publication, stop those who are or will be concerned about them, just as much as if they had been or would have been made known to them personally.

But the content of the first thought articles and regulations is as follows:

I. Since the soul lives chiefly by the word that goes through the mouth of God, but this may not be preached now and then, nor by anyone, according to the apostle's admonition: "How shall they preach if they are not sent? We order and decree that no one shall be allowed to teach the gospel, even if he publicly professes the religion and is still so skilled in it, unless he has been put to the test and found good in doctrine and life by an ordinarius or his vicar, to be certified by an open letter, which is issued freely, without the notary taking any trouble. Therefore, those who are sent and found good, who teach the Gospel rightly, wisely, and purely, will not be able to read the mysterious and obscure passages, so difficult to understand, not according to a new and fancied explanation, but as they were understood by the holy fathers and teachers accepted by the church, especially Cyprian, Chrysostom, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine and Gregory, also take good care that they do not present dreams and old wives' tales instead of the truth, for the certain the uncertain, for things which the whole church has accepted, uncanonical doctrine which has long since been eradicated and banished from the orthodox church, and to exercise all modesty in their recitation, lest they fall to blasphemy and invective and dishonor the holy place to the displeasure of the congregation. For this reason, the Ordinary shall appoint some learned and skillful people to examine in the diocese who have the skill to preach the Gospel, and who do not turn to the Lutheran side, so that means may be found so that the people may be properly instructed in the Christian law, and who may turn away from it, The divine service should be kept pure, and should be performed in the manner and with the customs described by the holy fathers and observed by our forefathers in the sacrifice of the altar, masses for souls, horis canonicis, and other acts of worship and ceremonies.

II. Therefore we remind and admonish all and every ordained priest that they lead such a life as their state requires and Christ wants them to have when he says: "Let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works and praise your Father in heaven; that they may also go about in respectable dress, as elsewhere Paul prescribed. Wherefore every prelate is to see carefully that the clergy whom he has under him do not wear all sorts of colored, as dashed and hemmed, but long garments, which go down to the heels, do not wear armor as when traveling, do not let the beard and hair grow, have a shorn plate, and take care that they do not give offense to the laity by indecent dress, as has been warned against in the holy Canonibus.

III. Moreover, they shall avoid the inns, except when they have to go to them on journeys, and there, as well as at home and elsewhere, they shall beware of gluttony, drunkenness, all forbidden games, blasphemy, brawling and all other offences and aversions, and shall not be found in "comedy" or at plays and public dinners, lest because of silence and horniness get their office a stain.

2303

IV. And because, according to the apostolic dictum, no man of war should become involved in food trafficking, no one, contrary to the provincial and synodal laws, may open an inn or tavern to the laity, because drunkenness often gives rise to quarrels, murder and manslaughter, and other vices that are detrimental to the dignity of the clergy. Moreover, they shall refrain from all trade and commerce.

V. However, the duly appointed clergy and their vicari shall not encumber the laity in the means and other parochial rights, beyond what is due to them by right, and shall not require them to take it away to keep the weekly, monthly or annual celebrations, nor shall they demand anything else from them except the sacrifices that are customarily made on high feasts, because these are to be made at everyone's discretion.

VI. Also, no one can and should tract with the people for the burial, for the administration of the sacraments and other spiritual acts, or demand something from someone who does not give willingly, nor should he, if a parishioner has given nothing, deny him any sacrament, or refuse to bury someone in the churchyard for the sake of fees. However, the foregoing does not in any way abolish the parochial jurisprudence, which, once introduced, belongs to the person who performs the office.

VII. Since there is no uniform custom in the dioceses, and many disputes arise between the laity and the clergy, in that some clergy demand more than they should, while the laity oppose it because of lack and poverty: We order that each Ordinary, within six months after the publication of this letter, when he has well considered and sufficiently investigated the aforementioned, make a certain law and decree with the advice of the princes and secular rulers who are concerned with these things, so that widows, orphans and other poor people are not unfairly overcharged on their property. Which, if it has not yet been done, when we or our successor come into the country, we assure that, after having obtained the matter, we will do so ourselves, or let the matter reach his papal holiness, who will then appoint judges to take care of this matter.

VIII. The gasteries of the clergy, which until now have been used at funerals and fraterni

If, however, either custom or the remoteness of the place requires that a meal be held, it should take place in the house of the clergyman, and be arranged respectably, not for excess, but for the greatest need, since eating and drinking is not suitable for clergymen, partly so that the words do not reach them: To whom the belly is their god; and also because their office entails offering gifts and sacrifices to the Lord in sobriety and chastity for the sins of God.

IX. Further, and lest it be thought that their desire for gain is stronger than their desire for the salvation of souls, when they sometimes absolve laymen who confess gross crimes, to no small damage to their honor and office: We order and decree that henceforth any confessor may absolve penitent confessing laymen of all secret sins, however grave and heinous they may be, even of those which the Ordinary have reserved to their power, with the sole exception of death-witnesses, heretics, and excommunicates, who are to be referred to the bishop or his vicarium. Which ordinance, as far as the clergy are concerned, is not to be regarded as new, but for the remission and forgiveness of sins, which we call absolution, they are not to extort anything from him who gives nothing willingly.

X. We also command, according to the Apostle's saying, "Lay hands on no one soon;" that one should not impudently, carelessly entrust the pastoral care to one, but should first have such a one, who has given public samples of his religion, examined by the bishop or his officials. Nor shall anyone take the liberty of ordering and setting up a vicarage of his church and parish, and of making a profit under the appearance of absence, without the authority of the bishop or his vicarii. For as one should not bind up the mouth of an ox that threshes, so we hold that such benefits of appointment and absence are to be moderated according to the will of the bishop or the official.

XI. No less shall the owners put their inherited 1) collegiate houses and estates, which are dilapidated, in good repair, as much as necessity requires, and if this is done, preserve them in their structural essence; but if they are in the wind, they shall be destroyed by the archidiaconos and deans in the country and others to whom it is due by right and custom, with the collection of their revenues, by virtue of our authority, be compelled to do so.

1) "erheiratheten" here will be as much as given by the laity, according to § 17 of the gravarniva. See above Col. 2156.

XII. Next to this we want to have expressly prevented, so that the care of the churches and founders is not entrusted to those who have professed themselves to an order, it may be which one wants it, or who have been excluded; If, however, some have been accepted or readmitted, they must, unless it is known that it is by favor and grace of their superior, and that they are staying away from their monasteries for well-founded reasons, put up with it, if we issue an order to the Ordarios or Vicarios, to direct such fugitives to their superiors by depriving them of the means of life or other means of rights.

XIII. The prelates in monasteries, who have jurisdiction over a single church, shall not in the future reappoint the first-mentioned vicarios perpetuos, who were to be dismissed after the order had been issued, in the same churches, unless they had previously been recognized by the ordinarii or their vicarii as competent and skilled; Those churches, however, which are united with the monasteries and are so close to them that the friars, if they were to perform the office in them, could at the same time be under obedience in the monastery, may be provided with such friars, if they are fit and skilful. We also allow this to small and poor monasteries that cannot provide sufficient maintenance, and we want such religious and other excluded persons who are in ecclesiastical foundations to be subject to the Ordinary in every place.

And since it is far better to have few righteous and learned servants in the Church of God than many unlearned and unskilled ones, which is to be considered especially in our time, then no others should be initiated into the spiritual state than those who are pious and learned before others, and who have also passed a test of this in the examination.

XV. As for the ordinands in a city or in a foreign diocese, we decree that they shall show their ordination letter or appointment, and likewise shall not be admitted to perform the divine service until the bishop or his vicarius or official duly accepts them.

XVI. Above this, because no one is more deserving of being perfectly pure and holy than those who carry the vessels of the Lord and work at the sanctuary, such ministers the Lord Himself has appointed.

that they perform the sacred acts daily and be found in them, so we want and command them, according to the canonical ordinances, which have been laudably instituted by the holy fathers, to live chastely and moderately; But the clergy, who keep cohabitants and lead a disorderly life, are to be restored to order by the imposition of the penalties assigned to them in the canons, whereby the established habit, harmful tolerance and negligence of the prelates are not to be of any benefit to them, or serve to defend them.

XVII. Of the promoters of indulgences, who are commonly called stationers, we resolve that no one, whoever he may be, shall press for a letter, either to preach, or to collect a contribution and alms, however much indulgence he may boast of having, unless he has presented letters of admission and permission from the Ordinarii or Vicarii; the ordinaries themselves, that they admit only those who have the testimony of an irreproachable life, and can give an account of their sermons if required, do not abuse the alms and gifts of pious souls for their own benefit, and affirm on oath that they have neither a part of the authority, nor the whole authority, to make collections for a certain sum of money. However, we leave the liberties granted to the mendicants by the apostolic see unimpaired and unchallenged.

XVIII. And that the shepherd may know the voice of the sheep, and that the sheep may hear the voice of the shepherd, and that all occasion for dissipation may be cut off, we order that foreign and unknown clergy be not admitted to the sacrifice of the Mass, nor tolerated in the company of the clergy for more than a month, unless they have written permission from one of the archbishops or bishops, to whose diocese they go, as well as a written testimony from their ordinarius, from whose diocese they came directly, and who has the best knowledge of their order and honesty, so that one who does not want to mend his ways after his committed errors does not sneak into another and foreign diocese with impunity.

In order that the alms of the Christian faithful may be used for the final purpose for which they were given, the administrators or their stewards in any church shall not be at liberty to distribute any of the funds received for the building, or to use them for any other purpose.

The building authorities shall not use the buildings and other things for their own benefit without the knowledge of the superintendent, but shall place them in the building chamber for safekeeping, as has been done so far, and shall keep two or three keys according to each place's use, one of which is to be handed over to the superintendent; incidentally, however, in handing over the keys and filing the accounts, the custom hitherto established by the princes and superiors shall be maintained and observed.

XX. Thus we also decree that the bishops vicarii shall not demand anything in pontifical functions at the feast of the church and altar, as it is written in the holy canons, except what belongs to them by virtue of their office. For it is reasonable that the bishops, according to the circumstances of their position, see to it that they keep the table money determined by the apostolic see, and that they do not raise anything new that could be a disgrace to their dignity and a burden to them.

XXI. Not without reason, but rather for just causes, we have also considered it good to limit the excessive number of feast days, and make the decree that Sunday, which has been kept highly solemnly by us from the old church on for the glorification of the resurrection of Christ, as no less the commemorative days of the birth of Christ/ of St. Stephen, of St. John and the innocent children, of the circumcision, of the apparition, Easter only for three days, the Ascension, Georgii, Pentecost likewise not more than three days, Corpus Christi, four Marian days, the Purification, Annunciation, Ascension and Nativity, the birthday of the Apostles, St. John the Baptist, St. Magdalene, St. Laurence, the Church Consecration, St. Michael, all the saints, St. Martin, St. Nicolai and St. Catherine, and in the diocese of Salzburg, St. Rupert, as they have been kept until now, will also be solemnly celebrated in the future; On the other feasts, however, they may be instituted or introduced as they wish, also on those for which the people are united, we allow and leave everyone free to go back to his work, from which he must support himself and his family, after having heard the mass; on the feasts of the consecration of the church, the church patrons and principals, however, we do not want to change anything as far as their celebration in the cathedral church city and place, where there is an episcopal residence, is concerned.

XXII. Since also among the shepherds and the herds much quarreling and annoyance have arisen over the wedding, which some call enthronement, others solennization, so

We declare and decree that marriages may be solemnized before the congregation without obtaining the consent of the Ordinary or giving him anything, except during the whole of Lent, the last week of Advent, Easter, Pentecost, and Christmas, together with their octaves, and on days of prayer.

XXIII. The fast days ordered by the church should be determined in the future under the obedience owed to the holy catholic church, and the punishment of banishment should not be considered, so that the weak consciences do not take offense, because at these times almost all godliness lies low, and the clergy is given little hearing.

XXIV In order to restore the defunct worship service and to prevent the common people from becoming more sleepy and negligent in it from day to day, we want only the person to be banned for a death committed against the clergy, but not the place, unless the murder was committed in the congregation and with a large crowd of the congregation.

XXV. Prohibit enclosed that if an ordinary clergyman dies without a will, the bishops may or shall appropriate their inherited property or property acquired by their own diligence.

XXVI. And since, on account of new heresies which have long since been condemned, the number of derogatory monks and priests is becoming astonishingly great every day, and the great majority of them take wives, we give authority to all secular princes and estates and their officials to take such derogators and church thieves by the head, so that such robberies of the church do not go unpunished; but in such a way that they first refer the culprits to the ordinaries and hand them over to them for due chastisement, without imposing any punishment on them; To whom also the serious command is given that they punish the vicious without delay and without all mercy neglectfully, not as has hitherto been done, according to the sacred orders, in such a way that, where the heinousness of the crime requires it, the bishop, according to the contents of the Capituli primi de haereticis in sexto, may either deliver the guilty to temporal rule, or condemn him to eternal imprisonment. If, however, it should come to the attention of the apostolic see that the Ordinarii have been negligent in this regard, ecclesiastical judges shall be appointed by the same, who, if they are informed of the negligence of the Ordinarii, shall, at the request of the princes and other authorities, punish the guilty, especially those who have been convicted of heresy.

XXVII Because some bishops, as we have learned, demand tithes from the monastery funds and vacancies, but this is highly unjust, and it is better to abolish abuses that have crept in than to allow innovations to break down: so from now on it shall be forbidden to collect and pay such tithes, and we hereby completely abolish such abuses, no matter how they may be introduced, and also want others to consider them abolished.

XXVIII. Likewise, we disapprove and reject as something inconsistent that the bishops want to take half of the intestates of benefactors, of which hardly a single one can maintain himself sufficiently and for his need, as there are those which do not yield more than thirty-two Rhenish gold florins, of which the Roman court itself does not demand half; which we also want to have observed by the Ordinarii, unless the opposite is prevented in the Concordatis, or they do not receive something in an honest and lawful way, without penal burdening others.

XXIX In order that the friendship and harmony among the provincials of the whole province may be more and more strengthened, we reintroduce the old custom of holding meetings, and decree that a provincial assembly shall be held every three years after Easter.

XXX. Since, according to the sacred statutes, charity is given for the sake of service or work, and since it is almost impossible that there should not be found among the great number of canonists (praebendatorum) some who, unaware of their office, do not keep the horas canonicas: We want, set and order that the Ordinarii, through the Archidiaconos and Decanos, be carefully instructed by such negligent clergymen, and after each one's neglect and laziness, use the benefits enjoyed either for the benefit of the church, or of the poor. If, after due remembrance and first instruction, a person should again fall into such negligence and laziness, which would be a sign of a fundamentally evil disposition, he shall be deprived of the ecclesiastical endowment altogether, and the collatori or patrons shall be permitted to look around for another capable person or to present him.

XXXI. Still further we place that one shall keep steadfastly above the ordinance of the fathers, according to which burial in the churchyard is denied to anyone who has not confessed and received the Lord's Supper at paschal time; and where

If it happens that someone dies suddenly without prior confession, we do not want to deny him the aforementioned burial in that case, if his clergyman knows or is assured that he has confessed and communicated according to the first-mentioned regulation, nor is there any other obstacle in the canons in the way.

XXXII. To prevent the dreadful blasphemy of the name of God and of the saints, which should not be held in low esteem, we decree and command that every clergyman or priest who has openly blasphemed and reviled God, and thus with detestable words impugned God and our Lord Christ, or blasphemed his mother, the most blessed Virgin Mary, and other saints, should be regarded with the deprivation of his income or endowment, or with other punishments, according to the nature of his blasphemy and crime.

As for the shameful vice of simony, we do not depart from the decrees of the ancients, but want them to be followed and the punishments set forth therein to be executed.

XXXIV. Against the clergy, who by lot tell fortunes, interpret signs, practice sorcery, on whom both in holy scripture and in the Decretis patrum a curse is laid, we decree and order that, according to the opinion of the superiors, a stain of shame be attached to them; if they will not desist on remonstrance, they shall be expelled from office, confined for a time in a monastery, according to the opinion of the superiors, and deprived of all ecclesiastical benefactors and functions; but the other false Christians who entertain erroneous opinions in matters of faith, and are either heretics, or are attached to the Jewish side, shall be excluded from the sacred assembly of the church without respect of person. They are to be excluded from the holy assembly of Christians without regard to their person, and a thorough investigation is to be carried out against them by the ordinaries or their vicars, or by the inquisitors of heretical wickedness, or by the judges appointed by the apostolic see or by us, so that they may be deservedly punished if they do not repent.

Both the clergy and the laity should be forbidden to speak insolently of the holy faith, especially at feasts and banquets; especially the clergy should exercise all modesty and spend their time properly in reading the Old and New Testaments, so that they are not tempted by idleness to all kinds of vices and pleasures.

XXXVI We order and wish that each bishop take care that the vicarii, who may hereafter be perpetual or at will, are not subjected to any other form of supervision.

The prelates and other ecclesiastics are to be careful not to get too much of the necessities and necessities of life, so that they do not have the opportunity to burden the subjects for lack of food; they are also to remind the prelates and other ecclesiastics, in view of the apostolic command and the practice of the early church, not to forget the poor, and to behave so that one may precede the other in helping them.

XXXVII. There are also, besides those now narrated, many other things distinguished and suggested by the Popes, Sacred Councils, Provincial and Synodal Constitutions, which adorn the conduct of the clergy and prevent the offense of which Christ has warned from time to time; which things we wish to keep and observe as sacred, with the further injunction that the transgressors, according to the aforesaid Canonibus and Constitutions, shall be regarded with severe punishment.

XXXVIII. And for this reason we forbid all and every Vicariis and Officials, as well as all Archidiaconis and Diaconis in the country, along with others, whose office entails reporting and correcting the sins and faults in progress, or who are charged with this by the Ordinariis, that they do not look through the fingers of the transgressions and violations of any of our aforementioned constitutions, statutes and ordinances, for the sake of money offered or for any other reason, but rather duly exercise the punishments deserved and usual by right on the transgressors, according to the nature of the crime and the requirement of their duty. In order that this may be done, it is of no avail to pass laws.

We have decided to reintroduce the ancient use of such assemblies, and we order that every year, at least once a year, an episcopal synod shall be held, at an appropriate time, by all the bishops, with the participation of all the bishops, so that the Catholic faith may flourish and grow again, and the Church may regain its former prestige by the complete eradication of all heretical doctrines, which can be preserved almost by no better and more convenient means than by the assemblies: We, who wish to reintroduce the ancient use of such assemblies, therefore, decree and order that every year, at the least, an episcopal synod be appointed, at the appropriate time, by all the bishops, with the participation of the most distinguished prelates and deans in the country, as well as other dim men, among whom judges shall be chosen everywhere, who shall take diligent care that the decrees and other statutes of the bishops, which are to be established at the synods, are kept rigidly and firmly in place, since in an adverse case the temporal power can be called upon to help. Finally, we order that this Constitution and Ordinance of ours be diligently read out in the above-mentioned provincial and episcopal assemblies, right at the beginning, so that no one may in the future plead ignorance and excuse himself with it. Given at Regensburg, in the year after the birth of Christ 1524, July 7, of the Pontificate of His Papal Holiness in the first year.

Visas. Jul. Flo. Montinus.
D. de Paternina.
C. Piego.

Jodocus Hötfilter, of the Most Reverend Cardinal L.
Campegii, Legati etc., Notarius, has signed it.

Section Four of Chapter Nine.

About the death of Pope Hadrian VI at Nuremberg between the two above-mentioned imperial congresses, after he had canonized Bishop Benno of Meissen a quarter of a year before, against which action Luther had printed a document, and what qualities this Pope had.

749 Pope Hadrian VI's Bull of the Canonization of St. Benno, formerly Bishop of Meissen. Rome, May 31, 1523.

From Lümgs kpllettZA. 666168. xurt. II. Continuation and its "outiuuutio 3rd, x. 43.

Translated into German by M. A. Tittel.

John, by the grace of God and the Apostolic See, Bishop of the holy and pure Church of Meissen, 2c., to all and everyone who will see, read, or hear read the present letter or this copy of the public testimony, offer constant salvation in the Lord, and that they firmly believe the present writing.

You should know that we have an apostolic letter, with a golden bull, on which silk cords of red and yellow color hang, according to the custom of the Roman court, emblazoned and issued by our most holy in Christ Father and Lord, by divine providence Pabst the Sixth, because of the canonization of St. Benno, bishop, our ancestor, which has already been done, executed and conferred, entirely correct and perfect in all things, unaltered and uncorrupted, also otherwise without any fault or suspicion, as it was immediately found at the first sight before a public notary and witnesses named below, received, the contents of which follow from word to word, and is this:

1 Adrianus, bishop, servant of the servants of God, in eternal memory of the cause! The high Lord has miraculously decided to build the contending Church, which is adorned with living, precious stones united with the supreme cornerstone Christ. Hence came the holy patriarchs, who in faith became worthy to shelter the holy angels, and saw God face to face. These were followed by the holy prophets, to whom God revealed His secrets, so that they might recognize and pronounce future things as present, through the illumination of the Holy Spirit. But after the fullness of time had come, and the exit from on high in the assumed humanity had made us worthy of grace to visit and fulfill the mysteries of our blessedness, as the prophets had proclaimed, the holy apostles were appointed as preachers and heralds (heralds) of the divine law, who throughout the whole world awakened the human race, which lay under the yoke of the devil's power, to blessedness, and preached the word of God to all the ends of the world.

2) Then the glorious martyrs followed, who, clothed in the armor of faith and girded with the belt of unwavering steadfastness, washed their robes in the blood of the innocent lamb, and following Christ with the white army, carrying a glorious palm of victory in their hands, joined themselves to the living stone, Christ, and left an everlasting memory of themselves and a holy example of the contending church. There have also appeared highly enlightened teachers who, with their teachings and examples, have resisted those who want to overthrow the Catholic and right faith itself, and have adorned the said contending church in many ways. With which

The same church, like the dawn, beautiful as the moon, chosen as the sun, terrible as the tops of the armies.

3. Then follow the holy confessors, who shine with the jewels of virtue, and who, as faithful and pious servants, have brought manifold profit and fruit of their labor to the Lord, who demands an account of the trusted pounds, and have placed them in the heavenly box (or barn); Who have also shunned all the caresses of the world as otter poison, have gone to lonely places, have been in caves and gorges, have mortified their flesh with bad food and spring water, have covered themselves with goatskins, have slept on reeds or straw, and have sought God barefoot, and have found the eternal fatherland.

(4) There are also beautiful virgins who, with a pure body, a pure heart, and a holy mind, with oil in their lamps, go to meet the bridegroom, who is more beautiful than the children of men. Similarly, devout and chaste widows, and other many persons of all sexes, who always seal on godly and holy works, and have presented themselves to the same heavenly bridegroom with full hands of a good harvest, glorifying God on high with the angels, and peace on earth for the people of good will (or good pleasure).

(5) All this is done by one and the same Spirit through a marvelous mystery. And as the Most High from the beginning visited, fortified and increased his vineyard with such godly servants, according to his promise: so he still lends the help of his protection in many ways, and visits the same vineyard in ordinary measure; therefore he has also brought a brave man to the construction of this vineyard, namely the glorious confessor and blessed Benno, who is to be joined to the crowd up there, yes, is already selected; who, among the other fighters of Christ, has adorned the holy church in many ways through the cooperation of divine grace, and has brilliantly illuminated the darkness of the present time with the brilliance of his lamp. For he fought valiantly against the world, the flesh, and the devil, and, running after the odor of the Most High, he drew to himself a multitude of the faithful of both sexes, and left behind him a holy generation of his order, poured out, as it were, over the whole face of the earth, so that he might be preserved by a famous memory for the enlightenment of the Gentiles, as a bright star in the firmament of the church.

(6) Of whose origin, life, customs and fame, as well as miracles, which God has been pleased to show in many ways to the world as a reward for His holiness, the least to be reported is that the descendants of such a famous man know something.

7 For the father of this blessed Benno was Friedrich Bultenburger, of noble lineage, who produced him from Bezela, his godly wife. And since a good nature was perceived in the blessed Benno from his youth, he took care, as soon as he was out of childhood, that it would not be spoiled by other young fellows, evil manners and wrong opinions, as it tends to happen in youth, and therefore handed him over to Bernward, bishop in Hildesheim, and ordered him, who also diligently took care of the assigned matter, namely that the boy would be well led to virtue. Therefore, he first urged him to love the good and great God, but afterwards, since the wise man well saw how fine it would be if scholarship and godliness came together, he had Blessed Benno taught by Bigario, a pious and learned man. He was taught by Blessed Benno of Bigario, a pious and learned man, under whom he gained a great deal of weight, so that when he had already become a young man and learned to live properly, he chose the monastic life and became a monk, renouncing all pleasures and devoting himself solely to virtue. His brothers, who lived with him, were satisfied with this and found as much virtue in him as was appropriate for a clergyman, which is why they unanimously chose him, since their abbot had died. But because the matter became controversial, and some, although not many, gave their vote to Siegebarto, a holy man, St. Benno, who was far from all ambition, refused the honor, and on the other hand tried for Siegebarto and asked that he not be deprived of his quiet way of life. The more he asked for it, the more zealous the monks became, and forced St. Benno against his will to accept this dignity, which he resigned in the third month and returned to his previous well-adjusted way of life.

Therefore Henry IV, Roman emperor of glorious memory, began to love him very much. And seeing that the holy man was fit for regimental business, he did not want to let such a man rot in the corners of a monastery, but, since he had been appointed by the pope Leone, of blessed memory, who, however

1) he took him out of the monastery against his will and made him bishop in Goslar and Hildesheim. Since he lived holy and blameless in such a bishopric until his old age, the canons of Meissen were moved by his fame to elect the venerable old man, who has now reached 56 years of age, as bishop of their church, in which he administered everything commendably, but especially here, that he tore the Wends, who were hostile to Christianity, out of their harmful error and brought them to the point that they zealously protected the Christian faith together with the Catholic Church; which is a wonderful and entirely divine deed.

For about the same time Gregory VII, Pope of blessed memory, our ancestor, and Henricus IV, Roman Emperor of the same memory, had great enmity among themselves, so that one sought to overthrow the other from the high dignity in which he stood; therefore each held council with his own. Not only the princes, but also all the bishops in Germany and Gaul were obedient to the emperor. Blessed Benno alone disobeyed the Emperor's order, considering it an honor to protect the Church's reputation as much as possible. And in order to prove his devotion to the church, he banished the emperor and the margrave of Meissen, who were considered enemies of religion, and denied the margrave entrance to the church in Meissen, and went to the pope's council. What could be higher than such magnanimity? Before he set out on his journey, however, St. Benno threw the keys of his church in Meissen into the Elbe, a great and famous river, so that those who were on the emperor's side and therefore had the ban on them would be barred from entering the church. From this it is easy to see what enmity he was putting himself in for the Roman church and what danger he was taking upon himself. For since the emperor thought that he and his people had been insulted, and he wanted to avenge his insults and those of others, he imprisoned the blessed Benno, who had come back from the Council (or Concilio) to cool his troubles; but the almighty God, who saves the pious, who are oppressed in an ungodly way, looked upon the divine man. That is why St. Benno was soon done with it and returned to his life.

1) Non prckseessore nostro, although below VON Gregorio VII. etiana precksoEssor is written, and thus noa seems to be wrong, since about ollm or the like should stand. (Walch.)

has been restored to its former state. Since the keys of the church in Meissen, of which we have spoken, were missing at that time, a fish is caught in the said Elbe river, in whose entrails the lost keys are found again. Certainly a high and clear sign of divine providence!

Now we want to say something about what the holy man did for the adornment of his church; first of all, since he saw that a fine song at the service was something beautiful, he ordered a fine way of singing (or music), which is still in use in the church at Meissen. He also increased the church with many and beautiful goods; he also built and established a collegiate or cathedral church in the place where he sometimes went to be in silence in order to deal with God. But what shall one say much about the good affection of St. Benno for church matters?

11) He walked dry-footed across the Elbe River, and when he once visited the farmers, as was his custom, and saw the people very thirsty from fatigue, he turned water into wine out of compassion.

At another time, when St. Benno was preaching in the valley near the city, he saw many people almost dying of thirst, as it happens in the summer; to please them, he cut the earth, from which a rich and ever-flowing well immediately sprang up, which is still called the Holy Well today. The bell, however, which St. Benno himself consecrated, drives away all storms from the neighboring fields. 1) The field over which the holy man used to travel also surpasses all fields in the neighborhood in fertility.

There is also a village Neumbergk, which is far away from Meissen; and yet it happened once, by divine providence, that St. Benno said mass there at the same time, and also seemed to be present at the service in Meissen.

14 When a margrave in Meissen, who was a bit stingy, out of shameful malice took the goods of the church in Meissen, St. Benno said that man would do well if he returned what he had taken from the church in Meissen; if not, God would avenge such malice one day. The mad man was furious and slapped the bishop on the cheeks; then the holy man, out of divine inspiration, said: "I will not be punished,

1) It must have been no longer there when the thunder struck in Dom, at the time when one sang the Te Deum inside about the Mühlberg victory. (Walch.)

He said: The almighty God will avenge this injustice at the same time in the following year. But the insolent and proud margrave laughed at him. Soon after that, St. Benno fell ill, and he was afraid that he would soon pass from this life into the blessed eternity of the community of all the elect; therefore, before he died, he exhorted the canons to diligently preserve the love that Christ taught us. Afterwards, he enjoyed the night meal, the divine food, very devoutly and devoutly, and after praying to God heartily, he passed away in the fortieth year of his diocese, after the birth of Christ in 1106. So much of what the holy man did in his life, not in a human way, but through divine help.

But what happened after his death with the greatest astonishment, we must also tell something about it. And at the beginning, when the time came when the holy man had announced that the margrave would suffer punishment, the margrave broke out into the following words: Benno once threatened us that something bad would happen to us today; now he is dead, we have nothing to fear. No sooner had he uttered the word than he was struck by the blow, and crying out to the bystanders for help, he died miserably with lamentation and sighing. From this it is easy to see that divine power was given to this divine man.

16 There is another example, which is quite similar to this. William, another margrave, did all kinds of evil to the church in Meissen; and when the bishop persuaded the man with many pleas to change his mind, he not only did not want to follow good advice, but plagued the church much more than before; so the bishop, knowing no other help, called on St. Benno and asked him to preserve the church. So it happened that St. Benno warned the margrave three times in a dream that he should leave the church in peace; and since he dismissed it as a vain dream, he finally lost an eye when he was warned the fourth time, and he was threatened with even more trouble if he did not desist from his godless behavior. Wilhelm, the margrave, then thought better of it and reimbursed the church for everything, and increased its assets as much as he could, also honored St. Benno and held him in high esteem.

17. not forgetting that there are two villages, one of which he went to when he was

In the other, however, he converted the Wends from their horrible godlessness to the Christian faith; the footprints of his feet can still be seen in it. Also the hut in which he lived with the Wends, although it may have been poorly built and had a roof, has, since it was very old, not collapsed, nor was it damaged by fire, since the neighboring houses often burned down. His episcopal robe, in which his body was buried, has also lain in the earth with the bishop's hat for over two hundred years, and is still seen and shown in its entirety without much change since it was excavated.

(18) Many other miracles could be told, for it is known that through the merit of St. Benno many have been raised from the dead, many sick have been healed, and easily no one who has made a vow to him has been left helpless by him. Therefore, our beloved son in Christ, Carl, the Roman and Spanish Catholic King, elected (Roman) Emperor 2c., and our beloved sons Albrecht 2c., priest (presbyter) at St. Peter's in Banden 2c., and Matthew Diaconus at St. Angelo, Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church; and our venerable brothers Richard of Trier and Hermann of Cologne, Archbishops, by their open letters; likewise our beloved sons, the noble men, Ferdinand, Archbishop in Austria, and George and Henry, bodily brothers, Dukes of Saxony, Landgraves in Thuringia and Margraves of Meissen, by our venerable brother, John, Bishops of Meissen, their envoy to us and the beloved son, William of Enkenvort, and our court prelate (Domesticum), as well as their envoy and agent (negotiorum gestorem) to us and to our apostolic see, humbly request that we may, after prior diligent examination and investigation, proceed to the canonization of the holy man.

19. When we were now willing to grant such a request, and were highly pleased that such a canonization had happened in our times, by God's providence, and therefore thought it good not to deprive St. Benno, of whom God had already made known by many manifest signs and wonders that He had made him worthy of the choir of saints in heavenly glory, also on earth of the honor of the saints that was due to him: We have not yet hastened and hastened in so important a matter, but have desired to consider the same, according to ancient and laudable usage, with delay and diligently, namely, after a thrice examination, which was made by the

In the venerable memory of Alexandri VI at first, then Julii II and finally Leo X, our forefathers, commissions were made therein.

Finally, Leo X has ordered three Cardinals, also of the Holy Roman Church, from three of her orders, as our venerable brothers, Bernardino of Ostia, of the Holy Cross in Jerusalem, and Antonio, bishops of Alba, then priests of the title of St. Vitalis, and John, deacon of St. Cosma and Damian's, Cardinals, on his brothers' advice and consent. Cosmã and Damians, Cardinals, on his brothers, among whom we were at that time, although absent, council and consent, ordered that they all of the blessed man's life, customs, rumors, and miracles, before and after his death, also the intercessions made by him 1), and other things that belong to such canonization of the saints, review and examine them, diligently inquire about each and every item, and report what they find to his secret consistory diligently, according to usage.

21. Since the said Cardinals, having seen and examined various trials held in Germany by the order of the said See, and sent them to our Court, and duly considered the testimony of credible witnesses, as the importance of the matter requires, and faithfully reported on the above-mentioned miraculous works, holy life and other pertinent things in several secret consistories, and we have found the wish (or votes) of the same and of all the Cardinals to be just and lawful, the said canonization is to be carried out, and for such solemn appointment the beloved son John Baptist of Siena, Doctor of both rights and Consistorial Advocate of our Court in the public Consistory, told us everything about the blessed man's life, customs, fame and miracles, and humbly requested that we, after prior mature consultation, proceed to the same holy man's canonization: After giving heartfelt thanks to Almighty God for what has been set forth and recounted before us, we asked all those who were present at the time in the public Consistory to assist the Church of God with their prayers and fasting, and to implore Him not to let them err in such canonization.

22 Finally, after several days, when all the prelates present at that time were gathered again in our Consistorial Court, in the Apostolic Palace, namely Patriarchs, Archbishops, and Archbishops of the Holy See, the Archbishops of the Holy Roman Empire, the Archbishops of the Holy Roman Empire, and the Archbishops of the Holy Roman Empire.

1) aũko taetis should probably be ad "o heißm. (Walch.)

The same bishops and bishops, in the presence of the same brothers of ours, the said Roman church cardinals, had the same processes of the same holy life, customs, rumors and miracles, which proceeded from it, recently and summarily repeated by the same John Baptist; which the cardinals and others, who were commanded by us to do the same, subsequently told and explained properly. And since all the surrounding prelates, who were asked what they thought of this canonization matter, answered unanimously, without contradiction, that they thought it was right that such a holy man should be counted and placed among the saints, we once again sincerely thanked the Almighty God that he had graciously enlightened our hearts to adorn his blessed servant with proper honor, and celebrated the first Sunday after Pentecost, which fell on 31 May in the year 1523. May in the year 1523, for such canonization, and have in the cathedral church of the Prince of the Apostles in the city a large wooden scaffold or stage, according to use, prepared and decorated, on which we today, after to the surrounding clergy and people a humble and devout sermon of St. Benno's life, miracles and rumors, also the litany and the song: Come, God Creator, Holy Spirit 2c., The lawyers (or administrators) of the canonization case, as well as the elected Roman Emperor Carl's envoy appointed to the said apostolic see, also implored us that St. Benno be included among the host of saints and be counted among them.

23) Since everything was duly accomplished, and no ordinary church ceremony was omitted, because we had God before our eyes, we considered it good to proceed to the canonization of the saint in question with the words:

In praise and honor of the holy and inseparable Trinity and elevation of the Catholic faith and acceptance of the Christian religion, we, by the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ and the holy apostles St. Peter and Paul, and our own, resolve and decree that Benno, of blessed memory, formerly bishop in Meissen, shall become a saint and be registered in the register of saints. Peter and Paul, and our own, on the advice of our brothers, that Benno, of blessed memory, formerly bishop in Meissen, be a saint and be included in the register of saints; write him also in the same register of holy confessors, and order that his feast and office (or mass service) be celebrated annually by the whole church, as for a confessor, bishop, the 16th of June, as the day of his funeral. June, as the day of his burial (depositionis), shall be devoutly and humbly celebrated; and also graciously remit from the same authority to all rightful penitent Christians who confess when they visit annually on the very day of the same Saint Benno grave, seven years and so many quadragens 1) of the penances imposed on them.

24) After this had been accomplished, and after we had sung the hymn: Te Deum etc., Lord God, you 2c., and our song masters had sung it to the end, and the Cardinal Diaconus had sung it at the end: Pray for us, Saint Benno 2c., and the choir answered: that we may become worthy of Christ's promises 2c., we immediately sang aloud a prayer of our own from this same saint, saying:

God, who surrounds and protects us with the glorious confession of blessed Benno, bishop, grant that we may also increase through his succession and enjoy his intercession, through our Lord Jesus Christ, your Son, who lives and reigns with you in unity of the Holy Spirit for ever and ever! To which said choir answered: Amen!

Then we held a solemn Mass, and all the Collects of the said first Sunday after Pentecost were gathered together and concluded, with the addition of the aforementioned and other special Collects of St. Benno, namely 2) pro secreta:

Let, then, O Lord, thy holy confessor and bishop please us everywhere, that, when we have all his glorious merits 2c., we may feel his intercession (patrocinia) with thee 2c., with its conclusion: namely, through Christum 2c.

Then, after the Communion, we added these words:

We pray, O Lord, since we have enjoyed this holy sacrament (repleti mysteriis), that we may be refreshed by the intercession of your holy confessor and bishop Benno, whose feast we celebrate 2c., with just the previous conclusion.

27) And so we have duly completed the Mass to the end with ordinary ceremonies according to the apostolic order 3) and granted plenary indulgence to all who were devout at this high office at that time, and for the testimony of which we have issued the present letter, to the praise and glory of the Almighty God, who is wonderful and glorious in his saints, lives and reigns, highly praised forever, Amen!

1) A quadragene is forty days of penitential indulgence.

2) is dark. (Walch.) - Maybe to read: pro ssq uontia - a Is sequence.

3) suxta Ordinarius apostolieuin, instead of ordinona. (Walch.)

Because it would be difficult to make the same letter known to everyone, we want and decide that its copies, which are signed by a public notary and sealed by an ecclesiastical prelate, be given unquestionable credence in all and every part, and that they be followed just as if the manuscript (or main letter, originales literae) had been shown and handed over to all and everyone.

Accordingly, no man shall change our command, statute, enrollment, ordinance, decree, grant and will, or act contrary thereto. And if anyone should do so, he shall fall under the wrath of Almighty God and the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul! In the year of the Incarnation of our Savior, 1523, May 31, the first year of our papacy.

From the (papal) castle.

T. Heizius. Seen

W. von Enkenvort.

Registered with me T. Hezio. On the back (or from behind) the seal of the apostolic bull.

Which apostolic letter, since it was presented to us and shown to us, we have been requested by the venerable men and gentlemen, the provost, dean, senior and the entire chapter of our cathedral church in Meissen, that we have this apostolic letter, which was issued and granted for the canonization of the holy bishop Benno, copied and made into this form of a public instrument. Therefore, we have also had it copied by the public notary written below, copy it and bring it into this public credible form of a copy and compare it properly with the main writing; we also want and order that this public copy instrument be followed and believed everywhere, as and as much as the main writing itself could and would be believed, therefore we add our order to the above-mentioned letter here.

For the all faith and manifest testimony (or document) of which we have also made the present letter, and have had it signed by the public notary named below and marked with our seal. Given and done in our episcopal castle of Stolpen. In the year of Christ 1523, Monday, which was Sept. 7, in the presence of the excellent, venerable, and strict and manly (strenuis validis) Messrs. Paul Dhums, beider Rechte Doctoris, Georg Kothschitz, our Chancellor, Jakob Renichens, Georg von Schönberg, Georg Pflug and Matthäi Weislicz, requested witnesses.

And I John Caesar, a clergyman of the Prague (episcopal) district, and public notary from imperial authority: Because I, in the case of the enclosed apostolic letter, which was issued and executed on the canonization of the holy bishop Benno, handing over, receiving, copying, repeating and reading, diligently filling, and adding the order and decree, and everything else, in that it has been done and executed by the most reverend in Christ Father and Herm, Lord John, bishop of the holy and holy church of Meissen, and has been present in the company of the aforementioned witnesses, and has been thus seen and heard and well noted: I have therefore made this present public instrument and copy thereof, signed it, made it known, and brought it into this public form, which I have been solemnly requested, called, and invited to believe and bear witness to all and every thing above.

750 D. Martin Luther's writing "against the new idol and old devil, who is to be exalted at Meissen. Late April or early May 1524.

This writing appeared in 1524 in several individual editions (the Erlangen edition lists six of them), for the first time under the title: "Widder den neuen Abgott vnd aliten Trüffel der zu Meyssen sol erhaben werden. Martinus Luther Wittenberg. III. D. XXIIII." At the end: "Printed in Wittenberg by Hans Lufft. 1524." In den Gesamtausgabe": in the Wittenberger (1558), vol. VI, p.452; in the Jenaer (1585), vol.II, p.43Id; in the Altenburger, vol. II, p. 780; in the Leipziger, vol. XVIII, p.511; in the Erlanger (1), vol. 24, p.238 and in the second edition, vol. 24, p. 250. The presumed time results from Luther's letter to Spalatin, De Wette, vol. II, p. 507, which, however, is not to be placed in May, as De Wette has done, but with Burkhardt, p. 70, on April 4 or 5. In this letter, Luther indicates his intention to produce our writing.

Against the new idol.

I hereby state that I do not want the dead Bishop Benno to be condemned or damned. He has his judge, like all other dead people, over whom no human being has the right to judge, unless God Himself reveals such, firstly through the Word, then by signs. I only want to write against the living Satan, who now at this time, when by God's grace the gospel has risen again and shines brightly, does not know how to take revenge, because he mocks God and disgraces His word by playing such a jugglery that he wants to be raised and worshipped with silver and gold equipment and delicious splendor under the name of Benno (which would probably rather remain lying); and God, through His wrath, also demands that the hardened and blinded tyrants and persecutors, as the pope with his mob, who do not want to hear the gospel for salvation nor suffer, must believe the lies and powerful error, and the work of the devil, to great damnation, as St. Paul says [2 Thess. Paul says [2 Thess. 2, 10-12]. And I do this all the more gladly and gladly, for I know for certain and am certain that if Benno is truly holy, it does not do him any favors to be exalted; just as no saint has ever been fond of being exalted by the pope, even though there are few of them, for they are usually vain papal saints, not Christian saints. The reason for this is that people's confidence in God's grace and Christ is turned away by the elevation of the saints, and falls on the merits and intercession of the saints. And so much good is done to their churches that the good works of love toward the neighbor are not done at all; so that instead of God the saints come, and instead of the neighbor wood and stones, of which only lazy gluttons and idle fattened sows are fed in the churches, monasteries and convents. Now nothing is dearer to the true saints than that faith should remain fine and pure, and love fervent and constant among men.

(2) Therefore God also willed in time past to bury Moses in such a way that no man should know his grave, lest he also be honored and called there; yea, he did not set up any worship or honor in any place, or with any name or manner, which he himself had not commanded. Ezekiel also broke the bronze serpent (which God Himself had named) when he saw that the Jews were setting up worship there. [2 Kings 18:4] Even though the false prophets had not

The people of the city, who were always shouting that they were doing it in honor of the right God, as our pope is doing with his own over this Benno.

How much less is it to suffer that in the New Testament, in the bright light of the gospel, one should worship of one's own choice and devotion, without the one he himself commanded in faith and love, with the sacrifice of himself, as St. Paul teaches Romans 12:1.

(4) At first, that we start at the highest, it has been well arranged that this Satan of Meissen would be exalted by the Pope Adrianum, his special servant in life. For although I hear from the same Adrian that he has lived a seemingly famous life, he has nevertheless (as such hypocrites are wont to do) been the worst enemy of God and of His word, and thus let the two murders be committed in Brussels, and made Christ two martyrs, and, without his knowledge and will, elevated them to the status of saints. And even if they had been heretics (as they are not), nevertheless a murderer has been committed on them, since true Christians, especially in the spiritual office, do not murder anyone, but only avoid the wicked and evade them, as Paul [Titus 3:10] and Christ [Matthew 10:17, 7:15] teach. And although I should not, nor can I, judge how he died, yet my judgment is right, that if he is different in such a sense, and has not recanted or atoned for such murders, and has been held to our gospel, then he is certainly a child of condemnation.

5 Here it is almost and entirely papal, as at Costnitz in the Concilio: there John Hus and Jerome of Prague were condemned and burned, the true holy children of God and martyrs; but Thomas Aquinas, the source and basic soup of all heresy, error and extinction of the Gospel (as his books prove), was exalted. So now Master Adrian must also do. He burned Johannem and Heinricum, the true saints, in Brussels. Now he raises Benno against them, even the devil himself. It is the special office of the popes, they must do: kill right saints, bring up false saints; condemn God's word, confirm their own doctrine, and then say it be done.

In honor of God and His dear saints, as Christ says John 16:2: "The time is coming when he who kills you will think he is doing God a service."

6. On the other hand, the fame would have been worthy of silence, and not only Master Adrian and the pope, but also all those who so nearly rush and hurry with Benno's elevation, should be ashamed in their hearts if there were a spark of Christian understanding in them. That they therefore both write in books and tell in the bull and publicly display before all the world the noble virtue and example of Benno, how he has defeated the Emperor Henry the Fourth to the Pope Gregory septimo, and banished the Margrave of Meissen together with the Emperor, and then escaped to the Pope, (I wanted to say) went on pilgrimage. That is a chivalrous deed! He should not only be called a holy bishop, but also a holy knight, and be exalted with vain golden picks and shovels, so that it would be disgusting and disgusting.

I will be silent about the histories, which powerfully show how the same Pope Gregory septimus acted against the Emperor Henry the Fourth as a traitor and evil-doer, even after reason to speak, and incited the son against the father, and deposed him from the empire, let him die so miserably in the ban, and all this only for the sake of temporal good, splendor and violence. Benno took a stand with such a pope, as the Bulla boasts of him here, and strengthened the pope in his evil ways. And there was not so much spirit in the holy man that he could have recognized how the pope was doing wrong to incite the child against the father, whom God had commanded to show honor and service; but he is so blind as a bat that he leads and stands with the pope, helps him, banishes both emperor and margrave, if he should have staked his life on it, to make a plea to the pope and to resist.

8th I will (I say) keep silent about this, and equate it that the emperor Henry was wrong, and the pope right (which the histories deny) to speak according to reason; so it is undeniable that the same emperor Henry did not touch the faith nor God's word, but as it is said, it was for the sake of the faith.

Money and goods to do violence and honor, as the pagans quarrel. Here (I say) the pope acted against the gospel, because he should not have resisted the evil and let go of what did not want to remain, as Matth. 5, 39. clearly teaches Christ. Yes, even if the emperor had acted against God's word, the pope should also have suffered it and left it alive, like a pious governor of Christ, his Lord. But now he not only resisted the evil and avenged himself, but also did so much evil to his adversary, shed so much blood, caused so much dissension that it is horrible to read, and did not let up until he brought the emperor to ruin the empire, the country and the people, life and limb, honor and friends, and the soul, as much as he cared for it.

9 And Benno, the holy man, who also proved the gospel with miraculous works, holds himself to this. This is the noblest virtue, which is why he is to be scraped out of the earth with golden shovels; perhaps we should also learn from his example how to keep the gospel. Yes, I am sure that this is the miraculous sign and virtue of Benno, which is most highly and diligently moved by the Roman See, and most agreeable. Otherwise, he might have had to lie in the ground for a long time. For he who can perform such miraculous signs, that he praises and helps to handle the wealth, splendor, power and honor of the Roman See, does more than if he raised ten dead, even if all the world should perish in body and soul, goods and honor. Well, you fine Pabst hypocrite Benno, how well you have earned your elevation, that you have made yourself a party to, and burdened yourself with, so much horrible and frightening malice of the pope, against the gospel and reason!

(10) But I truly fear that this virtue of Benno was invented and lied about by the Meissners, in order to pretend to the pope and to persuade him to raise him up, since they knew that such ear-crickets almost tickle the pope and like to hear him sing such a little song; that is why they put it first of all above all miraculous signs, so that the pope would be fooled and caught by it, and the other lame, loose, powerless ones would follow him.

alas! all too Meissen miraculous signs liked the more. And if this is so, that they deal with lies and hypocrisy, who wants or can doubt that this elevation of Benno is vain devil's specter? and that not Benno, but the devil lets himself be elevated, under Beuu's name?

(11) But if it be true, and not a lie, I say, If Benno died in such a conscience, and did not atone for such iniquity, he is surely gone to the devil, for the gospel must be truly kept. Christ says, "Whoever cancels one of the least commandments will be the least in the kingdom of heaven. What then do those at Meissen raise up? A multiple murderer and bloodsucker, and the cause of all misfortune in German lands, and an enemy of the Gospel, a companion of the Antichrist, to whom he has turned and made himself a partaker of his wickedness. This will inevitably follow from this high fame of the highest virtue of Benno in this bulla of Master Adrian. What then is said: We exalt such a saint, who lived against the gospel, because so much: We are mad and senseless, foolish and foolish in Meissen, that we do not know what is gospel or against the gospel, and call holy that which we ourselves praise and extol, as it has acted against the gospel? So let our angry nobles, who persecute God's word, bump and run against each other.

(12) Of the same kind is the noble, tender miraculous sign that the wise Bulla also praises for sins and for disgraces, not only of Bennoni, but also of all who exalt him, since she says how Benno killed for time the Margrave of Meissen, who struck him on the cheek, more than a year later that same day, as he had previously threatened him. Here Benno interpreted and lived the gospel rightly, since Christ says Matth. 5, 44: "Do good to those who harm you, and pray for those who defile and persecute you." But here you see in the bulla that Christ confirms the contradiction with miracles, and teaches with words to suffer this, but with miracles he compels to do otherwise. O Bulla! O holy uplifters! When will you be ashamed of yourselves? And the bulla lets

It is not yet enough for her that she casts such blasphemous iniquity for a miraculous deed, but lead to it, and make Benno a god, and says: Hinc facile concipi potest, divinam virtutem divino homini esse communicatam. Fie, that God may forbid you and punish you, you shameful blasphemers! With this they want to indicate that the saints also do evil for themselves, and not God alone, as Psalm 72, 18: Qui facit mirabilia solus.

(13) Now, once again, I fear that this is a good, cowardly, strong lie, invented on good Benno, to "soften" the pope. The Holy Roman See also prefers to hear that princes and lords are afflicted when they touch spiritual goods, rather than that all the world would become holy; therefore they have also put this into many legends, examples and books, so that they have good days and goods enough, and may not keep the gospel. But if it is true, I say again that Benno is as holy as Annas and Caiphas, he has atoned for it. But those who boast of such iniquity truly stand with great shame above Benno. For if they do not lie in the bulla with their fame, then Benno is the devil's saint; but if they lie, then the devil rides them with their exaltation. For where it is proven that someone has lived against God's word, he cannot be holy or justly exalted, even if he raised all the dead and performed all miracles.

The gospel is more powerful to condemn than all miracles are to exalt, because the gospel is false and does not lie; but miracles are very deceptive, as Paul proclaimed [2 Thess. 2, 9], that the end-Christian should use false miraculous signs, so that he may also deceive the elect [Matth. 24, 24]. As also Deut. 13, 5. Moses writes of signs, that one should badly believe no sign, where it wants to go against God's word. For the signs should serve and follow the word, and not the signs lead the word. Therefore Benno doctrine must be proven, or his signs are not valid. Marci 16, 20: Sermonem confirmante sequentibus signis; non ait, praecedentibus vel sine sermone apparentibus.

15. item, likewise is that Benno after his death once margrave Wilhelm has also

The saint was tormented for the sake of temporal goods, and finally, through the prayer of the provost (as the monasteries commonly have many holy people), one of his eyes was knocked out. The dear lords are all concerned with good and splendor; even the dead saints must protect them. This example is as certainly of the devil as God lives, for he is in the habit of dealing with the appearance of the dead to fool and frighten the people. The prophets, patriarchs and kings in the Old Testament also struck and wondered, but it is always written that it was done for the sake of the word of God and the people of God. But to my lords of Meissen and the Roman blind see, all this must be called miraculous sign, which only temporarily confirms good and honor.

16 Although I consider this to be a fictitious lie, like almost all the other miracles in the entire bull, I think that the pope and those at Meissen want to torture dear Benno in death with such lies and errors, so that they not only have a confessor in him, but also a martyr. For if he has been a pious man, they will certainly torture him with these lies more than any martyr has ever been tortured. How can they dishonor him more shamefully than by praising him for having lived against the gospel and by giving him the appearance that Teusel himself does? O you dear lords of Meissen, how well you might have stayed at home with your Benno in such miracles! And I want to warn you to beware, and do not make too much of a joke with blasphemy; for you see here that your boasting about Benno is either a lie, or Benno must be damned. If you will now continue with your head down, and thus publicly and knowingly strengthen and maintain your lies or Benno's iniquity, then I am innocent of your blood, and of all who consent with you. It would have been enough so far; it is time to stop.

(17) The other signs are so loose that [it is] to be pited, and that there is no wonder, whether the blind are easily deceived, and they that love to lie and to hear lies are deceived. Who should not laugh that the bell, consecrated by Benno, drives away the weather? Or, if the devil can be banished into a jar, should he not also make a weather and drive it away, to deceive the people by God's decree? If it is God's miracle at all, which is strange, it will never have to be a false miracle. So that Benno crossed the Elbe, and was seen here and there at the same time; who knows whether it was Benno or a devil; how often has the devil done this? Item, how angry should it be with the devil that he, the prince of the world, should offend or charm a man who is in unbelief, and then let himself be led to the saint and stop there? This is what the saint is supposed to have done!

Oh Lord God, how we are so careless, how we go in like the blind, how he has deceived St. Gregory so palpably in his Dialogo! Every day I hear such alienation, which the devil has driven back and forth, and still drives, that I would like to make ten Bennos out of it. Item, who wants to prove that Benno made the holy well, or that the common legend is like that, which one finds a lot, since nobody knows where it comes from. In Rome there is a lot of this kind of thing. Summa Summarum, if one wanted to paint and write a true life of a holy bishop, then one would have to show the word and doctrine that he had led; item, his faith and love, and the cross for the sake of doctrine; these are the right pieces. But now this bulla says: Benno preached; but what he preached and believed, it does not say. Thus, there is also no indication of love and the cross, but says of the ceremonies, and how he was angry, fled and plagued for the sake of the church. In addition, there are several ghosts of uncertain and false miracles, which would rather need to be proven that they were right and true, because Benno was holy.

19 For I would easily let myself be persuaded that Benno had been a pious man, but had been seduced by the pope in many ways, yet finally redeemed by God's causeless grace, like St. Bernard and many others.

1) "Confessor" here stands in the meaning confessor, confessor.

of the elect. But that he should have used such fantastic signs and done them, as the bulla reports, no one will ever prove. But if they were proven, they would make Benno a child of hell in his life, because his life goes too strictly against the gospel.

20 Therefore, my advice is that everyone be satisfied with this exaltation and let good Benno sleep in God's judgment, who alone knows how things stand with him. These signs prove nothing; his doctrine, faith, love and cross seem to be nowhere: what would one want to do with him? There is no need for him to be exalted. For we may well be Christians and become blessed, even if Benno and no saint would ever be exalted, unless the money must be sought here.

(21) And if all the above does not move you, let the bulla itself move you, in which the pope himself confesses that he has asked God with his own that he not let them err in this matter. See and grasp for yourself how here the pope lies and acts against himself. If he asks that God will not let him err, that he will cry out Benno holy, how can he be sure? How will he prove that he is heard? Which angel came and told him that he should be certain? For such a thing must be necessary, since he here sets forth a new article of faith, that the pope has as much power as I have to rule the heavens and the sun. Again, when he approaches and says that the miracles make him certain that he is holy, why does he ask God for what he already has? Doesn't this mean that God is tempted and mocked, asking for something that you already have and confess?

22 But the devil disgraces himself in this way, because lies do not last, they must always speak against themselves. Just as here the pope wants to act in the most spiritual and prudent way, he approaches and asks for security, confessing that he is uncertain, and yet he has previously decided that it is certain, and he complies with this, regardless of the fact that he recognizes himself as uncertain in prayer. So now he certainly leans, either in prayer or in rising; yes, he leans with both cheeks. He only asks for the sake of appearances, and thus mocks God. Although the prayer is true that he is uncertain, yet again he denies that he is certain through miracles. Since there are lies, deceit, lies and falsehood here, beware of the new idol under Benno's name. And if you do not want to keep him holy, then be sorry that they play such monkey games with the dead, and by them they make poor people miserable. What can Benno do that his bones are so used as an idol to deprive people of money and souls?

(23) Therefore let us not speak of them here, but speak of the right exaltation of the saints, which is certain and profitable for our souls. It should be noted that the Scriptures speak little or not at all of the saints in heaven, but only of those who are on earth, as Paul says Rom. 12:13: "Take ye the need of the saints"; and 1 Tim. 5:10: "Where she washed the saints' feet." In short, Paul in all the epistles calls "saints" to whom he writes; that holy be every Christian on earth. But the papists have no saints, without those in heaven, and whom they still put in daily. Therefore they do not understand the Scriptures and despise all God's saints. If we want to live up to the Scriptures, we must turn away from the dead saints in heaven and return to the saints on earth, exalting and honoring them; this pleases God and He has commanded it.

(24) For of the dead saints he has commanded us nothing; therefore nothing that we apply to them pleases him, but men have invented such idolatry, because that money carries, as all others before me have sufficiently done. For I have hitherto written nothing special against the honor of the saints, and in some little books I have proved that I do not almost deny it, though I must be called as if I had done it. But let it be done, through whom it has pleased God, so love me, I will gladly bear the shame with help, because I do not want to take away the work of others, and I confess that God also works something through others, that I am not the only one who is doing the gospel.

(25) So we see that the bodily exaltation of the saints requires much, and costs much effort; but the right spiritual exaltation and honor of the saints is easy, and is brief, namely, as Paul says Rom. 12:13: "Take care of the saints' needs"; and again [Phil. 2:3]: "Prefer one to another with reverence"; item: "Each one esteeming the other higher than himself". That is rightly called exalting the saints, in GOD and for GOD's sake. For because they are God's temple, each one should humble himself before the other, and honor his God in such a temple, yield to him, have patience with him, love and improve where he can. Behold, this costs no silver shovel, nor hoe of gold.

26 O that all those who exalt and honor Benno and other saints would listen here and let them say! Who would believe it to be true? And yet it is true that all the splendor, all the food and effort, all the honor and service, and what is now being applied to it at Meissen, is not as good nor as pleasing to God as if you gave a poor Christian a meal or clothes. Yes, that displeases God and serves the devil; this pleases God and displeases the devil; for this God has commanded, of that he knows not. How many thousand guilders do you think that Benno has cost, and will still cost? which are all at once lost before God, and in addition deserve greater wrath, so that one could have served so many right saints.

27 Do you not think that if on the same day a pious man in the country took pity on a sick and poor Christian, God would turn there with all the angels and turn his back to Meissen, where Benno is martyred and tormented (should say exalted)? When shall we once become wise? how long shall we be told such things? Ask [reason] whether it is better to give to the poor saints than to raise the dead saints who need nothing from him? Is it better and more necessary, why do people give nothing here and so much there?

28. But God's judgments are right: if we will not give ten guilders to the right saints, which pleases God, then the devil shall possess us and drive us with a raging spirit.

That we may hurl gold shovels and picks, and one thousand florins after another at the dead legs, and earn all misfortune and disgrace. But we do not want to hear it nor believe it; well, we will hear it at last and have to learn it, if it has lasted too long. Shame we seek, shame we shall find, and is already there.

(29) Furthermore, I say that even if all the signs and wonders of Benno were righteous and had been performed by God Himself through him; on the other hand, even if they had been performed for the sake of the Gospel, as Marc. 16, 20. promises Christ (which can never be proven): nevertheless, one should refrain from the insolent, sacrilegious, foolish presumption of exalting the saints. For all such signs, though they prove that a man is holy in life, yet they cannot make us certain whether he has passed and remained holy in death, because God's judgments are secret, strange and terrifying, and He Himself says Matt. 7:22, 23: "Many will say to me, 'Lord, have we not cast out devils in your name, and done many miracles? But I will say unto them, Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity.'" These are indeed greater and more sure signs than Benno has done, which Christ himself confesses; nor does he condemn them.

(30) Deuteronomy 5:13, 1-3 also says that God would send signs through a false prophet to tempt His people. Therefore, it is nothing if even after death a saint performs signs at his grave; who knows if God will tempt us with them? and in the meantime condemn the same saint in death, as well as the false prophet while alive? Especially is this journey great, where the signs reach that thereby the life of the same saint is praised, and not the faith and word of God is confirmed with it. How then are all the signs of this Benno, by which confirmation of God's word is not sought, but of his ceremonies, his intercession, the church of Meissen's glory, and the Roman church's splendor and power. Was it not a great miracle that Balaam 4 Mos. 24,1-5. had to speak God's word without his will and bless the children of Israel? Was it not

How wonderful that Saul prophesied among the prophets? [Should they therefore be holy, that the Holy Spirit spoke and did these things through them?

Therefore we Christians should never judge a man holy before the last judgment, as St. Paul teaches 1 Cor. 4, 5: "Judge not before the time, until the Lord come, which shall light up the darkness" 2c. Especially because we know that Christ [Matth. 24, 24.] and Paul [2 Thess. 2, 9. 10.] proclaimed that in these last times so many great and false signs shall take place that even the elect may be deceived. We may well do this, that we consider them holy in good opinion, as every Christian should consider the others, but we should not rely on them and want to be certain, as an article of faith (as the pope rages with his Benno and others): only to those whom God Himself has exalted, proclaimed and judged holy in the Scriptures, as the patriarchs, prophets, apostles and disciples 2c.

I believe kindly. St. Elisabeth at Margburg be holy; item. St. Augustine, Jerome, Ambrose, Bernard, Franciscus; but I will not die on them, nor rely on them. My faith shall be sure, and have certain ground in the Scriptures. But the pope, indeed all the angels, have no power to establish a new article of faith that is not expressed in Scripture.

Let this be said against the devilish work. Now I must also do something about this against the devilish words, so that such work may be exemplified and persuaded to the people. For I am well aware of the sermons that will be preached in Meissen, and how they will smear the mouths of the people, so that they will hold the god in high esteem, and open the bag wide for dear St. Benno, that is, for the good and honor of their belly. Therefore, I, of faithful Christian opinion and duty, hereby warn all who will hear such sermons to look at the reason and not at the appearance; for I can well see what foul reasons they will lay from the Scriptures for their jugglery; as the Bishop of Meissen has already suggested in his note one, namely:

34 Laudate Dominum in sanctis ejus means: "Praise God in his saints" [Ps. 150, 1]. They will then extend this praise further, and say: this is also praising God in his saints, when one lifts them up and calls upon them. When you hear such preaching, think and be sure that you hear the arch liar, the devil, himself speaking, the father of all lies [John 8:44], who perverts the Scriptures and the Word of God. Take it as proof that this saying was spoken and kept in the Old Testament, since no saint was exalted or called upon, nor was it commanded to call upon anything but God alone, as he himself says in Ps. 50:15: "Call upon me in time of need, and I will help thee, and thou shalt honor me." Therefore he also boasts that he is a helper of all men, 1 Tim. 4, 10. Yes, the 36th Psalm, v. 7, says: he helps both men and animals. Therefore, there is no help to be sought from anyone except from him alone.

(35) About this, this saying does not speak of holy persons, but of holy places. For it reads from the Hebrew: "Praise the Lord in his sanctuary", in sancto, vel sanctuario suo, as also the 20th Psalm, v. 3, says: "He sends you help from the sanctuary", and Psalm 22,4: "But you dwell in the sanctuary", that is, in a holy place, and the like. That with this saying the service of God is stimulated, as it was done in the Old Testament by the Levites and singers in the temple with singing and sounding, 1 Chron. 17,4-6. But now in the New Testament we have no place that God has appointed, but we ourselves are the temple of God, 1 Cor. 3,16. and Christ Joh. 4, 21. 23. abolishes all physical places, when he says: "One will worship neither here nor at Jerusalem, but spiritually and righteously", then this saying at this time must also be understood of the spiritual sanctuary, i.e.: "Praise God in his sanctuary", that is, in the Christian community and among ourselves. Therefore, it does not rhyme with the saints' exaltation and invocation.

(36) And if it be so, that the saints should be lifted up and called, then the bells, cymbals, timbrels, and harps should also be lifted up and worshipped. For it follows the aforementioned saying in the Psalm: "Praise the Lord in bright cymbals, timpani and strings. Well then, if you praise the Lord in it, call on them also, and raise them up, as the Meissen and Episcopalian note teaches us in the saying: Praise the Lord in his saints. I am silent here, as it is too long to act here, that those who call upon and exalt the saints do not commonly praise God in them, but rather defile and blaspheme Him, because they place their trust in them and hope in them. Which is called abandoning faith, denying God, and making the saints an idol, of which enough has been said elsewhere.

37 After that they have the saying, Job 5:1: Call and return to a saint. So blind and sacrilegious are the papists, where they find the little word "saint", they would like to establish honor and intercession of the saints, just as they confirm purgatory, where they can catch the word "fire" in the Scriptures, and holy water, where "water" is written. You should understand this saying of Job's: that Eliphaz punishes the pious Job that he has sinned, because God punishes him, and says: "Name me one, and look around you for the saints"; as if he should say: God has never punished any saint; you also do not denounce any, turn to whichever one you want; because God plagues you so, you must certainly not be holy, but an evildoer. Now behold how finely they have conducted this saying, that one should call upon saints. Everything is of equal importance to them; what they think, the Scriptures must contain and teach.

The third saying Proverbs 20, 25: Ruina est homini, devorare sanctum et postea quaerere vota. Here they read devotare for devorare, that the saints would stand firm. But Solomon wants to say: Laqueus est homini, exprobrare rem sacram, et postea vota quaerere: It is a snare to man to desecrate the holy word or thing, and then to be pious with sacrifices and good works; as our papists persecute the word of God, and all that is holy, and in the meantime go and hold masses, and do much good; but think not that they change their unholy nature, and cease to devour that which is holy.

39. about that, because they are pushed that they are

have no scripture for themselves, that one should call on saints and let them be mediators, but the scripture alone makes Christ the mediator and intercessor, as Paul teaches Rom. 3, 25. ff. 5, 1. 2. and 1 Tim. 2, 5. and many more, they go on and seek new excuses, and turn the Scriptures away from themselves, saying: "Let the mediator be twofold, satisfactorius et intercessorius, that is, one who does enough for us, that alone is Christ; let the other saints be intercessorii, intercessors. If one asks where this is written, they point us to their holy church (which they themselves are), which the Holy Spirit does not let err; the same says this, therefore it is right. But if they are so foolish in their schools, it would be called petitionem principii. For they should prove that the saints are mediators, which the Scriptures do not teach. So they go on as if it were already proved, and invent two kinds of mediators out of their own heads. Now when thou hearest these things, know the wolf by the voice: for the Holy Ghost teacheth nothing but the scriptures, as Christ saith, He shall teach you all things, and bring to remembrance those things which I have said unto you [John 14:26].

40 Thus we shall find that this fool's play at Meissen with Benno will be nothing but lies and deceptions of the devil, both in works and words. Therefore beware, and think thus: Even if it were all right and true, but since it is an unnecessary thing, which you can well do without, keep your money for your children and poor people, since it is necessary and well spent; much more because it is not only unnecessary, but also false, lying and devilish. And look at themselves: if it were their earnestness and heart to honor God and his saints, they would find a thousand and a thousand ways to help their neighbor, each of which would be a thousand times better than all the splendor of such exaltation at Benno. But if they leave that and go here, you will realize that they are blind and mad, and they seek your money and their benefit and glory in St. Benno. But I hope they will come too late and set the net before the eyes of the birds in vain, as Solomon says, Proverbs 1:17.

(41) But if you want to honor and praise the saints, follow the example of the Scriptures, in which we see how in prayer, or thanksgiving, or lamentation before God, one introduces the grace and goods given to the saints by God. As when Moses prays Ex. 32, 13. and says: "Remember Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, to whom you swore" 2c., and Solomon Ps. 132, 1.: "Remember, Lord, David and all his miseries"; and Christ at the cross, Ps. 22, 5. 7.: "Our fathers hoped in you and were saved; but I am a worm" 2c., and Ps. 44, 1. 2.: "God, we have heard, our fathers have told us, the work that you have done for them" 2c., and the like. Here you see that no saint is invoked; but God is praised in them that he has promised them such good and has done it to awaken us, also to seek such grace from him alone with all confidence. Sufficient for us is the one faithful Mediator Jesus Christ, the Holy One of all saints, to whom alone be praise and glory with the Father and Holy Spirit forever and ever, amen.

751 A letter from Battus Parmensis to Hieronymus Saulius, in which Hadrian is accused not only of atrocious avarice, but also of shameful and sodomitic fornication. Rome, 13 Jan. 1524.

From Wolf's Isetion. memorad., tora. II, p. 199. - In Walch this document is dated January 13, 1523, but this must be wrong in any case, because Hadrian died only on September 24, 1523, and here he is spoken of as one who died. Therefore we have shredded 1524.

Translated into German by Joh. Frick.

C. Battus Parmensis wishes Hieronymo Saulio Heil.

Your silence may be due to carelessness, or to much business, or to other causes, but it will not deter me from writing to you more often, although in truth I almost do not know what to write, since I have not even been able to get a few lines out of so many letters sent to you. I can write neither funny nor serious things, and know nothing at all, except that you wish to know, as I believe, what name Pope Hadrianus left to posterity. For of his death, I think, yours will already have given you news.

2 His fame, which he left behind, is not good, and everyone was not less surprised about its presentation than they were happy about his death. For for many years he knew how to conceal his lifestyle and his vices in such a way that, as a supposedly righteous and holy man, he was unanimously appointed pope, and, as you know, absent.

3 He came to Rome when I went to Sabina because of fear of the plague; whereupon the plague immediately became more violent and began to spread from day to day. I think that this was a foreshadowing of such an evil and harmful pestilence, which came here from Spain to our destruction. Finally, since winter was at the door, this rage subsided; therefore I went back to Rome, where everything was quiet, both because of the small number of people, since only a few dared to return to the city and the plague had destroyed many, and because of the severity and seriousness of the new pope, which was the only thing to be praised in this man besides his erudition.

4 He issued an edict that no one should carry a gun; he wanted the authorities to observe the law in the strictest possible way and not to allow any remissions to take place. This brought him no small praise from the inexperienced mob; later, however, it became clear that this was not a true test of his justice, but only a cover for his insatiable avarice.

If someone was summoned for a minor crime, he could not get away without a large fine, and in this case neither the favor and love of honest and noble men nor his previously innocent life helped him in the least. If those who had committed a great crime had no money to buy themselves out of debt and fill his head, he either let them be punished alive without any mercy or sent them to the galleys for their eternal punishment; but those who brought fat bags with them were punished as minor, and they themselves got away without any harm.

(6) The authorities, who had the right to speak, were summoned daily at night time, and the money they extorted from each defendant was collected by means of a sharp investigation. He collected the gold pieces himself on the spot; he also inquired from them the number and crimes of those who that same day had either been summoned to court or had been arrested.

7 He had so few and so few servants that the daily expenses amounted to barely twelve ducats (or gold florins). And what does it take? The Vatican no longer seemed to be the papal palace and, as it were, the eye of the city (Rome), as it once was, but, because of its solitude, a house that, as the poets write, was left empty for fear of the poltergeists. It never happened that he asked cardinals or other noble lords or royal envoys, who were staying in Rome and who often came to him according to custom, to dine with him; therefore, for the sake of this strange performance, he was not invited by anyone. Neither the Swiss nor the cavalry guards, who, as you well know, always accompany him when he goes out and keep watch day and night at the entrance to his palace, received their pay, but always had to suffer from hunger.

8 But he dealt even more unjustly with the inner guard, who stood before his bedchamber during the day. For not only did he not give them any pay, or otherwise prove generous to them, but what the cardinals or other courtiers had to distribute annually at certain times, he took from them and used it for his own benefit.

9. The cities, so under papal rule, he has, if they sent envoys to him, the congratulations to pay, and, as it happens, as often as a new pope is elected, that they assured him of the loyalty and reverence of their citizens. They did not, like other popes, let him enjoy some privileges in order to make his memory, if not immortal, at least glorious among the nations; Rather, he imposed on some and others even more duties or taxes to bear.

(10) The money that some peoples in Gaul, on this side of the Alpine mountains, paid to the soldiers hired for pay from theirs, in the name of the Pope and on the admonition of the fathers, because he was then moving away from Italy and his fortresses had to be protected from the invasion of the enemy, he did not have written down under the items to be paid. Three thousand five hundred Spanish soldiers accompanied him by ship to Italy. So that he would not be obliged to give them pay out of shame and shyness, or at least to give them gifts, he gave them freedom to go out robbing in Parma and Piacenza, as in a hostile country, and to attack towns and villages.

and to plunder, but to demand contribution from others. 1)

(11) These are samples enough of his unspeakable avarice, which seems to have been connected with a rather barbaric injustice. For among all those who have ever dealt with him and submitted to his obedience, he, despite his amazing riches, has never done anyone a favor or given anyone a gift, except one and the other, and that without an archangel; from which it can be concluded that he must have been either godless himself, or a foolish and deluded man.

(12) If, by the way, there is a reason for what was said after his death, he was indeed a godless and lewd man. For he went to the Vatican early in the morning every day, and so that no one would come there, he locked all the doors; some of his privates accompanied him, and when he performed his service there, he went all alone into the inner part of the church. No one could know what he did there during his stay, until it was learned later that he had an exquisitely beautiful woman there, and one had the idea that he had gone to this place so often for the sake of her love and had kept company with her. Which, that it was so, can, apart from the cute shape of this woman's room, the several times held meeting with her, and other speculations, the illness, from which he died, give a proof of it.

13. before he passed away, he was often ill with hamstring and tummy ache, which are common diseases of those who do not keep a moderate pace in carnal intercourse with females.

14 Moreover, he was accused of boy rape, because he had among his servants some young and tender, and at the same time extraordinarily beautiful people.

It is said that after his death a great number of magic instruments were found in his bedchamber. His most secret servants, in order to cover up such a big knavery, freely confess that he had taken great pleasure in the art of transforming metals and had often practiced it. But I am not one of those who accept everything immediately, especially what one wants to pretend about the dead.

16. that he smiled at those who came to him.

The fact that he received the orders of the government with facial expressions and caressing words and did not let anyone leave him saddened was a sign of his cunning and devious head; in fact, however, he did not prove to be as eager as he had indicated in his words and facial expressions. Moreover, he did not let anyone come before him so easily: he postponed from one time to the next the things he had once taken on; he accomplished few completely, except those concerning the coinage.

Much of what he began soon after assuming the papal dignity, he left unfinished in his death. However, apart from all the controversy, one must praise two things about him, namely his erudition and his thriftiness. His piety and holiness, as they say, were only pretended, and this is proven by the reasons and suspicions that I have mentioned above, which vice of pretense is especially common among the Germans, because everyone wants to be considered honest and sincere, and yet, before you know it, there is a mischievousness in his heart.

(18) But so that I do not speak of a dead man, and indeed of a dead pope, more than is appropriate and my intention suffers, this may be enough of Hadrian's performance. But because I think to do you a favor, if I give you a short outline of that pope, whom you will now never see, how he looked and was formed: so I will paint the same picture, as clearly as it is possible, before your eyes.

19 Hadrianus was of tall and straight stature, had an elongated, prominent and beautiful face, except that the depressed forehead hung too far against the vertebra. The eyes were small; yet not quite blue, as in most Germans, but fiery and lively, and so covered with the eyebrows that one could not easily perceive the roguishness hidden beneath. His nose was not unlike an eagle's beak, thick alone and not very crooked. The cheeks were somewhat long and outstanding, and because they looked red, they gave the whole face a special adornment. He himself walked erect, spoke with immense pleasantness, that you would no doubt have said of him that he was born to rule or reign, although his friends and relatives had this verse, cut off from the rest of the eulogies, placed on his grave:

Hic nihil in vita infelicius duxit, quam quod imperaret....

That is, in his life he considered this to be his greatest misfortune, that he should sit at the regiment. These words may have been written either on his orders or with the will of his relatives, but I have never seen anything more careless and foolish. Of this, too, it may be enough, and my letter shall close with the story of Hadriano. Be well, and see that you get here as soon as possible. Rome, January 13, 1524, under the Emperor Carl the Fifth.

752 Speech by Conrad Vegerius on the death of Hadrian VI in the presence of the Cardinals in Rome in 1523.

From Kapp's Nachlese nützlicher Reformation-Urkunden, Theil I V, p. 546.

Translated into German by Johann Frick.

When we read, venerable fathers, of Demosthenes, the great light of Greece, that, as often as he began to speak in public, a shudder would have come over him: how should I not be frightened, who lacks perspicacity, erudition and eloquence, and who, moreover, was not born and instructed among any nation where the Latin language is spoken and practiced? And this all the more, since he, when he wanted to give a speech in Athens, could not worry much, because he did not have to speak in front of such distinguished men, and only in front of people from one city; my undertaking, however, is far different, since I have to give a speech in front of the Holy Roman Church Cardinals, that is, in the public assembly of the whole world. And even if I admit that I once did something in the art of oratory, which, however, was something little and bad: this has now either completely fallen away, or at least become rusty, due to the omitted exercises in oratory for quite a long time. Even if this is the case, both your high and peculiar spirituality, excellent fathers, and the old and praiseworthy use, as well as my duty, make me brave and courageous. For who should be afraid of the most learned and honest rulers of the church than those who are accustomed to love the students and to encourage them to virtue, especially to speak of things that bring honor to human life? Especially when one does not voluntarily and impudently intrude upon them.

but only endeavors to do justice to the office entrusted to him. And since it is very important to the common people that traditional good customs are not abandoned, it seems that one must keep above them those that concern the memory of the deceased. For what good can one expect from one who shows himself sleepy and ungrateful in rendering the last honorable service? although a completely different cause has driven me to leave here.

For since I have enjoyed the honor for fifteen years of counting myself among the clientele of the incomparable Pope, for whom we are holding the funeral today, and since I have been greatly saddened by his death, I could not avoid giving way to the family's request and accepting the office of funeral orator. So, excellent fathers, I would much rather try to calm down to some extent in my great and sensitive sorrow, if it were possible, than believe that I would be able to give a decent lecture to such a respectable and distinguished gathering. Just as nature, as the general mother, orders all other things well and wisely, so life seems to have commanded the memory of the deceased by a special and majestic law. For if one reflects on the matter, one realizes that almost all other actions and efforts of mankind are aimed only at how we may either pay our last respects to the blessed, or preserve human society and propagate our race. For we establish houses of worship, together with the priests and priestly offices belonging to them, for no other end than that we give to the immortal God what is God's; nor do we beget children for any other purpose than that human society may be preserved through us. And even if someone tries to accomplish these two things in his whole life, the result will be that he considers God to be the Creator of all things, but considers himself to be nothing but a miserable, mortal man.

(3) But as we celebrate the memory of the dead, we learn, among other useful things, this, about which the most astute among the ancients have argued so often and for so long, that it is almost certain and certain that the human race is partaker of the divine nature. For who can be so strange and so incomprehensible that, when he is on one side, he is on the other side?

Do you hear that among the wise men of the world there are those who doubt the immortality of the souls, but on the other hand, here and there, among all nations, they perceive how the deceased are rendered the last service, and how funerals are held in their honor, if they are not convinced in themselves that man has something in common with God? Nor should the pagans themselves be considered so wrong as to show almost divine honor to those after death of whom they nevertheless thought that their souls died with their bodies; rather, it is believable that nature, at the same time as it planted in the human mind the care for the dead, wanted to indicate that something remained after death to which the survivors owed a service of honor.

4 This knot of doubt, which has occupied the pagan worldly wise men for so many years and has miserably blinded them, our Lord and God, Jesus Christ, has banished from human minds by His salvific and beatific teachings. The Catholic Mother, the Church, has also accepted the divine teaching and invoked it, that the souls of men are immortal, and has also decreed and commanded that the deceased should be raised up and honored through intercession and other works of love. What a decree, since it is to be understood by all and sundry, how much more is it to be observed by those who have led the highest priesthood with all holiness and honesty. For in this way, the godly actions of the living can help the spirit that may still be wandering on the journey to heaven, and the survivors can be encouraged to live a blameless life.

In this number we rightly include the most holy pope Hadrianus, who was recently snatched from us by death, since he took up and led this highest office on earth with such zeal, gentleness and justice that he well deserves to be included in the register of good popes. But so that you, respected fathers, may see this all the more clearly, I ask for your kind ear when I shall relate his life and deeds in a proper context.

6. Hadrianus was born in Utrecht, a famous city in Lower Germany towards France, in the year of Christ the God-Man 1459, in the month of Martio, of poor and lowly, but God-fearing and honest parents; and after learning the first rudiments of science, he was sent to

He lived in Leuven in the Netherlands, where an academy had been established not long before. There, after having looked around in grammar and other liberal arts, he concentrated on theology, in which he showed such diligence and increased to such an extent that in a short time, after having attained a profession in divinity through the votes of his teachers, he preceded all others of his kind. Soon after, the Collegium Canonicorum, which was established in the holy temple of the Prince of the Apostles, elected him as Dean; but he himself, as soon as he had more time and opportunity for a better and holier way of life, did almost nothing else but wait for his theological office with all diligence, went daily to the churches, sang, prayed and preached.

7) In order that one would not think that he had only mediocre gifts and skills, he could also serve others of his time and at the same time the descendants with his salutary knowledge, so he has left two books among other writings. One contains an explanation of the fourth book Sententiarum; the other deals with mixed questions (called quodlibeticas). Which works

For the sake of their thoroughness and the clear style of writing, which is far removed from all turgidity that is otherwise very common to scribes, they are held in such high esteem by scholars that they have been in hand here and there for some time. And even if they have already been handed over to the printer by his friends, this still happened without his knowledge, and when he found out about it, he expressed great displeasure about it. Finally, in order to show even more clearly his great love for theological studies, he had a precious and beautiful house built in this very city, which he later gave as a home to some young people who were devoted to godliness.

8 Since he had led this way of life, which was very decent for him as a very Christian man, for many years, and his fame had spread far and wide, Emperor Maximilian, of most glorious memory, who was very concerned about the education and instruction of his grandson, the then young Emperor Carl, thought that he could not entrust the future great prince to a better man than this excellent teacher of his time. For this reason, he sent deputies to him, who had to ask him whether he wanted to accept the new position? which, after he had finally accepted it after repeatedly giving a negative answer, he nevertheless did.

When the prince was born, he made it his foremost concern to teach him and make him accustomed to worship God and divine things with the utmost zeal and humility, and, next to that, to practice justice, love, mercy, and other royal virtues. By means of these and other wholesome rules, in a short time he brought the young prince so far that he was considered capable of the highly respectable succession to the throne to which he was then destined, and from that time on he has given not a few samples and testimonies of the excellent instruction he has had.

9. It happened about once that this prince wanted to have an envoy visit his maternal grandfather, Ferdinand, who at that time ruled far and wide in Spain and was already a very old gentleman; And when he looked around for a man to whom he could entrust the legation, he found no one more suitable than Hadrianus, because he believed that no one would be better able to reveal to the old king the nature of his mind, as the future successor, than the one by whom he had been specially instructed. Accordingly, our Hadrianus began his journey by land, but as soon as he arrived in Paris, he decided not to leave immediately, but to delay a few days until he had seen the famous academy. Therefore, he went to the Sorbonne, as the most distinguished college there, listened diligently to the debaters, and also debated with them himself accurately and confidentially. From there he continued his journey, and as soon as he arrived at Ferdinand's, he was received with peculiar honor and grace, not only because he was sent by his grandson, the older one, whom he had never seen and would soon have as his successor, but rather because the young prince had not sent a single envoy to him before.

After he had been there for several years, the Tortosa church lost its bishop. Because the wisest leaders, who were in power after the death of the king, were looking for a capable prelate for the said church, they wrote to Carl, who was in the Netherlands, and implored him to entrust Hadrian with this sacred office, even though he was not inclined to accept it.

He was appointed general inquisitor of heretical wickedness in these royal lands, both of which he administered with such diligence and fidelity that he was soon thereafter accepted by Pope Leo into the most reverend college of cardinals for this and other excellent services.

A few months later, King Carl had to return to Germany to take over the Roman imperial crown, and therefore had to entrust the administration of the Spanish lands to another honest and wise man. But here, too, he did not consult with himself for long, but without decency entrusted this important office to Hadriano. And although such high and rare responsibilities were heaped upon him (without his thinking and seeking, indeed rather against his will), he nevertheless took care, with his happiness increasing from day to day, not to become arrogant and puffed up, or to set his heart on riches; rather, one saw that the more favorable his fortune was, the more anxious he was to carry himself out humbly and modestly.

(12) In view of these glorious virtues, with which he constantly endeavored to adorn his conduct, it pleased the Most High not to leave this faithful servant without salutary temptations and trials. For immediately after the king's departure, the Spanish nation was in the throes of the bloodiest turmoil, and everything was thrown into utter confusion by murder and manslaughter, by scorching and burning, by robbing and plundering. Since this wise father, as befits a respectable and honest governor, sought to punish the perpetrators and to control the evil, it is indescribable what work, sorrow and worry this cost, and how many times he came into the most obvious danger to his life, which he, however, with the help of God, in whom alone he placed his trust to promote the common good, did not shy away from and happily overcame, whereby the words that he constantly spoke are very strange: If someone's ways please the Lord, he also makes his enemies pleased with him. This he obtained even in the very heated and dangerous turmoil by his justice and gentleness, so that the restless mob, when they learned that the council had come to a sharp conclusion against him, blamed it on his two colleagues; but if they let the caution prevail, he owed this good to no one but Hadriano.

In the meantime, when the bitterness of the mob had subsided, and most of those who had been most guilty had been regarded with due punishment, the death of Pope Leonis occurred; and after the voices of the holy College of Cardinals could not unite for some time, Hadrianus was finally elected pope and publicly proclaimed. He, as you know, respectable fathers, did not suspect such an outcome, nor did he ever let such a thing come into his mind. The messengers speed up their long journey to Spain without delay and want to deliver the pleasant news. At that time, the Most Holy Father was staying in Vittoria, a town in Cantabria (or Biscay), and when the messenger, upon receiving the letter, wanted to kiss his foot with happy congratulations, he refused until he was convinced by reading through the letter that the news had been delivered without displeasure, and immediately accepted this honor. Nevertheless, he did not change the rest of his way of life until he learned more detailed and certain circumstances about the election. Then, after giving due thanks to the immortal God and the holy college, he began to be executed and venerated as other Roman popes had done. He has kept his name unchanged, contrary to the custom of long ago, indicating that, even if he had now received the pontificate, he would have to act, by virtue of his former modesty and humility, as if he did not have it. Incidentally, since he saw that it was very important to the church that he go to Italy as soon as possible, he thought above all about how he could end the journey soon.

14 He therefore went by ship and sailed to Tarragona, but had to stay there for a few days because he could not leave due to a storm that had arisen at sea, and the sailors asked him to stay. As soon as the wind died down, he set out and arrived in Genoa in a few days. From there, on the shore of the Tuscan Sea, he entered Civitavecchia and immediately moved to Rome, having been previously caught up by your distinguished Collegio with due honor.

15 As soon as the coronation act was over, he turned his thoughts to how he could remedy the decay in Christendom by useful means. But while he was most occupied with this, the pestilence came to Rome very strongly and to general consternation; and although many even in the papal palace were concerned about it, the pestilence was still in progress.

And, most admirable of all, he did not set foot out of his palace as long as this miserable misery lasted, just so that it would not look as if he wanted to turn his back again on the city, which had been plagued with a protracted interregnum and now with an unhealthy air, and leave it in distress.

16 For the above-mentioned final purpose, he sent an apostolic nuncio to Germany to punish the rage of the Lutherans at the Imperial Diet held by princes and estates in Nuremberg; he also sent nuncios to various other countries to advise kings who were at odds or involved in war to make peace. Since they did not achieve anything (according to God's will), he was so distressed by this that the major part of his fatal illness, from which he later gave up his spirit, can be derived from this pain. But when he saw that the kings continued their wars and did not want to enter into a lasting peace, he announced to them a standstill for three years under the threat of severe punishments; but since they did not understand to do so either, and no other means could be found for the decline, he established an alliance with the princes and peoples of Italy, by means of which the city (Rome) and all of Italy should defend themselves against the infidels. At the end he sent to the Holy Roman Church Cardinal Legatum a 1a-

He sent a large sum of money to Hungary, so that he could keep this kingdom, which had to fear a hostile Turkish invasion first, in obedience and loyalty; he also helped other Christians in Dalmatia and Jlyria, who were very afraid of these cruel enemies, with money and provisions, although he himself was very exhausted in the former.

(17) By applying all his work, effort, diligence, care and vigilance to ask for and bring about the assistance of God's hand of power for the unfortunately all too troubled little ship of Peter, behold, he fell into an illness, which, since it increased and decreased with wonderful alternation, in which one could not find oneself, the venerable father finally gave up his spirit after a camp of one and forty days. But before his mental and physical powers began to decline and he became very weak and feeble, you will well remember, respected fathers, how fatherly and loving he was to you in the presence of his last will and other needs of the church.

which, since he was no longer able to do so because of extreme weakness and approaching final moments, it is right and just that the good intention be held in as high esteem as the laudable deed itself.

18. Nor are you, respected fathers, unaware, since he came to Rome and found the Roman see completely exhausted, even hideous and abominable and almost decrepit, both by appalling great debts and by war and pestilence, how reluctantly, how slowly and out of the most urgent need he resorted to those means without which this good and faithful shepherd would either have had to become despondent and fainthearted, or at least inflict an eternal disgrace or damage on the highest papal dignity, which had been so praiseworthy administered for many hundreds of years. And certainly, all impartial people, considering what this man did within a year, must admit that if he had remained alive longer, his other undertakings would have been equally important and most profitable for Christians. By the way, so far one has found footprints of such a hidden wisdom and such an unfathomable counsel of the great God, and in the future they will be noticed even more often, that when we poor, weak people want to start thinking about the matter, he leaves us completely; on the other hand, he does exactly what we like least of all, but in such a way that he nevertheless arranges everything for the honor of his most holy name and the welfare and benefit of mankind.

(19) But how futile, how uncertain, is not our hope, after which we count on everything certain and unmistakable. O how ineffectual and outrageous is the prayer of mortals, in which we ask for long life in vain for our princes! How vain are our prejudices, according to which, in admiration of their virtues and other glorious gifts of body and mind, we think that God will immediately grant us what seems good to us!

20. If the fatal death of the most holy pope, respected fathers, has caused damage; if it has caused misfortune; if it has inflicted a wound on the common people, or even on private persons: we ourselves are the ones who receive it, who must bear it with patience and feel it for eternity, of whose behavior the all-powerful God has just given a clear and distinct statement, and want to show us what we deserve, that he snatched this man, so pleasing to him, from our society so suddenly.

(21) Since this is the case, noble fathers, it is proper that we no longer mourn the death of the most holy pope, but rather heartily grant him the glorious beatitude to which he has been elevated. For after we have shown how from his youth he constantly devoted himself to the fear of God, justice, love and other excellent virtues; since you have also understood how he devoted his first years of life to learning and to public speaking.

What is left but to assume with firm and undoubted confidence that he is now free from the dark and black dungeon of this miserable life, and has ascended to that true and eternal light, and enjoys the certain and infinite reward of heavenly bliss, namely the ineffable and glorious beholding of the majesty of God for all eternity?

Section Five of Chapter Nine.

Of the visitation of the Electoral Lands by the Bishops of Merseburg and Meissen, presumably at Duke George's instigation, in compliance with the resolution published by the Imperial Regiment at Nuremberg on January 20, 1522 (see Document 727 above).

About the visitation of Bishop Adolph at Merseburg, but especially about the dispute between this bishop and the parish priests at Schönbach and Auch.

753 Two letters from Johann Stumpf, pastor of Schönbach, to Adolph, bishop of Merseburg, dated 1522, in which he proves that it is not heresy to serve Holy Communion in two different forms, and also asks for the bishop's protection against his enemies and for safe conduct.

From Kapp's "Nachlese," Part II, p. 557.
Translated from the Latin by Johann Frick.

Johann Stumpf to the bishop of Merseburg.

It is said to be heresy that I have given the Lord's Supper to some under both forms at their request. Just as if this were heresy, since nothing is accepted or done contrary to Scripture. Scripture agrees with me in 1 Cor. 11, where it can be seen that this was the custom in the first church. But, they say, it disputes with the assemblies of the church fathers. I answer: For now, in no ancient synod is the use of both forms forbidden. Afterwards, the most recent assembly at Basel did not condemn it as heretical, but rather gave it to the Bohemians.

I am not allowed to do so. Also, I am called out as a heretic for an atrocious crime, since my detractors should consider that the use of the Lord's Supper in both forms has never been considered a crime in any synod. Furthermore, those who accuse me of a great misdeed, that I distribute the body and blood of the Lord in the hand, without a chasuble, in the common language 2c., should know that one should not immediately make someone a heretic, who does something against the concilia, because one should not consider that an article of faith, what is decided by different and contending concilia, without agreement of the Scriptures. For we believe the conciliar only in so far as we believe the Scriptures. I may have acted contrary to the Roman church customs, but I have not sinned against the gospel. Therefore, I do not yet see my errors and crimes. And I have no doubt that those who were not ashamed to accuse me falsely will not be afraid to condemn me, an innocent man, rightly or wrongly.

Johann Stumpf's other letter to the bishop of Merseburg.

Hail! Most reverend Lord, I have already made it known in my previous letter that I do not worry about your venerable fatherhood. For I already know about your godliness.

I am convinced that I am the only one who not only does not harm the innocent, but can also serve as a refuge for the miserable. But I am afraid of those through whose countries I have to travel, who have sufficiently revealed their attitude toward my kind. We are being deceitfully pursued everywhere, and if I exposed myself to danger, I would be acting ungodly. Therefore I ask E. E. V. for a safe conduct, since I will be ready to give an account of my actions without delay. If David has listened to that woman, I ask that H.E.V. also listen to a poor preacher, to whom, as bad as I am, a Christian congregation has been entrusted.

754 Answer given by the pastors of Schönbach and Buch to the castle of Colditz. After 25 Aug. Anno 1523.

From Kapp's "Nachlese", Theil II, p. 562. - Walch has in the heading "Anno 1522", but from the content it follows that this document is to be set later than the "Handlung", No. 756, which took place on August 25, 1523.

Translated into German.

1 If they had stood before the bishop of Merseburg more often than was necessary and answered for themselves. For if he were a true and evangelical bishop, he would visit his sheep as Christ did and taught. For episcopus means an overseer, but not one who only wants to summon his subjects and rule over them.

2. Because the bishop in the previous action, 1) with disregard for all shame and Christian modesty, publicly asserts the proposition that it would be better for a clergyman to have a whore than a wife, since God forbids fornication, but taking a wife is not forbidden by God, but only by men: their conscience would not permit them to deal with such insolent and tyrannical bishops, if they did not first publicly testify that they would refrain from such blasphemies and keep to the word of God, as bishops are entitled to do. For John [2 Ep., v. 10] says: "If anyone does not bring this teaching, do not greet him"; and Gal. 1, 8 Paul curses all such; but in 1 Cor. 5, 9 f. he commands to have no fellowship with such who do not want to obey the word of God.

1) This refers to Document No.756.

They asked the bishop not to force or coerce them to do such bad things for the sake of his own conscience and theirs, unless the bishop refrained from rejecting the holy word of God, from blaspheming it and from hindering its course. For they would not only regard the ban as nothing, but also give their lives for it. And it would do nothing to their conscience for the bishop to refer to the Roman church and its customs. For Peter says: one must obey God more than men. Apost. 5, 29.

But the bishop of Merseburg said:

- 1) It would be better for a clergyman to have a whore than a wife.
- 2) This article of faith: He is risen from the dead 2) cannot be proven from the Gospel.
- 3) Paul's letters would not be the gospel.

755: Citation of the Bishop of Merseburg to Johann Stumpf, pastor of Schönbach. January 20, 1523.

From Kapp's "Nachlese," Part II, p. 566.

Translated from Latin by M. Aug. Tittel.

1. We Adolph, by the Grace of God and the Apostolic See, Bishop of Merseburg, Prince of Anhalt, Count of Ascania and Lord of Bernburg, and the Executor of the Apostolic Letter, (offer) to all and every provost, dean, archidiacon, scholastic, cantor, custodian, canon, also governors of parish churches, and especially in the countryside, in Bothen and Otterwisch, chaplains, who have or do not have care of souls, notaries and public clerks, whoever they may be, who are ordered in our city and district of Merseburg, and each and every one of you together and especially, our constant greeting in the Lord!

2) You should know that, since recently a common and frequent cry has been heard among us and has become known more and more, that unfortunately! one, Johann Stumpf, ordained 3) pastor in Schönbach, our episcopal district, has gotten into the wrong mind, that he, wanting to be wiser

2) This statement is incorrect, it should read: "He descended to hell. If this is emended in this way, then the three points indicated are found in the "plot" No. 756.

3) L886rtm, supposed or alleged, that is, who only falsely calls himself so. (Walch.)

as the holy, orthodox sense of Christian doctrine, and the custom which the holy Roman Church has hitherto held immovable, as well as a prohibition omitted by the most holy in GOD Father and Lord, Mr. Leo, by divine providence Pope of X, We have had the thought of John, by virtue of our pastoral office, summoned before us personally and reproached him with some articles of heretical malice: that with a blinded devilish mind, and with an impudent hard mind, he was not afraid to confess that he had taken a wife in the holy priesthood, according to his pretence, 1) and that he had served supper to people of both sexes in both forms, and also received such most holy sacrament of the body of Christ from the hands of a layman, 2) and did not celebrate (hold) the mass according to Roman usage both in ceremonies and prayers, and did and committed many other things contrary to religious usage. Whether we now, as much as possible, by a small warning and out of a good divine zeal, asked and admonished him to leave all deeds and obstinacy of devilish deceit, to think of something better, and to put away and discard previously reported harmful, pernicious, unjust, devilish and heretical opinions and falsehoods, and behave according to the holy catholic faith and the use and custom of the holy Roman church, as we have then set and granted him one month to return to its unity, which opens the shelter of grace to every returning person: Yet, at the instigation of the devil, I believe, he has completely disregarded our paternal admonition and warning, and up to now he has not in the slightest way been willing to testify to the catholic faith and the use of the Roman church, nor has he yet made the slightest effort to do so, or even asked for it.

Therefore we proceed and proceed against the said John, if necessity requires it, for the denunciation of the punishments of excommunication forfeited by him and as against a heretical and lazy member cut off, likewise for all enlargement and further increase of the excommunication, as well as for appeal to the help of the secular authorities, by means of justice.

4. We admonish and warn all of you and each of the above-mentioned, and each of them in particular, who is required to do so, with the contents of this letter, for the first, second, third and last time, and order you, under penalty of excommunication, to have the said Johann Stumpf, pastor in Schönbach, (or help), whom we also, by virtue of this, have summoned to the extreme (or in the most severe way, peremptorie), so that he will be summoned on the Saturday after the feast of the Purification of the Holy Mary, which will be the sixth of the future month of Februarii, 3) appear before us at Merseburg in our bishop's court in his own person, and not through a lawyer (or agent), and present sufficient proof that he has in all respects obeyed our previous and faithful warnings and covenants, and that he has completely and truly renounced the aforementioned errors and heretical opinions, that he has reformed, and that he has returned to the bosom of the holy mother, the church, which he shall first show and declare; Or that he say and bring forward a legitimate reason why the reported things should not happen; or that we otherwise reportedly proceed against the reported pastor in Schönbach, as a heretical, banned, rotten and cut off member of the church, who was declared to be so by virtue of the holy councils and apostolic letters, also imperial decrees, for such declaration, denunciation, enlargement and sharpening, also common banishment, and appeal to secular authority.

(5) The certificate that the same Johann Stumpf, pastor in Schönbach, has been summoned in the above-mentioned way, that he appears within the reported time limit of the last summons or not; we nevertheless further for the second time, at his other delay (or staying out); likewise for the third time, at his third staying out; as well as for the fourth, at the same, and thus for the abundance (scil. slowly enough or manifold times) to such a declaration, excavation and repeated excavation (or increase), common ban (interdict of the congregation), in appeal to the secular authority and other necessary procedures, by virtue of such holy councils and apostolic, also imperial orders, by the demand at the church door of our cathedral in Merseburg, just as publicly posted orders, want to proceed by means of the way of right; that said Joh. Stumpfens, pastor in Schönbach,

1) ut asseruit stands again, as he called them. (Walch.)

2) Namely, perhaps to pass it on to the others afterwards. (Walch.)

3) Saturday after the Purification of the Virgin Mary was the seventh of February in 1523.

his non-appearance or continued absence is in no way obstructive, likewise the day of the citation in our manner and its form, likewise said pastor's name and surname and what you have done in the above matters or what someone among you finds necessary to do, you shall report to me by your open letter or bailiff, with your signature underneath or on the other side.... by your own hand or with the original as soon as possible. Given in our bishop's court Merseburg, Monday, the 26th of January 15(23).

756. act of the bishop of Merseburg with the parish priests of Schönbach and Buch, happened on August 25, 1523.

This writing, which came out in 1523 in quarto in a single edition, is found in des Rabus "Martyrer-Buch", Theil III, p. 52.

Tuesday after Bartholomei early at vij. We, the parish priests of Schönbach and Buch, are summoned to Merßburg for our Lord, the bishop, in his parlors, and in the presence of His Grace Cantzler and a magister, our preacher there, interrogated, in masses, as follows.

Firstly, our Lord at Merßburg has given a long speech, and has repeated the contents of his citation, Geleytsbrieff and Schreybens, given to the priest at Schonbach, also his answer, with an indication of the disobedience, of which his Lord is not unreasonably annoyed, but his Lord will gladly forget and forgive, if we appear in obedience later, and accept both in mercy, before we give up the article, so that we can indicate it. and forgive, if we appear in obedience later, and accept both in mercy, before, if we let ourselves be proven wrong, so that we can be accused and notorious, 1) and improve, because his friend would also be a sinner, needing mercy from God, therefore his friend does not have to be ungracious, if we recognize ourselves. We will tell you in long words, how his God has experienced many things in his day, and a little more, than we young people, have seen many a mighty great and learned man under his eyes, and have also read something about it (without talking about what it was). But such strange things, which we would have assumed for ourselves as parish priests, were unheard and unheeded by his grace, and therefore not leydlisch, so much in his reason weyset, and Bischöffl. Office

1) "notorious" put by us instead of: "corrected" in the old edition.

We are now to state the reason and cause, and ask how it follows.

Bischoff said: Priest of Schönbach, do you have, as they say, a wife?

Parson: Gracious sir, yes!

Bischoff: For what reason?

Pastor: I have found the temptation of lust in me so quickly that it is not possible for me to keep chastity. And although I have asked God for it many times, I have found that God has not given me this, until I have received comfort from Christ, Matt. xix, where he says: "Non omnes capiunt verbum hoc, sed quibus datum est," that is, "The word is not for everyone, but for those to whom it is given. And after that: Qui potest capere, capiat &c., that is: "Whoever can grasp it, let him grasp it." Also in Paul: Melius est nubere, quam uri, that is: "It is better to be free than to be in heat. In which, as well as in many other words, I have found that taking a wife is not only commanded, but also permitted.

Bishop: Do you think that the sayings have been unknowable to the Holy Fathers, to the Christian congregation of the Roman Churches, to the holy many teachers? We hold you and your priest Doctor Martinum more and better than those who have considered it good that the priests who handle the highest mystery or secret of the masses should live purely and chastely, as is also figured or meant in the Old Testament at the Ark 2c. 2c. Also, the word capere, which means "to grasp", is not understood in Matthew.

Pastor: G. H., I also knew well the usage of the Roman churches, but I preferred and considered better the word of God, commanded to the people, which we call laqueos, that is "rope", according to Paulo. I will therefore provide myself, E. G. will also do so; but that the little word capere, to grasp, would be understood of it in Matthew, is German enough; if E. F. G. would look at the Bible, it would be so, and if Your Grace wants to hear it, I will read it out of my Bible, for Your Grace sees that the little pencil says: Non omnes capiunt verbum hoc, that is: "The word grasps nit iederman", is that the apostles say: Domine, si sic est, non expedit nubere, that is: "Lord, if the matter of a man stands with his wife also, it is not good to marry." And so it seems that the little word capere, seize, niendert [nowhere] belongs elsewhere, then where the apostles say in their question: Non expedit nubere, that is, it is not good to become married.

and to the little word eunuch, that is, the circumcised, I think it is German enough.

Cantzler and Magister: It is Latin, not German.

Pfarrherr: So that's what I mean, it's clear and understandable enough.

Bishop: Dear, beware, these sayings are not said to the priests, but to the leyn. There is also a little word before, duriciam cordis, which Christ says: "Moses, for the sake of the goodness of their hearts, has left them something, which I would like to put on you, because you are such a hard, stubborn man."

Pastor: I will prove how much the difference between priests and bishops in the Scriptures has no reason, since we are all priests in Christ, which is also said to priests; then Paul in the epistle to Tito and Timothy says: Oportet Episcopum unius uxoris virum esse, that is: "A bishop shall be one wife's man. If Christ and Paul in the foregoing words and sayings do not mean the priests (as you say), then here Paul is against Christ and himself.

Bischoff: O dear priest, maxime erratis: Ir jrend euch weyt, wa rechnet ir euwer votum oder Gelübd hin?

Cantzler and the Magister: Jha, jha, you should have considered this before, when you named your ordines or weyhe, and before then you vowed Celibatum, Keyschheit; you have had your age; why did you not consider it before, before then you juried and swore?

Priest: I confess that I have taken a vow and an oath, but I do not confess that I have taken a vow and an oath well and truly; I have taken a vow that I am not able to keep and that I cannot keep without a foundation. Item: Out of ignorance I have been convicted by the bishop, why should I not refrain from an evil law or vow, and not stop sinning (Here I have not been allowed to speak enough, as is the case with many others). I can also remember that my vow was made with the addition: Quantum humana fragilitas permiserit, that is: as much human stupidity as may be experienced. E. G. reminds you of what is at stake and what is undoubtedly sinful even here in E. G.'s grace. The priests have done this with so many lewd vows, which are received here in Merßburg, and are allowed to sin publicly, all of which arises from the evil vow of chastity.

Bischoff: Hey dear, haven't you read it too? Alter alterius onera portate, that is, one bears another's burden. How should one do to him, it should one

It is more likely that a priest, out of infirmity and weakness, falls into sin with a poor woman, then that he takes a wife, again doing the law and again the use of the churches. The result is twofold, joy and strife, so that the ley says: "The priest is special, and takes a wife, who must all be unjust, he alone is wise and pious. Rather, let your blindness and foolishness go, and let my valid and gracious judgment take place among you.

Priest: No, my lord, I will teach better than has been done so far.

Bischoff: Wolan, it is leyd to me, GOtt helf euch.

The bishop then turned and addressed the other priest of Buch, saying:

Father of Buch, do you confess that you have a wife?

Pfarrherr: G.H., yes, I confess.

Bischoff: What is euwr answer?

Parson: G. H. Although I refer entirely to the answer of the parson of Schönbach and the letter he has submitted, I also say, and put my answer on three grounds.

I. First, that I have not found in myself the gift of reynigkeyt.

II. secondly, that the Scriptures are in no place contradicted, nor are there many holy teachers against it.

III. to the iij, that I prevent the remorse, which Christ so often and highly denounces, also Paul, when he says: Episcopus sit vir irreprehensibilis &c., that is: "A bishop should be impracticable" 2c., so that in no other way I would be ignored, because I am unworthy, as a pastor to preach God's word, then that I nemme a weyb 2c. Bishop: Almighty God, how stubborn blind people are! I am surprised what [you] always think of. I suppose that it would be right that you both, on reason alone, and for good cause, so strongly oppose such an appropriate custom of the churches, might have persevered until the common church had allowed and approved it, and had not burst thus.

Pastor: E. G., we were afraid it would be too long, we would like to, but we do not want to wait so long.

Bischoff: Believe it, wolt auch wol eyns genommen haben.

Priest: Why doesn't your grace do it?

1) "you" inserted by us. - "to draw out"-to take out. So it is also written soon after in the chancellor's speech.

[Bishop] Makes a creed for himself. God is for, God is for, I trust you both more than I have felt, but it is all on fruit and considered nothing, well then, I have done that.

Hereupon the bishop again turns to the priest of Schönbach and says:

Pastor of Schönbach, I have more to talk to you about. It has come about that we forbid our priests to fast, that they eat meat and whatever they want.

Pastor: I have not forbidden fasting, but I have preached that fasting, that is, eating and drinking moderation, is not bound to any time, day or hour of eating, to kill the flesh.

Bishop: "You will not overthrow the fasting of one day, which Christ has formed us to follow.

Pastor: There are two works of Christ: first of all, they are based on faith and charity, as he says: Discite a me, qui mitis sum, et humilis corde, that is: "learn from me, for I am gentle and humble of heart. And so many of these things are commanded to follow us, and we are to follow them. Secondly, his miraculous work of raising the dead, healing the sick, feeding so many thousands of people with so little bread and fish, xl. 2c., which are a confirmation of the divinity of Christ, and thus have a spiritual mind and doctrine, which we should not follow, nor is it necessary.

Bishop: I will not let the eleventh day fast be anything other than a work of persecution, say what you will.

Parish priest: If Your Grace does not want it any other way, then Your Grace will go out into the deserts and eat a bite in xl. days and nights.

Bishop: Jr dörrft mich nicht heißen, was ich thun soll, ihr seydt noch zu gäl um den Schnabel, und zu wenig mich zu hessen; auß, auß! was höre ich.

Bishop: What then do you say to the mass which we celebrate in our own clothes, and not as the holy fathers have ordered? Give the sacrament to the people in both forms. But I do not think much of you, I do not hear any improvement.

Pastor: Sir, I will briefly answer that I take for myself the three evangelists and Paul, as your grace itself well knows.

Bishop: Oh, you do not understand, you are following the Greeks, on whom you may have referred to yourselves, these are wicked, disobedient people who have become

They were wise enough to be ruled by the Romans, and they have lived in their own heads all their lives.

Cantzler: I have also been in Grecia and seen their ways 1) to celebrate, but then not in their ordained ways and uses, also ordained by men 2c., what you see should amaze you even more than me.

Pastor: I am not attracted to the Greeks, I am surprised how you think I am. In that case, I give just as much to the Greeks as to the Romans; I stand on the Word of God, and want to be caught up with key doctrine, then I have the Scriptures. If the words of Christ, in which the mass is written, do not contain any of the things we have been saying before, they shall be arbitrary and free to me.

Bischoff: That is so much said, we are all wise, and all fathers of the churches are fools, know nothing. My dear friend, D. Martin does not yet know everything, would not persuade me to think more of him than of the four holy teachers, I am the least of them, would still like to tell D. Martin many things, since he has not thought about them. Martin in many words, since he has not thought about it.

Pastor: Shall I tell him about E. G.? The Christian, pious father Martinus has offered to teach, even about a child born of E. G.

Bishop: I don't say that I want to argue with him, I don't need to, because he is not in my area, which I thank God for, there is too much for both of you. But I will, if God wills, still bring you to follow me; I say it all because you have proven all things with Bible and Gospel, and so despise these holy fathers and doctors. I would like to know from you how you will prove all articles of faith with the gospel, and thus give nothing at all to the teachers.

Pastor: What article is not in the Gospel?

Bischoff: Descendit ad infernum, that is: Descended to the bright ones.

Pastor: Help God, he is in the stories of the apostles and in Paul.

Bischoff: Yes Paul, is that in the Gospel?

Pastor: Of course, in the Gospel, if G. Paullum does not want to let the Gospel be, we have a lot to do with G. Paullum.

Cantzler: Paulus enim habet alia uerba, quam Euangelium, si alia uerba, non est idem cum Euangelio, that is, Paulus has other word, then the gospel, because he then has other word, so he is ye nit a thing with the gospel.

1) "weyhe" should probably be "weyse".

Priest: There, there, nego consequentiam, that is, the folg schleußt nothing.

Cantzler: Yes, one may say: Licet non sit idem cum Euangelio explicite, tamen implicite, that is, Although Paul is not one with the Gospel explicitly, he is nevertheless verborgentlich.

Bishop: Wolan, let it be, we don't want to get into a dispute with him. But I must say one thing, I am surprised that you do not want to let the vestments and the white of the masses be anything, if you cannot deny that one should consider the body of Christ in the reverend sacrament.

Parish priest: Christ wanted to have memoriam sui, that is, his memory, with us, he did not leave us his body and blood, he also used clothes and characters, and said: Hoc facite in meam commemorationem &c., that is, diß thut zu meiner Gedächtnüß 2c. When one profits from the word of God, 1) or preaches, as St. Paul says, it freely creates more remembrance of God than mirror-image fencing.

Bishop: You are a fool, I can hear that well, a real fool.

Pfarrherr: Danck euweren G., wills also gerns von E. G. annehmen.

Bishop: It was true, you do it yourselves with your own words, you mirror the most holy office; you are like poor people, you want to emend and improve yourselves, and you are not special, do as pious priests should, according to the conscience of the Christian churches, take nothing new for leyb, let Martinum Martinum remain. I have known Martinum before, then you, one knows well, what life Martinus is, it is well told to us.

Cantzler: Tell me Pfarrherr, what kleydts is he wearing now?

Pfarrherr: Sein schwartze kappen; und was ists dann, was liegt am kleydt?

Cantzler: One knows well otherwise, my G. H. is also well under-guided, as he lies in all quassen, wild and lewd in words and gestures, is still far from being a god.

Parish priest: As I now have to say, that our Christian pious father Martinus is of a Christian pious life, and say, that E. G. reports to Milt 2), but as to all this, so E. G. has shown us better in no point, therefore we know ourselves in no point of the

If, however, the court is not satisfied with our prompt reply, we wish to send it to the court once again in writing, and reply to the court to the best of our ability. G.'s reply to the best of our ability, 3) with the hope that E. G. will be content to leave us undamaged for the time being.

Bishop: I will neither write nor reply, but I will give you four weeks to consider, if you will not improve in that time and recognize me as your Lord, and if you will not keep my submission and gracious promise, I will have to do so, as much as I feel.

Parson: G. H., we ask in all underthänigkeyt, E. G. wölle uns keynen Gewalt thun.

Bischoff: Neyn I, whether God wills.

Pastor: Then the Lord does us violence, if the Lord wants to force us to the habit of the churches against the word of God.

Bishop: I do not want to take anything unjustified, nor shall I be told anything unequal, all that I have felt, and out of obedience I may not fail to do. You have yourselves a vow, go and mend your ways.

Pastor: G. H., we thank your grace in and thänigkeyt, the gracious verhorens and unterweysens. We ask Your Grace to serve us obediently, in all loyalty, before we are forced to do anything contrary to the Scriptures and God's word.

B. About the visitation of the Bishop of Meissen, Joh. von Schleinitz.

757: Prince Frederick of Saxony's letter to this bishop concerning the three parish priests of Lochau, Schmiedeberg and Düben, whom the bishop wanted to have delivered into his custody, but which the prince refuses, and in addition makes several very edifying remarks concerning what the bishop said about his intention of the visitation: that he would like to see the bishop, in accordance with his office, abolish the concubines and other abuses that have become fashionable among the clergy. 1522.

1) "profits" (proLtk-ur), that is, publicly teaches.

2) "milt" - mild, that is inept, bad.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 142; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 93; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 132; and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 287.

3) "Fürlegen" here will probably be as much as embarrass, refute.

1st Venerable in God, dear friend! Your letter dated N. and received by us on the day N. at N., we have informed you in writing with your messenger that we wanted to give you an answer with our own message.

2. Accordingly, and as you have indicated in this letter, as the Highborn Princes, Mr. Frederick, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Roman Imperial Governor, Electors and Princes, and other decreed regimental councils in the realm, now assembled at Nuremberg, have written to you, and without such reminder, recognize yourselves guilty by reason of your episcopal office of 1) resisting those who belong to you out of ecclesiastical judicial compulsion, who have undertaken to set up such trades, contrary to the holy Christian church and for the special seduction of the common simple-minded people; and especially three parish priests, named as to Lochau, Schmiedeberg, 2) and thieves; also what therefore on the indicated time of the holy fast, and otherwise, will to do.

3. With request, we want to provide in our principalities, because there is now much rebellion, disgust, anger and damage against the clergy, by our gracious assistance, that these preachers and your skilful ones, and your persons, as you intend to do so, may carry out such kind and divine work unhindered and unashamedly, and that we will graciously assist, help and advise you against the disobedient, especially against the above-mentioned three pastors; Who, if they remain outside as disobedient, may then, by our gracious command, be answered to you in your obedience.

4 We do not wish to mislead Your Lordship by saying that it is not unpleasant for us to hear that you intend to use your office and that you intend to do so. For although all kinds of disagreements are now taking place, of which our oaths and friends, and especially Imperial Majesty's governors, electors, princes and other councillors of the realm, have reported in their letter, it is still not our place, as a secular prince, to judge these matters, as you know, since they are to be spiritual matters, nor is it our place to deal with them.

should. We would have liked to have seen and suffered that the harmful abuses against divine commandment, and especially with unseemly swearing and blasphemies, had noticeably increased everywhere, and that the clergy, contrary to the same divine and other statutes, had been allowed to have wives and concubines with them, had been met with seriousness by those who had jurisdiction over them. Up to now, however, little has been done about it, but sometimes it has been granted for the sake of money.

5. Therefore we are pleased that you use your office against the above-mentioned and other unseemly abuses, which are contrary to the divine commandments and sinful, and that you do so by yourselves, as you are entitled to do and have been entitled to do for a long time, also youthful (capable) preachers in your church, which understands our and other principalities, and the same abuses, blasphemies and other curses are practiced, preach the word of God along with other Christian statutes, and admonish the people to abstain from unchristian abuses. And although, to our understanding, your forefathers and your foundation, also the same clergy, have not received much nor any harm from us or from our principality before: but nevertheless we want to order and provide with ours, so that you and the same preachers, the good and godly works, which you intend, may now also practice unhindered and without fear.

But because it was not enough that someone was found who would not let himself be rejected by divine admonition and preaching of error, even against the three parish priests of E. L. legal proceedings were not yet taken, or that which was to be done to you in the case that they were found in unjust disobedience, was done or issued. For although we know to remember that we wrote to you before about some complaint that the priest of Schmiedeberg made against us about your official in Stolpen, it turned out that he shortened him with the citation.

Therefore, it would have been unnecessary to ask us at this time for help, assistance, advice, or for an order to respond to you, the same three parish priests, in your obedience, in the case indicated. For in the same case, and if due order is kept, we will, upon request, know how to show ourselves to the duty and fairness without reproach. For as much as God grants us mercy, we do not like to do otherwise than

1) Wittenberg and Jena: "theten", for which Walch, as it seems to us, correctly put: "thätet".

2) In the Wittenberg and in the Jena: "Sondeberg", we have retained Schmiedeberg from Walch.

3) In the Jenaer: "ereugen"; Wittenberger: erregen. Walch has here, as in the old edition, vol. VII, 2130, resolved the word "eräugen" by "ereignen". It is: to show oneself.

as a Christian prince is entitled to do. And since you have also indicated this in your letter from us and cannot do otherwise, for the glory of our hope, you should, according to the relationship, have indicated this to the deputies of the regiment on their letter from us. We did not want to restrain you from answering. imo Domini 1522.

758 Bishop John of Meissen's mandate to his parish priests and clergy concerning religion. May 6, 1522.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 141d; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 93; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 132; and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 286.

John, by the grace of God, Bishop of Meissen.

Worthy, dear devotees! After we found that through the ambiguous doctrine disruption is being introduced into our churches and much evil, we have had a correct Christian doctrine established, which, God willing, will bring about a noticeable improvement among the people in these areas, so that we intend to provide for you in the most beneficial way.

2. we have also taken into consideration all kinds of things that may serve Christian discipline and unity, so that we may not be accused of neglecting our episcopal office.

(3) But that all these things, which we have purposed for the good of our commanded people, may be the more abundantly and fruitfully accomplished and put to work, we, commanders, together with your people, desire to call upon God our Lord, that he may bestow the grace of his Spirit.

4 And if someone from the secular authorities wants to urge you to introduce something new, ask them diligently for it, and do not let them move you to do so, with the indication that we are all ready in work to promote what may be good for them and the people and the salvation of the souls, without doubt, they will like our faithful intention, and will do our pleasing opinion on all of this. Date under our Secret printed below, at Meissen, on the day of John ante Portam lati- nam [May 6], Anno 1522.

759 Des D. Andr. Carlstadt, Phil. Melanchthon and Joh. Agricola use Lei Joh. Schleinitz, Bishop of Meissen, for Jakob Seidler, a priest imprisoned for marriage and Luther's teachings. July 18, 1521.

This writing is found in Latin in the "fortgesetzten Sammlung von alten und neuen theologischen Sachen," 1723, p. 195, and somewhat more precisely in Kapp's "Nachlese," p. 463.

Translated from the Latin by Joh. Frick.

To the Reverend Father and Lord, Lord John, Bishop of Meissen, their well-deserved patron.

Hail in Christ! E. E. V. will not be surprised that we are writing to your venerable fatherhood more freely than is usual at this time, when you read the reasons for our undertaking. For we are driven to it by the danger of our dear confrere, Jakob Seydler, a preacher, and as far as we know, an honest man, whom E. E. V. has had imprisoned. Some articles have been written here, of which he has been accused as a not too pious man. Since it is uncertain which of these he accepts, and it is said that E. E. V. does not want to allow his answer to be published, we take upon ourselves the task of defending all of his articles that we have seen and which are perhaps falsely attributed to him by false scribes and others who are hostile to him.

2. it is said that he was imprisoned mainly for two reasons, namely because he, as a clergyman, took a wife, and because he was accepted and approved by Luther, I do not know what. But we remind them, out of Christian duty and obligation, as a Christian bishop, that they should not deal with a Christian in any other way than the Word of God commands, that is, that they should not overthrow his marriage and first show how the Lutheran doctrine is to be condemned, than that they should corrupt the soul of this man. What the papal canons set is none of the Christians' business, though they are not as strict as you are. For as far as marriage is concerned, neither the merely invented vow nor its canons can annul the permission to marry. For on the one hand those do not make vows of whom this is demanded; on the other hand they make vows according to the custom of their church, namely, that they will practice chastity as much as human weakness will permit. I think that, according to these words, the holy

The church was not allowed to have a council if those who had introduced this oath, which was common in their church, did not think that it was better to commit fornication than to take a wife. After that, neither the assemblies nor the bishops were allowed to burden the church with such human statutes, thereby endangering spiritual and physical happiness. For the bishops are only given the power to build, not to tear down. Moreover, it is also known that Germany adopted the constitution of the celibate state very late, and in fact quite forcedly, as the histories of the bishoprics of Cologne and Constance testify. As far as Luther's teachings are concerned, they will not do well if they would rather corrupt their prisoner than teach him what and why he should believe this and that. It is an important and precious thing about a Christian soul; it is bought at a high price, as the apostle says: "See that you do not offend him who bought our souls with his precious blood. Receive this man, and set him free again, if not for another reason, but at least for this reason, because he is a Christian. For he has not ceased to be a Christian when he has acted contrary to the ordinances of men.

3. E. E. V. will excuse our boldness in the best possible way, as they had no other intention than to entrust the welfare of our confrere to them in the best possible way. If they are cared for, they will do the office of a Christian bishop; in the contrary case, however, they will one day have to give an account to God of what they have done, not only to the judge of all flesh, but to Christ, the judge and avenger of souls. May the Lord keep them and give them his spirit. Wittenberg, July 18, 1521.

Your Honor

most devoted

Andr. Carlstadt.

Joh. Agricola.

Phil. Melanchthon.

Appendix of Luther's letters, which are listed in this fifteenth part of his complete writings and have now all been newly translated into German from the Erlangen "Briefwechsel Luthers".

No. 1.

(Wittenberg.)

(End of March 1518.) 1)

Luther to Spalatin.

After a remark about the fact that Spalatin was given the authority to absolve from reserved cases and to remit their penalties, Luther reports that the Bishop of Brandenburg had sent the Abbot of Lehnin to him to ask him to postpone the publication of his "Explanations" on the Theses on Indulgences and to stop issuing the "Sermon on Indulgences," and that he had promised to do so.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 39b; in Löscher's Reformation Acts, Vol. I, p. 839; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 70 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 177.

His Spalatin in the castle at Wittenberg.

Jesus.

Hail! That you have received the authority to remit all cases and to absolve from them, with the exception of a few, be grateful to the one who gave it to you. Well, the authority over the cases pleases me quite well; but how highly I value the remission of punishments, that is, the indulgence, you know, even though I do not firmly affirm anything about it.

1) Aurifaber has set this letter in the year 1517, and after him the other editors of Luther's letters except for the "Erlanger Briefwechsel", which sets it "at the end of March or beginning of April". We believe that it was written in March (according to Kolde, "Martin Luther", Vol. I, p. 150, it should have been written at the beginning of March), because Luther reported to Spalatin on April 3, 1518 (Erl. Briefw., I, 180) that the Bishop of Brandenburg had released him from his promise not to publish the "Explanations on the Power of Indulgences" (St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 100). About the timing of this letter, see what is said in the 18th volume of our edition, Introduction, p. 14 f., likewise the introductory remarks to No. 128 in this volume.

Head. I have had a similar judgment about the stations of the city of Rome 2) since they are nothing other than indulgences. For I think that the prayers or works that are put up to obtain it are better than the obtained indulgence itself. The rest I do not understand what you write about the patron spirits of the churches.

Yesterday the Abbot of Lehnin 3) came to see me in the name and place of the venerable Lord of Brandenburg, from whom he also brought me a letter, and reported to me on behalf of the same Lord, our Bishop, that he wished and asked that I delay the publication of my "Explanations" and any explanations about indulgences, if I had any; then he would have liked very much that the German Sermon [on indulgences] had not been published, and asked that it henceforth be neither issued nor sold.

But I am quite ashamed that he sent so great an abbot, then also that so great a bishop sent to me so humbly, and for this cause alone I have said, I am well content; I would rather obey than perform miracles, even if I could, and other things that might excuse my presumption. For though he held that in these things there was no error, but that all was orthodox, and though he himself reprobated those immoderate (so-called) proclamations of indulgences, ur-

2) See St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 183.

3) Valentin; his family name is not known. He died in 1542 as the last abbot of the Cistercian monastery at Lehnin, 2 miles from Brandenburg and 7-8 miles from Wittenberg. Sent by the Elector Joachim I, he was present at the disputation in Leipzig.

he nevertheless told them that for the sake of the offense, they should remain silent for a little while longer and be forgiven. Fare well in the Lord 2c.

Brother Martin Luther (Eluther.), 1)
Augustinian.

No. 2.

Wittenberg.

July 10, 1518.²)

Luther to Wenceslaus Link at Nuremberg.

Luther would send him the "Explanations," but they find not yet completed in print. He is warned not to travel to Augsburg because assassins are lurking about him, but he is confident. From his sermon on the ban and a fierce letter from Trutfetter to him.

This letter is printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 74; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, Vol. II, p. 619; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 129 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 210.

To the venerable Father Wenceslaus Link, theologian and ecclesiast of the Monastery of the Nuremberg Hermits 2c., his Superior in Christo.

JEsus.

1. Hail. Venerable Father! I would have sent the proofs of my theses, but our printer 3) is so slow that I am also tormented by this delay. There are almost eighteen theses completed which I have undertaken to send you. The trifles, 4) which I had published against my Timon 5) in an exceedingly scanty manner (nudius), are being spread again, far and wide, which I would rather not see, since in this I have yielded too much to the urging of my friends, although I have not done enough for their wishes either. Others write this

1) Around this time Luther very often signed himself Lsuttwrius, as can be seen from several letters that follow.

2) In the editions (except for the Erlangen correspondence), this letter is dated: äis XII k'rtrum, which is September 1. According to the content, however, the letter must be earlier, because the "Erläuterungen" were not yet ready for printing when it was written, but went out after mid-August. Therefore, instead of XII, it will read VII; that is July 10.

3) Johann Grünenberg in Wittenberg.

4) "Luther's Defense of his Sermon on Indulgences and Grace against Tetzel." St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 296; see the note there on the many editions of this writing.

5) This refers to Tetzel.

to my vehemence (impatientiae), while I rather played in it than was angry. If you want to know something about us besides, these your [two] Conrade 6) will tell enough.

Our vicar, Johann Lang, who is here today, says that he was warned by letter by Count Albrecht of Mansfeld that he should not suffer in any way that I leave Wittenberg. For it had been decreed by I don't know what kind of great men that I should be deceitfully put to death either by strangulation or by drowning. 7) I am clearly with Jeremiah [Cap. 15, 10.] the man against whom everyone quarrels and wrangles, because I daily provoke the Pharisees with new teachings (as they call it). But I, as I am aware that I teach nothing but the purest theology, have known for a long time that it would happen that I would preach an annoyance to the exceedingly holy Jews and a foolishness to the exceedingly wise Greeks.

(3) But I hope to be a debtor to Jesus Christ, who may also say to me (Acts 9:16), "I will show him how much he must suffer for my name's sake. 9, 16.): "I will show him how much he must suffer for my name's sake." For if he does not say this, why did he put me in the quite insurmountable office of this word? or why did he not teach other things that I should speak? It has been his holy will. The more they threaten, the more confident I am: my wife and my children are provided for; the fields, the houses and all property are ordered; now my honor and my name will be destroyed. Only one thing is left, the weak and broken wretched body: if they take it away, they will make me poorer by two or by one hour of life, but they will not take the soul. I sing with Johannes Reuchlin: 8) He who is poor fears nothing, he can lose nothing, but he sits joyfully in good hope, for he hopes to gain.

4. I know that the word of Christ comes from An-

6) Perhaps Conrad Kleies from the monastery of the hermit brothers in Nuremberg and Conrad Volckamer (Wittenberger p. 64 and p. 70) are meant. (Erl. Briefw.)

7) In Latin: vsl baptiser morteru - or to be baptized unto death.

8) Compare No. 132 a. E. in this volume.

The word of Christ, which began in the world, is of such a nature that the one who wants to lead it in the world must necessarily leave everything with the apostles and renounce everything, expecting death at every hour. If this were not so, it would not be the word of Christ; with death it was purchased, with many deaths it was spread, with many deaths it was resounded; with many deaths it must also be resounded or brought again. For thus our bridegroom is a blood bridegroom to us [Ex. 4:25 ff]. Therefore, pray that the Lord Jesus may multiply and raise the spirit of his believing sinner.

The other day I delivered a sermon to the people on the power of the ban, in which I casually punished the tyranny and ignorance of the dirty rabble of the officials, the commissioners and the vrcare. They are all surprised that they have never heard such a thing. After that, we are all waiting to see what evil will befall me in the future; I have lit a new fire. But so does the word of truth, the sign that is contradicted. I had wanted to publicly discuss (disputare) the same thing, but behold, the rumor of it came out beforehand and moved many great people so much that my bishop of Brandenburg sent a noble messenger to me and demanded that I should postpone this discussion, which I also did and still do, especially since my friends also advise me to do so. See what a monstrous man I must be, whose intention is also unpleasant.

The Doctor of Eisenach 2) has sent me a letter that is completely full of great zeal (for that is what one must call this man's exceedingly passionate outpourings [passio- nissimas passionēs] with an honorable name), far more bitter than the one you heard in the chapter with ears (CORAM); he said the same thing to my face at Erfurt. These people are tormented to madness by the fact that they are to become fools in Christ, and that it is judged that the honorable Magistri nostri have been completely wrong (toto orbe) for such a long time. I do not care about all the fools and blamers, if only Christ will give me a

1) St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 874. Compare also the introduction there, p. 39d.

2) Jodocus Truttfetter at Erfurt.

gracious God, to whom I am willing to give up the office of the word. I have written this in so many words because I enjoyed chatting with you. Farewell. Wittenberg, on the day of the seven brothers [July 10] 1518. Brother Martin Luther.

No. 3.

Wittenberg.

March 21, 1518.

Luther to Johann Lang.

Luther sends a part of Carlstadt's interpretations of the book de Spiritu et litera, reports on the raging of the preachers of indulgences against him, and that he is advised not to go to Heidelberg because of the danger, but that he will do so anyway. About the burning of Tetzels counter-theses by the students.

Handwritten is this letter in the Ooä. Ootkan. 399, koi. 125. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 53 d; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. II, p. 606; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 97 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. I, p. 169.

To his venerable father Johann Lang, licentiate of sacred theology, prior of the Augustinian hermits in Erfurt, his superior in the Lord.

JEsus.

Hail! I had sent to you, most venerable father, some of Carlstadt's interpretations of the book "Of the Spirit and the Letter", as well as 3) to some others; but my memory has left me, and I do not know how many and to whom I delivered them. Now, if you have received all of them, you must have nine, namely A. B, Cc. Ccc. d. 1. e. f.; but if not, write again and I will refund them. For so far we have printed them. For Doctor Carlstadt was down with fever and is still lying down; so the work is at a standstill and remains at a standstill.

2) The indulgence talkers thunder extraordinarily against me from the pulpit, so that they finally 4) do not have enough horrible names with which they can call me. They add threats in which they promise the people, one, that within a fortnight, the other, that within a month I will most certainly be

3) Here the Erl. Briefw. has adopted the reading of the 6oä. 6otk.: orr-n nonnullis sliis, from which we cannot extract a suitable sense.

4) With the other editions, we have against the Erl. Briefw. adopted tanäsm instead of tantum.

should be burned. They also issue counter-theses, so that I fear that they will burst from the quantity and magnitude of their anger. Yes, I am advised by all that I should not go to Heidelberg 1) so that they do not accomplish by trickery against me what they cannot do by force. But I will comply with obedience and go there on foot, also (God willing) come through Erfurt; but do not expect me, because I will hardly leave on Tuesday after Quasimodogeniti [April 13] 2). Our prince, who is extraordinarily inclined towards these well-founded studies of theology, eagerly protects me and Carlstadt without being asked to do so, and will in no way suffer that they drag me to Rome, which they know very well and are sufficiently annoyed about.

3. But so that you may be warned, if the rumor of the burning of Tetzel's theses comes to you, that someone may not add something (as it tends to happen) about what really happened, this is the incident: The students - as they are extremely weary of the old sophistical nature, but have a great desire for the Holy Bible, perhaps also in an effort to show me favor - having learned that a man had arrived from Halle who was sent by Tetzel, the author of the theses, they immediately set about it, frightening the man that he might dare to bring such things here. Some of them took some, but others snatched them from him, and all the rest, about eight hundred [copies] (after the announcement and convocation had been made beforehand: if anyone wanted to be present at the burning and the funeral of Tetzel's theses, he should come to the marketplace at two o'clock), they burned, and that without the knowledge of the prince, the council, the rector and all of us. Certainly, I and everyone dislike this grave injustice done to man by our people. I am not to blame, but I fear that the whole thing will be too much for me.

1) See the introduction to the 18th volume of the St. Louis edition, pp. 3b f.

2) But Luther left Wittenberg already on April 9. See I. o. p. 4 a.

will be counted. There is a lot of talk about this matter everywhere, but there is even more indignation among those, which is not entirely unjust. I do not know what will happen, only that my danger will become even more dangerous.

4 Doctor Conrad Wimpina is called by all as the author of these theses, 3) and I consider it certain that it is so. Therefore, I am sending you a copy that has escaped the fire, so that you may see how they rage against me. Our school thrives on the hope that we expect to have lessons on two, yes, three languages, on Pliny, mathematics, Quintilian, and several other very good ones, leaving aside the unrhymed lessons on Peter Hispanus, 4) Tartaretus, and Aristotle. And this pleases the prince and has already been taken into consultation, and it is being negotiated. Commend me to the fathers and brothers. I greet the father M. Usingen and the father M. Johannes Nathin in the same way. Wittenberg, on the day of St. Benedict [March 21] 1518. Brother Martin Eleutherius.

No. 4.

Wittenberg.

February 15, 1518.

Luther to Spalatin.

On the attitude in which one must perform good works; on the value of indulgences, and that alms are better without proof. Luther regrets that it is claimed that he was inspired by the Elector to argue about indulgences.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 49b; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, Vol. II, p. 602; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 90 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 153.

His Georg Spalatin, his best friend among his friends.

JEsus.

1st Hail! As you write, yes, prescribe that I should do, so I do, dearest Spa-.

3) See St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 12 b.

4) In the thirteenth century, Petrus Hispanus wrote a textbook on logic, Lummlas loZioales. - Petrus Tartaretus, towards the end of the fifteenth century, a Scotist and commentator on Petrus Hispanus, was on the commission chosen by the University of Paris to examine Reuchlin's "Augenspiegel".

Latin, that through you I thank the most noble prince for the excellent and truly princely gift of game, which is given to our young (novellis, as they are called) magisters, and I have told everyone that it was given by the prince. But I was extraordinarily and even more pleased by the Prince's disposition, who (as you write) is exceedingly gracious and willing to give, since even a man loves a cheerful giver.

You again add two small questions. One, what kind of mind (intentio) he must have who wants to sacrifice or do other godly works. I answer briefly: One must always have the attitude of despair and confidence in every work; namely, despair because of you and your work, but confidence because of God and His mercy. For thus saith the Spirit [Ps. 147:11], "The LORD hath pleasure in them that fear him, that hope in his goodness." For fear is a kind of beginning of despair. And to speak plainly: as often as you want to sacrifice or do works, you must know and firmly believe without any doubt that such your work cannot please God at all, no matter how good, great and laborious it may be, but is worthy of rejection. Therefore, first be your judge, and accuse yourself together with your work as such a person and confess it before God. This confession and accusation (for it comes from the fear of the divine judgment, before which no work can stand) will cause it to be pleasing; indeed, both the work and its accusation are pleasing to God, so that God has commanded us good works more to be a cause for such our accusation and fear of Him than that He should seek to be served by them. Thus saith the Psalm [Ps. 143:2], "Go not into judgment with thy servant, for in thy sight no living man is righteous." And in another place it is said [Proverbs 18:17, Vulg.], "The righteous first accuses himself." O, a description of justice unheard of for a long time! What is justice? It is an indictment of oneself. What is a righteous man? One who accuses himself. Why? Because he preempts the judgment of God, and condemns the very thing that God condemns, namely himself. Therefore he is of one mind with God in all things, makes the same judgment, has the same will with God, and for this reason is true, just 2c. Thus says St. Augustine in the 9th book [Cap. 13] of his Confessions: Woe to the life of man, however praiseworthy it may be, if it is judged without mercy; and St. Jerome, acting on the word Ps. 32, 6.: "For this shall all the saints beseech thee in due time," in the Dialogue against Pelagius [Book 2, Cap. 4], says: 1) How is he holy, if he beseeches for ungodliness? or how is he ungodly, if he is holy? 2c. Thus St. Augustine will teach thee throughout that all saints are sinners. Therefore, if you have thus despaired of yourself and humbly confess this to the Lord, then you can take comfort in His mercy without any doubt.

For he who doubts his mercy sins no less than he who trusts in his own works. He wants us to rely firmly on him, so that we may completely despair of ourselves. Thus 2) he formerly modeled it in the Law of Moses [5th book, chap. 24, 6.], where he commands that one should not take the lowest and the highest millstone from the debtor, that is, that one should not take away from the sinner either hope or fear, but grind and grind him between the two. Thus St. Job [Cap. 9, 28. Vulg.] feared because of all his works, and in Proverbs 3) (Cap. 28, 14.) it is said, "Blessed is he that feareth all things." Therefore, you will only do so much in the right way of good works as much as you are comforted by the mercy of God and despair of your works. For then you are no longer working for your own glory, but God is working in you for His glory, because nothing is sought here but that His mercy be glorified in us, not that we blow ourselves out with our works against God. And this is the best, only and final intention (intentio) of all [works].

4. secondly [you ask] about the power of the

1) Compare St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 233.

2) In the Erlanger si instead of sie; probably a printing error.

3) In Aurifaber and De Wette it says: Loel. o. IX, which is Loeliasstas sPrediger Salomo; in the Erlanger Briefwechsel: Lookkissstieus (Sirach). Both are incorrect. In one note the Erlanger has given the correct place.

indulgence, how much he is able to do. This matter still hangs in doubt, and my disputation wavers back and forth among blasphemies. But I will say two things; the first to you alone and to our friends, until the matter is published: namely, that nowadays indulgences seem to me to be nothing but a distraction of souls, and that they are of no use at all, except for those who snore and are lazy in the way of Christ. Although our Carlstadt does not hold this opinion, it is nevertheless certain to me that he regards him as nothing. For in order to get rid of this disruption, I have, out of love for the truth, entered the dangerous labyrinth of disputation and aroused innumerable minotaurs, yes, rhadamanthotaur and aeacdaurs 1) against me.

The second thing, in which there is no doubt, which even my adversaries are forced to confess, and the whole church, is this: that almsgiving and the support of one's neighbor is incomparably better than indulgences. Therefore, you are advised not to buy indulgences as long as you can find poor and needy neighbors to whom you give what you would have given for indulgences. If you do otherwise, I am excused, you may see. I do not doubt that he deserves wrath who abandons the poor and buys indulgences. But you will see more, God willing, when I have published the proofs of our theses. For I am forced to do so by those people who are cruder than crudeness itself, who proclaim me a heretic in all their sermons, and even go so far in their host that they seek to make the Wittenberg University infamous and heretical for my sake. I am much more concerned with how to keep myself in check, so that I do not despise them and sin against Christ, than how to triumph over them. For they are so completely devoid of all human and divine learning that it would be an exceedingly great shame to argue with them, and yet this very ignorance produces in them an incredible insolence and a more than brazen forehead. But they are hearty alone by the shadows of their larvae and night ghosts, of which they are so full, and that I, too, murmur after their manner, inessentiali, that one must completely despair of their improvement. There is one thing I would like to let you know that I am very sorry about, namely that these tongue-thrashers and many others with them have armed themselves with a new artifice, and gossip that everything I do comes from our most noble prince, as if I were incited by him to spite the archbishop of Magdeburg. Please, advise what one should do here; whether one should not make this known to the prince. I regret very much that the prince should come under suspicion for my sake; and that I should be the cause of disagreement between such great princes, that I detest and fear very much.

1) Minos, Rhadamanthus and Aeacus were the judges of the underworld, here transformed into monsters, like the Minotaur, the guardian of the labyrinth.

(6) I can suffer the prince to offer me to any disputation or judgment (if only I am given safe conduct), only so that they do not also involve the innocent prince in my hatred. See, what a horrible kind of people they are, and a people of darkness, hostile to the light. They have found Johannes Reuchlin over three countries away and brought him here against his will; they despise me, who invite and ask at the door, and gossip in the corners, because they see that they cannot defend themselves. But now take care and forgive me that I have written so long and made so many words. For I have been talking to a friend. From our monastery, February 15, 1518.

Brother Martin Eleutherius, Augustinian.

No. 5.

January 14, 1519. 2)

(Wittenberg.)

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther tells of an argument he had about Thomas and Aristotle at a banquet to which Emser had invited him in Dresden, and corrects the reports that had been spread about it; the sermon he had given in Dresden at that time had also been distorted. Furthermore, he comments on the good works of a friend for the benefit of a deceased person. In the postscript, he says that he will not answer Silvester's writing.

2) In the original, by Luther's oversight, the year is 1518 and so in all previous editions except the Erlanger Briefwechsel. Decisive for the year 1519 is the mention of Silvester's counter-writing (the "replica"),

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 44 b; in Löschner's Ref.-Acta, Vol. II, p. 597; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 83 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 350.

¹⁾ JEsus.

1st Hail! You need not be surprised, my dear Spalatin, that some claim that I was overcome at a banquet in Dresden; they have long since said other things as well, whatever they liked. Of course, I am almost more forced than invited by Hieronymus Emser together with our Johann Lang 2) and our prior in Dresden to an evening get-together. Since I thought I was among friends here, I soon realized that I had fallen in the midst of Laurer. There was a little Leipzig Magister, 3) a bad Thomist, who imagined that he knew everything extraordinarily well. As he was full of hatred towards me, he first received me in a friendly manner, but finally, after a disputation had arisen, he attacked me violently and with shouting. In the meantime, without my knowing it, a mendicant monk from the Order of Preachers was standing outside, eavesdropping on everything, who (I heard later) boastfully said that he had been extraordinarily irritated, and had hardly been able to control himself that he had not stepped out, spat in my face and called me all kinds of names. It had tormented this person so much that I had refuted Thomas to that little magister. This is the man who boasts everywhere to this day that I had been so completely convicted that I could not have answered either a Latin or a German word. Because we argued (as it is wont to happen) with the German language mixed in, he claimed quite confidently that I did not understand a word of Latin.

By the way, the disputation was about the trivial things of Aristotle and Thomas. I showed that neither Thomas nor all Thomists together had understood even one chapter in Aristotle. Finally, since the latter was glorious, I asked him to describe to me, with all the powers of Thomistic scholarship, what it means to fulfill God's commandments. I know, I said, that there is no Thomist who knows that. Here the plebeian man, still conscious of his ignorance, exclaimed: Give teaching money (for so [pastum] is the name given to the money paid to schoolmasters); for what else could he answer, since he did not know anything else? Laughing at this insipid answer, we parted. Later, the prior of Dresden wrote to me how they had bragged and made me shameful even at the court of the prince as an unlearned, arrogant person and I don't know with how many other names; likewise, that they had twisted the sermon I had held at the castle (against the truth) in every possible way. I had put on a quite theological history of certain three virgins, of which they afterwards gossiped that these three had been called by me at the court of the prince. In short, I have had to suffer viper-breeds [Luc. 3, 7.], who wanted everything and could do nothing, thinking that it would take away from their honor if they left something unblamed about me. I despised these larvae and wrote to him again that he should be quiet and also let my Cain and Judas live. But Hieronymus Emser has eagerly apologized for it, has also sworn, since he recently 4) came to me in Leipzig, that he had not laid an ambush against me. I said, as I still say today, that I despised such a trivial rage. If they are so learned, there are letters and paper; they may publish something and show the honor of their splendid learning. The sermon was about St. Jacob the Greater, whose feast day was then [July 25] 5), about the Gospel [Matth.

4) On January 7, 1519 or the following days. (Erl. Briefw.)

5) This sermon was preached in 1518, not, as one has concluded from the incorrect year of this letter, in 1517.

St. Louiser Ausg., Bd. XVIII, 412), which was published in Rome in November 1518 and probably reached Luther's hands in December, and the information that Luther was busy with a "Weise wie man beichten soll" (Walch, St. Louiser Ausg., Bd. X, 2158), which was published in 1519, as well as some other things, which are mentioned further down in the letter.

1) The original is missing the address.

2) The same was present as district vicar at an Augustinian convention held in Dresden at that time. - The prior in Dresden was Melchior Mirisch.

3) According to Linässl Colloquia, tom. I, p. 152 it was called Weißestadt. - The Dominicaner is called there "a gray monk".

20,20-23]: "You do not know what you ask", where I have punished the foolish desires of people who pray to God, and taught what a Christian should ask.

What happened to the bishop of Meissen, I am very surprised about, unless he lets the word of the wise man 1) be true in itself: The positions of honor change the customs, with the usual addition: but rarely for the better. I have never seen the man, I only know that he was very friendly with our Vicarius before. But you need not be surprised, my dear Spalatin, that evil is said about me. That is what I like to hear; if I were not reviled, I would not believe that what I do is from God. Christ must be made a sign to be contradicted, and a case for many, not of the Gentiles, but of Israel and the elect, and of excellent men, as the 78th Psalm, v. 31, says: "And he slew their fat ones (that is, the great ones, the most distinguished), and struck down the best of Israel." These, I say, are the works of GOD, to slay and to strike down, not the yeast of Israel (as He says through the prophet [Is. 49, 6.]), but to bruise the chiefs, and the kings and men like Pharaoh, to prove His power.

(3) I confidently despise that very questionable man (scrupulo8iolum) who thinks that I have fallen under the spell. For I do not fear these decrees at all, these statutes of men (which those people alone fear, but which God despises without end), so that I have the confidence to wage war against them one day. The wrath of the decrees does not bind, nor does it harm, if the mercy of Christ protects. If only God wanted that for the one who wants to lead God's cause, this would be the highest and only cause for fear.

I am surprised that Silvester's antics have not been handed over to you by the prior at Grimma, since my letter, which left at the same time as those, has arrived. I have also enclosed Lucian's conversation, which is

1) Loolesiastioi - Sirachs. Perhaps Lcolssiast68, Serm. Sal. 10,6. is meant. - The bishop of Meissen is Johann Schleinitz, who attained this dignity on 16 October 1518 as John VII.

Mosellanus has recently translated it into Latin, 2) so that, when it has been read, I will get it back together with the antics. There were also some packets of letters added, which were brought from elsewhere and addressed to you. You can ask in Grimma if you have not received them yet. From our Hebrews 3) another time.

(4) The good work done for the soul of a deceased person who is already blessed, my dear, that friend should not think too highly of it, nor should he argue about whom it benefits. It is certain that every good work first benefits the one who does it, and all the more so the more it is done to others. For spiritual goods are not given in the same way as bodily goods. With the latter, the giver becomes poorer, but with the latter, richer. The more the spirit is given, the more it increases; the more the flesh is given, the more it decreases. And for this reason the work is not done in vain, even if the soul does not need it. For here everything is common, and there is no good work that does not first include the common benefit and the will of God, that is, that such a work is to be done for this or that soul, if God wants it to benefit it. But if it is for the benefit of another, it is first and foremost for the benefit of the community of the whole Church. But this attitude of the spirit is corrupted by the inclination of the flesh, according to which one is accustomed to do works only for one soul, to the exclusion, as it were, of the others. It is up to us to do works, it is up to God to turn to them and to listen to them. About the rest at another time.

I also send you the letter of Mr. Sigisnund of Clumma, 4) so that you can go to un-

2) IEiani äialoZi äuo Okaron stla-tin6,?. Mosellano. HxAae 1518. The preface addressed to Prince Frederick, son of Duke George, is dated March 7, 1518.

3) Böschenstein, as the first professor of Hebrew in Wittenberg, arrived there at the beginning of November 1518.

4) According to the Pirna monk in Menke, II, 1498 "a free gentleman sat with Löbrasse in Lausnicz". - This matter also proves that our letter belongs to the year 1519, because a few days later, on January 24, 1519, Luther again urges Spalatin to answer him what he should write.

I want you to answer what I am to tell him by agreement. Be well. I am dealing with a "way to confess" 1). January 14, 1519. 2) Martin Eleutherius.

Our people think that one should not answer to Silvester, yes, we agree that it is a fictitious Silvester from the dark ones, 3) who has put such inconsistencies to man for mockery in order to challenge me against him. Farewell.

No. 6.

(Wittenberg.)

February 12, 1519.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther sends the interpretation of the passage Joh. 6.37. ff. requested by the Elector through Spalatin. (St. Louis edition, vol. VIII, 258).⁴) reports the upcoming disputation with Eck and the new edition of the German Lord's Prayer, and speaks compassionately about Tetzel. In the postscript, he reports on a conversation with the bishop of Brandenburg.

Our letter is found handwritten in 6o6. Ien. u. col. 268. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 146; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. III, p. 963; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 223 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. I, p. 412.

To his extremely dear Georg Spalatin, Christ's servant, canon of Altenburg.

JEsus.

1st Hail! I thank you, dear Spalatin, for your service and the acceleration [of this matter]. 5) I send what you have requested in the name of the most Serene Prince, about the Gospel of John, but from the Steg-.

1) "A Brief Instruction on How to Confess," Walch, St. Louis ed. vol. X, 2158, published in 1519.

2) In the original incorrect: 1518.

3) That is, as they occur in the epistolis obscuriorum virorum.

4) In the collections of letters, the same has the form of a letter by the heading: "JEsus", by the salutation: "Grace and peace in Christ, my dear Spalatin!" and the signature: "Brother Martin Luther, v." So in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 142 b; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, Vol. III, p. 959; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 224 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 414. Otherwise, everything is as we have reported it in the eighth volume I. above. The Erlangen edition notes that this interpretation is probably only an appendix to our letter, and has dated it accordingly.

5) This will probably refer to the change of the study plan requested by Luther on February 7 and the salary increase of Melancthon. De Wette, Vol. I, p. 221.

ripe. I did look up Chrysostom, but he treats this passage more coldly than I would like. Augustine comes closer, but somewhat darkly; indeed, in other words, I have followed his opinion. If I have missed anything, do not be surprised, both because I am a man, and because it is not the Gospel of Matthaei, but of John, in which, we find, few have labored. Of course, this would be a study to which I would be very willing to devote myself, if only I were free to do so.

Eck and I will fight with each other after Easter in Leipzig, as you can see here. I have the German Vater-Unser under my hands to publish it anew. 6) I will write to Johann Wacker shortly. I regret that Tetzel and his life (salutem) have come into such distress, and that his things are being exposed; 7) I would much rather, if it could be, that he be preserved with honors after he has improved to some extent. Through his disgrace nothing falls to me, as through his honor nothing has fallen from me. I cannot wonder enough that he has dared to extract so much money from the very poor people, from which even a bishop could live, yes, an apostle. Farewell and pray for me. February 12, 1519.

Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

I have been in Wittenberg with the venerable Lord Bishop of Brandenburg, and he has taken me to task with many words, but kindly, that I subject myself to such great things. I realize that the bishops are now finally becoming wise, namely that it would have been their office, which they see in me above all things, 8) and are therefore somewhat ashamed. They call me proud and bold, but neither of them I have denied; but they are not the people who know what both God and we ourselves are.

6) Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. VII, 752.

7) Compare Miltizen's letter to Pfeffinger of Jan. 22, 1519, No. 290 in this volume.

8) It seems to us the reading, which the editions offer: quock in IL6 vickent prs686rtirn, somewhat questionable; also the old translator went around it and offers: "was ich nun thue". It would probably be read: quoa "rv6 villkut praestiturn "what I, as you see, have carried out".

No. 7.

Wittenberg.

May 18, 1518.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther informs Spalatin that he has returned from the Heidelberg chapter, describes the reception he received there, the disputation that took place, and his conversations with Trutfetter and Usingen at Erfurt.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltischeu Gesamt- Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 62; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, Vol. II, p. 614; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. IIO and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 191.

His Spalatin, his very learned and loving friend.

JEsus.

Hail! I have finally returned, my dear Spalatin, to our home, by Christ's grace, and came to Wittenberg on the Saturday after Ascension Day [May 15]. However, I returned by wagon, while I had left on foot, since I was forced by the superiors to travel with the Nurembergers as far as near Würzburg, and from there with the Erfurters, but from Erfurt with the Eislebeners, who finally brought me to Wittenberg at their expense and with their horses. I was completely comfortable on the whole way and food and trailik suited me extraordinarily well, so that some think that I have become stouter and more corpulent.

The most illustrious prince, Count Palatine Wolfgang, received me very well, as did the Magister Jakob Simler, 1) and also the Hofmeister Hase [Hazijs]. For he invited me, that is, Father Vicarin Staupitz and our Lang, who is now Provincial Vicar, and we enjoyed with each other a lovely and pleasant conversation, ate and drank and looked at all the jewels 2) in the court chapel, then the armory, indeed everything that the truly royal and high princely castle has in ornaments. Magister Jakob was able to read the letter written on my account by our

1) He had been the tutor of Prince Wolfgang of the Palatinate and had accompanied him to the University of Wittenberg in 1515, and was therefore already acquainted with Luther.

2) The jewels in the Church of the Holy Spirit, which among other things also had a piece of Christ's cross and a piece of his skirt, both set in crystal. (Erl. Briefw.)

Princes not enough praise, saying in his Neckar language, "You have by GOD a kystlichen Credenz." Nothing was lacking that could have served only to give a friendly reception.

Furthermore, the doctors willingly admitted my disputation 3) and argued with me with such modesty that they are very valuable to me for that reason. For although the theology seemed foreign to them, they nevertheless fought against it shrewdly and beautifully, with the exception of the one who was the fifth and youngest doctor 4) who made the whole audience laugh, because he said: "If the peasants heard this, they would certainly stone you and kill you. To the people of Erfurt, my theology is deadly food, 5) and especially the Doctor of Eisenach has put a black theta 6) in front of all my sentences, and has written a letter to me, with which he would like to punish even someone ignorant in dialectics, let alone in theology.

I would also have disputed with them, if the time of the petitions 7) had not prevented it, but I have verbally negotiated with the Doctor of Eisenach, and at least managed that he realized that he could neither prove his own, nor refute mine, yes, that rather their opinions are the animal of which it is said that it has eaten itself. But in vain one tells a story to a deaf person; they stubbornly hold on to their vain distinctions, even though they must confess that they are built on no other foundation than on the dictamine (as they call it) of natural reason, which with us is nothing else than the chaos of darkness, which we have no other reason for.

3) Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XVIII, 36 and Introduction, p. 4.

4) This was Georg Niger from Löwenstein. The other four doctors of theology in Heidelberg at that time were Marcus Steiß, Loren; Wolf from Speier, Johann Hosser and Peter Scheibenhard from Deidesheim.

5) To words orumde, a proverbial way of speaking: Reheated cabbage brings death. - "The Doctor of Eisenach" is Jodocus Trutfetter.

6) On the tuning tables of the ancients, theta meant i-ävaT-oc, the verdict of damnation.

7) kies litaniarum is the time of supplications, which were made in the so-called cross week, after the Sunday Rogate.

Preach light as Christ JESum, the true and only light.

5. with Doctor Usingen I acted more than with anyone else to persuade him (for he was my traveling companion on the wagon), but I don't know if I accomplished anything; I left him pensive and full of wonder. It is something so great when one is hardened in evil opinions. By the way, the minds of the young and the whole younger generation differ immensely 1) from those in their opinions, and I have extraordinarily good hope that just as Christ went to the Gentiles when he was rejected by the Jews, so also now his true theology, which those delusional old men reject, will go to the youth.

6 So much from me. Finally, I hope and pray that you will not be unmindful of our school, that is, that you will take care of the introduction of the Greek and Hebrew languages. 2) I believe that you have seen the study plan (indicem) of the Leipzig University, which imitates us, as always. In it, they boast of many lectures that I do not believe will be held.

The letter to the most illustrious prince, the bishop of Naumburg, I could not have arranged more appropriately than through you. Therefore, you will do what, as you see, your best friends ask of you. Fare well in the Lord. From our monastery, May 18, 1518.

Brother Martin Eleutherius, Augustinian.

No. 8.

(Wittenberg.)

1. September 1518.

Luther to Johann Staupitz.

Luther declares that he will confidently continue in the assertion of truth and will answer the Prierias even more sharply if the latter does not desist; then he reports on matters of the Wittenberg University and finally on the reasons that led him to publish the Sermon on the Ban.

This letter is found in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 78d; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. II, p. 624; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 137 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. I, p. 223.

To the venerable and dear father, Johann Staupitz, 3) Vicar of the Hermits of St. Augustine, his patron and superior to be highly venerated in Christ.

JESus.

Hail! Do not doubt, my venerable father, that I will be free in investigating and treating the Word of God. For I am not in the least moved by that citation 4) nor by the threats that have been issued. I suffer, as you know, incomparably worse things, which require me to consider these temporal and momentary flashes as quite light, except that I sincerely want to honor the ecclesiastical power. If I am now banished by a man, I fear only to give offense to you, to whom, as I confidently believe, God has given a right and reliable judgment in things.

You will see that the explanations 5) and my answers are freer in some places than perhaps you could approve of, also that they are intolerable to the Roman flatterers; but the explanations were out, otherwise I would have moderated them. But if this Silvester and uncouth (sylvestreus) sophist should begin to continue and challenge me with other posts, then I will not play again, but let my head and my pen shoot the reins, and show him that also in Germany there are people who understand their and the Roman tricks, and wish that this should happen the sooner the better. For a long time and all too much 6) the Romans have been mocking us as their fools and dolts by their endless intrigues and twists and tricks, and do not deceive us both by trickery and by

3) Staupitz was in Rappoltswiller in Alsace on August 28.

4) Luther's citation to Rome arrived on August 7.

5) The "Explanations" on the Theses on Indulgences are found in the St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 100; Luther's "Reply to the Dialogue >of the Prierias," idia. col. 344.

6) Aurifaber: Minis, probably a printing error instead of: nimis.

1) per öik 6tä Traaül- == through two octaves.

2) Already on April 25, the Elector had written to Reuchlin about the appointment of a Greek and Hebrew teacher, Seckendorf, Hist. LutU., lid I, A34, aa6.2. Reuchlin's answer of May 7 in Oorp. Lek., I, x, 27, no. 14.

they lead us openly and unashamedly on a fool's rope.

3. for their thoughts and aspirations, as I see, are that the kingdom of truth, which is Christ's, should not be the kingdom of truth, since they pursue with unanimous rage that the truth should not be heard and acted upon in their own kingdom. I wish to be a part of this kingdom, if not with a true life, then certainly with a true tongue and heart, which at least confesses in truth that which is in any case improved. And I learn that the people are groaning for the voice of their shepherd Christ and that even the young people are glowing with an extraordinary desire for the holy Scriptures. The Greek lecture has been started among us, and we are all doing Greek for the sake of understanding the Bible. We are also expecting a Hebrew 1) and the prince is taking care of it.

I preached a sermon at Wittenberg on the ban, which was very necessary for the people because of the harsh tortures of the officials against our people. Although all our jurists and theologians approve of it, it is nevertheless astonishing how great a conflagration the all-grateful laureates have endeavored to arouse from it, which they have caught from my mouth and then put into extremely spiteful articles 2) and have spread everywhere and are still spreading, to the great persecution of my name. Yes, at Augsburg it is going around among the great and embittering many. In Dresden, my sermon has been reproached to my face, 3) by citing some of its articles. Behold how hatefully I am sought, and how I am fenced in on every side with thorns; but Christ lives and reigns yesterday and today and forever. My conscience testifies to me that I have taught the truth, and if I speak the truth, I shall be judged for the sake of it.

1) Johann Böschenstein.

2) Some points from this sermon were put into thesis form and spread everywhere, also, provided with a very bitter epigram about the Roman Gerz, came to Augsburg to the Imperial Diet and to Dresden and reached the hands of the two Roman legates, as Spalatin wrote to Luther on September 5 (Burkhardt, p. 11).

3) From Emser, when Luther was in Dresden on July 25.

hated all the more for its sake. 4) It is the body of Rebecca: the children must bump into each other in it, so that the mother is also in danger.

Behold, this was the cause that I issued this sermon 5) in order that I might counter those poisonous articles, or give light to what had not been rightly understood. You pray for me that I may not be too cheerful and confident in this challenge. I pray that God may not impute it to those. They also have zeal for God, as I also testify to them, but a completely unlearned zeal, until Jesus Christ also enlightens them with the same light of ours. May He keep you in His honor and His Church for salvation, Amen. On the day of Aegidius [Sept. 1] 1518.

Brother Martin Luther.

No. 9.

Wittenberg.

September 2, 1518.

Luther to Spalatin in Augsburg.

Luther wants the Elector to have no inconvenience from his dealings and to leave everything up to him. A proposal to change the curriculum at the university. An expression of displeasure at the Roman greed. A recommendation by Melancthon.

The original of this letter can be found in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 80; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, Vol. II, p. 626; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 139 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 226.

To his very learned Georg. Spalatin, Christ's priest, the Elector of Saxony's loyal librarian.

Jesus.

1st Hail! You write, my dear Spalatin, that there are some people who seek to make our most noble prince hateful to heaven and earth. I beg you, what an absurdity this is! I wish with all my heart that it will not happen for my sake. As I have said, I still say: I do not want our quite innocent prince to do anything in this matter that could defend my theses, but that I should be offered and reproached to all who act against me.

4) Instead of οἶσοςLM we have assumed οἶο sum.

5) "Luther's Sermon on the Power of the Ban," St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIX, 874.

or write, as I hope he will do, unless he can manage without inconvenience that no violence is done to me. If he cannot do this, then I also want the entire danger to be mine. I hope that I will defend what I have taken upon myself to defend, against the will (as I can boast under Christ's guidance) of all the opinions of the Thomists. But one will have to give way to violence, but without prejudice to the truth.

2 I believe that my explanations (which are printed, very incorrectly) 1) together with the refutation of Silvester's dialogue have reached you.

So I ask you to tell everyone you can that Martinus is the man who disputed this; if anyone wants to oppose it, or hopes to do better, they will find me willing to be instructed or taught. Therefore they may deal with me. Why do they bother the prince and other people in vain in these matters? But enough of this.

(3) A question has arisen among our good young men, which, from the advice of friends, has seemed good to me to write to you, or to report it to our princes through you. But it is this: that, since by God's grace the best lessons are now going on, and they are extraordinarily ardent for the Holy Scriptures and the lantern theology, it seems hard to them that because of so many lessons, which they have to hear for the sake of obtaining the honorary degrees, they have to put the best ones behind, or at least are too much burdened by both. They therefore ask, because it would be possible, that the lecture on ethics 2) (since it behaves against theology just like the Wols against the lamb) be left free, namely to all those who wished to hear it, and nevertheless the organization of the doctorate would not be impaired.

There is also the other question of what kind of examination should be followed by those who want to become baccalaureates or masters, in accordance with the new lessons; but we will see for ourselves,

1) Because of Luther's absence in Heidelberg. Cf. Letter No. 148 in this volume.

2) namely of Aristotle.

unless you also have better advice on the matter mentioned.

4) There is with us a letter from the city of Rome, written with great insight, 3) which is quite harsh against the Roman trickery regarding the collection of new tithes for the war against the Turks, of which one obviously recognizes that they are devised by the Florentines, the most avaricious people under heaven. For they make use of the goodwill of the pope to fill their gullet as they please. But I believe that this writing has already been with you; otherwise write and I will send it. For that the cardinals are legates of avarice (perhaps without their knowledge) is certain, if what he writes is true.

5 Be at ease in the Lord, and let Philip, the best of the Greeks, the most learned and loving of men, be well commended to you. He has the lecture hall full of listeners, especially he makes all the theologians, the highest together with the middle and the lowest, to be versed in the Greek language. Wittenberg, September 2, 1518.

Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 10.

Wittenberg.

February 22, 4) 1518.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther repeatedly defends the Elector against being the author of the indulgence controversy (cf. No. 4 of this appendix), denies the usefulness of dialectics in theology, and reports on a letter written to Trutfetter on this matter.

The original of this letter can be found in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 72 d; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, Vol. II, p. 617; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 126 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 160.

3) This refers to the Lxportutio viri eujusckum kcoetiskimi ack Principes, ne in deciinne pruestationsm oonksntiunt of the Würzburg canon Friedrich Fischer (about him compare St. Louis edition, vol. XI V, 258, note), who, recently returned from Italy, perhaps sat as Würzburg envoy in the Estates Committee and in sharp words revoked the approval of the demanded Turkish tithe. This writing then circulated in the somewhat modified form of a letter from Rome.

4) The time determination at the end of this letter: the S. Petro sacro has been resolved differently. Löscher and De Wette take the day of Petri and Pauli, the 29. Junius *); Burkhardt, p. 10, Petri Kettenfeier, den *) with eraser is pressure error instead of: Jun.

His Spalatin Georg, Christ's servant and ducal secretary.

Jesus.

1st Hail! I am not afraid, dearest Spalatin, that they speak of me in the worst way, or gossip that our prince is the author of my theses; I only fear that an enmity might arise from this occasion between such great princes, if, for example, the prince of Brandenburg 1) would let something similar happen out of revenge, as one recently heard about the one who is called "the tavern" 2).

By the way, you ask how far I consider dialectics useful for a theologian. I truly do not see how dialectics should not rather be harmful to a true theologian. It may be that it is perhaps a useful game or exercise for the intellect of young people, but in the holy Scriptures, where only pure faith and enlightenment from above are necessary, every reason must be left outside, not unlike Abraham, when he wanted to sacrifice, left the servants behind with the donkeys. This is also sufficiently testified by Johann Reuchlin in the second book of his Kabbalah: 3) If any dialectic is necessary, then the natural, innate one is sufficient, by which man is able to compare what is believed with what is believed and thus to conclude the truth. I have often examined with friends what benefit might have accrued to us from such arduous studies of philosophy and dialectics, and, indeed, we have unanimously wondered, indeed, lamented the fate of our power of understanding: we have found nothing of use, but a whole sea of harmfulness.

I have finally written to the Doctor of Eisenach 4) about the same matter, who (as it seems) is the prince of the dialecticians in our time, and have mainly stated what cannot be denied, namely, that dialectics cannot be of use to theology for its own sake, but does more harm, because theology uses the same grammatical words far differently than dialectics. How, therefore, I say, can dialectics be of use, since, when I go to theology, I must discard the word which had such [or other] meaning in dialectics, and take another meaning of it? And in order not to make mere words, I have added examples, namely: corpus (body, Leib) means in the tree of Porphyrius 5) a thing consisting of matter and form. But such a body (corpus) cannot be given to man, since in Scripture our body alone signifies matter, not also form, as in the passage [Matth. 10, 28.]: "Fear not them which kill the body, but may not kill the soul." Then I have stated that it is said inconsistently that an angel is neither rational nor unreasonable; likewise that it is of no use for Scripture that man is called endowed with senses, with reason, with body and with soul (sensitivum, rationalem, corporeum, animatum), and in short: I have said and still say that that whole bundle of the Porphyric tree is less than a fiction of old women or a dream of sick people, and that it was rightly called Porphyrius (that is a bloody one), namely because of the Christian souls that were to be killed by it. Then I have also destroyed the categories and some other things of philosophy and also of theology.

This displeased the man very much, and he claimed that my reasons were not insurmountable, nor should I myself be considered so. But it is those

4) Trutfetter in Erfurt.

5) The "Tree of Porphyrius" is a table of logical categories. See St. Louis edition, vol. VIII, 1387, note.

August 1; Knaake Petri Stuhlfeier, den 22. Februar, which we assumed with the Erlangen correspondence, and De Wette had described as possible in a note. The latter is undoubtedly correct, as is evident from a comparison of our letter with a letter addressed to Spalatin by Carlstadt on February 5 (Erl. Briefw. I, 144). Cf. Jäger, Carlstadt, p. 8 f.

1) Elector Joachim I.

2) The Pirna monk at Mencke, II, 1498 says: Siegmund Schenck, also a free gentleman, led a loosely rapacious life at the Bohemian mountains at Betscha, Oelsnitz 2c., was captured at Eisenberg in Thuringia, and beheaded at Torgau on the Elbe.

3) The following is a citation from Reuchlin's De Arte Cabalistica Libri tres, published in March 1517 by Thomas Anselm in Hagenau.

People are prisoners of Aristotle and Porphyry, and do not pay attention to what they say, but because they say it. Hence it comes that they also cannot understand one chapter of the Scriptures correctly, much less teach them.

If you therefore believe my judgment, then dialectics may be of use to you wherever it can, but in the holy Scriptures it will even do harm. I have held the teachings and rules of scholastic theology in high esteem and wanted to act the holy scriptures according to them with all diligence, and have had an abhorrence of the church fathers (God punish me if I lie), more than of the confusion of hell: there I have seen what use such studies were. But with you I will try the same once, when you are present, and teach you by experience what you are hearing now. Farewell and pray for me. Wittenberg, on the day dedicated to St. Peter, [February 22] 1518.

Brother Martin Eleutherius, Augustinian.

No. 11.

Wittenberg. In the first days of November 1517. 1)

Luther to Spalatin.

At Spalatin's request, Luther sends along a dialogue by Erasmus, which he does not wish to be distributed, however, because it jokes about ecclesiastical corruptions that should be deplored; he does not want anyone to believe that his theses were published at the instigation or with the approval of the Elector, and reminds them of the Elector's promise to give him a new dress.

This letter is handwritten in Ooä. len. a, k. 233. Printed in Lnäclsus, snpplsru. epp. lmttd. p. 2; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. I, p. 837; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 76 (in November 1517) and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. I, p. 121 (before November 11, 1517).

1) That this letter, to which no date is attached, is to be set in the first days of November, results from the postscript, in which Luther expresses the wish: he would like to know to whom the Elector had given the order to deliver the promised dress to him. In a letter that has not been preserved, Spalatin must have informed him that Pfeffinger was the commissioner and advised him to contact the Elector himself. Luther did so soon thereafter and complained about Pfeffinger's dithering in a letter to the Elector (Walch, old edition, vol. XXI, 2), which is also not dated, but must in any case be placed before November 11, because on that very day Luther thanked the Elector through Spalatin for the gift that had arrived in the meantime (Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 28).

To his in Christ dear and learned Georg Spalatin, ducal protector in the castle.

JEsus.

Hail! I had resolved, my dear Spalatin, never to communicate the Dialogue 2) to anyone. I have no other reason for this than because it is written so sweetly, so learnedly, even so wittily (that is, completely Erasmian) that it makes one laugh and joke about the infirmities and the misery of the Church of Christ, which every Christian should lament with the highest sigh. But because you demand it, see, there you have it, read it and use it, and then give it back to me.

I did not want our theses to come into the hands of our most illustrious prince or anyone at court until those who believed that they would be attacked in them had seen them, so that they would not think that I had published them either by order or with the prince's favor against the bishop of Magdeburg, which, as I now hear, is dreamed of by many of them. But now one can also unhesitatingly swear that they went out without the knowledge of Duke Frederick. Other things at another time, for now I am very overloaded with business. Farewell. From our monastery.

Brother Martin Eleutherius,
Augustinian at Wittenberg.

You wrote that I was promised a dress by the prince. I would like to know to whom he has commissioned this matter.

No. 12.

(Wittenberg.)

April 16, 1520.

Luther to Spalatin.

Negotiations with Matthew Adrian concerning his appointment as professor of the Hebrew language. Rumors about the ban Luther had to fear and that a doctor who could make himself invisible intended to kill Luther.

2) It seems likely to us that this is the dialogue of which Scheurl (Briefbuch, vol. II, p. 42) writes to Ulrich von Dinstedt, January 5, 1518: "Erasmus is believed to have written the conversation between St. Peter, Pope Julius, and the Schutzgeist, a very funny story."

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 262; in De Wette, Vol. I, p.440 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol.II, p.382.

To his dearest in the Lord, Georg Spalatin, Christ's servant, in the castle at Lochau.

Jesus.

1st Hail! We have agreed with Adrian, my dear Spalatin, that he should wait a little. He has promised to stay in Berlin for eight days and to expect letters from us. Now we have to make sure that we get an answer from W[erner] from Bacharach as soon as possible; 1) but he definitely wants a hundred guilders as salary. In this whole matter, we must take care above all that we do not sit in vain between two chairs, if we lose this one, and the other one perhaps goes elsewhere, either appointed by the Mainzer or on his own initiative. Many of our people have strongly urged me to keep Matthew for at least a year, also to prevent the disgrace, as they think, because of that eclipse (eclipsin), 2) which will perhaps take him out of hatred against us, as the rumor goes. But if you cannot write in such a short time what is to be done, then this must at least be written to him in Berlin, so that he will not be annoyed to postpone the matter further. I assume that he has decided to accept a Hebrew professorship either in Frankfurt 3) or in Leipzig, if it cannot be with us. Answer soon.

It is publicly said about my cause that the most terrible church punishment is in readiness against me, because the provost of the New Work in Halle 4) has warned me and,

1) In the original: ex V. Luttaraede. The V. is not to be resolved by Vito, as was done in the 60ä. The V is not to be dissolved by Vito, but by Vernoer, and instead of LuttaraeMo, which Luther wrote by mistake, LaeMaraeMo is to be read, as already Seidemann correctly assumed in De Wette, vol. VI, p. 653, because Werner was from Bacharach.

2) Mockingly, Leipzig is called so. The accusative Inpsirn (from the nominative Aps) also occurs in Uneins <t6<lolatu8, similarly the expression used here celipsin, eclipse, namely of truth.

3) Frankfurt on the Oder.

4) Nicolaus Demuth.

as they call it. Then some of my enemies also took pity on me and had friends from Halberstadt warn me that a certain doctor of medicine, who, when he has made himself invisible by magic, kills people as he pleases, has orders to kill Luther as well and will arrive on the next Sunday when the relics are shown. This is said to be quite certain. Farewell. On the day after Quasimodogeniti [April 16] 1520.

No. 13.

September 11, 1520.

Luther to Spalatin.

Wittenberg.

Luther reports the result of the negotiations with Staupitz and Link, which Miltitz had sent to him to ask him to write a letter to the pope in which he declares that he never wanted to attack his person; Luther is willing to do so. From a letter of Hutten. The Archbishop of Mainz has banned Hutten's books, and covertly Luther's as well. Should the latter attack Luther by name, he said, he would join Hütten. From Agricola's Wedding. Interpretation of a passage of the Gospel.

This letter is handwritten in 60ä. len. a, I. 97. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 282; in De Wette, vol. I, p.485 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol.II, p.477.

The highly learned and honest man, Magister Georg Spalatin, princely court preacher, his superior in the Lord.

Jesus.

1st Hail! I received your letter dated from Altenburg 6) yesterday, dear Spalatin, but I had received the last one from Buttstedt 7) earlier. Nothing has been done about me in Eisleben 8) except that Carl Miltitz requested advice from the fathers and finally obtained that the venerable Father Staupitz

5) On the Monday after Misericordias Domini, the sanctuaries of the collegiate church at Wittenberg were shown (Erl. Briefw.).

6) Spalatin was on the journey to Cologne with the Elector. They left Lochau on August 27, arrived in Cologne on September 25, and returned to Lochau on November 29.

7) Buttstedt is 2H German miles north of Weimar.

8) On August 26, 27 and 28, 1520, a general chapter of the Augustinians took place in Eisleben.

and the new Vicar Wenceslaus should travel to me and ask me to write privately a letter to the Roman Pontiff, in which I testify that I have never done anything against his person, hoping that through this advice the matter will go out well.

2 Although this does not apply to me, nor to the fathers, the man who perhaps wants to advise his cause through this will still be granted. I will therefore write what is also true, that nothing has ever occurred to me that could be held against the person of the pope. For what can I write more easily and with more truth? By the way, I must be careful in writing that I do not treat the apostolic chair itself too harshly; but it will get its salt.

Hutten has addressed a letter to me, glowing with violent anger against the Roman pope, and writes that he is now attacking the priestly tyranny with writings and weapons, moved by the fact that the pope has pursued him with daggers and poison and ordered the bishop of Mainz to send him captured and bound to Rome. O, a nonsense (he says) worthy of the blind pope! You will get to see the document when I have recovered it from Heinrich Stromer 1), because he desired to see it.

(4) To the cause of the evil is added that the bishop of Mainz has commanded by sermons, with explicit mention of Hutten's name, that his books against the Roman pope are neither to be read nor bought, under the penalty of banishment, and at the end it is added that the same judgment also extends to similar books, where he punishes mine in a concealed manner. But should he also treat me in this way by name, I will also join my spirit with Hutten and excuse myself in such a way that it will not please the Bishop of Mainz; perhaps they themselves will hasten the end of their tyranny by this advice.

5. coming back to me. It

1) Heinrich Stromer from Auerbach in the Upper Palatinate, therefore also called D. Auerbach, professor of medicine in Leipzig.

Not six doctors have been with me, but only two, the Vicars Staupitz and Wenceslaus with several brothers. All of them do not dislike my cause, but the Romanists dislike it.

The most illustrious prince beautifully decorated Eisleben's wedding with a donated stag, so thank him very much for us.

(6) That about which you inquire from the Gospel [Matth. 13, 12. 25, 29.]: "To him who has, it is given that he may have the fullness; but to him who does not have, it is given that he has" (or as another evangelist [Luc. 8, 18.] I believe that Augustine treats it correctly, that it is a general summa by which the Lord wants to teach that those who are in grace and use the gifts they have received rightly receive more and more, even in the reception of what should have been distributed to others, while those who misuse them constantly decrease in it. For the gifts of the spirit cannot lie dormant. For they serve either to profit or to harm the one who possesses them, since they are living things, which does not happen in bodily things. Thus it is said in Revelation [Cap. 3, 11.], "Hold that which thou hast, that no man take thy crown."

(7) Thus the kingdom was taken from the Jews, and is daily taken from them; and it is given, and is given to the Gentiles, which bring forth the fruits thereof [Matt. 22:43], as the same Lord hath said. The same thing is always the case between the godly and the godless, and the Hebrews always rob the Egyptians, and one builds the house and the other inhabits it, as he foretold in the Law of Moses [Deut. 28:30].

Take this for the best, and be at ease in the Lord. But see to it that not everyone has free access to our prince everywhere, lest someone attack him with poison. For the Romanists will leave no stone unturned, and Hutten cannot warn me enough; he fears so much for me because of poison. Wittenberg, September 11, 1520, Martin Luther.

No. 14.

Wittenberg.

October 31, 1518.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther indicates to Spalatin his return from Augsburg, and further that he has appealed and will appeal further; that he intends to publish the Augsburg negotiations and the papal breve with remarks. Finally, he asks for the promised doctor's banquet for the Carmelite priest Johann Frosch of Augsburg.

The original of this letter is in the Anhalt Gesamt-Archiv. Printed by Aurifaber, Vol. I, Bl. 99d; in Löschner's Ref.-Acta, Vol. II, p. 632; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 165 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 273.

To his highly learned friend Georg Spalatin, the Duke of Saxony's librarian 2c., in Christo.

JEsus.

Hail! Today, dear Spalatin, I have come to Wittenberg by the grace of God, but I do not know how lukewarm I will remain, for my cause is such that I hover between fear and hope. I have appealed from the badly reported pope to the pope who is to be better informed, and have thus departed, leaving behind the brother 1) who was to make the appeal known to the Cardinal with a notary and witnesses. In the meantime, since I have arrived here, I want to make another appeal to a future Concilium 2) and will attach myself to the Parisians in case the Pope, out of the fullness of his power, or rather of his tyranny, should reject the first appeal. I am full of joy and peace, so that I am surprised that this challenge of mine seems to be something great to many and great men.

The benevolence and mercy which the Legate, the Cardinal, promised to show to our most noble Prince 2c. against me, has certainly been great and abundantly shown, but we did not recognize it as such. For he has offered to do everything fatherly, yes, in the most fatherly way.

and would have done so without a doubt if I had only wanted to revoke mine. For at this junction the whole thing came to a standstill; because I did not want this, and he certainly wanted it (and I do not believe that he had any other order than to condemn), I was forced to appeal.

I will prepare my answers to his objections together with the appeal for publication and will add a theological explanation of the apostolic, even diabolical breve 3), which you have often mentioned against me and recently sent me a copy, which, when I returned, was delivered to me in Nuremberg with other letters of instruction. For it is unbelievable that something so monstrous emanates from the pope, especially from Leo the Tenth. Whoever, therefore, may have been the knave who wanted to frighten me with such a decree under the name of Leo X, will recognize that I can also recognize buffoonery, or if it has also in truth come from the Roman court, I will teach them about their quite impudent insolence and immoderate ignorance.

4 The Cardinal-Legate for his person pleases me very much, and as much as I suspect, the Romans begin to fear and trust their things little, therefore they seek excuses with great cunning. Other things I will tell you orally, God willing. Commend me to the prince and assure him that I am grateful and mindful of his kindness.

Finally, for the sake of the prince's honor, you are to see to it that you inform the prince of the arrival of the father licentiate, Carmelite priest in Augsburg, 4) who has entertained us abundantly and kindly. He is worthy in many ways that we, in turn, show ourselves to be pleasing to him. He left Augsburg on the Saturday before Simonis and Jude [October 23], and came to Augsburg.

1) Leonhard Beier. - The appeal is No. 212 in this volume, where notary and witnesses are indicated.

2) See No. 243 in this volume. - The University of Paris had appealed on March 27, 1518, and had published a paper about it.

3) The breve of Leo X of August 23, 1518 is No. 176 in this volume. Luther's gloss on it is No. 177.

4) Johannes Frosch from Bamberg came to Wittenberg in 1514 as a Baccalaureus and attained the degree of Licentiate there in 1516. Now he had come back to Wittenberg to receive the doctorate.

in the hope of the feast (pranäi) promised to him (as he says) by our prince; I too, if the prince has promised it, have come confidently; without doubt everything will happen. See therefore that all that he hopes will be done with honor 2c. Fare well in Christ. On Sunday, the day before All Saints, I hoped that you would be present with the Prince; but I was mistaken and hurried in vain. Wittenberg, 1518.

Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 15a.

(Wittenberg.)

September 16, 1518.

Luther to Johann Lang.

About the sending of a brother. Luther's edition of Silvester's Dialogue is out of print and will be reprinted. About the erudition of Melanchthon. The Elector seeks to avert the trip to Rome. On religious affairs and the theologians of Erfurt.

This letter is handwritten in 606. dotün. 399, f. 126. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 81 d; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. II, p. 627; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 141 (the date incorrectly resolved: September 9) and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. I, p. 236.

To the venerable Father Johann Lang, middle vicar of the Augustinian hermits in Erfurt, his superior in Christ.

JEsus.

1. Hail! Here you have the brother who wants to sacrifice. He could not be sent sooner because there was no traveling companion. 1) I have no other Silvester dialogues than this one. Melchior Lotther prints others, since all copies of the earlier printing are sold. For this is how the Dominican brothers buy them all up and seek to suppress them. We are sending the lector Johannes Jenner 2) to his place, although I cannot learn anything for certain yet, only that I hope he will adopt better manners elsewhere.

The highly learned Philipp Melanchthon, who was fully versed in Greek (graecanicissimus), is our professor of Greek,

1) According to the rule of the Order, an Augustinian was not allowed to travel alone.

2) In the Wittenberg Album, p. 44, entered in the winter semester 1515 as Brother Johannes Gmner of Nuremberg.

a boy and tender youth, if you look at his age, otherwise one of us, if you look at the diversity of knowledge and the knowledge of almost all books; so much he is able not only in both languages, but also in the instruction in both languages; he is also not ignorant of Hebrew.

The Most Serene Prince has written to me that he has acted in my cause, that Cardinal Cajetan has written to Rome to have my cause transferred to Germany (ad partes); and in the meantime I would have to wait for that. Therefore I hope that the ban will not come. But I displease many, several, most.

By the way, you would not have had to answer me with such great impatience. For it was given to me, and in the meantime I have not yet looked for anything else, that you want all costs to be paid by us, not just those six Zerbster Groschen. Then our prior 3) was also very displeased and still displeases him that the brother carpenter 4) is delayed so long, namely until winter, when no one can work; but even there you may watch; what is it to me?

4) About the father, the Magister of Mecheln, 5) and the names of the deceased you can learn everything from this brother. Farewell and greet those who think it worthy to be greeted by me. I want your theologians to be astonished at me, but may it be left to me that I follow my theology. For I never want those people's, nowhere, in any way. On the day after the Octave of the Nativity of Mary [September 16] 1518.

Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

3) Conrad Helt from Nuremberg (Vid. p. 43.).

4) Brother Wilhelm, the carpenter, had been promised by Staupitz to the Wittenbergers, and already on June 4 Luther had asked Lang (Walch, old edition, vol. XXI, 595) to send him to Wittenberg to make chairs and benches for the monastery.

5) Johann von Mecheln, inscribed at Wittenberg in 1507, was later, when the governor Margaretha had the lower German Augustinian monasteries separated from the Saxon congregation in order to ward off any Protestant influence, elected vicar by four of them and confirmed in his dignity by Haorian VI in a breve of November 23, 1523 (Erl. Briefw.).

No. 15b.

Salzburg.

September 14, 1518.

Staupitz to Luther.

Staupitz fears for Luther, because he will have few friends in his fight for the truth, because of the fear of the adversaries. He invites Luther to come to Salzburg to live and die with him.

This letter is found in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 82 d; in Löschner's Ref.-Acta, vol. II, p. 445 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. I, p. 234.

JEsus.

Grasp the soul in patience instead of a greeting! I have so much to write about that it would suffice for a booklet, but I will keep it short. It seems to me that the world is embittered against the truth. In former times Christ was crucified with such great hatred, 1) and I see nothing that can await you today other than the cross. If I am not mistaken, the verdict is near that no one, without consulting the pope, should seek in the Scriptures what, in order to find Him, Christ has badly commanded to be done. You have few patrons, and yet God would not have them hidden for fear of the adversaries. It is my wish that you leave Wittenberg for a while and come to me, so that we may live and die together. The same pleases the prince. 2) With these words I conclude: "It is good that it should happen this way, so that we as forsaken follow the forsaken Christ. Farewell and come in good health. Given at Salzburg, on the day of the Exaltation of the Most Holy Cross [Sept. 14] in the year 1518.

Your brother Johannes Staupitz, D.

No. 16.

Augsburg.

October 10, 1518.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther reports on his arrival in Augsburg on October 7, and that he will now speak with Cajetan only after three days, after he has previously rejected the impositions made on him by his deputy. News about various persons, namely Staupitz, whose arrival he expects.

1) Because it seems to us that kul886t is unstated, we have assumed fuit.

2) Matthäus Lang, Cardinal - Diaconus of the title St. Angeli, Prince of Gurk, Archbishop of Salzburg, Legate de Latere of the Apostolic See in Germany. Cf. above No. 175.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 83; in Löschner's Ref.-Acta, vol. II, p. 628; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 142 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 239.

To his Georg Spalatin, the highly learned and loving priest of Christ, his friend in the Lord.

JEsus.

Hail! We came to Augsburg, my dear Spalatin, on the day of St. Marci, which is after Franciscus [October 7]. However, we arrived tired, and I almost stayed down on the way, having contracted I don't know what kind of severe stomach sickness, but I got better again. Today is the third day after my arrival and I have not yet seen the Reverend Legate, but on the first day I immediately sent Doctor Wenceslaus and another to report that I was there. In the meantime, I have been given safe conduct or a salvus conductus by very good friends among the imperials and the council. Out of consideration for our most noble prince, all are willing and ready to serve me.

For although the Cardinal, the reverend Legate, promises all kindness, my friends do not want me to trust him implicitly, so wisely and carefully do they take up the matter. For they know that he is inwardly extremely bitter against me, however he may outwardly present himself, which I have also recognized not indistinctly from other things.

Today, however, I will go to him in any case and request the first conversation and presentation; what will happen I do not know. To some it seems good for my cause that the Cardinal of Gurk 3) is absent, to others also that the Emperor is also absent, for he is not far from here and is expected back daily, and the Bishop of Augsburg 4) is not in town. I dined yesterday with Conrad Peutinger, the Doctor, who is both a citizen and a man, as you know him best.

3) Matthew Lang mentioned in the previous letter, not, as Seideinann thinks in De Wette, Vol. VI, p. 665 8. v. Gurk, Bishop Raimund von Gurk, who died already on October 5, 1505.

4) Christoph von Stadion.

This one takes up my cause most of all with the greatest zeal, and also other councilors not less busy; and I do not know whether the reverend Lord Legate fears me, or whether he intends a Grenelthat.

Yesterday the Orator of Montferrat 1) sent to me that I should not go to the Legate until he had first talked to me. This man came (like all those in favor) at the instigation of the legate and provided by him with instructions, and urged me with many words and (as he said) with the most salutary advice that I should agree with the legate, return to the church, recant the evil spoken, by holding up to me the example of Abbot Joachim of Florist, who in just this way had managed not to be a heretic, even though he had spoken heretical things. Then the lovely man advised me against it, I should not give any reasons: Do you, he said, want to set up a tournament? In short, he is an Italian and remains an Italian. But I said: If I can be taught that anything I say is different from what the Holy Roman Church says, I will be my own judge and recant immediately.

5 Incidentally, here will be the knot: if he [Cajetan] will make the opinions of St. Thomas more obstinate than the decree and the reputation of the Church can suffer, I will not give way to him in this until the Church has revoked its previous decree, on which I base myself.

(6) Ei, ei, he said, do you want to organize a tournament? Then he went on to the most nonsensical proposals, that he publicly confessed that it was permissible to preach lying sentences, if they only brought good profit (bonam questam, as he said) and filled the chest; and that he said that one should not deal with the authority of the pope disputation-wise, but that the same must be raised in such a way that he alone, by his wink, could do away with all things, also with that, which challenges the faith.

especially in this matter, and several other things that you will hear orally.

But I have rejected this Sinon, who had been instructed not at all thoughtfully in the Pelasgian art 3), and he has gone away. Thus I hover between hope and fear, for this clumsy mediator has instilled in me not a little confidence.

I did not find Doctor Christoph Scheurl in Nuremberg, so I asked Philipp Feilitzsch to give six florins to Johann Böschenstein in the name of the prince, and he borrowed another four florins from D. Scheurl or the prior of our monastery in Nuremberg. 4) For he said that he could not accomplish such a great journey with so little means. He will now come as soon as possible.

Our reverend father Vicarius, Doctor Johann Staupitz, writes that he will definitely and certainly come if it is beyond doubt to him that I have arrived. Therefore, on the day I arrived, I immediately sent Brother Leonhard to announce my arrival, and I expect that he will come today.

The Frankish envoy had left shortly before I came to his country, and left behind an excellent verdict on me, in which he testifies to his favor towards me.

If you will share this letter with my Wittenbergers, or at least what you want them to know, you will do me a favor (at another time I will write more extensively and more, now I could not because of business and lack of time). Greet them all in my name, and may they be well, whether I come back or not. For it is certain that I will appeal to a future concilium, if the venerable Lord Legate will want to act more by force than by right.

(11) We know that the rose has been sent to our most noble prince by the pope (which they are accustomed to bestow on the great with great hope), and that all favors have been promised to him in the most benevolent manner. Summa Summarum: the Roman Church

3) See ViLL. IIb. II, V. 79. 106. 152.

4) Böschenstein received these four florins from Scheurl (Scheurl, Briefbuch II, p. 53).

1) Urban of Serralonga, who had been at the Electoral Court as the envoy of Count William IX of Montferrat in 1517. After the count's death, he stayed with Cajetan (Löscher, Ref.-Acta, vol. II, p. 453).

2) The abbot Joachim of Floris (near Cosenza in Calabria, Kingdom of the Two Sicilies) died in 1202.

(if one may speak so) has an insatiable thirst for gold, and by devouring it she increases the thirst again and again. Farewell in eternity and say the best thanks to the most noble prince in my place and commend me to him. Augsburg, Sunday after Dionysii [Oct. 10], very early, 1518.

Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 17.

Augsburg.

14.¹) October 1518.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther reports on his conversations with Cajetan.

The original of this letter is in the an Haltisches GesamtArchiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 85d; in Löscher's Ref. Acta, vol. II, p. 631; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 147 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. I, p. 246. German in the Wittenberger (1569), vol. IX, p. 59; in the Jenaer (1579), vol. I, p. 118 b; in the Leipziger, vol. XVII, p. 184 and in Walch.

To his highly learned Georg Spalatin, priest of Christ, librarian of the Elector of Saxony 2c., to his lord who is to be highly honored in Christ.

To the Magister Georg Spalatin "zu Handen".

1st Hail! I do not like to write to the most illustrious prince, my dear Spalatin, therefore you, who are his familiaris, receive my letter and see to it that it is reported to the most illustrious prince.

The legate is now already acting with me on the fourth day, rather against me, in that he promises quite nicely that he wants to arrange everything gently and paternally out of consideration for the most noble prince, but he carries out everything alone with pure unbending force. He did not want me to answer in public disputation, nor did he want to dispute with me privately. It was only one thing that he answered me again and again: Recant, recognize your error,

This is the way the pope wants it and not otherwise, you may want it or not, and other such things.

3. but especially he urged me with a certain extravagant Clement the Sixth, which begins: Unigenitus. 2) Here, here, he said, you see that the pope states that the merits of Christ are the treasure of indulgences. Do you believe this, or do you not believe it? And he allowed no explanation or answer, but acted with the force of words 3) and cried out.

Finally, through the intercession of many, he could hardly be requested that I submit my responsibility in writing. I did so today in the presence of Philipp von Feilitzsch, whom I had taken with me for this reason, and who, in the name of and instead of the prince, pointed out the prince's request anew. At last he rejected and scorned the notes, and cried anew that I should recant, saying that he had overcome and silenced me by a lukewarm and broad speech which he had drawn from the fables of St. Thomas. Almost ten times I started to speak; just as often he thundered again and ruled alone.

At last I too began to cry out, saying: If it can be shown that those extravagant ones teach that the merits of Christ are the treasure of indulgences, then I will recant, as you will. Dear God! How tremendous gestures and mocking laughter there were! Suddenly he seized the book, read heatedly and puffing, until he came to where it is written that Christ acquired a treasure through his suffering 2c.

6 Here I said: Listen, most reverend father, consider this word: "he has acquired". If Christ acquired the treasure through his merits, then the merits are not the treasure, but what the merits have earned, that is, the keys of the Church. So my thesis 4) is true. Here he suddenly became confused, and since he did not ver-

2) Dextrav. IM. 5. tit. 9. 6. 2, not the Bull Vniuersalis given by Clement XI (Erl. Briefw.).

3) vi vorstorum, that is, as we see from No. 238, Col. 641: because the pope had spoken the words, Luther had to accept them.

4) The 58th indulgence thesis, Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 77.

1) Because of De Wette's concern about the correctness of this date, see the note in No. 238, Col. 646; likewise Köstlin, "M. Luther", Vol. I, p. 227. - The Erlangen correspondence has for this letter the inaccurate description of the content: "Report about his first and second conversation with Cajetan", because it is mainly talked about the third and last audience. Cf. Document No. 202.

When I wanted to appear confused, he jumped forcibly to other things and wisely wanted this to be forgotten. But I was (certainly quite disrespectfully) heated, and broke out into these words: Most reverend father, you may not believe that the Germans also lack grammar; it is something different "to be a treasure" and "to acquire a treasure."

007 And so his confidence was broken, though he yet cried out that I should recant. I left when he said, "Go, and do not return to me unless you want to recant."

And behold, soon after the end of the midday meal he summoned the reverend father Vicarius D. Staupitz, and with many flattering speeches he persuaded me to recant, also claiming (while I was absent) that I could not easily have a better friend than him. And since the latter had answered that he had persuaded me and was still persuading me today that I should humbly submit to the church, as I had also offered myself before all, he nevertheless said that he was no match for me (namely, in his opinion) in the Holy Scriptures and in spiritual gifts; furthermore, he [Cajetan] was in the place of the pope and in this position the superior of all of us, so that he himself should persuade. Finally, it came about that he should indicate the articles in which I should recant, also what I should hold.

9 And so the matter is so far in limbo. But I have neither hope nor confidence in him. But daily I work on the appeal, and will not revoke a syllable; but I will put out the answer I have given him, that it may be spread throughout the world, if he should continue by force as he began. Farewell. In haste. At Augsburg, on St. Calixtus' Day [14 October] 1518.

Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 18.

Wittenberg.

November 19, 1518.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther tells Spalatin to make sure that the Elector reads the letter he writes to him in response to the Cardinal's letter to the Elector, and expresses his displeasure with the Cardinal's theology.

nal, the Prieria and the Dominicans in general. He asks whether the Elector will not write to the Pope that his matter be negotiated in Germany; he is not concerned about himself, but about the welfare of the university.

This letter is handwritten in Ooä. a, t. 285. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 103; in Löscher's Ref.Acta, vol. II, p. 636; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 172 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. I, p. 281.

To his Georg Spalatin, the priest of Christ, his extremely honest friend.

JEsus.

Hail! In this letter, 1) I write to our most noble prince, my dear Spalatin, more extensively and clearly the content and the events of my tragedy than I had written to you the other day. 2) For the messenger was pressing, and I had hardly entered the house. But I did not want to let him leave without a letter, even if it was written in the greatest haste and quite inadequately. It shall now be your task that the most noble prince either reads or hears this letter.

You can see from the second objection 3), to which I replied, how the Reverend Legate is versed in the Holy Scriptures. In addition, I have heard from his mouth quite untheological sentences, namely those which, if another had said them, I would have declared them to be the greatest heresies. I see that all those who belong to the Order of Preachers are of the same mind, that is, that none of them is righteously Christian, since this Cardinal is praised by the preaching monks themselves as the most princely prince (princeps principissimus) of their doctrine, but Silvester as the second after him. Consider thou (for thou knowest Silvester) what the tenth or the hundredth may be, if the second is such, and such also the first. My heart would almost be puffed up if I did not feel sorry for the people that they have so shamefully wasted their time and lost their studies and have learned nothing but the most miserable ignorance. Christ, the true light of men, has been banished, and Aristotle, the darkness of the world, has been banished.

1) Document No. 238 in this volume.

2) No. 14 in this appendix.

3) Document No. 237 in this volume, U 3 and 4.

Men, and the most abominable, have reigned. So now I have seen two lions of Moab, as the Scripture says [2 Sam. 23:20], can I fear the hares of Moab? Long live, long live, long live Christ! Amen.

Now I ask you to find out for me whether it would not be possible for the prince to write to the pope on my behalf so that my cause would be transferred to Germany. Not because I am very concerned for myself, since I am sorry that I am not worthy of suffering a particularly great evil for the truth, although I have sought dangers and hardships through this journey to Augsburg almost to the temptation of God, but because our university is dear to me, and I would not like to see the students of the best young men, who have an extraordinary zeal for the Holy Scriptures, who are still in infancy (in lacte), sacrificed. For it is written [Ex. 23:19], "Thou shalt not sacrifice the kid while it is at its mother's milk." But since I am suppressed by force, the door is already open against Andreas Carlstadt and everything that is called theologian, and I fear that our university, which has just arisen, will suddenly be destroyed, not unlike Pharaoh's order that the children of Israel should be killed and drowned from their mother's womb.

There are many Pharaohs among the preaching monks and especially since this pope holds the papal dignity, from whom they have obtained that the Council of Basel was condemned, of which the Cardinal himself boasted against me. Therefore they will presume to subject themselves to all things. But may God resist them, amen. Fare well in the Lord. Orally, perhaps, another and a more. Wittenberg, November 19, 1518, Brother Martin Luther.

No. 19.

Wittenberg.

November 12, 1518.

Luther to Spalatin.

About the banquet to be held in honor of Johann Frosch; about the publication of the Augsburg Negotiations and the announcement of the appeal in Augsburg; complaint about the professor of the Hebrew language Böschenstein.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 102; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, Vol. II, p. 634 (wrong: Nov. II); in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 168 (wrong: Nov. 6) and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 277.

To his highly learned and honest friend Georg Spalatin, the priest of Christ, librarian to the Prince of Saxony, in the Herrn 2c.

JEsus.

1st Hail! Behold, my dear Spalatin, that father, the licentiate Johann Frosch is here, and claims for certain that our prince has promised him as I have told you and written before. For I casually inquired about the certainty of the matter, so that he would not want to know that the prince knew nothing about this promise or was in doubt about it. His provincial did not come with him because he was prevented by indisposition, but he is expecting the Nuremberg prior. Now we have decided that we want to arrange for his banquet on the next Thursday [Nov. 18], so that he will not lose much time here in vain, in the certain hope that it will be paid for by the prince's generosity.

We did this, however, because this seemed good to us the other day when I was with you, and because it could have been assumed [by him] that it would happen neither in the castle nor elsewhere. For he wanted to speak to the prince beforehand, but since he was advised against it, he refrained from doing so, so that he would not have to spend the triple way and time on it, but especially because I knew that he would hardly be admitted, because of the suspicion of the plague, since he would necessarily have to travel through places infested with the plague. So we stand; if you have something better by which we may preserve both the honor of the Prince and the reverence for him [the Doctor], show it quickly. We would have prepared such a meal for him in our monastery, but we feared that we would not be able to get game; then, because it seemed more honorable, to yield to the princely promise.

1) Not Link, as Seidemann states in De Wette, Vol. VI, p. 675 s. v.; rather, the Carmelite prior is meant. (Erl. Briefw.) - The Provincial had come as far as Nuremberg.

My Augsburg trade is printed. For my brother Leonhard has returned and reports nothing new from Augsburg, but neither does the licentiate, except that a certain one of my friends had wanted to dissuade the notary that he should not file my appeal, but nevertheless the notary remained steadfast through the coaxing of the licentiate. That is how people are when God is not with them. For that one is a great man, and was considered by me to be one of my first friends. But the scripture is true [Ps. 146, 3.]: "Do not rely on princes, they are men, they cannot help."

4 Our university is doing well, especially in Greek; only the Hebrew professor has a head after his own fashion, and puts weight on that which has no weight. For that which we esteem most highly he gives easily and gladly to it; that which we almost despise he makes great, as if he wanted to say no to it: that is, we let ourselves care for the meaning of the letters and words, but we do not care much for prosody, because we do not expect to become orators with the Jews. But we are at man's beck and call, lest he (which he is above all prone to do) raise any complaint. Farewell. Wittenberg, the day after St. Martin's Day [Nov. 12] 1518.

Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 20.

Wittenberg.

January 14, 1521.

Luther to Staupitz in Salzburg.

Luther reassures Staupitz about his matter by reminding him of a word he himself had spoken earlier and expresses confidence about the bold step of burning the bull. All kinds of news.

Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 2986; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 541 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 70.

JESUS.

Hail! When we were in Augsburg, Reverend Father, you said to me, among other things we discussed about this matter of mine, "Remember, brother, that you began this in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ;

I have accepted this word, not as spoken by you, but as spoken to me through you, and I keep it very well in my memory.

2 Therefore, with this word of yours, I now ask: Be mindful also that you have said this word to me. Until now there has been joking in this matter, now something more serious is about to happen, and, as you said: If God does not bring this about, it is impossible for it to be brought about; clearly this is now in the hand of the almighty 1) God, so that no one can deny it. Who can advise here? what can a man think? The noise rages so violently that it seems to me that it cannot be quieted other than by the last day. So great is the excitement on both sides.

3 The situation with the papacy is not like yesterday and the day before; even though it bans and burns books and may even kill me, something quite extraordinary is at the door. How happy the pope would have been, if he had rather used good means to establish peace than violence and storms to destroy Luther. I burned the books of the pope and the bull, at first with trembling and pleading, but now I am more pleased about this than about any other deed in my life, because they are more pernicious than I thought.

Emser writes in Leipzig in German against me 2) at the instigation of Duke George, who rages against me and has proposed at court to act against me in the most ungodly way, using threats and murder.

5 I was summoned by the emperor through letters to the prince, but he refused, and the latter immediately revoked the former ones through other letters. God knows what will happen. Our Vicarius Wenceslaus has gone to Nuremberg. Teschius is at Grimma; he is said to have left, God keep him. With us everything stands well as

1) Aurifaber offers potsntissiins, for which De Wette conjicirt potsntissimi, which we have assumed. The Erlanger has De Wette's other conjecture, patsutissilus.

2) See St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 39 f.

so far. Hütten has attacked the bull 1) with very sharp glosses against the pope, and still has many things planned with regard to this matter.

6 My writings have burned three times: at Louvain, at Cologne and at Mainz, but at Mainz with great contempt and even with danger to those who burned them. Thomas Murnar also wrote furiously against me. 2) For I am not surprised about that barefoot (Barfotum), the ass of Leipzig. Farewell, my dear father, and pray for the word of God and for me; I am torn and tossed by these floods. Wittenberg, on the day of Felix [January 14] 1521.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 21.

Wittenberg.

February 9, 1521.

Luther to Staupitz in Salzburg.

Staupitz had been accused by the pope of being a follower of Luther by the archbishop of Salzburg and had submitted to his judgment in a letter. Luther exhorted him to stand firm and to revoke this cowardly declaration so that he would not deny Christ.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 303; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 556 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 83.

To the venerable and noble man, Johann Staupitz, Master of Holy Theology, Augustinian Hermit, his superior in the Lord.

Hail! I am surprised, venerable father, that the letter and my books have not yet reached you, as much as I understand from your letter. Of course, I preach to others and become reprehensible myself, so much does the intercourse with people tear me away from myself. But in which spirit I still act the word of God, you see from what I send. Nothing has yet been done against me at Worms, although the papists are carrying out evil against me with extraordinary fury. Spalatin writes that there is a was so great a favor against the gospel that he did not expect me to be condemned unheard and unconvicted.

Emser in Leipzig has put aside his shame and written a booklet against me, which is filled from beginning to end with a single lie. I am compelled to answer this monster for the sake of Duke George, who is puffed up by the nonsense of that man.

3 I do not dislike to hear that you are also attacked by Leo, so that you also set up the cross, which you have praised so much, as an example to the world. For I would not want that wolf to be satisfied with your answer, because you have admitted to him more than is right. For he will interpret it as if you completely deny me and all that is mine, after you have pronounced that you will suffer him to be your judge. Therefore, if Christ loves you, he will require you to recant this writing, since in this bull he has condemned everything you have taught and held about the mercy of God.

Since you know this very well, it seems to me that you cannot call him as a judge without insulting Christ, whom you see raging with hostile rage as an adversary of Christ against the word of grace. For it would have been your duty to declare this and to punish him for this ungodliness. For here it is not time to fear, but to cry out, since our Lord Jesus Christ is condemned, stripped and blasphemed. Therefore, as much as you exhort me to humility, I exhort you to hope. You have too much humility, as I have too much hope.

But the matter is serious. We see Christ suffering. Even if we had to keep silent and humble ourselves until now. Dear, must we not now, when our dearest Savior, who gave Himself for us, is made a mockery of in the whole world, fight for Him? Shall we not stick our necks out? My dear Father, the danger is greater than many think. Here the gospel [Matth. 10, 32. Luc. 9, 26.] begins to have its course: "Whoever confesses me before men, him will I also confess before my Father; whoever is ashamed of me, of him will I also be ashamed."

1) In Document No. 444 in this volume.

2) See St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, introduction, p.40, note 1. - Murners name was nicely changed in his dispute with Wimpheling over his dsrmauia. (1502s transformed by his opponents into "Murnar" (Murr-cat), and now in his dispute against the Reformation hardly called differently (Erl. Briefw.). - The "Barefoot" is Alveld.

(6) May I still be found guilty of being a miser, an adulterer, a murderer, an enemy of the pope, and guilty of all vices, if only I am not accused of ungodly silence, while the Lord suffers and says [Ps. 142:5]: "I cannot escape, no one takes care of my soul. I looked to the right, and behold, no one would know me." For through this confession I hope to be absolved of all my sins. Therefore I have also confidently put on my horns against this Roman idol and the right Antichrist. The word of Christ is not a word of peace, but of the sword. But what do I simple teach a wise man (sus Minervam)?

(7) I write this to you all the more confidently, because I am very afraid that you will be in the middle between Christ and the pope, of whom you see that they are in the highest battle against each other. But let us pray that the Lord Jesus may shortly destroy this child of perdition with the spirit of his mouth. If then thou wilt not follow, let me go and be carried away; I will not (by Christ's grace) conceal from this abomination his abominations.

But this submission of yours has saddened me greatly and has shown me someone other than the previous Staupitz, the preacher of grace and the cross. If you had done this before knowing this bull and the shame of Christ, you would not have grieved me.

9 Huts and many others write bravely for me, and songs are made daily, which will little delight this Babel. Our prince not only acts wisely and faithfully, but also steadily; by his command I publish this writing "Grund und Ursach aller Artikel" 1) in both languages.

10 Philip greets you and wishes you a more joyful (auctiorem - richer) spirit. Please, greet also the physician Ludwig, who has written to me very learnedly. I had no time to write to him, since I have to employ three presses alone. Fare well in the Lord and pray for me. Wittenberg, on the day of St. Apollonia, February 9, 1521. Your son Martin Luther.

1) Document No. 448 in this volume.

No. 22.

(Wittenberg.)

November 25, 1518.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther sends some letters back to Spalatin, reminds him of the delivery of the letter from the university and his letter to the Elector, in which he answers Cajetan's letter, and awaits Spalatin's verdict on the same. He is aware of the excommunication from Rome and is determined to then leave Wittenberg. Just then, the [^]uAU8tarm should be issued.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches GesamtArchiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 104d; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, Vol. II, p. 637; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 188 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 303.

To his Georg Spalatin, the worthy and highly learned man, his best friend in Christ.

JESUS.

Hail! I am sending back to you 2) the letter of the pretended Bishop of Liège, 3) my dear Spalatin, and the other one of Crotus 4); but you will see to it that the most illustrious Prince gets to see the letter of the University and mine 5). I await your judgment on my answer, which I have given with reference to the letter of the legate, if it is not to be erased completely. Now my Acta [Augustana] are published.

By the way, I am expecting the curses from the city of Rome every day, so I am making arrangements and arranging everything so that when they come, I will be ready and ready to go with Abraham, without knowing where to go, but certainly where to go, because God is everywhere; but I will leave a farewell letter behind. But you see that you dare to read the letter of the cursed and banished one. Now take care and pray for me. On the day of St. Catherine [Nov. 25] 1518.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

2) The original has reruitto and so the Erlanger Briefwechsel; in the other editions: remitte.

3) It is Document No. 166 in this volume. It seemed so unbelievable to Luther that a bishop so openly denounced the abuses of the Roman court that he doubted the authenticity of the document.

4) Crotus Rubianus, actually Johann Jäger from Dornheim, Luther's study friend in Erfurt. The letter written from Italy to Luther in Augsburg no longer exists (Köstlin, Martin Luther, Vol. I, p. 286).

5) The letter from the university is No. 263 and Luther's No. 238 in this volume.

No. 23.

(Wittenberg.)

December 13, 1518.

Luther to Staupitz.

Luther indicates his return to Wittenberg; that those which the prince did not want to be published are now finally being printed with his permission. He complains about Cajetan's malicious letter to the Elector, but has answered it properly. The Elector wishes to have him removed, and therefore a meeting with Spalatin has taken place in Lichtenberg, but his departure for France is being resisted. The Erfurt fathers do not want Johann Lang to receive his master's degree.

Handwritten, this letter is in the Oo6. cken. k. 24, 1. 178. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 101 (without date); in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. II, p. 639 (presumably dated Dec. 7 without giving a reason); in De Wette, vol. I, p. 194 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. I, p. 319 (Dec. 13 after Eocl. cken.).

To the venerable and dear Father Johann Staupitz, Vicar of the Augustinian Hermits, his most beloved Father in Christ.

Jesus.

I came to Wittenberg at the beginning of the holy evening before All Saints, happy and healthy, venerable and dear father, but I came against everyone's expectation, but afterwards I found this shameful case, and immediately I was sorry that I had arrived. May the Lord have mercy on us.

2) The prince has absolutely objected to my [Augsburg] Acta being published; now he has finally allowed it, and now they are being printed. 1) In the meantime, the reverend Lord Legate has written a lengthy letter to the prince, 2) in which he accuses me and you and my comrades (as he calls them) horribly, because we left without his knowledge, and complains that this is a fraudulent act. Finally, he has advised that he may send me to Rome or expel me from his lands, so that he does not (these are his words) bring a stain on his honor for the sake of a little brother, and says that they will pursue the matter in Rome, 3) because he has written my fraudulent action to Rome and washed his hands. The prince wanted me to answer this letter, and so I did, 4) and, as I believe, gave him his fee.

But the prince is very concerned for me, but he would rather that I had a place elsewhere. He had M. Spalatin in Lichtenberg, where I was appointed, talk to me about this matter for a long time. I said: If the Baun comes, I will not stay; and he advised me not to go so quickly to France. I am still waiting for his advice. But farewell, my dearest father, and command only my soul to Christ. I see that they have made a firm resolution to condemn me, but Christ again strengthens in me the resolution not to give way. Let it be done, let his holy and blessed will be done. Pray for me.

4 I ask you, what kind of absurdity are the fathers at Erfurt up to, that they do not want to let the father Vicarius, the Licentiate, 5) come to the Magister dignity? how long, I ask you, shall this peculiar nature and this disobedience last? For I forgot this, since I was with you and wanted to talk to you as much as possible. Our university is doing well, except that the best lessons do not have enough hours. On the day of Lucia [13 December] 1518.

Your Martin Luther, a poor man.

No. 24.

(Wittenberg.)

December 11, 1518.

Luther to Link.

About Miltizen's arrival, the Augsburg Acts that Luther sent, the Protestation and other of his writings; about the death of the provost at Kemberg and the flourishing of the Wittenberg University. In the postscript, of the mood of the Elector, and that he had intended to suppress the Augsburg Acts.

1) namely with the approval of the Elector, which, as we see from No. 26, was not yet available on December 9. Thereupon, in the already completed copies, the blackening of the objectionable passage in Document No. 177 in this volume will have been carried out, and the printing of further copies, with their omission, will have been permitted. Already on Dec. 11, Luther sent a copy to Link. See No. 24 of this appendix.

2) No. 237 in this volume.

3) Instead of euu8uo in the editions, as in Cajetan's letter, euusuin will be read.

4) No. 238 in this volume.

5) Johann Lang, District Vicar.

Handwritten in the Ooä. OIoMÜ. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 124; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 192; in Löschner's Ref.-Acta, vol. II, p. 641 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. I, p.316.

To the venerable Father Wenceslaus Linken (Sinistro), a right (dextro) theologian, Augustinian ecclesiastics at Nuremberg, his superior to be highly venerated in Christ.

I have written letters to you and still do, dear Father Wenceslaus, but the messengers are so rare, then also so unreliable, that I doubt whether you will receive them; now I have the confidence that I will certainly come to you through this one. The rumor has reached me of three apostolic breves that have been given to Carl Miltitz against me. For M. Caspar has learned this from your letters and has reported it to me through his own messenger out of excessive concern for me. Behold, I send you my [Augsburg] Acta, which have gone out more sharply than the Lord Legate might have expected; but my pen goes pregnant with much greater things. I do not know whence these thoughts come to me: this matter, in my opinion, has not yet had its beginning, so much is lacking in it that the Roman greats could hope for the end. I will send you my little things, so that you may see whether I am right in thinking that the true Antichrist, as Paul depicts him [2 Thess. 2:3 ff.], reigns at the Roman court; that he is worse today than the Turk, I believe I can prove.

2) Our printer has issued 1) my appeal to a concilium to my many and great displeasure; but it has happened. I wanted to keep it printed with me, but God has other thoughts. Those yelpers bark everywhere extraordinarily against me, but they do nothing. I have taken up the Our Father again, 2) in order to publish it in German. I am also sending you other little things of mine, namely the answers 3) to the letter of the Lord Legate, but with the condition that you send all this after you have received it.

1) Johann Grüenberg. - The appellation is No. 243 in this volume.

2) "Interpretation in German of the Lord's Prayer for the Simple Laity," St. Louis edition, vol. VII, 752.

3) Luther's answer No. 238 in this volume; the Elector's answer No. 241.

to the venerable father Vicarius 4). I am expecting my murderers from Rome or somewhere else. I am surprised that it is dragging on with the ban. The provost in Kemberg 5) gave up his spirit in the plague, but in such a calm and gentle death that I have never been so pleased by the death of any man. He spoke and did everything in the most Christian way to his end and desired full of faith and confidence to be dissolved. Praise be to God! M. Bartholomäus Feldkirch, the Rector of our University, has taken his place. There is nothing else new with us. Our university is as busy as the ants. Farewell and greet all who are to be greeted, especially the pastor of the Sebalduskirche 6) and the other magisters, but especially Pirkheimer and Albrecht Dürer, D. Christoph Scheurl. D. Eck writes that my answer against Silvester does not please him everywhere, nor does he dislike it everywhere, but he nevertheless adds a very wise and true word, namely that he knows that his judgment does not count for much with me, because in fact his advice counts for nothing with me. What I am sending to Augsburg, you will, I hope, have taken care of. Farewell again. In a hurry. On the Saturday before the third Sunday of Advent [Dec. 11] 1518.

At first, the prince would have preferred that I not be in the place; afterwards, he definitely wanted me to stay. What he thinks now, after the Acta and the appeal have been issued, I do not know. For he delayed for a long time that they should not be published; but even since they were already printed, he wanted them to be suppressed, which could not happen even through my doing. He is now holding a meeting in Jena because of the answer to be given to the legate about the money against the Turk. I do not know whether it is good that you communicate the appeal to many, although it is widespread among us.

4) Staupitz.

5) According to Lingke, Reisegeschichte Luthers, p. 87, the provost was called Ziegelheim von Sprenberg.

6) Johann Herholt (Seidemann-De Wette, Vol. VI, p. 667 s. v.). - "The other Magister" was Georg Pesler (Burkhardt, Briefw., p. 500), not Hector Böhm [Böhmer], as Seidemann 1. o. p.646 states.

No. 25.

Wittenberg.

December 20, 1518.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther apologizes for the announcement of the appeal and the Augsburg Acts, which the printer had issued in sheets without his prior knowledge. His joy about the answer of the Elector to Cajetan.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches GesamtArchiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 125; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, Vol. II, p. 644; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 197 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 323.

To his highly learned and best friend Georg Spalatin, Christ's servant, his master.

JEsus.

Hail! Neither my advice nor yours has gone through, my dear Spalatin. For I, too, ordered that the appeal be printed, but made an agreement with the bookseller that he should not issue any at all, but lay them all down with me after he had received his payment from me, so that, wherever the expected furies of the Roman judgment would come, they would then be ready and ready to be distributed after I had escaped. But the good man, who was anxious for his profit, had, while I expected him to bring them, sold almost all of them beforehand, and I then learned as the last of all that they had been published. I was very displeased with him, but it had happened and I could not undo it. Similarly, the acts were finished except for the last sheet (quaternionem ----- Quaterne) when your first ban arrived, and issued into many people's hands (so much do they chase after it when I publish something that takes up even one page); then I could not hold back the last sheet, since the previous ones had been distributed. Otherwise, don't doubt it, I would have preferred your advice and would have been safe, as I did before (as you know). Now I am all the more sorry for the publication of both writings, after I have seen this excellent letter from our most noble Prince to the venerable Lord Legate 1). Dear God, with what joy I have read it and again I have read it.

1) No. 241 in this volume.

I read it with the realization of how full of joyful defiance it is, and yet seasoned with extraordinary modesty. I fear that the Italians do not sufficiently recognize what is behind it. For it is a kind of people who, both in things and in writings, focus their attention on outward appearance and prestige. But at least they will see that they have not yet begun anything of what they thought they had already finished. It is impossible that they will not completely dislike him. Therefore, for the sake of the Lord, I ask you to give me the best interpretation of the outgoing of the last writings, which is also very unpleasant for me, and then also to thank the most noble prince for me and to praise him in an appropriate way for my extremely happy gratitude. It is excellent that he, who recently was my equal, a mendicant monk, now [but] is not afraid to approach even the most powerful princes without all reverence, to address them, to threaten them, to command them, 2) because it is also late that also the worldly power is from God, and that its honor must not be trampled underfoot, especially by such a man, who has received his power only from men. It pleases me extraordinarily that the prince has shown such an exceedingly patient and wise impatience in this matter. May the Lord in mercy make all this, whatever it is, His own and acknowledge it as such. Amen. Farewell and greet all our friends at court. Wittenberg, the day before St. Thomas [20 December] 1518.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 26.

(Wittenberg.)

December 9, 1518.

Luther to Spalatin.

Spalatin's warning not to publish the Augsburg Acts had come too late; he had heard disturbing things about Miltitzen's arrival in Germany, and also made an appeal. It was wrong that he had taken leave of the Wittenberg people, he had only announced to them the possibility of a quick departure.

2) Before äisout, De Wette and the Erlangen correspondence put a punctum, as we think, not good. For this is not both a criticism of Cajetan and praise of the churfürstliche Brief. Aurifaber, Löscher and the old translator have the punctuation we have assumed.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches GesamtArchiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 123; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, Vol. II, p. 640; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 191 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 314.

Your esteemed husband, Mr. Georg Spalatin, Christ's servant, librarian of the Prince of Saxony, his friend who is to be highly honored in Christ.

JEsus.

Hail! It had already happened, my dear Spalatin, what you forbade me by your letter. My acts have been published, but with great freedom of truth, yet not yet completely. I see that I must hurry in this and in all things. Yesterday I received news from Nuremberg that Carl von Miltitz is on his way; a credible person (as they write) is said to have seen that he has three papal breves 1) that he should take me prisoner and hand me over to the pope. Likewise, through our prior 2) the Doctor of Eisleben, who together with Philipp von Feilitzsch stood with me before the legate at Augsburg, commands me to be careful; he had been on the journey, where he had heard that one of the Roman court (cortisanum) had prayed, he had promised the pope that he would deliver me. I also hear other things, all of which, may they be true or may they be pretended to terrify me, as I think, are not to be despised. And therefore, lest they kill me unprepared or assault me with the ban, I have arranged everything and await the counsel of God. I have also appealed to a future concilium. 3) And the more they rage and enter the way with violence, the less I am frightened; I will finally be even freer against this Roman serpent breed (lernas). It is false what you have heard, that I have bid farewell to the Wittenberg people, but I have spoken on this opinion: I am a very uncertain and unfaithful preacher, as you have experienced. How often have I left you without saying goodbye! Now if the same should happen once, I will have bid you farewell, if I should not return. Then I admonished them that they should not be frightened by the rays of the pope's banishment, which raged against me, nor for their sake blame the pope or any other person, but should command the matter to God, and the like. For I read and teach as before. Fare well. On the day after the conception 4) [Mary] [9 December] 1518.

1) There were not only three, but several, namely to the Elector, to Degenhard Pfeffinger, to Spalatin, to the Naumburg canon Donat Groß and to the council of Wittenberg, No. 250. 251. 253. 255 and 256 in this volume.

2) The "Prior" is Conrad Held; the "Doctor" Johann Rühel.

3) Document No. 243 in this volume.

Brother Martin Eleutherius.

No. 27.

November 4, 1520.

Wittenberg.

Luther to Spalatin.

About letters to Spalatin that have not arrived. Luther is pleased that Spalatin understands that one cannot rely on men; he does not demand the protection of the princes for the gospel, but only works so that they accept it and become blessed. From his writings against the Bull, from the enmity of Duke George and the Bishop of Merseburg, from the writing of Thomas Rhadinus. He wants to renew his appeal, and write to Duke George and the Bishop of Merseburg, but not to that of Mainz. Of the enmity of Matthew Adrian, the reception of the bull in Erfurt and by the bishop of Bamberg.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches GesamtArchiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 287d; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 520 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 509.

To the man distinguished by scholarship and godliness, Mr. Georg Spalatin, court preacher of the Elector, Duke of Saxony, his! Friends in the Lord.

JEsus.

1st Hail! I, too, wonder what has come between you and not receiving my letters, dear Spalatin. For I have written twice, and I realize that nothing has come to you. I am glad that you finally see that the hopes of the Germans are futile.

4) In the old edition: "after the Annunciation".

are that you learn not to trust in princes [Ps. 118, 8. 9. 146, 3.], and refrain from depending on the judgment of men, who either praise or condemn mine, as you have depended on it until now. If the Gospel were such that it would be either propagated or preserved by the potentatibus of the world, God would not have commanded it to the fishermen.

(2) My dear Spalatin, it is not the business of the princes and bishops of this world to protect the word of God, and for this reason I do not seek anyone's protection, since they must rather assist one another against the Lord and His anointed [Ps. 2:2]. What I do, I do rather for this reason, that through their service to me they may prove themselves pleasing to the word of God, and through the same be saved. But I am sorry for those who have heard and known it. For these cannot deny, forsake and conceal it without their eternal ruin. We must fear lest thou also be found among them with us, and many of the friends, and pray for the spirit of strength.

It is difficult to disagree with all bishops and princes, but there is no other way to escape hell and divine wrath. Therefore, see that those who take offense at my sharpness are those who disdain the cause of the word, and I do not know what human thoughts are. For if a man esteems the thing of dignity, it is not to be wondered at if he would cry out and burst. If you did not push so hard, I would order the whole thing to GOtte and do no more than I have done, since I know that only through his advice and help the matter must be pursued.

I have published the Latin counterbullet 1) which I am sending; it will also be printed in German. I ask you not to be moved in it by those who are unwilling that moderate commandments are harshly touched. The Roman pope's commandments are not moderate commandments, since in them Christ is annihilated and denial of faith is commanded. I have, from lukewarm ter displeasure about the matter, have to be short. Thus, this satanic bull torments me, and I almost kept silent altogether. For which Satan has ever spoken so insolently against God from the beginning of the world? But what shall I say? I am overwhelmed by the greatness of the most frightening blasphemies of this bull, and no one pays attention to that. I am completely convinced that the Last Day is near, by many and powerful signs; the kingdom of the Antichrist is beginning to come to an end.

Duke George is completely furious against me with his sophists and the bishop of Merseburg. I see that this bull implies a rebellion that cannot be quenched, which is befitting the action (officium) of the Roman Curia. Emser has published his Furies against me under the name of Thomas Rhadinus Todiscus 2) and had them printed in Rome, and now in Leipzig. It is to their praise that they have raged with incredible fury.

I will not write privately to the princes, but will renew the appeal by a public note, and call upon all the great and small of Germany to adhere to the appeal, and will state the impropriety of the matter; then I will appeal to the conscience of each one, so that he will not be convicted at the hour of death that he has obeyed these monsters. -

I will not do anything with the bishop of Mainz, but I will corner Duke George and the bishop of Merseburg with letters and the German counter-bullet (when it is published); not that I hope to soften these stubborn spirits, but to save my conscience by informing them of their danger. For it is impossible for those to be blessed who have either acceded to this bull or have not opposed it. The Lord will look at the other, even at you. 4)

2) Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 1252, note 4.

3) No. 478 in this volume, the renewed appeal.

4) The old translator offers here: "not you", but the Latin says: et vos. This can also be translated: also you.

Egranus has told us the same thing about our Adrian, but he has also become an enemy of mine, claiming that I have taught that good works count for nothing, but faith alone. He has hardly refrained from publicly reviling me. Yes, he has insulted me, and the man, who is quite unlearned in theological matters, has challenged me; he is of no use at all and must soon be dismissed. He has gone to Leipzig, perhaps to join forces with Eck. May the will of the Lord be done.

The Erfurt Academy, which had been most urgently requested by Eck, did not admit the bull, claiming that it had not been communicated in a lawful manner. The Bishop of Bamberg rejected it in the same case. The young people of Erfurt besieged the corner armed and threw the printed bull in shreds into the water, therefore it is now in truth a bull (*bull*a == water bubble). The city council turns a blind eye, the court in Mainz dares nothing. But with what honors Eck was received in Leipzig, I think you know; he is hated by almost everyone, except the prince and the bishop. You do what the Spirit will have told you and be well. Wittenberg, November 4, 1520.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 28.

(Wittenberg.)

September 25, 1522.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther sends a book for his host at the Wartburg, and wishes that the Elector may be calm on his account and let him lead the fight.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 92 k; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 252 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. IV, p. 7.

To Georg Spalatin, evangelist at court and to the prince of Saxony.

Grace and peace! I ask you to send this copy to that John in the kingdom of the birds 1), my host, the

1) Hans von Berlepsch, castle captain at Wartburg Castle, to whom Luther sends a copy of the New Testament here.

you know, until I will have several. For by this case I am angry with Lotther's trade (foro), and not yet reconciled or appeased. By the way, you see what our Wenceslaus writes here. I would like our prince to mind his own business and let me deal with Satan and his scales, as I also wrote before. The sky will not fall if he does not believe that, but I believe it and I am sure. But why do I trouble myself with words? Who does not see that by the ready help of God so far the threats of all have become mockery? He who has done this will do this also until the end. This matter will not be led, and will be led, at anyone else's peril. Be well and pray for me. Greet the rest of us. At this hour I am leaving for Leisnig, since I have often been called and requested there. Thursday after Mauritius [September 25] 1522.

Martin Luther.

No. 29.

Wittenberg.

March 25, 1520.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther sends the "Weise, wie Man beichten soll," the printing of which he is dissatisfied with. The "Sermon of Good Works" is in progress, and Luther asks to whom he should dedicate it. The answer to dje at Cologne and Louvain is soon ready. Council for the pastor at Lochau.

The original of this letter is in the Cksammt archives of Anhalt. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 252 d; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 430 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 366.

To the learned and good man, Mr. Georg Spalatin, Magister, his Alertheuersten in Christo.

JEsus.

1) Hail! I send you "the way how to confess", 2) my dear Spalatin, little correct, which is annoying; then with omission of the preface, which we, although it was ready, I do not know by what fate, have omitted to print. It is under the hand and pen of the "Sermon of Good Works," 3) which will not become a sermon, but a booklet, so much does it grow under the

2) St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 786.
3) St. Louis edition, vol. X, 1288.

If it continues like this, it will become the best of all that I have published; but I know that what I like, because it is mixed with this heaven, does not tend to please others. What is your opinion about it, I wish to know.

(2) It has been discussed with me several times that I would like to dedicate a booklet to our most noble Prince John or his son or his wife. But I, since I suspected that they were looking for a name, and I did not want the Holy Scriptures to be used for the name of anyone except God, have not granted them permission until now. If it seems to you, give advice, and I will dedicate this sermon or booklet to the one you will name. 1)

The answer to the Cologne parasites (bomolochos) and the dead lions 2) has come to the end of the last sheet and will soon be finished. Farewell and pray for me, and guide the pastor at Lochau 3) that he may learn to wear the courtly manners which the Lord has assigned to him as relics of the holy cross, and not yield easily, and he will be blessed in this profession. I know that they are very burdensome, but the fiercer the fire, the more quickly and surely it proves the gold. Wittenberg, Sunday Judica [March 25] 1520.

Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 30.

(Wittenberg.)

2. February 1519.

Luther to Joh. Sylvius Egranus.

Luther reports on the negotiations with Miltitz, admonishes Egranus to stay in Zwickau, reports the upcoming disputation with Eck, and sends Carlstadt's writings.

Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 140; in Löschner's Ref. Acta, Vol. III, p. 956; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 215 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 407.

1) He dedicated it to Duke John of Saxony. St. Louis edition, vol. X, 1298.

2) Meant is "Die lehrmäßige Verdammung der Bücher Luthers durch etliche Magistri nostri zu Löwen und Köln und Luthers Antwort darauf," No. 421 in this volume. -is a poor, lowly man, who was condemned by the Victim seeks to get something, who gives himself up to anything for the sake of food.

3) Jakob Gropp.

To the right theologian and Christian man, Johann Egranus, ecclesiastics at Zwickau, his superiors in the Lord.

JESus.

1. salvation Hear lately, my dear Egranus, how it stands with my things. Carl von Miltitz was sent to our prince, armed with more than seventy apostolic letters, which were given to him to bring me alive and bound to the murderous Jerusalem [Matth. 23, 37], namely Rome; but on the way he was thrown down by the Lord [Apost. 9, 4], that is, frightened by the crowd of those who were favorable to me. After he had carefully investigated the opinion of me everywhere, he changed his violence into a deceptively feigned benevolence, and dealt with me in so many words that I should recant my sayings in honor of the Roman church. I answered him to this blow: One should prescribe the manner of the recantation and indicate the cause of the error, but such a cause that would be apparent enough to the common man and the scholars, so that a recantation that had no good appearance would not arouse even more hatred against Rome.

We finally agreed on the bishops, either the one in Salzburg or the one in Trier, that one of them would be ordered to do the thing, and so we parted amicably, even with a kiss (namely a Judas kiss), because he also cried under the admonition. But I opposed it, as if I did not understand these crocodile tears. That is how far it has come; what they may now do in Rome, I do not know.

Carl said that in a hundred years there had not been a thing that had been more troublesome for the quite idle bunch of Cardinals and the Roman Romanists (Romanantium Romanorum), and that they would rather give ten thousand ducats than allow this thing to go further than the beginning. I rejoice, and command GÖtte everything.

4 I also wrote to you before that you should not leave Zwickau; you can learn a lot from books at leisure in Zwickau.

Do Greek. For you owe GÖtte, that is the people of God, more than you and the sciences. I wish to know what ails you in the doctrine of faith, which seems clear to me. For I do not separate justifying faith from love; indeed, for this reason one believes, because he is liked and loved in whom one believes. Grace causes the word to be well pleased and believed; but this is to love. I, too, do not like everything that the newer ones have said about faith, hope and love, since they do not seem to have understood any of them.

Our Eck, who was approached by me in Augsburg to fight with our Carlstadt in Leipzig so that the dispute would be settled, has finally agreed. But listen to how the man behaves: he takes up my sentences and bites them most horribly, and he lets go of the one he has to deal with; one would think that he was playing a carnival game. I am therefore compelled to get involved with the man for my indulgence theses and to fight with him. He is a quite unfortunate little glory beast.

After Easter, he promises the battle. Some claim that it is instigated by the Dominicans (Praedicatoribus), but it is the will of the Lord. I would have sent a copy, but I have only one, which was sent to me from Nuremberg. I am sending Carlstadt's booklet "On the Justification of the Wicked"; he has completed the rest "On the Spirit and the Letter", which I am also sending, hoping that you have the beginning of it. Fare well in Christ and pray for me. On the day of the Purification [of Mary] [February 2, 1519.

Martin Luther.

No. 31.

(Wittenberg.)

February 20, 1519.

Luther to Staupitz.

Complains about Staupitz's silence; about the negotiation with Miltitz; about the Leipzig disputation, which the Leipzigers initially refused; about the Basel edition of his small works (opusculi).

Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 151; in Lösche" Ref. Acta, Vol. III, p. 964; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 251 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 430.

To the venerable and dear father, Johann Staupitz, Vicar of the Hermits of St. Augustine, his patron and superior to be highly venerated in Christ.

JESUS.

Hail! Even though you are very far from us and silent, venerable Father, even though you do not write the eagerly awaited letters to those who are waiting for them, we want to break the silence. We wish, all of us wish, that you would let us see you once in this heavenly region. I believe that my [Augsburg] acts have come to you, that is, the Roman anger and displeasure; God is tearing, driving, I cannot say leading me; I am not powerful, I want to be quiet and am torn into the midst of the noise.

Carl Miltitz saw me at Altenburg and complained that I had attracted the whole world to me and had withdrawn it from the pope; he had scouted out in all the inns that among five people hardly three or two were favorably disposed toward the Roman party. He was equipped with seventy apostolic breves for the task of bringing me captive to the murderous Jerusalem, the purple-clad Babel [Revelation 17, 4. f.], as I learned afterwards from the prince's court. Since it was desperate with this undertaking, he began to negotiate that I should give back to the Roman church what I had taken from it and recant.

But since I requested that he should report the things to be revoked, we finally agreed that some bishops should be ordered to do so. I named the Archbishop of Salzburg, of Trier, and of Freising, and in the evening he received me, and we were merry at a banquet, and after he had given me a kiss, we parted. I pretended not to understand these Italian tricks (Italitates) and hypocrisy. He also had Tetzel called and scolded; at last he convicted him in Leipzig that he owed ninety florins as his monthly salary.

1) Namely, von Eck's first edition of theses. See St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 25a f.

He would have had a salary and three horsemen and a wagon free of charge and without any expenses. Now this Tetzl has disappeared, and no one knows where he has gone, except perhaps his fathers.

4 My corner, the treacherous man, draws me again into new things, as you see here, 1) so much does the Lord see to it that I am not idle. But this disputation will, if Christ wills, go out badly for the Roman rights and customs, on which Eck leans as on his sticks [Isa. 36, 6. Ezek. 29, 6.].

I would like you to see my small works (opuscula) printed at Basel, so that you can see what learned people think of me, Eck, Silvester and the scholastic theologians. For the very witty people call Silvester magirum [cook] of the palace 2) instead of magister of the palace (but it is magirus in Greek, ahead in Latin), making a deliberate printing error, and they rebuke him with other very sharp remarks. This will hurt the Roman great ones. You, I beg you, pray for me. For I have the firm confidence that the Lord requires your heart to be concerned for me. I am a man exposed to society, intoxication, tickling, carelessness, and other troubles, and am surrounded by them, except that which oppresses me by virtue of my office.

The Leipzigers have finally given their consent to the disputation with Eck and accuse me of carelessness that I had written that they had refused it, and demand in a letter addressed to me that I should revoke this. But I am certain through Duke George that they have refused. I have answered twice that their dean, when I asked for it, had refused me before, which he also did. So pitifully do people seek whether they can prevent such a disputation, but Duke George is very insistent on it. Farewell, dearest father. February 20, 1519.

Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

1) Probably Luther sent with this letter also the letter to Carlstadt, No. 361 in this volume, to which the disputation note of Eck is attached.

2) Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, introduction, p. 20a and the note to it.

No. 32.

(Wittenberg.)

March 5, 1519.

Luther to Spalatin.

Admonished by Spalatin to mention faith and works, also obedience to the Roman church in his defense, Luther says that it never occurred to him to become unfaithful to the Roman see. The Roman decrees are supposed to leave the true gospel unhindered. The arrangement of lectures at the university.

The original of this letter can be found in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 154; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, Vol. III, p. 965; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 235 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. I, p. 446.

To the esteemed and highly learned man, Georg Spalatin, court preacher to the most illustrious Elector of Saxony.

Jesus.

Hail! You have reminded me twice, my dear Spalatin, that I should mention faith and works, then also obedience to the Roman Church in my German treatise on defense 3). I believe that I have done so, although it was published before you reminded me. It has never occurred to me that I would have wanted to fall away from the Roman See; indeed, I am content that he be called, or be, the Lord of all. What is that to me? since I know that also the Turk is to be honored and tolerated, for the sake of violence, because I am sure that only by God's will (as Peter [1 Ep. 2, 13. Rom. 13, 1.] says) any violence can exist. But I am anxious, because of my faith in Christ, that they should not tear and defile his word according to their will.

2. the Roman decrees shall leave me free of the true gospel, and even if they take away everything else, I will not do the slightest thing. What more can I do or should I do? Therefore, I will be more than happy to stick to the treaty and not innovate in anything, because this disputation, as I hope, is a disputation, and only the scholars should keep an eye on it; the common people will have their sermon. Farewell.

3) This is Document No. 281 in this volume: "Unterricht auf etliche Artikel, so ihm von seinen Abgönnern auflieg und zugemessen worden worden.

You wish to know who the petitioners are with regard to the lectures that the most noble prince would like to change? The Rector, 1) Carlstadt, me and Amsdorf. Many, however, do not like it, but for a quite unjust reason, since they do not look at what is useful for the young people, but at what the magisters should feed on. And as I was arguing with someone the other day, I said: If the scholarships are only to be given to feed the masters, then the university will become a hospital for the poor. The poor must therefore be fed in a different way, here we must look at what is useful for their studies. They are blind and have no judgment. I hope that the most illustrious prince will give the right advice here. Farewell. March 5, 1519.

Brother Martin Luther.

No. 33.

(Wittenberg.)

May 16, 1519.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther finds it ridiculous that Miltitz summons him to Coblenz to appear before Cajetan without being authorized to do so from Rome or by the Archbishop of Trier. He wants to write for the third time to Duke George, who has twice given him an evasive answer about the Leipzig disputation.

Handwritten, this letter is in the Oo6. den. a, L. 53. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 174; in Löscher's Ref. Acta, vol. III, p. 977; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 270 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 45.

To his Georg Spalatin, Christ's priest, his friend and learned patron.

JEsus.

1 Hail! The ridiculous man, Carl Miltitz, confesses that the order from Rome has not yet come, and summons me; but he summons me himself, not the archbishop; then, to appear before the Cardinal: whether the people are nonsensical? I will write to him; meanwhile advise me, I ask.

2. the duke George has answered me twice, 2) and does not let me yet to the dis-

1) Bartholomäus Bernhardi of Feldkirch.

2) In these two replies, dated March 4 and May 7, 1519, the Duke's consent was made conditional on Eck's request for reimbursement of the disputation (Seidemann, "Leipziger Disputation," p. 129).

I have informed him that Eck forces me to answer him by private letters as well as by public disputation notes. Then, why does he demand of me so much that Eck should write for me, since he has not hesitated to show favor to Eck and has demanded nothing in regard to Carlstadt? What kind of an absurdity is this? I send his two letters; now I write to him for the third time. Please, give advice, what seems good to you. - I will take care of our Schart 3) if I can serve him.

3 By the way, as for my describing the priestly way of life, why do you ask me to do this, since you have the apostle who speaks so abundantly about this matter in the letters to Titus and Timothy?

I thank you for the gift, and I give you God's reward. Fare well in the Lord. We all consider Carl's letter to be of such a nature that, according to everyone's judgment, I would become a laughingstock if I went on the journey for its sake. On Monday after Jubilate [May 16] 1519, Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 34.

(Wittenberg.)

May 16, 1519.

Luther to Johann Lang.

From a matter of order. Luther sends his and Eck's theses for the Leipzig disputation, and reports that Duke George twice gave an evasive answer. About Miltitz's letter. The interpretation of the Epistle to the Galatians is printed.

Handwritten in the 6oä. Ootb. 399, toi. 115. printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 173 b; in Löscher's Ref. Acta, vol. III, p. 976; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 273 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 51.

To the venerable Father Johann Lang, the Vicarius 5) of the Augustinians, Master of Holy Theology, his superior in the Lord.

3) Marcus Schart and his brother Bernhard were the servants of the two natural sons of Frederick the Welsh.

4) Such a writing is found in the editions as a supplement to this letter. Walch brings it in the old edition, Vol. XXI, 631.

5) Vicario mediastino jokingly instead of vicario medio. iVltzckiusinus is a slav used for all sorts of minor purposes.

Jesus.

Hail! The prior of Grimma, 1) venerable father, who has now stayed with me for a day, wished me to write to you about Brother Matthias, the miller, through whose administration things have come to such a pass that the monastery is suffering from a bad reputation, in that the citizens have hinted at or even proven I don't know what kind of trouble that has arisen with the miller's maids. He certainly desires that he be transferred; you will, as your office requires, advise in this; I mean that he should be removed. The lay brothers (conversi) have been ruling there for a long time.

2) I send the new disputation notes, the mutual accusations of Eck and Luther. 2) Duke George has answered me twice in a very doubtful manner; he does not admit me yet, but promises that he will admit me when Eck has informed him that the fight with me is pending, while he has admitted Eck and did not wait to see whether Carlstadt would like to fight; indeed, he has learned from me that I am being challenged by Eck through letters and disputation slips that have been published. You see what an absurd thing people are up to. Now I am writing to him for the third time. The Leipzig theologians and heralds of lies will perhaps be consumed by spite, so much are they inflamed against me.

Carl Miltitz has summoned me to Coblenz to answer to the Archbishop of Trier in the presence of Legate Cajetan: a sweet man, confessing at the same time that he has not yet received a commission from Rome, and hoping that I am so stupid that I should come, since I am only summoned by his insolence. I see that everywhere, from all sides, they are seeking my life in every possible way. My letter to the Galatians 3) becomes

1) Wolfgang Zeschau.

2) "Eck's Disputation and Apology Against Luther's Accusations" 2c. is in this volume no. 362; the theses belonging to it in the St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 712. "Luther's Disputation and Apology Against the Accusations of D. Johann Eck" is in this volume no. 363, the theses belonging to it in the St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 718.

3) The Shorter Interpretation, St.L. ed. vol.VIII, 1352.

Leipzig produced in print. Farewell and pray for me. Monday after Jubilate [16 May] 1519.

Brother Martin Luther.

No. 35.

(Wittenberg.) September

3. September 1519.

Luther to Johann Lang.

Luther is surprised that the people of Erfurt hesitate so long with their verdict on the Leipzig disputation. Luther writes about Eck's boasting and the Leipzigers' writings about the disputation; about his refutation of the articles imposed on him by the Franciscans at Jüterbock and his defense against Eck's malicious judgment. The interpretation of the Epistle to the Galatians is ready for printing. Von Miltitz and the Golden Rose.

Handwritten in the Ooä. Ootuuu. V. 399, col. 129. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 207d; in Löschner's Ref.Acta, vol. III, p. 981; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 327 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 139.

To the venerable and dear father Johann Lang of Erfurt, vicar of the middle hermits, his superior in the Lord.

Jesus.

Hail! I wonder, venerable father, why your citizens of Erfurt may hesitate, since one is waiting for their verdict; but I assume that they will act more wisely than to get involved in these strange and spiteful matters. In the meantime, we anticipate the verdict, and judge one another and are judged. We, unlearned and learned, write poems everywhere. 4)

2. corner in his impetuosity hurls letters, 5) strews triumphant crowns. The One Leipzig has produced nothing but Herodote, critics, Aristarche, Tadler (Momos) and innumerable such frogs. Leipzig, which was always dumb, has become a greater yapper (latrantior) than many scyllae because of this One Disputation. 6) So much the miserable envy torments itself

4) Soon after the Leipzig Disputation, a large number of writings about it came out, namely, until then, the following documents (here chronologically ordered), which are given in this volume, Cap. 5, Sections 3 and 4: No. 394, 406, 407, 397, 398, 380, and, Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 1202, Emser's letter to Zack. The last sentence in the preceding text alludes to the title (see No. 399 in this volume.) of Rubens' Reimerien, which are mentioned in this appendix, No. 49. 3.

5) Cf. No. 413 in this volume.

6) Scylla, the daughter of Phorcus, was taken by the Circe out of jealousy into a monster with dogs on its underbelly. Oviä. LitzunaorpU. 14. v. 52 8^4.

whether he could not claim victory against us by making noise. The truth will prevail.

3) I would send you my explanations (salivas) about the Psalter 1) but because you do not write anything, whether you want them and how much you already have, I think that you are not interested. This man 2) sells my last explanations against Eck. 3) Lotther in Leipzig prints a defense for me against the same, in which I refute the thirteen articles that have been imposed on me by the Minorite brothers in Jüterbock and which Eck has most spitefully directed against my name. 4) I again impose 24 articles on him and the matter is well underway. I am told that today the letter to the Galatians is finished.

Our most noble prince is tempted by Miltitz with the golden rose, who boasted in Dresden: "Doctor Martinus is in my hands"; but if God is merciful, he will do nothing. Farewell and pray for me with work overburdened brother. On Saturday after Aegidii [September 3] 1519, Brother Martin Luther.

No. 36.

(Wittenberg.)

October 3, 1519.

Luther to Joh. Staupitz.

Luther sends the interpretation of the Epistle to the Galatians, writes about the forthcoming discussion with Miltitz; also about religious affairs; about the two letters from Bohemia; about Melancthon's theses; about Erasmus's judgment of him and Eck; about the hatred of the bishop of Brandenburg; about Staupitz's coldness toward him; about a Franciscan chapter in Wittenberg that is hostile to him; about Fontinus's disputation; about a dream concerning Staupitz.

1) This refers to "Luther's work on the first 22 Psalms" (operatio Q68 in psalmos), which appeared in pieces, and of which Melancthon had already sent a part to Lang on April 3, 1519 (6orp. UsL., I, 76). See St. Louis edition, vol. IV, 198 ff. and the note there.

2) Perhaps the bearer of the letter.

3) "Luthers Erläuterungen über seine zu Leipzig disputirten Thesen." St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 820.

4) This is the writing: "Luthers Vertheidigung wider das böswillige Urtheil des Johann Eck" 2c. St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 1370. - The specification thirteen (XIII) articles is erroneous, perhaps through the fault of the copyists; there were fourteen articles of the Franciscans, to which Eck then added a fifteenth. Luther mentions and refutes fifteen articles in his writing.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 209; in Löscher's Ref. Acta, vol. III, p. 983; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 340 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 182.

To the venerable and extremely valuable Father Johann Staupitz, Vicar of the Hermits of St. Augustine, his patron and superior to be highly venerated in Christ.

JESUS.

1. Hail! I send, venerable father, two copies of my incomprehensible Galatians. 5) They no longer please me as they first pleased me, so that I see they could have been interpreted more broadly and clearly. But who can do everything at the same time? yes, who can always do many things? But I have confidence that this Paul is clearer than others have made it before, even though it does not satisfy my taste. The Psalter is progressing, 6) only that I am annoyed by the slow printer. Our prince, who has recovered, is staying at Lochau.

Carl Miltitz has ordered me to Liebenwerda next Sunday [Oct. 9] with the Prince's permission in an extremely friendly (I know the fox) letter. 7) I do not know what will happen. He finally handed over the rose in Altenburg in the absence of the Prince, which he had intended to bring to Wittenberg, I do not know with how much pomp.

We have not yet seen anything of the meeting in Erfurt 8) except for the obedience of the lay brother Peter, whom our prior has not yet dismissed because he expects another in his place, not believing that you respect this meeting less than the one in Dresden. Brother Matthias Grüner has also come and become our procurator. I do not yet see what you want to have done with the books that you left with me, and I am very surprised about that.

3. I wanted more brothers to be sent to us, and capable ones at that. There have been

5) St. Louis edition, vol. VIII, 1352.

6) Luther's "Works on the Psalms," St. Louis edition, vol. IV, 198. The "slow printer" is Joh. Grüenberg.

7) No. 316 in this volume.

8) Nothing else is known about this convention.

Both priors in the Netherlands, Jacob and Henry, 1) wrote to me in an exceedingly lamenting and quite hopeless manner that nothing is happening through their vicar. But they say that they want to send brothers, even come themselves; but it will not happen, since the letters are written in the Easter season and they are not yet there.

In this hour I have received letters from Prague in Bohemia from two priests of the Utraquist party, who are quite learned in the Holy Scriptures, together with a booklet by John Hus, 2) which I have not yet read. But they exhort me to constancy and patience; that is the pure theology which I teach. They follow the manner of Erasmus (Erasmisant) quite extraordinarily, both in meaning and in writing. The letters, however, came to me through the court of our prince, in that Spalatin sent them to me, and there it is no longer hidden.

5) You have seen or now see Melanchthon's somewhat bold but quite true theses 3). He answered in such a way that he was to us all what he is, namely a miracle. If Christ will, he will replace many people like Martin (multos Martinos), as an exceedingly powerful feiud of the devil and of scholastic theology, because he knows equally the inanities of those people and the rock of Christ; therefore, as a strong one, he will be able to do much. Amen.

Letters have come from France in which it is written that Erasmus 4) said: I fear that Martin will perish by his righteousness; but of Eck.

that he had robbed his name of one letter, namely that instead of Eck one should say Jeck. But Jeck means a fool among the Dutch. So much does Christ fight against the vain honor that the one whom the Leipzigers worship and call Eck, all scholars, as they write, detest extraordinarily and call him Jeck.

7 My bishop of Brandenburg is pregnant with a monster, the good man, and like Moab, he misses greater things than he is able [Isa. 16:6]. He is said to have said that he would not let his head rest gently, because he had previously thrown Martin into the fire like this firebrand, which (while saying this) he threw into the fire at the same time. But this is how Eck's windmaking blows up this miserable bubble.

8 But this from others. What do you want in relation to me? You trust me too much. I have been exceedingly grieved for thee this day, as a weaned man for his mother [Ps. 131, 2. Vulg.]. I beg you to praise the Lord even in me, a poor sinner. I hate the exceedingly poor life, I detest death, and I am empty of faith, full of other gifts; Christ knows how much I do not desire them if I cannot serve him.

(9) The Minorites discuss with us in the assembled chapter about the marks of St. Francis and the glory of their order, but with such happiness that we, who before revered both, now begin to doubt both about those marks and about the nature of this order. Both have been found to be more like lies than truth; the same thing has happened to them, since they exalted those things too much, as happened to the preaching monks who exalted St. Thomas too much.

(10) They were led to these disputations by envy against this Martinus, who had spread the rumor that I had preached against those wounds. Therefore they thought to have gained an occasion against me and hoped to make something difficult for me. And I am indeed happy, since all of them are so eager to attack me that they also begin to invent doctrines which they would like to deny as mine; but it does not do any good.

1) Jakob Probst, prior in Antwerp, and Heinrich von Zütphen, prior in Dordrecht. It was a matter of appropriate measures in the sense of the Reformation, to which the Vicar Johann von Mecheln (also called Johann von Osbach) did not offer his hand.

2) The two letters have been included in No. 422 and 423 in this volume. The book of Hussens is 6s Vedssia.

3) Reprinted in Krafft's "Briefe und Documente aus der Zeit der Reformation", p. 6. Melanchthon had put forward the theses for the attainment of the lowest theological dignity, namely the degree of a daeoalaurns tUboiobiae kidlieus. The disputation took place in September 1519 under the decanate of Petrus Fontinus (not Fontanus, as Krafft writes).

4) In Walch's old edition: "Emser.

I am sorry that they are making such a mockery of their entire Order without cause.

It was an Erfurtian who disputed this, namely the one who attained the master's degree at the same time as our Lange. Tomorrow, Peter Fontinus 1) will debate, who attacks me and all of us as bad scholars and smart alecks, and has stated that one must thoughtlessly repeat the most distinguished fathers. We will see great miracles from these Minorite workers. Thus these ignorant people excite great sorrows without cause. But behold! their Baccalaureus Jakobs, 2) who answered today for the bystanders (pro cironlo), surpasses those two Magistri nostri, because he was modest and put the theses right. He is from Zwickau, educated here in Wittenberg, at the same time pious and a good head. Thus God humbles the worthy and exalts the lowly.

(12) That night I had a dream about you, as if you wanted to leave me, but I was crying bitterly and suffering; but you waved your hand at me and told me to be quiet, that you would return to me; this is certainly true and has just happened this day. But now be well, and pray for me poorest. The day before St. Francis [October 3], in the evening. 1519.

Brother Martin Luther.

No. 37

(Wittenberg.)

October 13, 1519.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther says that he did not promise Miltitz the trip to Trier, but only his willingness to accept the bishop of Trier as arbitrator. What one chooses from Miltitz in Rome. About the writings of some opponents. Apology for his quick departure at a banquet. About the plague in various regions. Finally, he urges that his and Carlstadt's answer to the Elector be sent to Eck.

The original of this letter is in the Ge" sammt-Archiv of Anhalt. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 211k; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, Vol. III, p. 985; in De Wette, Vol. 344 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II.

To the servant of Christ Georg Spalatin, secretary and court preacher of the Elector of Saxony, his friend in the Lord.

JEsus.

1st Hail! Not only have I not spoken a word about it, but I have never even had the thought, my dear Spalatin, that I wanted to travel with Carl to Trier; I wonder at the impudence or even forgetfulness of this man, since I have hardly admitted to him that I wanted to come to Liebenwerda; how can it be likely that I should promise such a journey, and with him as a traveling companion? Therefore, you will not doubt that I have promised nothing else than that I, according to our prince's order and advice (whose name and actions with the bishop of Trier I asserted for his sake), insisted on the promise and agreement, according to which we had united at Altenburg on the bishop of Trier as judge in this matter; the judge, I say, has only been mentioned, nothing is said about the journey.

Add to this the fact that the same Carl said that he would not travel to Trier on this trip, but to Rome as soon as possible, and that he had already arranged the mission he had from Rome. Yes, I suspected that he had no other reason for wanting to talk to me again in a personal meeting about a matter that had been agreed upon long ago than so that he would have something to boast about his diligence when he returned to Rome, namely that he had not only dealt with me personally once, but had tried everything he could.

3) But I believe that he, since he is deceived in his hope, pretends such trivial things out of fear of conscience, or gossips after his own fashion. For yesterday at the midday meal, a certain doctor, the provost of Collerburg, 3) a Pomeranian, who, having come from Rome, dined with me at the Prince of Pomerania, 4) our rector, described him as such a person, and he said, "I do not believe him.

3) Löscher has next to OoUsrkui^nsns in brackets": OolkerAkllsis, with which probably the right thing will be hit.

4) Duke Barnim.

1) Franciscans from Borna.

2) Jakob Fuhrer from Zwickau.

told that he was taken for I don't know what in Rome. For he had boasted there because of his affinity with the dukes of Saxony 1), so that he was called everywhere by the Italians de parente Duce Saxoniae (that is, by the kinship [parentela] of the dukes of Saxony), and many other ridiculous and vain things. In short, he is a miserable man who has been made a fool of everywhere there, and should be made a fool of here as well.

4. The same doctor reported that when he was to deliver the rose, an apostolic breve was handed over to him in which he was ordered to hand over the rose to the prince in such a way that he should send Martin against it, and it would have happened this way if a certain sensible cardinal had not intervened, who, after reading the breve, said with great vehemence: "Are you all children or nonsensical that you dare to buy the monk from the prince? and immediately he tore the breve with his own hands.

5 My Silvester Prierias is silent (as he reports), but another, Cyprian, a brother of Paris, 2) writes against me by order of the pope, but unwillingly. For he reports that he said (to use his words): The pope wants me to write, but I do not like to do it at all; that brother is rich in words (verbosus), he will not be silent. My dialogue 3) is hard for them, and well known in Rome.

I have not yet received a letter from the University of Leipzig, but I have found anew the follies of that man, Rubeus Longipolitanus, in the German language, who makes stupidities about my name (crassantis). It is to be marveled how very it, the Leipzigers are delighted to blow out their poison through this flute, which fits very well for them. How fearfully envy seeks causes to revile, but I still despise everything.

7 I beg your pardon for my very quick departure. For I did it because I know that the name of the monks has an evil reputation at court and with the pots (propter aulos et ollas); 4) then, because I did not want to be an annoyance to the man of whom I told you, whom I believed to be a burdensome and annoying table companion. You know how, because of one man, one must also refrain from many things that are permitted [1 Cor. 8:13]. You also see how sharply the Leipzigers observe me. Now if the latter secretly wrote to his Leipzigers that I had been merry and frivolous, had even played dice with our Pistor, and they seized the opportunity and compared my life with the word whose proclamation through me they hate, then this would, through my instigation, cause an obstacle to the gospel of Christ. For what should they not write, who through the Rubeus chatter that in Leipzig I carried in my hand a plaited and bound wreath to smell and look at it? they would rather say that I carried it on my head, if they could dare. I cannot be careful enough of all things, nor do I want to be; but I will give way to weakness and spite as much as I can. I have therefore hurried away out of no contempt, but out of fear of offence.

8. a cruel plague is raging in Switzerland, so that it has killed 16,000 men, not including children and women. This was reported by the same doctor, the provost, who told the above. In Kreuzberg 5) she carried off eighteen nuns together with their provost; in Sangerhausen eight brothers together with their prior. It is said that she also rages in Nuremberg and almost everywhere. Thus it is written to us from our places. The father vicarius 6) came to Nuremberg healthy on September 24 and from there to Munich.

1) Henry the Illustrious, died Jan. 14, 1300, had in third marriage a von Maltitz, who has also been taken for a Miltitz (Seidemann, "Miltitz", p. 18).

2) The Dominican Oiprinno Lsnsti, who, born in Arragon, is called here kurrlüsknsis, because he had become a master in Paris. He is mentioned in Huetit st Lekarä, Keniptorr. orä. krasäieut., 1. II, 49, but among his writings none is listed against Luther from this time. Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, introduction, p. 19 d.

3) St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 344.

4) That is, they are unmannerly and gluttonous.

5) Kreuzberg, a quarter of an hour below Vacha on the Werra, where there was an Augustinian nunnery.

6) Staupitz.

9th Now I also begin to wish and ask that what we have answered our prince be sent to Eck. 1) The latter wrote to the pope and boasted of his honor that he had overcome both of us at Leipzig and left us dejected. The man, who is entirely boastful, glorious, boastful and boastful, has even dared to demand reimbursement of his expenses from the pope in this matter. This was told by the above doctor, the provost. Farewell. In the greatest haste. On the fifth day [Thursday] after Dionysii [October 13] 1519.

Brother Martin Luther.

No. 38.

(Wittenberg.)

May 5, 1520.

Luther to Spalatin.

Of Staupitzen's intended resignation from office at the next Augustinian chapter. About Matthew Adrian, who cost Luther and Melancthon a lot of money. About the sermon on good works.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 265; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 446 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 399.

To the good and learned man, Magister Georg Spalatin, princely court preacher, his friend in the Lord.

Jesus.

1st Hail! I am sending a letter, as you wished, but a short one, as the content is short. I also send the letter of Wilhelm, 2) the treasurer of the Count of Stolberg, who recently visited me here with his father, brother and friends.

Our vicar has scheduled our chapter earlier 3) and will come to Eisleben on the feast of Augustine [Aug. 28] and there, as they say, lay down the burden of his office.

Adrian does not have a house yet, and we are constantly plagued. But listen! I almost passed over it: remember that you are helping me with two or three gold florins.

1) No. 416 in this volume. However, the letter had already been sent on Oct. 12.

2) Tire stone.

3) It should actually have taken place in 1521.

For I put up a lot with Adrian; or should Philip and I alone spend our money in guest affairs? since we are poor, but others do not care about him, as it were. So they do not visit him, which displeases me, for that is somewhat ruder than is proper. Yes, if I could, I would also reclaim from you the loss of time, which is most burdensome to both of us. May the Lord grant that he will soon have a house, although the good man very often stays in Luca's pharmacy, for fear of making things difficult for us.

I lose a lot of time by inviting people all over the city. I don't know which Satan arranges this, that I must not refuse it, and yet brings me harm if I do. - The Sermon of Good Works grows to a not small book, even twice as big as the Tessaradecas. 5) Farewell. May 5, 1520.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 39.

(Wittenberg.)September

1. September 1520.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther thanks the Churfürst for Wildpret; of the imminent arrival of Staupitzen and Links; of Miltizen's letter; of the transfers decided upon at the Capitol.

The original of this letter is in the Ge" sammt-Archw. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 280b; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 483 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 472.

To the worthy man, Magister Georg Spalatin 2c., his patron in Christ.

Jesus.

Hail! Above all, my dear Spalatin, see to it that you give thanks for me to the most noble prince, who fattened me with venison, although I am a monk. By the way, the venerable Father Staupitz will come today and with him his new successor M. Wenceslaus. For yesterday the

4) Lucas Cranach had a pharmacy; D. Basilius Axt was according to the letter to Brismann on August 24, 1531 5) This is: "Tröstliches Büchlein in aller Widerwärtigkeit" 2c., Walch, St. Louiser Ausgabe, Bd. X, 1816 ff.

Ours returned. 1) Carl Miltitz wrote this letter 2) to me; he also gave a speech at the public meeting of the fathers, which was delivered with Italian pronunciation 3) and asked for advice on how to dampen me. For he sees that he brought the rose in vain, which he also indicated with words, however darkly. The fathers are said to have answered that they had nothing to do with me and knew no advice. But we will hear more about that today. The counts have kept him quite splendidly.

I am sending the letter from Antwerp, which is written by the prior of 4) this place, so that you may see what is being done in relation to me. Our Lang (about which I wonder) is to be prior at Dresden, 5) Melchior Mirisch [is to be prior] at Ghent; I do not know whether they have been driven by the spirit of fortitude, so much are all things in confusion with the new government of the new vicar. I believe that you will have received the letters from the father Jakob Vogt 6). Farewell. The first of September 1520.

Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 40.

(Wittenberg.)

3. October 1520.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther does not want to write the letter to the pope that he promised Miltitz, because Eck has arrived with the bull of excommunication. He leaves it undecided whether he should ask the Elector to obtain an imperial edict for him and his books. News from Venice. Of the "Babylonian captivity" and a writing by Carlstadt; of Eck's reception in Leipzig; of the Archbishop of Mainz; of Matthew Adrian.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv, Printed by Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 283b; by De Wette, Vol. I, p. 491 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 486.

1) The General Chapter of the Augustinians was held in Eisleben on Sunday, Monday and Tuesday after Bartholomew [August 26-28].

2) No. 339 in this volume.

3) In Walch's old edition: "in Italian".

4) Jakob Probst.

5) This was just an empty rumor.

6) The confessor of the Elector, died April 15, 1522.

To the learned and godly man, Georg Spalatin,
Christ's servant, his friend in the Lord.

Jesus.

Hail! I have received many letters from you, my dear Spalatin, and I am surprised that the one through which I answered yours from Buttstedt has not yet reached you. 7) For the later ones did not concern anything else than that one, namely from the fathers' sending to me from Eisleben; but I still hope that it will have reached you in the meantime. For Carl has requested that I write privately to the Roman pope and apologize for not having attacked his person. I have not yet done so, nor will I do so now, since Eck, as one has heard, has prepared bulls and curses for me at Leipzig. 8) It is still not known what he intends to do.

It has seemed good to many that I should ask our prince to issue me an imperial edict that no one should condemn me unless I am overcome by Scripture, nor forbid my books. You may see whether it is advisable; I do not care much about it, because I do not like that my books are so much copied, and would like to destroy them all at once, because they are without order and unsmoothed, although I wish that the things themselves are known to all. But not everyone can gather gold from the dung, nor is it necessary, since better writings and the holy books are available. I would like it much more if we could either multiply the living books, that is, the preachers, or ensure that they are read to the people; in this regard, I am sending you what has been sent to me from Italy.

If our prince wanted to come here, I believe that he could hardly do a work that would be more worthy of him. For if the common people in Italy were to take hold of this, perhaps our cause would stand all the stronger. Who knows if God will not awaken them and give us

7) Compare No. 13 in this appendix.

8) In the Erlanger abhuc instead of aklue; probably a misprint, because no variant is given.

Keep our prince for his own sake, that he may work through him for his word? Therefore, see what you can promote here for Christ's cause. The one who writes from Venice is a brother of Lazarus Spengler, 1) who sent this copy to me from Nuremberg.

The book of the captivity of the church 2) will go out on Saturday [Oct. 6] and be sent to you. Carlstadt has also made his decision, 3) and is sounding the horns against the Roman pope. At this hour it is reported to me that Eck is quite uncertain in Leipzig and very much despised, and is mocked in many notes posted everywhere, and he finds a far different shape of things and a different attitude in Leipzig than he had hoped; for things are not as they were a year ago. 4) Yes, he has changed his lodgings and is staying in the Dominican monastery; it is publicly said that he will not escape the persecutions, nor will he return to Ingolstadt. 5) I did not want him to be killed, although I wish that his plots would come to nothing. May the Lord do what is good in his eyes.

5) There is nothing new in our country but the Prussian war. 6) The bishop of Mainz publicly orders that the books of Hütten and those that have appeared against the pope be stopped; thereby he will bring evil upon his head. Hütten sets out with tremendous anger against the Roman pope, 7) and attacks the cause with weapons and writings. Our Adrian, I do not know by what furor he is driven, 8) rages violently against me; perhaps he seeks an occasion to leave. I have done nothing to the man; he is attacking

1) Georg Spengler, a respected merchant in Venice; Scheurl, Briefbuch, vol. II, p. 60. He died March 21, 1529.

2) "Of the Babylonian Captivity of the Church," St. Louis Edition, vol. XIX, 5 ff.

3) Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XX, Introduction, p. 5a f.

4) Compare Miltizen's letter to the Elector of October 3, 1520, No. 340 in this volume.

5) He finally escaped at night from Leipzig to Freiberg.

6) This is the war of the Teutonic Knights' Grand Master Albrecht against the King of Poland, to whom he refused the oath of fealty.

7) Compare No. 13. ? 3 in this appendix.

8) He held to Eck. Cf. Seidemann, "Beiträge," p. 39, note.

my sermons, ready to teach me the gospel, while he does not understand his Moses. We interpret his nonsense in many ways; but let it go, time will reveal it. Fare well in the Lord. On the day before Franciscus [October 3] 1520. Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 41.

Wittenberg.

11. 9) October 1520.

Luther to Spalatin.

The bull has arrived, Luther wants to attack it as fabricated. He is of good cheer, since the bull and Eck are despised everywhere. At this hour, he wants to leave for Lichtenberg for a discussion with Miltitz.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 28üd: in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 494 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 490.

To Georg Spalatin, the godly and learned man, princely Saxon court preacher, now at the emperor's court.

JEsus.

Hail! Finally the Roman bull has arrived, which Eck brought with him, of which ours write several things to the prince. 10) I despise it and now attack it as a godless and lying and in every respect ecclesiastical one. You see that in it Christ himself is condemned, then that nothing of reason and cause is given, finally that I am called, not to be heard, but to recant, so that you can know that they are people full of rage, blindness and nonsense, who neither see nor mean anything. But I still want to proceed with concealment of the name of the pope, as against a fictitious and lying bull, although I believe that it is genuine and their own. Oh, if only [Emperor] Carl were a man and attacked these devils for Christ!

9) The date of this letter in the text, "October 13," is incorrect. Luther arrived in Lichtenberg on October 11. Compare No. 347 in this volume.

10) Eck sent the bull with a letter of October 3 (No. 456 in this volume) to the University of Wittenberg. The latter turned to the Elector, who was in Cologne at the time and only gave an evasive answer to their letter from Homburg on November 18 (No. 457 in this volume).

2 I certainly fear nothing for myself; let it be what the will of God wills. Nor do I know what the prince should do, except that it seems to me to be best here that he pretends not to know about it. For even at Leipzig and everywhere, both the Bull and Eck are held in the greatest contempt; therefore, I suspect that it might want to gain a reputation through our excessive concern and distress, while in itself it will easily collapse and be silent. I am sending a copy of it, so that you may see the Roman monstrosities. If these should prevail, it will be the end of the faith and of the church.

However, I rejoice with all my heart that evil is done to me for the sake of the best cause, and I am not worthy of such a holy plague. Now I am much freer, having finally become certain that the pope is the Antichrist and has obviously been invented as Satan's chair. God only preserve his own, that they are not seduced by his exceedingly godless appearance. Erasmus wrote that the court of the emperor was taken over by the beggar tyrants 1) so that there could be no hope for Carl. This is not surprising: "Do not rely on princes, they are men, they cannot help" [Ps. 146, 3].

I am going to Lichtenberg at this hour to give Carl Miltitz another opportunity to speak with me, as the Prince has ordered, although the Preceptor 2) does not like it and I do not know what great things he fears. Farewell and pray for me. I will renew my appeal 3) and do what has to be done according to the advice of the others, even though I would rather that the bull would take its course against me; but one must also take others into consideration. Wittenberg, 1520, 13 [11] October.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

1) That is, the mendicants.

2) "The preceptor" is not, as Walch and De Wette assume, Melanchthon, but Wolfgang Reibenbusch, preceptor or head of the Antonian monastery at Lichtenberg, at the same time chancellor of the University of Wittenberg. Compare No. 347 in this volume.

3) This he did on November 17, 1520. See No. 478 in this volume.

No. 42.

Wittenberg.

March 24, 1518.

Luther to Joh. Sylvius Egranus.

Luther speaks courage to Egranus against Ochsenfart's attack on his doctrine of the three Marys; about Eck's obelisks; about the ignorance of the Leipzig theologians in the Holy Scriptures.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 56 d; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. II, p. 608; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 99 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. I, p. 172.

To the noble and righteous friend, Johann Sylvius Egranus, 4) Master of Liberal Arts and Philosophy, ecclesiastical priest at Zwickau, his most revered in the Lord.

1st Hail! I have seen the sentences (positionos) of Doctor Hieronymus Ochsenfart, which, as it seems, have been compiled against you, but without mention of your name. Be steadfast and strong, my dear Egranus, so it must be done. If this were of the world, the world would love yours. All that is in the world must die in the world, that the spirit may be glorified. If you are wise, wish me happiness, and I you.

2. Recently, an outstanding man of true and perceptive erudition and a deft good head, and, what hurts me even more, who was previously connected with me by a recently concluded great friendship, 5) wrote "obelisks" [notes] against my theses, namely Johann Eck, Doctor of Theology, Pro-Chancellor of the University of Ingolstadt, canon of Eichstädt, now also preacher of the church of Augsburg, an already famous man, also known through his books; and if I did not know the thoughts of Satan, I would be astonished at the rage from which he has created the entire

4) His real name was Johann Wildenauer from Eger, and since 1517 he was employed as a preacher at the Marienkirche in Zwickau. He had preached during the sermon about the legend of Saint Anne against the church belief of the three husbands of the grandmother of JEsu, Anna, and was therefore attacked by D. Dungersheim of Ochsenfurt (compare St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, introduction, p. 21 d). A rich evidence of literature about him can be found in Seidemann, Münzer", p. 9, note.

5) See St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 23.

new and exceedingly sweet bonds of friendship dissolved without any warning, neither writing nor saying goodbye. 1)

But he has written obelisks in which he calls me a poisonous Bohemian, a heretic, a rebellious, insolent, sacrilegious man. But I pass over the lesser invectives, that he calls me a sleepy, unskilled, unlearned man, finally also a despiser of the pope. In short, they are nothing other than the most despicable invectives with explicit mention of my name and designation of my theses, so that there is nothing in these obloquies but envy and resentment of a completely enraged heart.

4 Nevertheless, I wanted to swallow in patience this morsel puffing for a hellhound, but the friends forced me to answer him, but in a private writing. Praised be the HErr JEsus, yes, he alone be in honor, let us be rightly covered with shame. Rejoice, dear brother, rejoice, and do not be so frightened by these flying leaves that you should desist from teaching as you have begun, but [rise against them] like a palm tree in Kades against the burdens pressing it down. 2)

The more they rage, the further I go. I let go of the former things, however they may bark at them, and take up the later things, so that they may also bark at them. Continue happily, only ask the Lord that he himself create his glory and that his will be done. However, I have written to D. Hieronymus Ochsenfart that what you have asserted does not seem to me to be errors, but truths; his statements also seemed to me to be mostly erroneous, and I am prepared, and have no doubt, that you will defend both your errors and mine.

1) Eck therefore apologized in a letter to Carlstadt (No. 352 in this volume) and offered peace again, but too late.

2) Sirach 24,18. Vulg.: tznasi xalraa cxaltata "um in Oucclcs. - In ^ulus (Icllius', noct. ^ttic. III, 6, it is said that the heavier one loads the wood of a palm tree, the higher it rises against the load. We find the same more frequently in Luther, e.g. Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XI, 42, §94 and vol. XII, 421, 8 28.

But if they were to bring up something from the scholastic teachers, he should know that he would not get anywhere with us with it, but would only lose words.

(6) It is obvious that I would like to swear that there is no scholastic theologian who understands even one chapter of the Gospel or the Bible, especially not one from Leipzig, not even one chapter of the philosopher Aristotle, which I hope to prove with honor if I am given the opportunity to examine them; unless that is to know the Gospel, if one pronounces the syllables, but only to some extent. Therefore, do not be afraid of ignorance. Let not the rattling of titles leave your mind: doctors, universities, magisters, for they are a mere shell and a sham (do not be afraid of those whose hearts you see); nor of men, but only of the form of a shell. The Lord instruct thee and strengthen thee; in him thou shalt be well. Wittenberg, the day before the Annunciation [March 24] 1518.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 43.

(Wittenberg.)

3. February 1519.

Luther to Johann Lang.

Congratulations on Längs' upcoming graduation; Luther reports that Eck is provoking him to serious argument against Rome, and asks for the dismissal of a Father Matthew.

Handwritten in Ooä. Ootttan. 399, tot. 127, printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 141 d; in Löscher's Ref. Acta, vol. III, p. 958; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 217 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. I, p. 410.

To the venerable Father Johann Lang, middle vicar of the Augustinian hermits, the newly appointed Doctor 3) of Theology, his friend in Christ.

JEsus.

Hail! All the honors the Lord has bestowed on you, we wish you happiness, as if they were also bestowed on us. Venerable

3) Both De Wette and the Erlangen correspondence say (probably on the basis of the "Doctori" in the salutation) that this was a congratulation on Längs' promotion to the theological doctorate, but we are of the opinion that Luther, as in the letter of June 4, 1518 (De Wette 1,124; Walch XXI, 595), used the title Lscras Ditsoloxias closiZnato Doctori also Father, [Ps. 45:5, Vulg.] "go blessedly forth with thy jewels, and thou shalt prosper"; 1) I will not come.

Our corner is waging new wars against me, and it will happen that I will do what I have long thought, if Christ is gracious, that is, that I will finally start a serious book against the Roman serpent breed. For up to now I have only played and joked with the Roman cause, although they lament extraordinarily as over an unbearable seriousness.

By the way, I ask you to see to it that you remove Matthew, 2) this aged father. For one must spare old age, and his willing obedience must be respected; also it is neither an honor nor proper before God nor before men to leave him in such misery; but in such a way that you first provide us with another in his place, who is to be appointed there as pastor. If you heard me, such a parish should be filled with a (so-called) secular priest. Farewell. On the day of Blasius [February 3] 1519.

Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 44.

Wittenberg.

April 13, 1519.

Luther to Johann Lang.

Luther asks Lang to send the teacher of the Hebrew language recommended by him in Böschenstein's place. Information about the Leidiger Disputation, which the Luther jokingly used this word here, since it was about the promotion of the licentiate Lang to Magister. Still on December 13, 1518 (No. 23 in this appendix) Luther wrote to Staupitz that the Erfurt fathers did not want to let the licentiate Lang get the master's degree, and now, two months later, he should have been promoted to doctor? This could not be done by skipping the master's degree. Moreover, in all later letters in which the titles are given, Lang is referred to as Laoras UreoloZias MKFr'sFe-*, never as 8th D. so e.g. in No. 44 of this appendix. - Erhard, Ueberlief. z. vaterl. Gesch. I, 31, says (as the Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 13, Note 2 indicates) that the doctoral graduation took place on February 24, 1519; but this source is not reliable, because according to it, the Erlanger Briefwechsel (Vol. IV, p. 138) has transferred his No. 655 to the year 1523, which, as later corrected, belongs to the year 1528.

1) How Luther wants these words: xrospsr's prossäs st to be understood in the Vulgate, see St. Louiser Ausg., Vol. V, 368.

2) Compare No. 44, § 7 in this appendix.

Theologians at Leipzig try to prevent. From letters received. Luther sends him some of his own writings, some from others, and warns him of two sermons published without his consent 2c.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 161; in Löscher's Ref.- Acta, vol. III, p. 968 (with wrong resolution of the date); in De Wette, vol. I, p. 253 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 9.

To the venerable and highly esteemed Father Johann Lang, Master of Sacred Theology, middle Augustinian Vicar of the Hermit Congregation (Eremitarum familiae Vicario Augustiniano medio), his superior in the Lord, his highly esteemed friend.

Jesus.

Hail! I rejoice and wish you happiness, venerable Father, that you too are one of those in whom the cross of Christ is effective; be a strong man! 3) We thank you for your gifts. By the way, you know why I didn't come to your pomp 4). Our silence is not so much to blame as the nature of the road, by which it comes that we either rarely or never have anyone who goes from here to you.

This Hebrew of yours, whom you recommend, you want to induce to go to us and, I ask you, to put everything you can into it, and all the more so, since our Böschenstein, 5) who is a Christian by name, but in fact an arch-Jew, has gone away to the disgrace of our university, and you also owe something to our university. 6)

3) Oviä. ListÄlli. 9, 272; 15, 846.

4) the promotion, which is said to have taken place on February 24.

5) Johann Böschenstein from Esslingen, born 1472, died 1532, came from Ingolstadt to Wittenberg at the end of October or beginning of November 1518 (inscribed between Nov. 2 and 5, ^lb. x. 77) as the first Hebrew professor, but, as we see here, left again at the beginning of April 1519. (Cf. No. 16, § 8 in this appendix.) He then went to Heidelberg, but remained there only a short time. Later he was Zwingli's teacher in Hebrew in Zurich. In a special writing, he defended himself against the accusation that he came from a Jewish family and not from born Christians, and says of his family that it is a very old family of the town of Stein am Rhein, below Costenz, where his father's brothers still lived as fishermen.

6) Lang was inscribed in Wittenberg in late summer 1511 and remained there until May 1515. Kolde, ^valseta, p. 4.

We will see to it that he is honestly preserved in Christ and that he is in a proper position here; not only because we all have to care for one who is still young (recentem) in Christ all the more carefully, but it should also be our task that a sufficient salary is procured for him.

Eck has indicated that our disputation will take place on June 27, but it will be between me and him, as you will see from this disputation slip. For Carlstadt will not fight with him about these theses, both because they are mine and because the deceitful sophist has brought these things from the pope 2c. on the track, so that he would bring him by them either into the danger of having offended the pope (which is an unbearable misfortune for those endowed with benefices 1) or to bring down the one deterred by such a danger without war and without victory.

He will, however, argue about the other things, which say nothing about the authority of the pope or the indulgence. For the exceedingly godless people have left us only these things, against which a Christian man could sin, while they meanwhile sully God's commandments in the most abominable way. But everyone fears for me that I will come off very badly with the twelfth thesis; but I, although I do not expect to be able to catch the extremely slippery sophist, who is also an extraordinary screamer and boaster, will nevertheless, with Christ's help, uphold what is mine. For this reason it [the twelfth, later the thirteenth Theses] is placed in such a way that I would have the opportunity to finally draw out into the open the inanities (nugas) of the completely inconsistent and godless Decretals, with which we Christians are frightened in vain, since they are full of lies, which are advertised under the name of the Roman Church. Christ will strip them of their larvae and, as it was said in Job (Cap. 41, 4. Vulg.) He will remove the covering from his face and reach into the middle of his mouth.

But the theologians of Leipzig and at the same time the bishop of Merseburg have made and are still making extraordinary efforts to prevent the disputation from taking place, and they would almost have turned the prince away from it if he had not, fortified by the word of our prince, finally acted in a commanding manner. 2) The university has answered and promised me. The prince writes that he will admit me as soon as he has been informed by me that Eck also wants to fight with me, and now it is being done that this will happen. For he believes that Carlstadt alone will fight with him.

In the meantime, the theologians are belittling me, especially that bull, ox and donkey, 3) who does not belong to those who know their Lord [Isa. 1:3], but is one who eats chaff 4). They cry out to the people of Leipzig that they should not adhere to the new heresies, by which they perhaps intend that, when the hatred of the people is aroused and the fear of the pope is created, we might still be excluded. It is reported that Tetzl, when he heard that the disputation was going to take place, said: "This is the devil's work!

7) Eberhard Brisger has received ten guilders. We are doing well here, only that we are in a bad way as long as we have no other pastor in Dabrun 5). Discord has arisen between Father Matthew and Günther Staupitz.

8 Cajetan has written anew about me to our most noble prince; before inconsistencies, now follies, and it pleases me well that these very coarse Italian follies are also revealed to the layman.

2) Cf. Duke George's letter to the Bishop of Merseburg, No. 370 in this volume. - The letter of the university to Luther is missing.

3) D. Ochsenfurt, or Dungersheim of Ochsenfurt.

4s That is, the Decrees of Gratian, which have the superscription palea (chaff). Cf. St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 247,754 and 757.

5) Dabrun, a village on the left bank of the Elbe, 3/4 German miles southeast of Wittenberg. There, Günther von Staupitz, brother of the vicar Johann Staupitz, sold the Augustinian monastery at Wittenberg 124 gulden of Rhenish interest on the village of Dabrun 2c. for 2400 gulden. Because of this interest purchase the monastery was in dispute with him for a long time. - The "father Matthew" will be the same who was mentioned in No. 43 of this appendix (cf. Seidemann - De Wette, Vol. VI, p. 679).

1) Carlstadt was canon of the collegiate church in Wittenberg, which was under direct papal jurisdiction.

9) Frobenius has written to me in Basel, who praises my frankness extraordinarily. But also from Paris, friends have written to him that many people there like my things and that they are read by those in the Sorbonne, that is the theologians. In addition, he has distributed all copies to Italy, Spain, England, France and Brabant. He sent two volumes to me and Carlstadt as a gift. Another, a certain learned priest at Ettlingen, 2) and another, even more learned, but without giving his name, also write. In this I rejoice that the truth, which speaks so clumsily and unlearned, pleases so much.

I also send Carlstadt's chariot, 3) which illustrates the foolishness of the theologians, and against which they raged extraordinarily in Leipzig: one tears it apart publicly with his hands in the pulpit, the other inquires of the young people in confession whether they have laughed at the chariot, or whether they possess Martinus' writings. Those who confess, they punish quite badly, as Andreas Camitianus 4) writes to me. See the darkness, see the nonsense! These are theologians!

(11) I believe that my beginning came to you through the Psalter (5); now I am doing it.

1) Here is an anacoluth in Latin. Luther begins with the plural 8erip86runt, since he wants to say of three scribes, but continues afterwards in the singular: Lerikit 6t a1iu8 2c.

2) Caspar Hedio. The letter is missing; also that of the anonymous scribe.

3) See No. 355 in this volume.

4) M. Andreas Frank, from Camenz, professor in Leipzig.

5) "Luthers Arbeiten über die ersten 22 Psalmen," St. Louis edition, vol. IV, 198. Melancthon had sent a part of it to Lang on April 3 (Oorp. I Lsk. I, sp. 76). - Now in this little paragraph are two difficulties. Regarding the words: ouo tuuru 6orriM8, the Erlangen correspondence says: "What Luther means here by the Correctur, I do not know to explain." And Waldau, "Nachricht von Hieron. Emsers Leben und Schriften," says p. 12: "He writes in a letter made on Thursdays after Judica to Georg Spalatin sollte Joh. Lang heißen: Lcis, yuoä Drussr nv8t6r, stiam ckuM rseta kormat, errat; which words I admittedly do not fully understand." These difficulties might be solved as follows: Instead of Lm8er, Kawerau has set up the acceptable conjecture that erni88or (editor) or 6x6'8or (printer) should be read. The printer was Johannes Grünenberg. He issued the sheets individually, and with this type of publication, many errors may have occurred. So it is obvious to understand the eorrsissere of the Aufbefsern, the supplementing of the copy.

another copy, through which you can improve yours. You know that our editor, even if he prints correct things, makes mistakes.

I am sending you the grammar of Moses Kimchi until you can get another one; this one is sent to me by Anshelm Thomas 6) as a gift. I am issuing the interpretations of the Epistle to the Galatians at once; they are to be printed at Leipzig. 7) If two sermons should come into your hands, one in Latin, the other in German, on two kinds of righteousness and on marital status, 8) do your duty: they have been copied from me and published without my knowledge, but quite erroneously and in an inconsistent manner both compiled and printed; this is a disgrace to me. I am also sending the revised Lord's Prayer. 9) Philip will send other things. 10) I believe that you have seen the new Methodus or "the way of theology" (Rationem theologiae) 11) of Erasmus; I wish that he had not finished it so easily.

Have you seen, for example, in my writings against Silvester published in Basel, that they have written, more with diligence than by mistake, at the beginning: magirum [cook] instead of magistrum palatii, then also other printing errors in the margin, pure mockeries? We are told that the Car-

6) Thomas Anshelm from Baden had printed the Hebrew grammar of Moses Kimchi (who lived in Provence in the first half of the 13th century) at Hagenau in January 1519 and dedicated it to the Elector of Saxony, Frederick.

7) Melchior Lotther in Leipzig was the printer.

8) The former sermon is found in the form reworked by Luther, Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. X, 1262; the latter in the corrupted form there Col. 630; changed and improved by Luther Col. 638. Both sermons, although perhaps already delivered in 1518, were printed only in 1519 in February or March by Wolfgang Stöcke! in Leipzig.

9) "Luther's Interpretation in German of the Lord's Prayer for the Simple Laity," St. Louis Edition, Vol. VII, 752. Compare also the note there.

10) In Latin only: Oaetera?dilippu8, to which the Erlangen correspondence makes the remark: "This letter of Melancthon is missing." We doubt that the quoted words are about a letter. It seems to us to be closer that mitto in the preceding sentence is supplemented by mittet.

11) The title of the writing is: Latio 86u M6tko<tu8 eonapsnäio porvonioncii a<1 veram ttieoloAiam; Panzer, VI, 212, Xo. 277.

dinal Cajetan had been imprisoned at Mainz by the Spanish envoys of Carl, because he had made all possible efforts for the party of the King of France. 1) We wrote to Erasmus, Philip and I. 2) See, there you have everything you wanted. The venerable father Vicar 3) has forgotten ours, so he does not write anything. Kindly greet the venerable father M. Usingen, likewise also M. Johann Nathin, and I cordially commend myself to the brothers, whom I also greet all.

Finally, I remind you again about Hebrews, so that we may help the excellent young people who do theology in the best way and have extraordinary zeal for right sciences. Be well, and, Christ willing, may your leg also be healed. Wittenberg, Thursday after Judica [April 13] 1519.

Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

Furthermore, you will not refrain from reminding our highly learned and dearly beloved Jonas of me and assuring him of my love. So also D. Ludwig Melsingen and all my acquaintances.

No. 48.

Wittenberg.

June 6, 1519.

Luther to Joh. Lang.

Of Trmtfetter's death. Luther reports that he is busy editing the explanation of his thirteenth thesis against Eck. He has not yet received a definite answer from Duke George about the Leipzig disputation. Of a journey of his enemy Rabe to Rome; of a great challenge, which he wants to communicate orally. Greetings.

Handwritten in 6oci. Qotk. 399, col. 128 k. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 179; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. III, p. 979; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 281 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 69.

1) As we can see from a letter of Beatus Rhenanus to Zwingli of April 4, 1519 (from Basel), Cajetan and his comrades had wanted to go to the head of the French party, Richard, Elector of Trier, by ship to Oberwesel near Coblenz on the Elector's Day (March 31), and they had therefore hired vehicles. These, however, were stopped by the Spanish envoys under the pretext that this was done by order of the Elector of Mainz. When a complaint was made to the prince of Mainz, he denied that it had happened on his orders.

2) Luther's letter to Erasmus of March 28, 1519, is found in the St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 1582.

3) Staupitz.

To the venerable Father Johann Lang, Vicar of the Augustinian Hermits in Thuringia, the highly learned and righteous Master of Holy Theology, his friend to be highly honored in Christ.

JEsus.

1. hail! We have heard that D. Jodocus of Eisenach has departed from life. May the Lord accept his soul and forgive him all his sins, including ours. I send what you see, we have nothing else.

2) I now give the reasons of proof about the so much hated thirteenth thesis 4) for the sake of the envy that goes around with the fact that I am not to be admitted to responsibility in Leipzig. In three letters 5) I have not been able to obtain a definite answer from Duke George (that Leipzig raven 6) has traveled to Rome in order to bring other lies there and other sacrilegious things here), but I will be present in order to at least offer myself for answer. But everything is admitted to Carlstadt.

3 In addition to these things, another, greater challenge has befallen me. With all this, the Lord teaches me what man is, which I thought I already knew well enough up to this point; you will hear it verbally when you are present. The brother John Caesar escaped the danger of death by the devouring ulcer.

Be well and pray for me, a great sinner. I have no need of anything but the mercy of God. Therefore, envy torments me because it feels that I have no need of other things. Wittenberg, on the Monday after Exaudi [June 6] 1519.

4) "Luther's Explanation of his Thirteenth Thesis on the Violence of the Pope," St. Louis Edition, vol. XVII, 720.

5) These letters from Duke George to Luther on March 4, May 7, and May 23, 1519, are printed in Seidemann's "Leipziger Disputation," p. 129, Supplement 21.

6) Hermann Rab (also Rabe), a native of Bamberg, came to the University of Leipzig in 1486 (became Doctor of Theology there in 1512), entered the Dominican Order and was elected Provincial in Saxony at Osnabrück in 1511, iriHuisitor kasretioas pravitatik in 1517, Prior of the Pauline Monastery in Leipzig in 1525, died there on January 5, 1532. In Cyprian's "Nützliche Urkunden," vol. II, p. 106, the Brref that Rab wrote to Miltitz in Tetzels favor is dated January 3, 1519.

Greetings to the venerable fathers M. Johann Nathin and Bartholomäus Usingen and all. Soon you will see the proofs of my thirteenth thesis of the supremacy of the pope, which I hope are insurmountable.

Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 46.

(Wittenberg.)

1. November 1519.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther asks Spalatin to thank Marcus Schart on his behalf for a gift of money and at the same time sends him several copies of the "Sermon on the Preparation for Dying" (St. Louis Edition, Vol. X, 1984). About Eck's writing Expurgatio (see St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 27b) and Luther's rebuttal "Luther's Letter to Johann Eck on Eck's Purification Writing" (No. 383 in this volume), which is already at the printers. He sends a copy of the "Works on the Psalms" for Langenmantel.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches GesamtArchiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 216; in Löscher's Ref. Acta, Vol. III, p. 990; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 352 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 218.

To his [friend] in the Lord, Georg Spalatin, the highly revered servant of Christ.

JEsus.

Hail! I ask you to thank Marcus Schart in my name, my dear Spalatin, for the ten florins and at the same time send him these copies, as many as seem good to you. But since I had become so rich, on the same day the need of several people made me poorer, to whom I am forced to lend. I am distressed that there is so little love left among the people of Christ, since they do not even have twenty guilders [so that] one can help the other. I am therefore of the opinion that those florins were given to me because the Lord wanted those people to be served through me, and yet it is not enough. Therefore, if you advise me to do so, I will also knock on the door of the most gracious prince for poverty. For my sake, thank God, I am not worried.

2. the raging corner has a "cleansing writing" against the letter addressed to you 1) to which I have already replied with a sheet that is to be completed this week and has already been sent to the printer. It is to be marveled at how man rages, also full of lies. Then he has come to me quite appropriately and conveniently in that he has carelessly exposed his hypocrisy. But in this, with concealment of everything else, I have seized him, and will compel him to reveal himself and his Leipzigers more. Next I will send a copy.

If Langenmantel does not have the complete "Works on the Psalms", send him this copy; but if he has several sheets, send it back and indicate the number, so that we do not harm the printer. Fare well in the Lord. On the Day of All Saints [Nov. 1] 1519.

Martin Luther.

No. 47.

(Wittenberg.)

November 7, 1519.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther's recommendation of Matthew Adrian for employment as a teacher of the Hebrew language. He sends his "Letter to Johann Eck on Eck's Purification Scripture" (No. 383 in this volume); thanks the Elector for Wildpret.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 216d; in Löscher's Ref. Acta, vol. III, p. 991; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 364 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 222.

To His Most Holy in Christ, Georg Spalatin, the completely righteous priest of God.

JEsus.

1st Hail! As you see here, my dear Spalatin, Matthew Adrian writes to me, the Hebrew of Louvain, perhaps driven out by those through tyranny, and desires to teach Hebrew with us. You know the reputation of this man and his learning. Therefore, you would like to present these gifts of God to the most noble prince as an exceedingly noble opportunity to promote the Hebrew language among us. And I ask you to answer this as soon as possible, so that I can give him an answer. In the meantime, his messenger is staying with me. You see that he thinks that our

1) No. 380 in this volume.

The death of the prince (which God wants to postpone for a long time) has been announced. This may be a false omen.

I send you Eck's nonsense 1) with my short letter, who responds to it, and will give him more when the hypocrite comes out completely with his exceedingly ungodly hypocrisy. Farewell and pray for me. For the venison we thank the most noble prince. On the day after Leonhard [Nov. 7] 1519. Martin Luther.

No. 48.

Wittenberg. (October 15, 1519.)
2)

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther wants to write a postilla at the request of the Elector; he advises not to answer Miltitz. Postscript I: About the dedication of his sermons to the Duchess of Brunswick; II: Sends the requested letter to the Elector. Does not want to have anything more to do with Eck.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. The postscript II is on a special slip of paper. Handwritten in Oo<1. vssav. No. 42. There is postscript II as a special letter No. 43. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 221b; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, Vol. III, p. 997; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 376 (in the prints just shown, postscript I is missing, which is printed in Burkhardt, p. 24) and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 220.

To his dearest [friend] in Christ, Georg Spalatin.

JEsus.

1st Hail! There is nothing, my dear George, that has often been more urgently desired of me by several than what, as you write, the most noble prince desires of me. But of all that I do, I, too, would not ask for anything.

1) The expurMtio oto.

2) De Wette places this letter "after the 8th of December", which is not permissible, since here the wish of the Elector regarding a postilla is indicated first, and Luther already reports to Spalatin on the 7th of November that he had begun work on the postilla. - The time of the Erlangen correspondence is: "between November 1 and 7" which is based for the same on postscript II. On November 1 (see No. 46 of this appendix) Luther had announced the writing against Eck to Spalatin; here it is finished, on November 7 (see No. 47 of this appendix) he sends it to Spalatin, so this letter must fall between November 1 and 7. Then the Erlangen correspondence continues: "But if postscript II does not belong to this letter at all, then it would have to be called 'Wohl'".

I would rather do this, because I believe that only in this way the priests and clergy could be helped, that they, with the elimination and rejection of the unwashed fables of the chatterers, who banish Christ more than they present him before the eyes, would have something by which they could spread the truthful theology of Christ among the people and dispel the errors, which, as it were, have broken in like a flood of sin. And God wanted the popes to see to it, because that is their office.

But as much as I want to do this, I am afraid that I will not be able to do it, because I am too busy to devote myself to it; or it will be necessary to withdraw something from the public lectures as well as from the sermon, which will be difficult.

because of the words Carolo Miltitio eto. f? 3 at the beginning even further back, put about the end October." - We have a somewhat further conjecture. We are of the opinion that both the letter and postscript II are to be dated October 15. It is striking that Luther, after he had written in detail to Spalatin on October 13 (in this appendix Ro. 37, §§ 1 and 2), that he had not promised Miltitz to travel with him to Trier, here comes back again quite emphatically to the same matter. We assume that Luther was prompted soon after October 13 by the Elector's wish to write the same thing to him, which Luther fulfilled by the letter to the Elector (No. 325 in this volume) of October 15, which, as postscript II shows, was enclosed with our letter to Spalatin. This would at the same time clarify what in postscript II is the matter that Spalatin requested. On October 17, the Elector sent this letter of Luther to Miltitz (No. 326 in this volume) with a very short answer of his own. - The difficulty that would then remain in Nachschrift II due to the writing against Eck could be overcome in this way: Here, Luther's work on the Schrift wider Eck is mentioned, in the letter of Nov. 1 (No. 46 of this appendix) of the printing (it is not the first announcement, as the Erlangen edition thinks), and in the letter of Nov. 7 (No. 47 of this appendix) of the transmission to Spalatin. - Another objection that could be raised: "it cannot be assumed that our letter and No. 5V in this appendix should have been sent to the same person on the same day", is easily settled. We have quite the same case with two letters written to Spalatin on November 7, 1519, of which the original still exists, namely No. 47 in this appendix and Walch, old edition, vol. XXI, 145 (De Wette, vol., I, p. 365). And perhaps this explains the fact that no date was added to our letter. - In any case, from the dedication of the sermons to the Duchess of Brunswick, it can be assumed as certain that our letter is to be placed in the middle of October.

But I will try it and begin; if G^Otte likes it, it will continue; I wish to serve him completely in this matter. Farewell and commend me to the prince. I like the very good advice of the worthy Auerbach. 1)

3) I believe that nothing should be answered to Carl Miltitz. As I have written and said, 2) this is how the matter happened, and I cannot speak differently if I do not want to lie. For if he was a riddle speaker against me, who I heard with quite simple ears, then he was such through no fault of my own. Wittenberg, 1519.

Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

(I.) You will wonder how it has come about 3) that I have dedicated my sermons to the Duchess; I too wonder, since I had not yet seen her, but I am with

1) D. Heinrich Stromer from Auerbach in the Upper Palatinate, born in 1482, professor of medicine in Leipzig, personal physician to several princes, including Duke Georg of Saxony and Elector Friedrich, died November 25, 1542.

2) In the letter of October 13, 1519, No. 37 in this appendix.

3) In the Erlangen correspondence: yna torts; whereas Burkhardt, p. 24 reads: Hus, sort. This we have assumed. - The Duchess of Brunswick is Margaretha, a Countess of Rietberg by birth, married to Duke Frederick of Brunswick-Luneburg on Nov. 16, 1483; widowed on March 5, 1495. Luther dedicated three sermons to her, namely "vom Sacrament der Buße" (St. Louis edition, vol. X, 1230), "of the Sacrament of Baptism" (ibid. Col. 2112), and "of the reverend Sacrament of the holy true body of Christ" (St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 426). These three sermons appeared one after the other; the middle one, according to the final note of the first edition, was finished in print on November 9, 1519, the third one was under press three weeks later; from this the Weimar edition, vol. II, p. 709 concludes: "therefore, for the first one, we must certainly not go back beyond October of the same year". The Weimar edition could have continued: "therefore we can conclude that the first is completed about three weeks before Nov. 9"; but it expresses itself less definitely, because before it in all editions it had been assumed (so also in our edition) that the Sermon of Repentance belonged to the year 1518. Due to the fact that the dedication of the sermons to the duchess is mentioned here, the date assumed by us for this letter receives the greatest probability, and from this, in turn, a more exact determination of the time of the first sermon results than one has had so far. It seems that this one was also sent with our letter, because Luther did not mention it against Spalatin either before or after.

great requests to be at our Otto's 4) will for the so highly praised wife.

(II.) I send the letter to the most illustrious prince 5) about the object you have named, and ask you to give thanks for me for his exceedingly kind care; I am extraordinarily sorry and do not want their graces to be troubled with it. To Eck I have answered nothing but three words, namely that he will become infamous throughout the world as a sophist, not through my fault but through his. I do not want to have anything more to do with this man; he is completely unfaithful and has obviously broken the rights of friendship.

No. 49.

(Wittenberg.)

October 16, 1519.

Luther to Johann Lang.

Of the boast of the Leipzigers that Erfurt would decide against Luther; of Emser's forthcoming rebuttal and of Rubeus' German rhymes.

Handwritten in 6ock. Ootbav. 399, koi. 127 b. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 215b; in Löschers Ref. Acta, vol. III, p. 989; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 351 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 203.

To the venerable Father Johann Lang, Master of Sacred Theology, middle Vicar of the Augustinian Hermits, his Superior in Christ.

J^Esus.

Hail! Finally Brother George 6) returns to you as you wished, venerable father. There is nothing new, except that the spitefulness of the Leipzigers increases from day to day. They boast for certain that your Erfurters have passed a sentence against us for Eck. 7) If this is so, then it may be good for you that yours are interfering in a foreign matter without cause.

2. I have resolved to make this verdict infamous throughout the world by means of a Latin as well as a German defence paper, and I will

4) Otto Beckmann, canonicus and professor of eloquence in Wittenberg; he later became a renegade.

5) This will be letter No. 325 in this volume.

6) The Augustinian Georg Hoch from Erfurt.

7) This was a false rumor.

I am not willing to let any syllable of our theses go unsworn. I am not willing to let any syllable of our theses go unsworn. I am not willing to leave any syllable of our thesis unsaid. May the will of the Lord be done.

Emser gives birth (as they say) to an elephant instead of a goat 1) and I do not know how many tigers, in that the Leipzigers are quite unlearned scholars (amusissimis musis) obstetricians. Thus the matter is in great heat, and Satan rages against the word of God, but he will accomplish nothing. The donkey Rubeus has again 2) belittled me in the worst way in the German language, and even so the hatred in Leipzig is not yet sated. But the Lord lives, and I also live; in him you also live and prosper and pray for the truth. On St. Gall's Day [16 October] 1519, Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 50.

Wittenberg.

October 15, 1519.

Luther to Spalatin.

Ueber einen Abgesandten der böhmischen Brüder und die Antwort auf die Briefe derselben (No. 422 und 423 in diesem Bande); von des Rubeus Schmähschrift, einen Briefe des Rectors zu Leipzig und einer bevorstehenden Gegenschrift Emsers.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 215; in Löscher's Ref. Acta, vol. III, p. 989; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 350 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 201.

To His most worthy in the Lord, George Spalatin, Christ's servant.

Jesus.

1 Hail! We have done everything with this truly fine man, the Bohemian, my dear Spalatin, as you will see and read. I have given him all my writings. Philip dictated a letter to him, since we were all present and participated in it, even the Bohemian himself, in our monastery.

I have seen the nonsensical things of Rubeus on

1) Meant is the writing: A venatione Luteriaua ^6AO66roti8 U886rtio. Emser. Cf. St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, introduction, p. 39d.

2) First in a Latin script, No. 398 in this volume. The title of the German script mentioned here is found in No. 399.

sent you, but I see you got it elsewhere. The Leipzigers are racing. I am sending the proud letter from the Leipzig rector, which I received yesterday, in which the incompetent head commits everything for which he apologizes and which he rejects. So without all judgment are the people. I will answer him by doing nothing else than showing him his things. Just send me the letter back soon.

It is said that Emser is working out an Iliad against me and has boasted about how he wants to treat the proud monk; I am eagerly awaiting this birth of the mountains. We will take care that in the future nothing of such trivial things will be published here. I think whether our university should write to the University of Leipzig. I would write to Prince George, but I have experienced his chancellor 3) earlier and do not want to give an opportunity to the water bubbles, which I have met there before. Farewell and pray for me. Wittenberg, the day before Gallus [October 15] 1519.

Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 51.

(Wittenberg.)

(Early October 4) 1519.)

Luther to Spalatin.

Various things about Eck and Miltitz.

The original of this letter is in the Ge- sammt-Archiv of Anhalt. Printed by Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 221; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. III, p. 997; by De Wette, vol. I, p. 375 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 275.

3) D. Johann Kochel from Magdeburg.

4) De Wette has for this letter the date: "After December 8, 1519", in which the Erlangen correspondence follows him. The reason for this date is the following: "On December 8, Miltitz wrote to the Elector fNo. 328 in this volume that he had received serious orders from Rome to bring the matter with Luther to a close soon, and held out the prospect of interdicts and other ecclesiastical censures. On the 11. he then spoke to the Elector himself at Torgau, where he repeatedly urged that Luther should travel to Trier. The Elector, however, did not agree and broke off the negotiations. - This determines the approximate date of this letter." - This reasoning seems to us not only extraordinarily weak, but also completely invalid. The Elector broke off the negotiations with Miltitz: what should be his order or advice after that, which Luther declares himself ready to fulfill in this letter? What guided us in our determination of the time, we have said in the note to § 2 of this letter.

To his dearest friend in Christ, Georg Spalatin,
Duke of Saxony's court preacher.

JEsus.

1st Hail! Send Eck's slobber 1) back, my dear Spalatin. For you did not send me Franz Sickingen's letter 2); it was given to me to read by our Otto 3) for a very short time. It is also written about Eck from Nuremberg and Salzburg by the hand of the vicar Staupitz that he is trying to win over the great ones; he has also published Rubeus' German rhymes against us again at his expense in Augsburg. Truly a thing worthy of a theologian! Our vicar writes that he is healthy and honored in Salzburg, and sends you his greetings, and that you may recommend him to our prince.

2) With regard to Carl Miltitz, I will do what the most gracious Prince has commanded and advised; 4) I almost wish to get into the hands of these wicked people, so that they may

1) Perhaps Eck's writing is meant: Expurgatio^{ob}.Dekiiste., whose title is exactly given in the St. Louis edition, Vol. X VIII, Introduction, p.27b. It is dated September 2, 1519, and Luther answered it in October by his letter to Eck (No. 383 in this volume), which went out at the beginning of November.

2) On July 29, 1519, a letter of feud by Sickingen against the Dominican Order, especially against Jakob Hoogstraten, appeared in print; this is what is meant here. Bernhard Adelman mentions in a letter to Pirkheimer of October 15, that the same one should have written a second letter against the mentioned order.

3) Beckmann.

4) These words have primarily determined us to place this letter before Luther's meeting with Miltitz in Liebenwerda (Oct. 9), in relation to which Luther writes in his letter of October 13, 1519 (No. 37 in this appendix, § I) to Spalatin: "Therefore you will not doubt that I have promised nothing else than that I, according to our prince's command and counsel ... of both promise and agreement, according to which we at Altenburg had united on the bishop of Trier as judge in this matter" 2c. In reference to this passage, Seidemann, "Miltitz", p. 17, says: "Luther acted sin Liebenwerda) according to secret instruction of the Elector." Above in the text Luther promises that he will act according to the received instruction. - Furthermore, it does not seem credible that Luther in December could hardly have gained a glimpse of Sickingen's letter, which had already gone out at the end of July. Therefore we have been anxious to date our letter further back.

I would finally satisfy their rage if I did not stand in fear for the word of God and the little people of God. Fare well in Christ. I am forced to leave Amsdorf and go to Pretzsch at this hour. 1519.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 52.

(Wittenberg.)

February 27, 1520.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther sends the letters published by Eck (No. 413 to 416 and No. 419 in this volume). Oekolampad confesses to be the author of the Oanonioi inäooti (No. 408 in this volume). Eck complains that this writing hurt him the most. From a Basel print in relation to the Leipzig Disputation.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 249 b'; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 422 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 341.

To the learned and righteous man, Mr. Georg Spalatin, Christ's servant, his dearest friend.

JEsus.

Hail! So that you finally see what it means to write theologically what Eck prescribes in his letter addressed to the prince 5), you can, although it corresponds beautifully to his prescription, waste an hour and read this slobber of the raging boar.

2 Oekolampad writes to our Philip that he is the author of "the unlearned canons", 6) and that he has made this writing so that it presents itself to the people; then, if he is not quiet, he will make something else; and he writes that Eck has complained that no other writing that was published against him has hurt him so much. I am also sending you a print from Basel about the action in Leipzig, so that you can see what they think of it. Send all this back as soon as possible. Farewell and pray for me. Monday after Invocavit [February 27] 1520.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

5) No. 419 in this volume.

6) No. 408 in this volume.

No. 53.

December 3, 1519.

Wittenberg.

Luther au Spalatin.

About Eck's letter to the Elector (No. 419 in this volume); Luther complains about Eck's untruthfulness concerning the determination of the place for the disputation. About the expected verdict of the University of Erfurt. - Postscript: about the filling of the parish in Schmiedeberg.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 219 b; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. III, p. 994; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 371 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 268.

To the learned and proven man, Georg Spalatin,
Christ's servant and his most trusted (friend).

JEsus.

1st Hail! I am glad, my dear Spalatin, that you got to know Eck in Eck's letter. He was such a one when he disputed at Leipzig, as he is (now) when he writes. For there is nothing but rage in him, and as I had printed in the letter 1) addressed to you, he is only powerful in this one thing, namely, to arouse spite; to this he also always directs all his energies. Furthermore, it is a nice trick that he proves by the original of my letter 2) that we offered him Leipzig or Erfurt. Who doubts that we gave him our consent to Leipzig or Erfurt, as my letter indicates? How could we have admitted that we wanted to dispute there, if we had not written that the place was up to us, because another could not be granted?

Why does the intriguer conceal that he wrote again on my request that he would like to come to Wittenberg, that he does not want to, because that (as he says) belongs to a Sejan horse 3)? But since he again offered Cologne and even more distant places, but we refused, we were finally forced to agree to one of the two cities already mentioned, although we preferred neither of them.

- 1) No. 380 in this volume.
2) Namely in § 70 of No. 419 in this volume, where Eck refers to Luther's letter to him (No. 359).
3) "The Sejan horse" is literally the horse that a certain Cn. Sejus had, but who, like all those who had the horse after him, became unhappy.

that is, what I wrote afterwards, that we would have recognized only from the disputation why he had preferred Leipzig. Therefore, we did not offer it, but, since it was offered, we accepted it, albeit unwillingly, only so that the arrogant person would not want to boast that we did not want to stand by our theology.

3 Therefore, you will now understand the copy of my letter, which states that we did not offer [the place], but agreed to it, forced by necessity. But with such tricks the exceedingly spiteful sophist is wont to deal. And therefore I await with pain his threats in print, in which he (I know) will not act with other reasons, and then I will, with Christ's help, paint all his intrigues before all the world and bring them to light.

I am sending the letter from Lang, from which you can see what is to be hoped for in Erfurt with regard to the verdict. But if they do not judge, I do not care about the Parisians, because it has been agreed that they should judge me as one who has been convicted. 4) Be well and pray for me. Wittenberg, the day before St. Barbara [December 3] 1519.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

At this hour, two magistrates with equal votes have been appointed for the parish of Schmiedeberg; finally, it has been agreed that the older of them should have the preference. One is Magister Johann Herzberg, the other Johann Schurf, the brother of Doctor Jerome. But I have not yet found out which is the older one, since I left.

No. 54.

August 18, 1519.

(Wittenberg.)

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther sends the letter of responsibility against Eck's letter to the Elector; complains that Eck is interfering in a hostile manner in Luther's dispute with the Franciscans at Jüterbock and that the Bishop of Brandenburg is spreading his writing. About the ceremonies to be used at the Passion celebration.

4) Compare Eck's letter to Hoogstraten, No. 395 in this volume.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches GesamtArchiv. Printed by Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 206b; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, Vol. III, p. 980; by De Wette, Vol. I, p. 323 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 129. The last piece of this letter (§ 4) is once again in Walch as a special letter in the old edition, Vol. XXI, 5; also in the supplement to the Leipzig edition, p. 29.

Your esteemed husband Georg Spalatin, priest of the princely court, his most sincere friend in the Lord.

Jesus.

Hail! Behold, my dear Spalatin, we are sending the letter to the most noble prince 1) and our most gracious patron, who is answering Eck's slander. If the most illustrious prince should deign to send the same to Eck, it will be dear to us; but if not, then let it be done as God pleases. For the venerable father Vicarius has made it doubtful to us whether the prince wanted Eck to be answered in this way as well, or only by the Latin explanations of the theses, with which we are now occupied; therefore we provide both. If the letter is to be sent, then we wish that either according to the prince's or according to your opinion everything be changed that seems to be good to be changed in it. I have searched for Eck's letter among my papers, but have not yet found it; I will search more carefully.

2) By the way, Eck (whom we can now judge and accuse without sin) behaves everywhere neither as a good nor as a noble thinking man: he has handed over articles to the bishop of Brandenburg, which are provided by him with interpretations, which the brothers of Jüterbock have brought together against me in a lying way. 2) He is an impudent man and has a shameless forehead, ready to assert everything possible and to let the same thing go again, depending on whether there is a glimpse of fame for him. He has only one thing in mind, whether he cannot harm Wittenberg with right and wrong. This is what

I now oppose and will drag this intriguer with his lies before the public, God willing.

Meanwhile, the bishop of Brandenburg, without having heard the other part, spreads Eck's lies and helps them, to my name's disgrace, to many people's reputation through his name, by which he shows quite nicely what attitude he has harbored against me so far. I fear that I can hardly avoid implicating him at the same time and displaying his ignorance and sacrilege, which is closely related to that of Eck. The Minorite Brothers of the Observance help him quite extraordinarily; we only lack a printing press so that we can publish counter-writings more quickly. 3)

I have begun, according to your wish, to direct my attention to the public celebration of the passion of Christ, and the more I think about it, the less I find something that could please me, because there are already more than enough ceremonies in the church, so that almost all serious things of Christian godliness run into superstition, as [the people] are inclined to trust in the outward appearance of the works and in the meantime to leave the spiritual things safely in the queue. And for this reason I am not yet fully prepared how to present it, so that what is established may at the same time have a beautiful outward appearance and be inwardly fruitful. It is difficult for both to happen at the same time, since the Gospel has placed the most reliable godliness in brotherly love and mutual goodwill. Another time more. Farewell and commend us to our patron, the prince. Wittenberg, 1519, on the day of St. Agapetus [August 18].

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

3) Therefore, Luther's "Vertheidigung wider das böswillige Urtheil des Johann Eck" 2c. (St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 1362) was printed by Melchior Lotther in Leipzig and not finished until September.

4) publies we have resolved by publicoas, because it belongs to mkaitutioui. For what the old translator offers: "I have thought publicly" (eoeipi publico iutouäkrzt), does not seem possible to us.

5) Added by us, since we assume that Luther had a preceding vulxus in mind when he wrote "xroeliv".

1) Luther's and Carlstadt's letter of responsibility against Eck, No. 416 in this volume. Eck's letter, against which it is directed, No. 413.

2) Compare St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 43 b f. and No. 380 m in this volume, towards the end.

No. 55.

(Wittenberg.)

February 8, 1520.

Luther to Spalatin.

Of the author of the Canonici inäooti; of the burning of the writings of Luther and others, intended but thwarted by Eck; of Eck's writing against Carlstadt, and of Duke George's request to the people of Erfurt to give their verdict on the Leipzig disputation. His sermons on Matthew, his work on the Postille, and his answer to the ban of the Bishop of Meissen.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 241; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 404 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 318.

To the learned and honest man, Georg Spalatin, princely Saxon court preacher and secretary, his superior in Christ.

IEsus.

1st Hail! Bernhard Adelman has written that he has seen to it that the Eck is answered; this much I have about the author of the unlearned very learned canons. The style fits, in our opinion, both Oekolampad and Conrad Adelman, the brother of Bernhard, who seems to me to be stronger and more important than Bernhard.

Our Wenceslaus wrote that Eck had ordered the nobles [of the university in Ingolstadt] that my books should be burned on the public market, "the unlearned canons" and the German "Schutzrede"; 1) and since a container had been prepared there so that they would be burned the following day, certain more sensible doctors at Ingolstadt would have consulted Johann Reuchlin, and he would have answered: They should be careful that they do not attach a stain to themselves and the whole university by this matter. Therefore the execution was omitted. When Eck came to the place the next day, he left angrily, without having accomplished anything. One would think that man had become a raging bacchante. That is how we do theology nowadays! By the way, I didn't want you to read what he spat out against Carlstadt, but you will read it, because he so sullied that I have not seen nor heard of a more impudent and impure book. 2) He is a desperate man, the wretched sophist, when he sees that his undertaking is either postponed or prevented. Duke George has written anew to the Erfurt people with great arrogance (so our Lang writes) that they should answer which of us has the better opinion about the faith. A good prince, but one who is driven and ruled by the sophists. Carlstadt is working on a rebuttal against Eck. 3) See the fruit of the Leipzig disputation!

2 I have not even managed a word of my sermons on Matthew, my dear Spalatin, although I hardly wanted anything else so much, but I lacked time. Furthermore, I have not yet completed the interpretations that began with Advent up to Lent, and have not begun anything from Lent. You want to know briefly the reason for this. It is impossible for me to do it, there is no lack of desire. By God's grace, there is enough strength, but I hardly do enough for the Psalter? 4) Enough. You would not believe how much even a single verse troubles me at times. You want to tell the prince that I will gladly continue the matter as I have gladly begun it; but you create two or three days for me for each one, and that will hardly be enough. Sometimes my time is taken away by my willingness to serve strangers, brothers and near ones. Yesterday I also lost half a day by responding to the Meissen ban. 5) I certainly have a quick hand and a vivid (promptae) memory, from which

2) This is the book that Eck dedicated to his compatriot Gervasius Vaim from Memmingen, professor of theology in Paris, on December 3, 1519, which has the title: "Wider den dummen Verfechter Martin Luthers, Andreas Rodolphi Bodenstein, Carlstadt" 2c. See Wiedemann, "Eck," p. 512 ff.

3) Carlstadt had intended the title for it: 6outra drutissiruuru asium st assstrum vostorsulum sts, but on Spalatin's advice (prompted by Luther), he changed it and gave it the title: Eontutatio acivrsus äksusivaru spiktolam loanuis Lskii sts. Cf. De Wette, Vol. I, p. 406.

4) St. Louis edition, vol. IV, 198 ff.

5) St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 462.

1) Des Lazarus Spengler Schrift: "Schutzrede und christliche Antwort" 2c.

I wonder how it might be with others who are slower than I. But you know that our intention is that after Lotther's printing press is properly set up, all interpretations should be printed at the same time. You know, however, that our intention is that, after Lotther's printing press 1) has been properly set up, all interpretations should be printed at the same time, and that is our intention that we also begin, as soon as possible, the severe punitive speeches about the teachers of the sentences 2). Farewell and commend me to the prince. February 8, 1520.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 56.

Wittenberg.

March 21, 1520.

Luther to Johann Lang.

Luther's reply against the Louvainiers and the Cologneers is printed. Von Eck's journey to Rome. About the imminent death of D. Eschhausen's wife. Postscript on the imminent death of Aesticampianus.

Handwritten in the Ooä. botd. 399, toi. 130d. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 252; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 429 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 365.

To the venerable and highly esteemed father, Johann Lang, Master of Holy Theology, Vicar of the Hermits of St. Augustine, who has his being in Erfurt, his [friend] in Christ.

JEsus.

Hail! I believe, venerable Father, that you received my letter through Brother Martin Benedictus. Now there is nothing new with us. For my answer against the reprobates, 3) the bad theologians, is under

1) Around this time, Melchior Lotther Jr. moved from Leipzig to Wittenberg and established a printing press there. The writing just mentioned, "Luthers Antwort auf den Zettel, so unter des Officials zu Stolpen" 2c., was, as we can see from the Weimar edition, vol. VI, p. 136, still printed by Melchior Lotther in Leipzig, whereas the Latin adaptation of this writing (St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 468), which Luther produced very shortly thereafter, was printed by Melchior Lotther Jr. in Wittenberg. See Weim. Edition, 1.6. p. 143.

2) Philippieas super sententiarum. The Erlangen correspondence remarks: "Probably the Lueudratuueula, published against Melanchthon's will and therefore later suppressed by him; cf. Oorp. Ret. XXI, 6 ff. 59."

3) No. 421 in this volume.

the press. My corner goes to Rome and wants to set fire to the forest of Lebanon. But I believe that Rome is also subject to Christ, the Lord above all, who, if I am worthy, will work for me there; but if I am not worthy, then I do not want him to work for me here either. You will ask the Lord for me, that I finally become pious and lead his cause worthily in this wicked world. I recommend the wife of D. Thomas Eschhausen to you, who, as I believe, is either already deceased or will pass away today, because there is no hope for life. Farewell in Christ. Wittenberg, 1520, Wednesday after Lätare [March 21] Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian.

Aesticampianus 4) also suffers from respiratory problems. He has been given the last ointment and prepared for retirement, although he still walks around his room with a pious and confident heart and is not at all afraid of death.

No. 57.

Wittenberg.

August 23, 1520.

Luther to Spalatin.

About the matter of the widow Landmann; about the additions to the second edition of the Scripture to the Christian Nobility. Luther sends his "Erbieten" (No. 433 in this volume) and his letter to the Emperor (No. 428 in this volume) for improvement. Content of a letter to the Cardinal 8. Orueis. Postscript: Recommendation of Franz Günther.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 279; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 480 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 464.

To the dear friend, Mr. Georg Spalatin, Christ's servant, his [patron] in the Lord.

JEsus.

1st Hail! First of all, nothing is answered to the widow Landmann (as I hear), my dear Spalatin, but harsh vituperations, so that this intercession has helped nothing; answer, if you can, what is going on. I have arranged for your letter to be brought to Nuremberg. There will be in the second edition, which Lotther will take over, additions to the

4) D. Johann Sommerfeld. He died on May 31, 1520.

Booklet 1) will be made; it will also be increased. Behold, I send the "Erbioten" (Elogion) and the letter [to the emperor for improvement.

2. the contents of the letter to [the Cardinals St. Crucis 2) is this: Since his fame is extraordinary in the whole world, I have wanted to ask him to make himself a mediator with all the diligence possible to him, so that the matter may be settled; that I also offer any 3) conditions of peace, except recantation, and the ignominy of heresy, and the freedom to teach the word; that banishment and violence would not be feared by me, since I could already be safe in the midst of Germany; at the same time that they should beware lest, if one were destroyed, they would awaken many; I would (if God gives grace) be a match for the enemies in gifts and scholarship. 4) Fare well and pray for me. Wittenberg 1520, the day before Bartholomew [August 23].

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

I recommend Magister Franz Günther to you, and you will see to it that this letter is delivered to the Prince.

No. 58.

Wittenberg.

January 21, 1521.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther sends the beginning of the "Grund und Ursach aller Artikel" 2c. (No. 448 in this volume). Of Emser's and Murner's writings. Use for Joh. Schwertfeger, that the teaching position of civil law be transferred to him.

1) "To the Christian Nobility of the German Nation" 2c. St. Louis edition, Vol. X, 266.

2) aü 8. Örn66ni: "anyway LernÄrckinrm Oarvajal Hispanns, Lpiseoxms Ostiensis, OarälLnalis 8. Oueis" (Burkhardt, p. 31).

3) The Erlangen correspondence has this reading, oua8vis; against it Burkhardt I. o. reads vm, which you want ^Spalatins. - De Wette erroneously says that Luther sent the letter to 8 Örnx to Spalatin for review, because he recognized neither the motion ("Erbioten") nor the letter to the emperor. Luther would not have detailed the contents of the letter to the Cardinal in our letter if he had sent his letter to him along with it. We leave it undecided whether Luther is speaking here of his letter to the Cardinal or of one to be drafted for him by the court.

4) This seems to indicate that Luther is not talking about his letter to the Cardinal. For this

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 300 d; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 545 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 75.

To the learned and godly man, Georg Spalatin, princely Saxon court preacher, his [friend] in Christ.

JESus.

1. hail! I believe that this has come to you or will soon come to you, my dear Spalatin, what I sent to you with the assertion of the articles by Taubeuheim; 5) in the meantime, we have read your letter to Stromer. The German "Grund und Ursach" (Assertio) is among the press of which I send you a foretaste; it is better than the Latin. Emser writes against me at Leipzig with great courage; 6) I despise Murner.

Furthermore, since the provost 7) has died and Wolfgang has turned away from us, yes, since I hear that the Torgau doctor is also to be deprived of the lecture on law, I ask you to be a good intercessor and mediator for Johann Schwertfeger. If he could obtain the lecture on civil law, which he also seems to be equal to our Philippus, then he would perhaps change and become a layman from a clergyman, which would also be more to the man's liking.

I am writing this on the advice of many good people; you do what the spirit tells you to do. It is said that the bishops of Meissen and Merseburg have decided to execute the bull; it is the will of the Lord. There is nothing else with us; you are showered with new things every day. Fare well in Christ our Lord, Amen. Wittenberg, 1521, on the day of St. Agnes the Martyr [January 21].

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

he could well write to his trusted friend Spalatin, but (with his great modesty) not to the Cardinal.

5) Cf. no. 65 of this appendix.

6) namely against Luther's writing to the German nobility, to which Luther replied with his writing "An den Bock zu Leipzig". See St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 39 b f.

7) D. Henning Göde. - "Wolfgang" is D. Wolfgang Stehlin, who turned away from the Reformation. - "The Torgau Doctor" is Matthäus Beskau, professor of law at Wittenberg.

No. 59.

Wittenberg.

March 6, 1521.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther sends the last sheets of the book "Grund und Ursach" and the beginning of the Postille. He gives news about his work and about his adversaries.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 310 d; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 567 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 98.

To the learned and pious man, Georg Spalatin, disciple of Christ, his friend in the Lord.

JESus.

Hail! On the first of March, the German text "Grund und Ursach" was completed, my dear Spalatin, but when will it reach you? Today is also the beginning (praegustus) of the Postille, 1) as you see; slowly, ours is being delivered to you. The answer to Emser 2) is in progress. I am getting started on the Canticum of Mary, 3) as I wrote earlier. I have sent the sheets of the German Assertio ["Grund und Ursach"] piecemeal, now I am sending the rest. In Louvain (as I am told) Latomus 4) stands up as an enemy against me, and the whole crowd of sophists. I hear that also two Italians 5) have written, and Murner three.

1) The Latin postillon on the four Sundays of Advent. See Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XI, Preface, Col. VII.

2) Luther's "Answer to the Super-Christian 2c. Buch des Bocks Emsers" 2c., St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 1270. See the introduction there, p. 41 a.

3) "Interpretation of the Magnificat," St. Louis edition, vol. VII, 1372. See the note there.

4) In the writing: Articularura ckoetrivae kV Nartlui Imtiieri, per tleoloZos l'ovanienses aamnatorruli ratio ex saerls litteris etc, which Luther encountered through his "Refutation of the Reasoning of Latomus," St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 1056. See the introduction ibid. there, p. 35 f.

5) One of these "two Italians" is Ambrosius Catharinus, whose writing Luther received the following day through Wenceslaus Link, and soon answered in his "Answer to the Book of M. Ambrosius Catharinus" 2c., St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 1434. See also the introduction ibid. there, p. 45 d ff. The other is disputed. Burkhardt, p. 37, refers to Dlarei Lauriae vekensio potestatis ^postolieae, L'errara 1521. The Erlangen correspondence says that because Luthern could not yet have known this writing in March, des ^oisii Narliani Illo ckiol^Anensis etc. in Ulart. Imttisuru oratio was meant. But this, fispisooops Duäae sTuy in Spain, was a Spaniard, not an Italian. Perhaps Italos is to be translated here by "Welsche".

Books. What is this? Right once Hercules can come up against two! But for an elephant these monsters are gnats.

The Bishop of Meissen is annoyed that Schmiedberg's and Fabian's money has been bequeathed to me, since he recently sent a secret scout to investigate whether Fabian had really bequeathed me two thousand gold florins. The bishop of Merseburg, of humble court and holy avarice, continues in the service he renders to God by killing Christ and his word. I believe that never from the pulpits has been shouted so furiously against any man as is shouted against me by the Minorites and the preaching monks; it is extraordinary how I rejoice in this. For thus they make themselves known even to your people, and the thoughts of their hearts are revealed after the sign is set up, which is contradicted. Otherwise there is nothing new. Now farewell and pray to the Lord for me. Wittenberg, March 6, 1521.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 60.

(Wittenberg.)

March 7, 1521.

Luther to Wenceslaus Link.

Luther wants to write against Ambrosius Catharinus. He sends books and all kinds of news.

Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 312; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 569 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 104.

To Wenceslaus Link, general vicar of the hermits of St. Augustine.

JESus.

Dear God, what a great mishmash of this quite insipid Thomist Catharinus! 7) I will answer him with little, at most four sheets. These German books you will give in my name to the apothecary Stephan Hoff, and to him, I

6) Heinrich Schmiedberg, chancellor of Bishop Philip of Naumburg and Freisingen, bequeathed a hundred florins to Luther before he died at Eilenburg on November 5, 1520. Compare No. 467 in this volume. - Fabian" is Fabian von Feilitzsch, electoral counselor.

7) See St. Louis edition; Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 46.

please you to say thanks for the gift sent to me. I would have written to him, but since I am busy, I could hardly write this. With another messenger I sent you the Psalter; now you do not need these German books.

The postilla about Advent is ready, but the printer did not want to publish it, because he fears that the profit might be taken away from him first. The prince has written to me from Worms so that I may know that the matter is not yet in the nest of the papists. The bull posted in Leipzig has been soiled with excrement and torn up, likewise in Torgau; but the same thing has happened in Döbeln, with the signature: "The nest is here, the birds have flown out." Emser's book 1) was nailed to the public post in Magdeburg, which is called "Gack" 2) or "the pillory", with two rods or brooms attached here and there, and the inscription added: This place is worthy of such a book. Besides, there is nothing new with us. You pray for me. March 7, 1521.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 61.

Wittenberg.

March 7, 1521.

Luther to Spalatin.

Recommendation of a young clergyman and news.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 313; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 570 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 106.

To Georg Spalatin, the pious and learned man, his most trusted [friend] in Christ.

JEsus.

1st Hail! This young man, Michael Creuzen, who is well-disciplined, my dear Spalatin, has

1) See St. Louis edition, Introduction, pp. 39 ff.
2) In Aurifaber and De Wette wrong: "Sack". Instead, the Erlangen correspondence put "Kack", but we according to St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 998: "Gack". See the note there. Gack or Kack rst, however, not, as Seidemann assumes in De Wette, Vol. VI, p. 670, the "gallows," but the kaak, pole of shame, pillory. - The editor of this has heard from the mouths of old people that the "Kaak" in Rostock was on the new market next to the so-called water art, while the gallows was outside the city, at the Reeperbahn.

I want to use both your and my help with our most gracious prince to ask for a certain priestly position, whom I neither should nor want to refuse this service. You will therefore see to it that he is promoted because of you and me (if I am anything). Because that you are something at the court and are valid, one believes rightly.

By the way, there is nothing new with us, except that the bull is becoming more despicable day by day. For what happened to it in Leipzig, I have written to you before. 3) It is said that it was also posted in Torgau, but secretly, and it was immediately torn apart. Since it was struck in Döbeln, it was immediately pelted with dung and torn apart, and these words were written: "The nest is here, the birds have flown out."

The Duke of Saxony, Heinrich, in Freiberg, strongly detests them along with his own. I have addressed a letter to him, because it was written to me from there that he wishes this. The King of Denmark also persecutes the papists, and has given orders to his university that they should not condemn what is mine. Thus reported the one whom we sent there, D. Martin. 4) He has returned to be doctored, but he will return there.

4) What happened to the book of Emser in Magdeburg, I have written before. 5) Finally, Ambrosius Catharinus has come from Nuremberg; dear God, what a tasteless and silly Thomist, so that he almost kills us sometimes by laughter, sometimes by disgust. I will answer him briefly and excite the bile of the Italian beast.

Two Counts of Stolberg came to us for the sake of their studies. You had

3) In this, Luther will be mistaken. He had written this to others, but not to Spalatin. That a letter is missing here is unlikely.

4) This is Martin Reinhard, who was sent to Denmark in the winter of 1520 at the request of King Christian II; however, he remained there only a short time. Later he became a preacher in Jena, where he made common cause with Carlstadt and wrote the "Acta Jenensia" (No. 680 in this volume). Compare also No. 681 in this volume and No. 117 of this appendix. - We do not know whether "D." is to be dissolved by Doctor or Dominus.

5) In the letter Walch, old edition, vol. XXI, 747; De Wette, vol. I, p. 560.

well and pray for me. Lucas has asked me to sign these pictures and send them to you; 1) you will get them. Now also the juxtaposition of Christ and the Pope in pictures [the Passional] is prepared; a good book for the laity. Wittenberg, 1521 March 7.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 62.

Wittenberg.

July 10, 1520.

Luther to Spalatin.

Of the salary allowance for Melanchthon, the bull from Rome, the Lucius asäoltrm; of Peter Aperbach as a lector to be won for Plinius, by D. Wick. Luther sends the letter of Silvester von Schaumburg (Schauenberg), No. 489 in this volume, the contents of which the Churfürst could make use of in his letter to the Cardinal St. Georgii. Postscript: Indication of several things that the Elector could also add.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv; the original of the postscript in the 60ä. Ootlian. 122, toi. 16 with the inscription in an old hand: Hugo soksäula portinot ää kpistolam säe supliotions pro kkilippo), quao äata 68t 10. Iulii 1520. The letter is printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 272 b; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 465 and the letter together with the postscript in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 432. The postscript is appended to the letter in Buddeus, p. 17, which is found (also with this postscript) in De Wette, vol. I, p. 463, in Walch, old edition, vol. XXI, 767; in Buddeus and Walch with the wrong year 1522. We have transferred the postscript from Walch, vol. XXI, 768 here.

To the learned and godly man, Magister Georg Spalatin, princely court preacher, his superior in the Lord.

JEsus.

1) Hail! He himself wrote to you about the intercession to be made for Philip, 2) dear George, I have nothing more to say about that. By the way, I almost wish that that infamous bull would come from Rome, which rages against my teaching. I hope that I will receive "den gehobelten Eck" (Eccum dedolatum), 3) which has been printed in Erfurt, today. What Lang writes about Peter Aperbach, you see.

1) That these preceding words are not to be referred to the "Passional Christi und Antichristi", about this see the preface to this writing in the St. Louis edition, vol. XIV, 191 f.

2) Melanchthon's letter is in the 60p. Loc. I, 262 (from July, not September).

3) This satyr is by Pirkheimer in Nuremberg.

You yourself know man from his childhood how great gifts he has. Perhaps God offers us this opportunity, which I did not want to be rejected out of hand, and I believe that it is not easy to find another who is equally puffed up for [the lesson about] Pliny. Of the [Roman] courtier Doctor Wick 4) (Viccio) there was no danger; nor will I admit any.

I send the letter of the Frankish knight Silvester Schauenberg, and if it would not be burdensome, I would like that this would be indicated in the letter of the prince to the Cardinal St. Georgii. Georgii 5) so that they would know that, even if they expelled me from Wittenberg with their curses, they would achieve nothing except to turn the matter from a bad one into a worse one, since now there are people not only in Bohemia, but also in the middle of Germany, who can and want to protect the expellee against all their lightning against their will. There is danger that I would rage more fiercely against the Romanists, certainly through these protectors, than if I were to argue under the prince's rule in the public magisterium. This will undoubtedly happen if God does not defend me. But to show consideration for the prince, as I have shown consideration in many things up to now, even when I was irritated, will then certainly not be necessary.

Therefore, they should know that what I have not yet done to them is not due to my modesty, nor to their tyranny or merits, but to the name and reputation of the prince, then also to the common cause of the students in Wittenberg. From me at least, after the game has been started for me (jacta mihi alea), the Roman rage and the Roman favor are considered contemptible; I do not want to be reconciled with them, nor do I want to live with them forever.

4) Johann von Wyck from Münster had been Reuchlin's trustee in Rome, from where he now returned. In 1528 he became syndic in Bremen. After the introduction of the Reformation in Münster, he returned there, but left the city again when the Anabaptists came to rule. On his way back to Bremen he was caught by the bishops and secretly beheaded in the dungeon.

5) Raphael Petrucci, who is however listed in the Cardinal directories as tituli 8. 8u8anva6. - The letter of the Elector to the Cardinal is in this volume No. 155.

have communion. They may condemn and burn what is mine; I, on the other hand, if I can only have any fire, will condemn and publicly burn the whole papal law, that is, the whole cesspool of heresies, and there will be an end to the observation of humility, which has been shown in vain up to now, with which (this is my will) the enemies of the Gospel shall no longer blow themselves out.

The more I consider the letter of Cardinal St. Georgii, the more I despise those whom I see so enraptured by pure cowardice and an exceedingly bad conscience, as if they still wanted to feign great ferocity at the last breath. By force they try to protect their ignorance, but fear that it may not go out happily, as it did yesterday and the day before. But the Lord, who knows that I am an abominable sinner, will bring forth his cause either through me or through another; I have no doubt of it. Farewell. Wittenberg, July 10, 1520.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

[Inserted note.]

The prince would also like to add this: Luther's doctrine is so widespread and ingrained in Germany and beyond that if the Romans do not overcome it with good reason and with Scripture, they would, by force and ecclesiastical punishments, as one fears, accomplish nothing other than that Germany twice become a Bohemia. For, as they themselves know, the Germans are hot-tempered, and it is not safe even for many popes to irritate them if they are not restrained by Scripture and reason, especially at this time, when science and languages prevail in Germany, and the laity are beginning to become wise. Therefore, as befits a Christian prince, he comes beforehand and warns that they do not want to do something sacrilegiously, trusting in some power, if they have not first given obvious reason, so that they do not arouse an unmanageable sedition against themselves. I would like to believe that this would shake those timid Romanists very much. But your judgment shall be valid in these and in all things.

No. 63.

(Wittenberg.)

May 13, 1520.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther has his famulus Johann Lonicerus answer Alveld from his book, and has provided him with the draft. The intercession for the sick Elector; by Miltitz, Cranach and a messenger of Silvester von Schaumberg.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 265 b; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 447 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 401.

To the learned and godly man, Mr. Georg Spalatin, court preacher of the Elector of Saxony, his dearest [friend] in the Lord.

Jesus.

Hail! I am very pleased that I have had the burden of writing against Alveld carried out by my brother. 1) Man has also overcome my mental powers in a quite incomparable way, so that I would not have been able to counter his ignorance with anything worthy. I have neither seen, nor heard of, nor read a book that would have been so tasteless or foolish in all syllables, in short, I lack names with which I could describe it. Today I have finished the notes that I gave to the brother so that he would put it into a form, and in a short time it will be finished. Likewise, the "Sermon of [Good] Works," 2) I hope, will be finished shortly.

2. for the prince will be prayed, only do not begin to trust in our prayers, but in God's goodness, who gives the promise to those who pray, and I hope the Lord will preserve it for us, even for Himself, in these matters.

I do not care about Miltitz, about the one at Meissen 3) and others. I wanted all the tyrants of Rome to feel insecure, so that they could

1) See St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 31b f. - This refers to Luther's religious brother Johann Lonicer.

2) Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. X, 1298.

3) By Nisnormern is to be understood the bishop of Meissen, not Miltitz. A comma must be placed after Miltitium, as the Erlangen correspondence has done. Shortly before this time Luther was in dispute with the Bishop of Meissen. See St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 462 and ibid. the Erleutung, p. II.

finally learned to recognize that they were human beings who had a God.

I know that Lucas has the cloth, but he does not know for whom it should be, and I have not demanded it. I have also seen the watered garments (undulatas) 1) but he does not know for whom they are to be either, they have also not been demanded, so that there would not be a mistake if they were also bought for others. Perhaps everything has come to you today.

Two days ago I had a messenger from Silvester von Schauenberg, the Frankish nobleman, whose son 2) has also recommended Philip here, and he promises safe protection 3) if the prince were in danger in any way because of me. As I do not despise this, I will only rely on Christ as my protector, who may also have given him this spirit. Fare well in the Lord. On the Sunday Vocem Jucunditatis [May 13] 1520.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 64.

Wittenberg.

July 20, 1520.

Luther to Wenceslaus Link.

Luther sends him new writings. From Alveld; from the student revolt; from Schaumburg's letter and from the writing to the Christian nobility.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 275 b; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 470 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 444.

To the venerable man Wenceslaus Link, Master of Holy Theology 4) at Nuremberg, hermit, evangelical preacher, his [friend] in the Lord.

1) According to Du EuuZtz, uuduiaa is a coarse hären dress, camlott dress.

2) Inscirbit in the Album, p. 93 as Ambrosius "Is Lebaubsra Herbipo: Gioe. 10. Lluü 1520. The name is otherwise written "Schaumberg" or "Schaumburg".

3) This is an oral message; Schaumburg wrote Letter No. 489 in this volume to Luther only on June II.

4) In Aurifaber: "D. 1. NaAistro" etc., thereafter our translation, in that we have dissolved D. by Divns. The Erlangen correspondence offers: "v. Nbsol., LlaZistro ^Doctor of Theology, Magisters, which we did not accept for this reason, because it is not necessary to think of the Magister title after the Doctor title. - We are also aware of the fact that it is not usually called vsiva] NbeoloZins, but 8saeru6] or 8sa,6r08ÄN6tu6] 1b6oloZiu6.

JESus.

Hail! I send you again my trifles, hurry Aergerniß for the hypocrites. I believe that the "planed corner" has reached you. The Leipzig Waldefel 5) shall yahren against me anew; but we shall see. Recently there was almost a schism among us and a riot arose, but Satan was quickly crushed by Christ's help.

2 Silvester von Schauenberg, a Frankish nobleman, has sent me a letter in which he asks me not to flee to Bohemia or elsewhere, but to come to him if the Roman excommunications come into force. He promised me excellent protection from a hundred Frankish knights. Thus, finally, Roman rampaging is also despised among the Germans. Franz Sickingen did the same.

3) From Rome, letters have been written to the prince against me, 6) but in vain. The same has happened from the court of a great man in Germany. Our German booklet against the pope about the necessity of the reformation of the church, which is addressed to the entire nobility of Germany, will be published, which will offend Rome to the highest degree, since her ungodly artifices and violence will be brought to the public. Farewell and pray for me. Wittenberg, the day before Praxedis [July 20] 1520.

Brother Martin Luther.

No. 65.

Wittenberg.

January 16, 1521.

Luther to Spalatin in Worms. 7)

Luther sends Spalatin a letter and some of Hutten's works and his nsssrto, whose vehemence he excuses. He is dissatisfied with Hutten's warlike plans. He does not like the fact that the emperor has withdrawn his invitation to Worms. From a conversation with the Margrave of Brandenburg, the printing of the Postille 2c.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 332 d; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 543 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 73.

5) Alveld.

6) Compare No. 440 in this volume.

7) The Elector had arrived in Worms on January 5 and Spalatin with him. Köstlin, "Martin Luther" (3), Vol. I, p. 419.

His most beloved in the Lord Georg Spalatin, princely Saxon court preacher, the pious man.

Hail! I am sending the letter Hutten sent to me 1) with the bull and other works of him, my dear Spalatin, and everything you see, also the letters of Bucer, one of which has been delivered to me damaged, as you see before your eyes, perhaps by the trituration of the messengers. My Latin assertio, 2) which was previously sent to you in a few sheets, now comes in its entirety with the supplement. Do not judge it as harsh; the German will be clearer and simpler. It was necessary to sprinkle the Latin stomachs with something salted. Emser has risen up against me; may the Lord be my counselor.

2 You see what Hutten is dealing with. I do not want violence and bloodshed to be used to fight for the gospel; that is how I wrote to man. 3) By the word the world has been overcome, the church has been preserved, it will also be restored by the word; but also the Antichrist, as he started without hand, so he will be destroyed without hand by the word. I also send my letter to the prince. 4) With sadness I read Carl's last letter, in which he recants his former actions. I ask you, what hope can there be, since they are so minded and write? May the will of the Lord be done.

I have been before the Margrave of Brandenburg and his princely comrades 5) today. I was called and they talked to me, because they wanted to see the man.

1) The letter is dated 9 December 1520 - the "bull" is the writing: Dialogi Huttoniei novi, poryuam kostivi. Lulla vs! Dulioicla. Among the other writings was: In ineonclium Dutborianum oxkiamatio Iliribi üttoni D'uitis. Anno Domini NDXXI.

2) "Grund und Ursach" 2c. No. 448 in this volume is the German script.

3) This letter did not come into Hutten's hands; it was lost, as can be seen from Luther's letter to Spalatin of February 17. (Walch, old edition, vol. XXI, 747; De Wette, vol. I, p. 560.)

4) No. 575 in this volume. This letter is dated January 25. Luther had probably already intended to write on the 16th and hoped to be able to send this letter with the present one to Spalatin.

5) Among them, as Spalatin reports, especially Duke Albrecht of Mecklenburg.

I received the hundred gold florins that were bequeathed to me from Taubenheim, but Schart also gave me fifty, so that I am beginning to fear that God may reward me here, but I have objected that I do not want to be overfilled by him in such a way, or I will immediately give it away and dispose of it. For what do I have to do with so much money? I have given half to Father Prior 7) and made man happy.

The younger Prince 8) has written to me for the second time very graciously, indicating to me the answer of his uncle, our Elector, about my matter.

The interpretations of the epistles and gospels have been put into print. I will order them to go out under the name of the prince 9) if you do not advise otherwise. For three sheets are printed, the first is still postponed.

Doctor Henning, the provost, is seriously ill; one doubts the possibility of his recovery; likewise Tilo Dene 10) is suffering; the Lord help them. Otherwise there is nothing out of the ordinary. Farewell. Wittenberg, on the day of St. Pabst Marcellus the Martyr, [January 16] 1521.

Martin Luther, Augustinian.

No. 66.

January 14, 1521.

Luther to Wenceslaus Link.

Luther rejects the request that he declare in writing that he has written nothing against the secular power, since this is unnecessary. Miscellaneous news.

Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 299b; in De Wette, Vol. I, p. 545 (with the wrong date: January 21) and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 72.

6) The legacy of D. Heinrich Schmiedberg.

7) Helt.

8) Duke John Frederick of Saxony. The letter is dated 20 Dec. 1520.

9) On March 3, 1521, Luther dedicated the Latin Postille to the Elector. See St. Louis Edition, Vol. XI, Preface, Col. VII f.

10) Tilo Dene, born 1465, mayor in Wittenberg since 1501, died only on November 29, 1545.

JEsus.

Hail! I have received your letter from Merseburg, venerable father. But how could I have written, since I did not know where the spirit of God was taking you? But I was very surprised that you wrote that I would like to testify in a published booklet that I have written nothing against the worldly rule, since all my writings show the opposite. But who can shut everyone's mouth, since very many do not want to read my things, for the sole reason that they have heard that mine cannot be read and rebuked, or not believed. What shall I do here with the impertinent people?

I was appointed by the emperor, and now this appointment has been revoked. Emser writes against me; I will meet that beast. For he acts on the orders of his furious Duke George. We have heard bad things about Teschius 1). With us, everything is as it was. I have received my hundred florins and have pleased the prior with the money and even more in the Lord.

3. be well and pray for the word, since you see that the matter is in the wildest turmoil; perhaps this is the flood of sin of which it is foretold that it will happen in the year 24. 2) Wittenberg. Philip greets you. On the day of Felix [January 14] 1521, your Martin Luther.

No. 67.

Wittenberg.

March 6, 1521.

Luther to Johann Lang.

Luther sends writings; reports that he answers Emser. About his new adversaries, his overload of work. About the papal bull and the hostile behavior of the bishops of Meissen and Merseburg. Postscript: Of the efforts of Aleander at Worms.

Handwritten in the Oock. Ootdnu. A. 399, toi. 132p. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 311; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 568 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel-, vol. III, p. 100.

1) Compare No. 20, § 5 of this appendix.

2) In 1520, such a writing had appeared: "Eyn Warnung des Sündfluss oder erschrockenliche Wassers des .xxiiij. iars auß natürlicher Art des hymels zu besorgen" 2c., six leaves in quarto. Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XI, 59, 33. where instead of what is said in the note in the oldest editions is found: "which will now occur over two years".

His Johann Lang, the theologian, Erfurt hermit, his extremely dear [friend] in the Lord.

JEsus.

Hail! Although I am very busy, my dear father, I am writing this only to forestall your complaints that I am not writing anything to you when I have no other reason to do so. At the same time, I am sending my trifles. Against Emser, I have an answer under my hands.

Murner has poured out three books against me. It is said that two Italians have also written against me, of whom I have seen nothing so far. But also the Löwener have something under the press to attack me. By so many snakes (hydris) I, a unifier, am attacked, and I am forced to overturn the saying that not even a Hercules can stand against two, while I must stand against ten. Preaching twice 3) requires one man, the psalter three, the postilion no less, and besides this there are so many enemies, to say nothing of the secondary works and the letters to the friends, then also of the conversations and services against brothers. For I am released from the laws of the Order and of the Pope, and excommunicated by virtue of the Bull, which I rejoice in and accept, only that I do not take up the habit and the place.

3 Give my best regards to Crotus and Jonas, and take care that you pray bravely for the ministry of the Word. For Satan is slaughtering many thousands of souls through this quite satanic bull. The bishop of Meissen has gathered and burned wagonloads of our books, as well as the holy man (sancticulus), the bishop of Merseburg, who has the most hopeful and stingy humility. Farewell in Christ. Wittenberg. Philip greets you. On the sixth of March, 1521.

Martin Luther.

Aleander, the apostolic nuncio, is working with all his might to have me declared to the imperial eight, but as yet he has done nothing.

3) Luther preached twice a day at that time; once on the first book of Moses, the other time on the Gospels,

No. 68.

Wartburg.

May 14, 1521.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther reports the rumors of his capture. About several events in Erfurt and Gotha. His friendly reception in Hersfeld and Eisenach. His present occupation. The circumstances of his capture.

Handwritten in the Ooä. lern n. k. 269 and in the Ooä. 60t6. 187. 4. which, however, according to De Wette, mostly have reprehensible variants. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 3266; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 5 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 152.

To his most worthy in Christ, Georg Spalatin, the most faithful servant of Christ in Altenburg.

JEsus.

Hail! I received your letter, Gerbel's 1) and Sapidus' on Sunday Exaudi [May 12], my dear Spalatin, and the fact that I have not yet written to you was done with good forethought, so that the new rumor of my imprisonment would not give someone cause to intercept my letters. Various things are said about me here, but the opinion gains the upper hand that I was captured by friends who were sent from Franconia 2). Tomorrow the time of the escort given by the emperor comes to an end. I am sorry that you write that they would also rage with such a strict edict in order to search their consciences; not because of me, but because they carelessly burden themselves with evil and continue to burden themselves with such great hatred. Oh, how great hatred this shameless violence will arouse! But let it go; the time of their visitation is perhaps imminent.

I have not yet received anything from Wittenberg or elsewhere from our people. The youth in Erfurt had damaged some of the priests' houses at night (at the time when we went to

1) Nicolaus Gerbel, D. juris in Strasbourg. - Johann Sapidus (Witz) from Schlettstadt, Rector of the school there. He later went to Strasbourg.

2) One will have thought of the Frankish noblemen who were favorable to Luther. Another widespread rumor had him imprisoned by Count Wilhelm of Henneberg, who was an opponent of Luther because of his attack on the pilgrimage to Grimmerthal.

Eisenach), 3) unwilling that the dean of the Severistift 4) (Severianus), a great pope, seized Magister Draco, a well-meaning man, by the surplice and publicly dragged him out of the choir, claiming that he had been banned because he had gone to meet me with others when I entered Erfurt. In the meantime, people fear greater things; the council is looking through its fingers, the priests there have a bad rumor, and it is said that the young craftsmen are allying themselves with the studying youth. It is obvious that they perhaps want to make true the prophetic proverb that says: Erfurt is a Prague. 5)

3 Yesterday I was told that in Gotha a certain priest had suffered because they had bought I don't know what kind of goods to increase the income of the church, and under the pretext of spiritual (ecclesiastica) freedom refused to pay the (so-called) burdens and duties. We see that the people (as Erasmus also writes in his βουλή [bule]) could no longer, nor would they want to, bear the yoke of the pope and the papists. And yet we do not cease to afflict and weigh down the same, although, since the light brings everything to light, we have already lost the name and [good] opinion, and that appearance of godliness can no longer apply nor rule as it has ruled until now. Up to now we have increased hatred 6) by force and suppressed it by force; but whether it can be suppressed in the future, we will find out.

I sit here all day, idle and heavy-headed; I read the Greek and Hebrew Bible. I will write a German sermon on the freedom of ear confession. 7) Also the Psalter and the Postillas.

3) on April 9.

4) Jakob Doleatoris, actually Schröder, from Eimbeck.

5) Soon after its foundation, the University of Erfurt had taken such an upswing, especially due to the influx of German teachers and students from Prague, that it was compared to Prague. Here Luther means: as the University of Prague had fallen into disrepair due to unrest, so would it happen to Erfurt.

6) Instead of omnia, the two manuscripts have odia, which we have assumed.

7) The writing "Von der Beichte, ob die Pabst Macht habe zu gebieten". St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIX, 814. -The "Psalter" is the "Works on the first 22 Psalms".

I will continue as soon as I receive what I need from Wittenberg, including the Magnificat that I have begun.

You cannot believe with what kindness the abbot of Hersfeld 1) received us. He sent the chancellor and the castle governor to meet us a good mile away; then he received us himself at his castle with many horsemen and accompanied us into the city. The council received us inside the gates. In his monastery he fed us splendidly and put me up in his bedroom. They forced me to preach a sermon early at the fifth hour 2) claiming in vain that he might lose his sovereign rights (regalia) if the imperials began to interpret this event as a breach of the granted fare, since they forbade me not to preach on the way. But I said that I had not agreed that the word of God should be bound, which is true.

I also preached in Eisenach, 3) but the fearful priest protested in front of me in the presence of notary and witnesses, but humbly excused himself because of this necessity with the fear of his tyrants. So you will perhaps hear in Worms that I have broken the escort, but it has not been broken. For this condition was not in my power, that the word of God should be bound [2 Tim. 2:9]. I did not consent to it, and if I had consented, it would not have had to be kept, because it would have been against God. So the next day he [the abbot] finally led us to the forest.

men," iikiä. Only for the print did Luther finish the 22nd Psalm that he had begun, but he did not resume the lectures. It is therefore not quite correct what the Erlanger Briefwechsel notes: "Luther did not continue the Op6rntion68 in ksnlinos as he had undertaken here." See the note in the St. Louis edition, Vol. IV, 199 f. - "Die Postillen" are the German church postils.

1) Crato Miles of Hungen. He was inclined to the Reformation, but did not formally convert, probably because then the abbey would have been given to a strict Catholic. He was soon the only Catholic member of the abbey.

2) May 1.

3) on May 2.

The Chancellor is in charge of us, and he has dined all of us in Berka 4).

We were finally received by the Eisenachers, who met us on foot, and entered Eisenach in the evening. Early in the morning, all the companions left with Jerome. 5) I traveled to my relatives across the forest (for they hold almost all of the land), and in breaking away from them, as we were turning toward Waltershausen, I was caught shortly thereafter near Altenstein Castle. Amsdorf must have known that I was to be captured by someone, but he does not know the place where I am being held.

My brother, 6) who saw the horsemen at times, made off from the wagon and is said to have come to Waltershausen on foot in the evening without greeting. So here my clothes have been taken off and I have put on horsemen's clothes; I let my hair and beard grow, so that you would hardly know me, since I myself have not known me for a long time. Now I live in Christian freedom, released from all laws of this tyrant, although I would rather that that pig at Dresden 7) would be worthy to kill me while I was preaching publicly, if it should please God that I should suffer for the sake of His word. May the will of the Lord be done. Be well and pray for me. Greetings to your whole court. Given on the mountain, Tuesday after Exaudi [May 14] 1521.

Martin Luther.

No. 69.

Wartburg.

May 12, 1521.

Luther to Melanchthon.

Luther wants to know what Melanchthon thinks about his concealment, into which he has reluctantly submitted. He admonishes him to stand firm and faithful to the cause of the Gospel. He comments on the imperial edict and complains of abdominal discomfort. Some news.

4) Berka is a small town in Saxony-Weimar-Eisenach, on the Werra. This does not refer to Berka an der Ilm in the Principality of Weimar.

5) Prospect. - In Möhra, where Luther was a guest of his father-brother, Luther preached on May 4 in the morning.

6) Luther's monastic brother, Johann Petzensteiner, who often accompanied him on his travels.

7) Duke George.

Handwritten in the Ooä. len. s, k. 118. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 324; in Strobel-Ranner, p. 16; in Schütze, vol. II, p. 206, but incomplete, without addressee, and placed under the letters from the Coburg of 1530; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 1 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 148.

To Philipp Melanchthon, evangelist of the church at Wittenberg, his exceedingly dear brother in Christ.

JEsus.

1. Hail! What are you doing in the meantime, my dear Philip? Are you not praying for me that this seclusion of mine, which I have unwillingly allowed, may work something greater for God's glory? And how this pleases you, I very much wish to know. I feared that I would be regarded as leaving the battle line, and yet there was no path open to me on which I could have resisted those who wanted and advised me to do so. I want nothing more than to meet the rage of the adversaries and offer them my neck.

2 As I sit here, all day long I imagine the figure of the Church and see the word in the 89th Psalm [v. 48.]: "Why will you have created all men in vain?" Oh God! What a frightening image (spectrum) of the wrath of God is the abominable empire of the Roman Antichrist! And I abhor my hardness, lest I be utterly dissolved in tears, lest I too weep with my fountains of tears for the slain children of my people [Jer. 9:1]. But there is no one who rises up and keeps God [Isa. 64:7], or makes himself a wall for the house of Israel [Ezek. 22:30, 13:5] in this last day of His wrath. O, a worthy kingdom of the Pabst for the end and yeast of the world! God have mercy on us!

(3) In the meantime, therefore, O servant of the word, stop and fortify the walls and towers of Jerusalem, until they also attack you. You know your profession and your gifts. I pray especially for you, whether my prayer (as I do not doubt) is not able to do something. Do the same for me, and let us bear this burden together. We alone are still in the battle line; they will look for you after me.

Spalatin writes to me that such a cruel edict 1) will be printed that they will, at the risk of their conscience, investigate the whole world about my books, so that they will soon cause their own downfall. Rehoboam at Dresden is pleased, 2) and is very eager to execute such an edict. They have also told the emperor to write to the king of Denmark that he should not receive the remnants of the Lutheran heresy, and they sing the little song [Ps. 41:6]: "When will he die and his name perish?"

Hartmann Kronenberg has promised the emperor a salary of 200 gold florins 3) because he does not want to serve the one who hears these godless people. I believe it will happen that this edict will not rage anywhere but among this Rehoboam and your other neighbor, 4) whom the vain doctrine plagues. God lives and reigns forever, amen.

The Lord has beaten me with great pain. The bowel movement is so hard that I have to force it out with great force until the sweat of fear, and the longer I put it off, the more it hardens. Yesterday, on the fourth day, I had an opening; therefore, I did not sleep all night, and I am still not at peace. I ask you to pray for me. For this evil will become unbearable if it continues as it has begun.

6 The Cardinal of Salzburg went as a companion with Ferdinand to his bride in Innsbruck on the day before Philip and James [April 30], that is, on the fourth day after our departure. 5) It is said that this companion displeased Ferdinand, but also the emperor, as Spalatin writes. But you read his letter yourself. See that you write everything that is going on with you and how everything stands, and be well with your own (cum carne tua). On Sunday Exaudi [May 12] 1521, in the regions of the birds.

Your Martin Luther.

1) The first edict in No. 747 of this volume.

2) Duke George.

3) This was the annual salary for having entered the service of the emperor with his friend Sickingen. Compare About Hartmuth von Kronberg, numbers 503 to 514 in this volume.

4) the Elector Joachim of Brandenburg.

5) Luther left Worms on April 26.

No. 70.

Wartburg.

May 12, 1521.

Luther to Amsdorf.

Since Amsdorf had been Luther's companion during his capture, Luther asked him for news about the continuation of his journey and told him how he had fared.

Handwritten in 6oü. Isn. L. 24. n. 1.182. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 326; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 3 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 150.

All the Mr. Nicolaus Amsdorf, the holy theology licentiate.

JEsus.

1st Hail! I had recently written to you all, my dear Amsdorf, but after hearing a better counselor, I tore it all up because it was not yet safe to send letters. Now it has been written about the books and sheets 1) to D. Hieronymus, and in this letter I also write to the prior about the same. You will take care of what needs to be done. The Lord is seeking me home, but pray for me, as I always pray for you, that the Lord may strengthen your heart.

2 Therefore, be confident, and when the opportunity arises, speak the word of God with joy. Write also how everything went for you on the journey and what you heard or saw in Erfurt. At Philippils you will find what Spalatin wrote to me.

On the day I was torn away from you, as a new rider tired by the long journey, I came to my night inn at about eleven o'clock in the dark. Now I am here idle, like a suitor among captives. Beware of the Rehoboam of Dresden and the Benhadad of Damascus. 2) For a cruel edict has gone out against us. "But the LORD will laugh at them" [Ps. 37:13.]. In Him be at ease, and greet all who are to be greeted. On Sunday Exaudi [May 12], in the Air Quarter, 1521.

Your Martin Luther.

1) The "books" that Luther needed for his work; the "sheets" that were already printed from the Magnificat he had begun. - Jerome" is Schürf; "the prior" is Helt.

2) George of Saxony and Joachim of Brandenburg, whom Luther compares to them because of their arrogance and mockery of the holy gospel. Cf. I Kings 12 and 20.

No. 71.

Wartburg.

November 1, 1521.

Luther to Nic. Gerbet in Strasbourg.

In response to his inquiry (of May 18), Luther gives him news of his stay and his writings so far, the most recent of which is the one against the Archbishop of Mainz concerning the indulgence in Halle. He reports that he agrees with Melanchthon about the abolition of the monastic vows and wishes Gerbet luck for his marriage.

Printed at Aurifaber, vol.I, Bl.362K; at Ki8t. 600168. 866. XVI. 8Uvpl6M6Qtum.?. VIII, xo. 30, p. 340; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 89 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 239. The second half of this letter is found in 0oä. OotNav. 451 as a letter to Melanchthon.

To the man distinguished by scholarship and Christian godliness, Nicolaus Gerbet, jurist, his extremely faithful friend in Christ.

JEsus.

Hail in Christ! Your letter, dearest Gerbet, which was written to me on the day before Pentecost [May 18], was only delivered to me on Michaelmas, and this I write to you today on All Saints' Day [November 1], and do not know when it will reach you; perhaps at another Pentecost time or never (ad Calendas Graecas). 3) You see the cause of my silence; namely, you may attribute this to fate, that is, to the hidden will of God.

By the way, I believe that you have since learned from others what you are asking so anxiously and amicably, namely how my affairs are. I have withdrawn from the public sphere by following the advice of friends, albeit reluctantly and without knowing whether I was doing something pleasing to God. I certainly thought that I should stick my neck out to the common rage, but they were of a different opinion. Moved by their advice, horsemen sang to me by a disguised attack on the way and brought me to a safe place, where I am now treated in the friendliest manner.

3. but you can believe that in this idle solitude I am exposed to a thousand devils.

3) The Greeks had no calends, hence the expression.

am. It is so much easier to fight against the incarnate devil, that is, against men, than against the evil spirits under heaven [Eph. 6:12]. Often I fall, but the right hand of the Most High raises me up again; therefore I also seek publicity again; but I will not, unless the Lord calls me.

It is not up to me to send my books to you. I have written about this matter to Spalatin, 1) that he see to it. In the meantime, a booklet has gone out against Catharinus on the Antichrist, likewise against Latomus of Louvain, likewise the German Scripture on confession, likewise the 68th Psalm interpreted in German, likewise the Canticle of Mary explained in German, likewise the 37th Psalm explained in German for the consolation of the church at Wittenberg. 2) Philippus has published for me a protective writing against the Parisians 3) which I have provided with a German [Vor- und Nachrede]; it has also already been published. He also has the theological Methodus 4) under the press; a book worthy of Philip.

5) The German interpretation of the Epistles and Gospels has been in the press from me throughout the year, 5) likewise I have written a public 6) chastisement against the Cardinal of Maiuz, because he has again erected the idol of indulgences in Halle, likewise the interpretation of the Gospel of the ten lepers; 7) everything in German. I was born for my Germans, whom I also want to serve. I have great desire to publicly attack the high schools with writings, but I have not yet decided to do so. I have resolved not to write anything about Matthew.

8) but I had begun to preach both Testaments from the beginning for the people in Wittenberg for the pulpit, and I had come in the first book of Moses up to the 32nd chapter, in the Gospels up to the voice of John the Baptist; here my voice fell silent. Behold, there you have everything you asked for.

6) Your earlier letter, which you had sent to me to Worms, I received long after in this solitude. 9) But it is extraordinary how much I liked the wife and the bridegroom 10) who gave and adorned her to me. But she gave birth to the children I listed above. You are asking whether the offspring is similar to the mother. She is still fertile, and she is heavily pregnant, and, Christ willing, she will bear a son who will crush the Papists, Sophists, Religiosists and Herodists with an iron 11) scepter [Ps. 2, 9.]. For about the vows of the monks and priests we, Philip and I, have a strong alliance, namely, that they must be annulled and destroyed. 12) O, about the wicked Antichrist with his scales! how Satan has devastated through him all the mysteries of Christian godliness!

You want to greet your wife again, and I wish that she loves you and is loved by you again. You happy man, who have overcome the impure celibate state, which is also damnable either by constant rutting or by impure rivers, by an honorable marriage. Suffer all that this state instituted by GOD entails, and be grateful to your GOD. The completely wretched and dishonorable state of young men and girls reveals such great abominations to me every day that my ears already do not hear anything.

1) Walch, old edition, vol. XXI, 766; De Wette, vol. II, p. 91.

2) The above writings are found in the St. Louis edition, vol. XV/III, 1434; vol. XV/III, 1056; vol. XIX, 814; vol. V, 656; vol. VII, 1372 and vol. V, 306.

3) St. Louis edition, vol. XV/III, 960, and 932 the verdict of the Parisians with Luther's pre and post speech.

4) the loai tieoloMei.

5) the German church postilla.

6) This will be the writing "Wider den Abgott zu Halle", whose appearance Spalatin prevented, and which has disappeared without a trace. But still on December 1, 1521, Luther threatened the archbishop of Mainz with the publication of this writing. Compare St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIX, Introduction, p. 26 a.

7) St. Louis edition, vol. XII, 1438.

8) In his letter, Gerbet, also on behalf of his friends, had asked Luthern to prepare interpretations of the whole of Matthew as soon as possible.

9) May 12. See No. 68, § 1 in this appendix.

10) This refers to the fact that Gerbet had presented Luthern with his edition of the New Testament published by Thomas Anshelm at Hagenau in 1521. The "wife" is therefore the Bible edition, "the bride's guide" Gerbet.

11) Erlanger: lerre instead of: ferrea.

12) This refers to Lucher's correspondence with Melanchthon on vows and "Luchers Urtheil über die geistlichen und Klostersgelübde," St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 1500.

uglier than the name nun, monk and priest, and I consider the married state to be a paradise, even if it has to contend with the utmost paucity.

Greet also the others whom you have named to me, Otto Brunfels, 1) Caspar Uringer and Lucas Bathodius, and all who hold with you to the gospel and condemn the spirituality of the angels, as the apostle says [Col. 2, 18]. And thou hast well and pray for me. From my desert, 1521.

Martin Luther.

No. 72.

Wartburg.

May 12, 1521.

Luther to Johann Agricola.

Luther wishes Agricola's wife a happy delivery and exhorts him to be faithful in his office, Handwritten in dock. llen. L. 24. n, 1.151; Ooä. üatLenderser; Ooä. OotJan. 1048, 1. 58 d. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 325 b; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 4 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 151.

To Johann Agricola, the married theologian and freedman of Christ at Wittenberg, his friend.

Jesus.

Hail! Although I believe that everything I have addressed to Philip and others is also addressed to you, my dear John (unless through my departure the fellowship among friends has also departed, which God forbid), it has nevertheless seemed good to me to greet you with my hand as well. Be therefore greeted, and be mindful of this word: "The servant is not greater than his lord" (John 13:16). Salute your flesh and your rib; may the Lord grant that it may be happily delivered, amen.

1) Otto Braunfels, son of a cooper from Braunfels, born in Mainz in 1488, entered the Carthusian Order there and lived in the Carthusian House in Strasbourg, which he left at Hutten's instigation. He was also a physician and went to Basel in 1530, from there he was called "ach Bern, where he died in 1534, - "Uringer" (so written by Gerbel) is called "Urniger" after Aurifaber, "Winger" after I'tzebtius. - "Bathodius" is Lucas Hackfurt, priest at Strasbourg, later the almoner of the city.

I am a strange prisoner, who sits here with my will and not with my will; with my will, because the Lord wills it so; not with my will, because I wish to stand in the public for the word, but I have not yet been worthy of it. Wittenberg is hated by his neighbors, but the Lord sees to it that his time will come; then he will laugh at them [Ps. 2, 4], if we only believe in him. Write, how it stands with the sermons, which were handed over to everyone, so that either my hope or my concern of the word may be increased.

(3) But you also, since you are called to the ministry of teaching the children 2) the word, establish your ministry, and bear what the Lord sets before you to bear. Behold, this I have written, only to write. Fare well with all thine own. In the region of the birds, on Sunday Exaudi [May 12] 1521. Martin Luther.

Give one guilder to the newborn child and the other to the mother in childbirth, so that she may drink wine and have plenty of milk. For if I had been present, I would have become godfather in any case.

No. 73.

(Wartburg.)

August 15, 1521.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther expresses his dissatisfaction with the printing of the book "von der Beichte" and writes about the printing of the Postille. He rebukes the way Carlstadt argues against celibacy, wants to know at whose expense he lives there, and tells that he had been hunting with him.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt - Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 349; in De Wette, Vol. II, p. 41 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 217.

To Georg Spalatin, his [friend] in the Lord.

. Jesus.

Hail! The second and third sheets of the confession I have received from you, my dear Spalatin; the same with the first one.

2) He had the office of a catechist at the parish church. Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XX, introduction, p. 42d.

I had already received the bow from Philip. But it is quite extraordinary how this printing repents and upsets me. Would God that I had sent nothing German, so unclean, so careless, so confused 1) it is printed to say nothing of the bad types and the bad paper. The printer Johannes is a Hans, who always remains in the old Schlendrian. 2)

2 I ask you to see to it that he does not print the German Postillen under any circumstances, but rather that everything that I have sent from them is kept and sent back to me so that I send it to someone else. For what use is it that I have worked so much, if through such great uncleanness and disorder other printers are given an occasion to still increase and multiply the errors? I do not want anyone to sin against the Gospels and Epistles after this example; it is better that they remain hidden than that they are published in this way. Yes, for this reason I am not sending anything now, although I have almost ten large sheets on the same matter, and I will certainly not send anything more until I have realized that these dirty profit-seekers care less about their profit when printing the books than about the benefit of the readers.

For what does such a printer seem to think but this? It is enough for me that I make money; let the readers see what and how they read. Philip has sent three sheets of Latomus, which I like very much.

(4) How I would like Carlstadt to make an effort to refute celibacy with more suitable scriptural passages; I fear that he would incur ill reproach for himself and for us. For what kind of interpretation of Scripture is this, that "to give seed to Moloch" means so much as to be defiled by natural flow? as if everyone did not know that seed in this place means so much as children or offspring,

1) See St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 838, note 2.

2) The ordinary form of the proverb is: Hans in that is, an incorrigible man. Luther has here the form: in koäsm tsrnxs

- Hans, who always remains in the same tempo, who does not let himself be dissuaded from his sloppiness (Weim. Ausg., vol. VIII, p. 132, note 2). - The printer is Grüenberg, not Lufft, as De Wette assumes. See St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, introduction, p. 38 f. After that, the information vol. XI, in the preface, Col. IX, Z.4 is to be changed.

as Ps. 37, 25. 28. and Joh. 8, 33. 3) is written. Why does he not use the words of Scripture, which call this evil softness (wollitiem) and impurity, as the apostle [1 Cor. 6, 9. Gal. 5, 19.] is wont to do? The fact that he even twists the passage to Timothy from a wife to be rejected 4) to the celibate state will be refuted by an adversary in many ways and with success.

It is an excellent thing that he has undertaken and a very good enterprise, but I wish that it will also be carried out in an excellent, skillful and successful manner. For you see how great clarity and the exertion of all forces on our part are necessary for the adversaries, since they blaspheme even the clearest and most appropriate. How much more must we, who are a spectacle of the world [1 Cor. 4:9], take care that our word is blameless, as Paul teaches [Titus 2:8].

(6) Perhaps I am concerned about strange things here, but they are not strange things if he succeeds in his plan. For what is more dangerous than to provoke such a large number of celibate people to marriage by such unreliable and uncertain passages of Scripture, so that afterwards they are martyred with constant anguish of conscience, and worse than now? I, too, wish that the unmarried life would become free, as the Gospel demands, but I do not yet know sufficiently how to go about it. But this I remember in vain, perhaps he does not want his course to be hindered, therefore one must let him.

7) I send the briefly explained passage to John, as you wished. 5) You will be ob-

3) In the original here are two inapplicable citations, namely Psalm. 77 st ^oli. 5.

4) Carlstadt had posted seven theses for a disputation to be held on June 21, 1521, the first of which reads thus: "As we reject the younger widows, so also the monks, so also the young priests in the conjugal state." Jäger, Carlstadt, p. 176.

5) This was the interpretation of the passage Joh. 20, 22. f., which Spalatin wanted to have interpreted more extensively, as we see from Luther's letters to Melanchthon, No. 100 in this appendix. This passage, inserted into the Sermon of Confession, is found at the end of the second part, St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 845 ff, A 63-68. The other passage, where Luther had already brought this interpretation before, is there, Col. 837 ff, § 46 ff; this cannot be the inserted passage, because it is on the third, already printed, sheet. The fourth arc begins in the original edition with z 52 (ibid. Col. 840).

to insert the same at a suitable place. For I do not have the entire sermon in my memory, but I assume that I have said this before quite abundantly, that this excess would perhaps not have been necessary.

8 Do not worry about the suffering of my banishment. For I do not care, wherever I am, if I am not finally a burden and a burden to these people. For I do not want anyone to be burdened by me. But I certainly believe that I am living here through the food and at the expense of our prince, otherwise I would not stay here for an hour if I knew that I was consuming this man's possessions 1) even though he gives me everything happily and gladly.

(9) For thou knowest that if any man's goods must be forfeited, those of princes must be forfeited because to be a prince and not to be somewhat of a robber is either impossible or scarcely possible, and the greater the prince the greater. You will do well if you give me certainty about this. For from this so kind man I can learn nothing else than that he will receive me from the princely purse. But this is my way, that I fear to be a burden, where I am perhaps not a burden, and it is also befitting for a noble-thinking person that he fears this

I went hunting for two days last Monday [August 12] 2) to get to know the bittersweet pleasure of heroes. We caught two hares and several poor partridges; truly an occupation worthy of idle people. I also did theology there under nets and dogs, and as much pleasure as the outward appearance of those things gave me, so much pity and pain brought the secret hidden underneath. For what is this image but that it signifies the devil, who hunts these harmless little animals by means of his persecutions and the godless teachers, his dogs? This extremely sad secret interpretation was all too obvious to the simple-minded and believing souls.

11) There was a more gruesome secret interpretation. Since we had kept a rabbit alive through my efforts, and I had wrapped it in the sleeve of my skirt and walked away a little, the dogs had meanwhile found the poor rabbit, broken its right hind leg through the skirt and killed it by strangling its throat. Namely, the pope and Satan are so furious that he corrupts even the saved souls, and does not care about my effort.

(12) Yes, I am tired of this hunt; I think that the one in which the bears, the wolves, the boars, the foxes and such ungodly teachers are pierced with spears and arrows is more lovely. But I am comforted by the fact that the secret interpretation is exceedingly close to bliss when the hares and innocent animals are caught by men, [quite different] from when they are caught by bears, wolves and predatory hawks and the bishops and theologians similar to them, because it is meant that here they are devoured to hell, there to heaven.

This is what I want to have played with you through the letter, so that you may know that you who eat game at court will also be game in paradise, which the best hunter of Christ can hardly catch and preserve with much effort. A game will be presented to you while you are playing your game on the hunts.

I have changed my intention and am sending the poorest of the postilion, thinking that if one has perhaps begun to print what I had sent before, that it cannot be postponed or stopped. However, I would like it to be printed on paper in large quarto format 3) and with Lotther types, because it will be a large book. But I will divide it into the four parts of the year, from quarter (angaria - quatermber) to quarter, so that it will not be too burdensome and expensive.

15. but in vain do I desire this, because what I want cannot come to pass but

1) Hans von Berlepsch, castle captain at Wartburg Castle.

2) Monday and Tuesday.

3) in cubitalis xunvri rnoänm the old translator asked correctly by "auf Regalpapierart" given. The Erlangen correspondence explains it by: "in quarto". That Luther wanted a larger format, however, can be seen from his reasoning - "because it will be a large book".

what is done there. But whatever happens or does not happen, see to it, I beg you, that the copies written by my hand are well preserved or sent back to me. I know what kind of Satan is stalking them. I wonder if my Magnificat will finally be finished. Farewell and pray for me. On the Feast of the Assumption of Mary [August 15] 1521.

Martin Luther.

No. 74.

Wartburg.

June 10, 1521.

Luther to Spalatin (in Coburg). 1)

Luther sends Spalatin the Magnificat and the manuscript of the Book of Confession; he is still uncertain whether he should add the 119th Psalm, on which he is working, to this book. He is busy with the German Postille, studies Greek and Hebrew, and suffers from constipation.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 333 d; in De Wette, Vol. II, p. 16 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 171.

To the man of excellent scholarship and godliness, Georg Spalatin, princely Saxon court preacher, his dearest in Christ.

Jesus.

Hail! I have received both your last letter and the booklet of Oecolampad 2) before, my dear Spalatin, with everything else, and now I am sending, because it is believed that it can be done most conveniently through you, as you see, the completed Magnificat, and the booklet which arose from the Sermon of Confession, which is attributed to Franz Sickingen, so that it may be printed, if it pleases you, as soon as possible. For I have already sent the 22nd Psalm 3) to the printer before.

1) Spalatin had left Worms with the Elector on May 23. On May 31, the latter wrote from Gerolzhofen to his brother that he hoped to be with him in Coburg on the next Sunday (June 2) (Fürstmann, Neues Urkundenbuch, p. 19b). On June 10, Melanchthon received a letter from Spalatin at Coburg (Oorp, Lei. I, 396). Aurifaber and, according to him, Walch let Spalatin still be in Worms.

2) Hnōā non sit onsrosa obrlstianis onkossio, Paradoxon doa. Oooolarnpadii. Basi! 1521. cf. no. 79 of this appendix.

3) St. Louis edition, vol. IV, 1256.

You will therefore see to it that this is also brought there, unless something seems to you to have to be changed. For I have not yet decided about the 119th Psalm 4) whether I would prefer to have it connected [with the Scripture of Confession] or especially as a book of its own. The rest I will send as soon as I have learned what is advised by you there. For now I have it under hands in work, but not yet completed, therefore the messenger has been forced to leave it behind.

I have not yet received the postilion; the one to whom I had given the order has made a mistake. In the meantime, I have written that if they cannot be found, you will arrange for me to receive a copy of the shorter postilion, if you have it, along with the index of the epistles and gospels. In the meantime, I have provided my epistle in German for the Sunday after Christmas Day 5) with an exceedingly rich interpretation. I must also answer Latomus, who boasts in his lord the pope. But I marvel at the spirit of Oecolampad, not both because he has fallen on the same subject with me, but because he is so free, confident, and Christian. The Lord keep him and let him increase, amen.

I am very idle and very busy here: I am learning Hebrew and Greek and writing without interruption. The housekeeper treats me far beyond my means. 6) The disease I suffered from in Worms has not yet left me, indeed, it has increased; I suffer from extremely hard bowel movements as never before in my life, so that I despair of being cured. The Lord is seeking me so that I may not be without the remnants of the Cross. He is praised, amen.

I wonder what the imperial edict can withstand. I have read my letter 7) addressed to the estates of the empire on my return journey [from Worms] in print, but very

4) St. Louis edition, vol. V, 1252. Compare ibid. vol. XIX, Introduction, p. 38 b.

5) St. Louis edition, vol. XII, 204 ff.

6) vir bujus looi - the man of this place. The castle captain Berlepsch.

7) No. 581 in this volume.

erroneous. Here it is said that Herr Schifer 1) died and left a million gold florins to [Emperor] Carl. O about the bold Christ, who does not shy away from these mountains of gold! But would God that they would finally recognize that he, the Lord, is our God.

I did not answer the younger prince to his last letter, because the place of his stay] was not known to me, nor do I consider it necessary, so that the secret of my place is not betrayed by too many letters through some cause. You pray for me, this little thing is necessary for me, since I have an abundance of all other things. Everything that happens in public with regard to me does not concern me; I am finally sitting here in peace. Fare well in the Lord and greet whom you can. From the island of Patmos, June 10, 1521.

Henricus Nesicus. 2)

No. 75.

Wartburg.

July 13, 1521.

Luther to Melanchthon.

Luther criticizes Melanchthon for missing him too much, since everything in Wittenberg is going well without him. He is ill and intends to go to Erfurt; he does not want to answer Einsern, but wants to translate Melanchthon's Apology; he is working on the German Postille. He answers the question whether the right of the sword can be justified from the Gospel, which Melanchthon had denied. Luther says that the Gospel approves and confirms secular power, but does not use it. Finally, he urged the Wittenbergers to be more active in proclaiming the Gospel and disapproved of the fact that the court had prevented the disputation on confession.

Handwritten in the Ood. den. b, k. 6; in the Ood. Kolter, vrosd. O. 351, bl. 28d (very corrupted); in the royal

1) This is Onillerino de Orov, vnyne de 8ora, 8eüor de Okevres sOKiövresl, Dn^ue de ^risoot, the imperial minister. Scheurl, Briefbuch, p. 108, calls him daro de 8ekiveris. - His nephew, Wilhelm von Croy, also died at Worms. See No. 567 of this volume.

2) This signature has given rise to various conjectures. Aurifaber and De Wette read: Honrions nesoius, but the original offers Xosious. A conjecture, which can lead to the correct solution, is made by Lindner in the "Studien und Kritiken" 1835, p. 82, namely that vyEöc (islander) is a word formed by Luther himself. If we now add the explanation given by Luther in his "Namenbüchlein" about "Hinric", we get: "The father soder author) of many ^writings) on the island." (See St. Louis edition, vol. XIV, 729.)

Library at Copenhagen Äis. 1393, p. 39. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 334b; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 21 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 189. The text of the letter seems to be corrupted in many places.

To Philipp Melanchthon, the faithful servant of Christ, evangelist of the church at Wittenberg.
JEsus.

Hail! I disliked your letter in two respects, firstly because I recognize that you carry your cross too impatiently and yield too much to your emotions and, as is your way, are too tender; secondly, that you exalt me too much and are greatly mistaken in attaching such great things to me, as if I were so concerned for the cause of God. I am ashamed and tormented by your so high opinion of me, since I am sitting here insensible and hardened in idleness, unfortunately! praying little, not sighing at all for the church of God, rather burning by great fire of my untamed flesh; in short, since I should be fervent in spirit, I am fervent in flesh by evil lust, laziness, idleness, sleepiness, and I do not know whether God has turned away from me because you do not pray for me. You are now taking my place, more significant and lovely in gifts from God.

2) It has already been eight days that I neither write nor pray nor study anything, partly tormented by temptations of the flesh, partly by other complaints. If the matter does not get better, I will have to go to Erfurt in public; 3) you will see me there, or I will see you, because there I will consult physicians or surgeons. For it cannot be that I can bear this affliction longer, since I could more easily suffer ten large wounds than this small sign 4) of an injury. Perhaps the Lord is weighing me down for this reason, so that he can pull me out of this desert and into the public eye.

3) I will not answer the Emser 5);

3) Luther was prevented from doing so by the plague in Erfurt.

4) Instead of indiduni in the outputs, we have adopted indidnm.

5) to his "Quadruplica". But because no one could be found willing to take over the answer, Luther answered a little later by writing "Widerspruch seines Jpcthums" 2c. See St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 41.

Let someone answer who seems to you to be puffing, for instance Amsdorf; but perhaps he is too good to deal with this miste.

I have decided to translate your "Schutzrede" 1) against the Parisian donkeys together with their frenzy into German, and to add notes. I wish very much that Oecolampad's book of confession would also be translated into German with you, so that the papists burst.

I am working on the German 2) postils about the Evangelio and will send them to the press immediately, as soon as I have ten of them ready.

Since things are going so well with you, you have absolutely no need of me. And I am also displeased with you that you burden yourself with such great work and do not listen to the fact that you should take care of yourself; therefore you let yourself be guided by selfishness. So often I shout this at you, but just as often I tell a dove a fable.

5 I still think the same about the power of the sword as before. For you seem to me to desire from the gospel either a command or a counsel concerning this matter. In this I fully agree with you that such a right in the Gospel is neither a command nor a counsel; nor would it be proper in any way, since the Gospel is a law of volunteers and freemen, who have nothing to do with the sword or the right of the sword.

6 But the right of the same is not denied, but rather confirmed and praised, which we certainly do not read of any of the things only admitted. For even the fasts and outward ceremonies are neither commanded nor advised in the Gospel, nor any care for temporal things. Nor would it have been proper for the gospel to make decrees about these things, since it alone guides the spirit in its freedom; but is it for this reason a right that they should not be used, indeed, does not necessity require them?

of this life such a right and use?

Your reason would be able to make a difference if everyone obeyed the Gospel. For when the sword is taken away (since the wicked are necessarily in the majority), how long will the church of God endure in this world, since because of the licentiousness of the wicked no one can be sure either of life or of the use of his goods? But you do not want to be referred by reasons and [indication of any improprieties that may occur], but by the Scriptures.

8 I have said before that the sword is neither commanded nor judged, as well as many other things, but that it is nevertheless praised and confirmed, as is the right of marriage, which also has nothing to do with the gospel. For you have John the Baptist, Luc. 3:14, instructing the men of war, saying, "Do neither violence nor injustice to any man, and be content with your soldiers." Surely, if they did not have the right of the sword, he should have forbidden them, since they actually raised your question and said, "What then shall we do?" Here you have the warrior state, though not as one instituted, yet as one confirmed. Do you not think that it is much harder for you to answer those who cite this passage against you than for them to answer you? Paul commands 1 Tim. 2, 1. ff. to pray for those who are in authority, according to the example of Jeremiah, who commands [Jer. 29, 7.] to pray for the king of the Babylonians, and does not command to pray against authority, as against a thing that is either forbidden or has no right.

9th But, thou sayest, those were Gentiles; but there was no prayer 3) that they might believe, but that they might be and abide in peace. You will not persuade me that a prayer could be commanded by the apostles and prophets for those things which are only to be left and to suffer, that they might abide and be at peace; otherwise we would pray for the robbers and (as you interpret it) the unjust tyrants, that they might be unjust.

1) St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 960; Luther's German translation of the Detsrminatio of Paris with his Vor- und Nachrede ibendasselbst Col. 932.

2) Instead of veruuoulu, veruaeule or V6rQuouulus should be read.

3) Instead of orabat we have assumed orabatnr.

10 Now I do not suffer that Rom. 13, 1. ff. and 1 Petr. 2, 1) 13. ff. are rejected by you as if they should not serve here or only instruct the subjects. You cannot do that, Philip. These are the words of God, and they mean something great, since it says: "The authority is from God, and he who opposes the order of God opposes the authority, and it is God's servant. You will not find that this is said only of approved things.

(11) He is not a servant of God, but an enemy, who does wrong, or who makes everything possible to be tolerated, nor is a ventilator or a lulled thing a servant of God. It is something completely different that it is sometimes written that he stirred up one nation against another to 2) war [2 Chron. 15, 6. Matth. 24, 7.], like the king of Babylon against Tyre, and in Ezekiel [Cap. 26. Jer. 27, 6.] calls him his servant, and in Jeremiah [Cap. 51, 11.] "awakened the courage of the kings of Medes"; and it is something else that Rom. 13 and 1 Tim. 2 are said that the authorities are ordained for the sake of peace. For here it is said, 3) that it is appointed for the fear of evil works and for the honor of good works; there: 4) for vengeance, and the account is balanced for an evil work already done.

12) What will you do now that you read that Abraham, David and the ancient saints used the sword in the best way, of whom it is certain that they were evangelical men? Although they used it only for a time, 5) it is certainly not godly that evangelical men should deny the use of the thing of which they made commendable use, namely, the right of the sword, especially since it is neither revoked nor forbidden in the Gospel, but (as I have said) confirmed, at least among those who believed, namely, the men of war who asked John.

(13) Since Christ had to use divine and heavenly things in the Gospel, what wonder that he did not use the sword, which is easily ordered by human creatures, and meanwhile treats it in such a way that, if the Gospel did not dispute that it was used by him, he would have wanted to use it, since, after it is used, he praises it and confirms it, even clearly teaches that it is used by God.

14 Peter [2 Ep 2:10] and Jude [v 8] are also angry that the powers and dominions are despised by the Antichrist. But may one not despise unbridled or unrighteous things that are permitted? He wants honor and reverence to be shown to them; but does he want the same for unlawful and ungodly things?

(15) Caught up in these passages of Scripture, I have not what to answer for myself, Philip, and much less will you satisfy me in regard to this piece than I will satisfy you in yours. You have no passage which reprobates or forbids or in any way teaches the authorities to flee. I have it as one confirmed in so many ways, praised to be honored and commanded to GOtte in prayer, only that it is neither commanded nor counseled in the Gospel, which neither marriage, nor the household, nor the discipline of the house or a city, nor any government and care for temporal things [can say of themselves].

16. if you have something that has been revealed to you in another way, show it, but present it in such a way that you prove that it is forbidden to flee or merely permitted. For Christ said that power was given to Pilate from above [John 19:11]; but I hold that these words are to be understood in this place as meaning that God does not give to evil. But enough of this.

17 I wish Amsdorf luck that his fortune is increased, 6) but even more that he gives an apostle in a happy way. You are already full, you rule without me [1 Cor. 4, 8], nor do I see why you miss me so much, or how my work can be so necessary to you. You seem to be thinking to yourself, since it is

6) by the parish of Schmölln near Altenburg. See No. 81 of this appendix.

1) In all editions: 1.26tri 3.

2) Here, according to De Wette's assumption, we have read ää dslñnm instead: Helium.

3) Instead of äicit we have assumed äieitur.

4) "there," namely, in the Old Testament passages cited earlier.

5) Only here do the outputs end the previous sentence.

your affairs are better when I am absent than when I am present: you read, Amsdorf reads, Jonas will read. 1) I ask you, do you want the kingdom of God to be proclaimed to you alone? Must not the gospel also be brought to others? Will your Antioch not give a Silas, nor a Paul, nor a Barnabas to any work of the Spirit? [Acts 15:34 ff.]

(18) I say unto thee, Though I am exceeding glad to be with you, yet it would not grieve me (since ye already have abundance) if the Lord would pardon me either at Erfurt, or at Cologne, or elsewhere with a door for the word. I pray you, how great a harvest is everywhere, and no laborers [Matth. 9, 37.]; but you are all laborers. Certainly we must not be taken into account, but our brothers who are scattered everywhere, so that we do not live for ourselves, that is, for the devil, and not for Christ.

(19) Therefore, see that we are not too carnal toward one another, seeking more the presence of the flesh than of the Spirit. I am ready to go wherever the Lord wills, either to you or elsewhere. I know nothing at all about my return. You know in whose hands this lies.

20 Spalatin writes to me that, by order of the prince, there has been no discussion about the part of the theses on confession, which displeases me greatly. I beg you, from now on, always anticipate the advice forged by the court and do not follow it, as I have done so far. Half would not have happened if I had followed their advice. There are people there, too, just as we are.

I will discuss this with Spalatin. These things inflame our adversaries' defiance and prove that we are fearful. Farewell. This letter, which I had already written, someone promised to deliver, but he did not keep his word. Pray for me, I ask, all of you, for I am sunk in sins in this solitude. From my desert, 1521, the day of Margaret [July 13].

Martin Luther, hermit.

1) Jonas was not yet in Wittenberg.

No. 76.

September 9, 1521.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther rejects the advice of Erasmus and Capito that moderation and peaceableness must be practiced. About his condition. He wishes that Melanchthon be persuaded to preach.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. The address of the same is no longer available. Printed in Aurifer, Vol. I, p. 355 d; in De Wette, Vol. II, p. 48 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 229.

Jesus.

Hail! Neither Capito's nor Erasmus' judgment moves me in the least. They do not act differently than I have long thought of them; indeed, I have also feared that I would one day have to deal with one of them, since I see that Erasmus is far from the knowledge of grace, since in all his writings he has not the cross but peace in mind. Therefore, he thinks that everything is to be treated and carried out in a polite manner and with a certain friendly benevolence; but Behemoth 2) does not care about that, and nothing improves from it.

I remember that when he said about himself in his preface to the New Testament: A Christian easily despises honor, I thought in my heart: O Erasmus, I fear you are mistaken. It is a great thing to despise honor. But he wanted to despise it in such a way that the contempt would not have been inflicted on him by others, but he would have thought the same only in himself. But the contempt of honor, if it be in words, is nothing; much less if it should be in thoughts to me, but, as Paul says, "the kingdom of GOD standeth in power" [1 Cor. 4:20.]. Therefore, I have not yet dared to boast of any thing, nor can I, except the word of truth which the Lord has given me.

(3) Therefore, the writings of those people are all inconsequential to each other, because they refrain from scolding, biting, and giving offense. For when the popes politely reminded they think they are being flattered, and, as if they had a right to be incorrigible, they persist, satisfied that they are to be feared and that no one dares to punish them. These people are depicted by your Plutarch in the booklet of flattery; but in a more serious and frightening way Jeremiah's [Cap. 47, 10.]: "Cursed be he that doeth the work of the LORD carelessly," for he speaks of your works of the sword against the enemies of God. And I fear greatly, and am afraid in my conscience, that, yielding to thy counsel and that of my friends, I have subdued my spirit at Worms, and have not shown myself to those idols as an Elias. They would hear other things if I were placed before them again. But enough of that.

2) Job 40, 10. Siebe St. Louis edition, vol. VIII, 1729 Luther's marginal gloss.

The elder Duke John finally knows where I am; he did not know until now. My host has secretly revealed it to him, but he will probably keep it quiet. I am doing well here, but I am sluggish and dull, and as a wretched man I am quite cold in spirit. Today, on the sixth day, I had a bowel movement of such hardness that I almost breathed out my soul. Now I sit in pain like a child beggar, torn, wounded and bloody, and will have little or no rest this night.

5. be thankful to Christ, who does not leave me without the remains of the holy cross. I would be healed from all soreness if the body were open. For what heals in four days is wounded anew when I defecate. I write this not so that you may pity me, but that you may wish me happiness and pray that I may be worthy to be fervent in spirit. For it is time to pray with all our strength against Satan, for he is planning to cause a sorrowful tragedy against Germany, and I fear that the Lord may allow him to do so.

(6) I am still sleepy and idle to pray and resist, that I am very displeased and a burden to myself, perhaps because I am alone and you do not assist me. I beg you, let us pray and watch so that we do not fall into temptation. I have nothing else to write now. You know everything about everything.

7. I am glad that Wittenberg is increasing, mainly because it grows in my absence, so that the wicked sees it and clenches his teeth, and what he would like is lost [Ps. 112:10]. Let Christ accomplish what he has begun. I would very much like Philip to preach to the common people somewhere in the city on the feast days after midday, instead of drinking and gambling, so that it would become a habit to introduce freedom and restore it according to the form and customs of the first church.

8. for when we have broken all the rights of men, and thrown off their yoke, what care we whether he be not anointed, not circumcised, and a husband? He is in truth nevertheless a priest, and indeed gives a priest, unless the teaching of the word be not the office of a priest. Otherwise Christ would not be a priest either, who taught in schools, in ships, on the shore, on mountains, and even alone in all places and at all hours.

(9) Therefore, since he [Philip] is called by GOD and exercises the ministry of the word, as no one can deny, what is the matter if he is not called by these tyrants, the bishops, not of the churches, but of the horses, and of the courtiers? But I know the mind of man; he will not obey my coaxings. Therefore he must be called and urged by the commandment and the doings of the whole church. For if she demands and requires it, he must not and cannot refuse it.

(10) If I were present, I would certainly work with the council and the people to ask him to read the Gospel to them privately in German, as he began to do in Latin, so that he would gradually become a German bishop as he has become a Latin bishop, and I would like you to make an effort to see that this happens. For the people need the word of God above all. Since this is abundantly present in him [Melanchthon] before others, you also see that, since our conscience urges us to do so and God demands it, we are obligated to call him, so that the Word is not deprived of its fruit.

(11) You will be able to do this very well through Lucas and Christian 1) in the council, so that in this way Christ will also replace my absence and my silence with his [Melanchthon's] preaching and sound, to put Satan and his apostles to shame. Origen taught the women privately: why should he not also undertake something like this, since he can and should do it? especially since the people thirst for it and desire it.

(12) Dear one, do not be moved by his excuses; he will present the most beautiful fig leaves, as is also fitting for him. For he shall not seek it, but he must be urged and called by the church, yea, asked, that he may serve, and not do that which is profitable for him, but for many. I beg you to do this above all things most diligently, and take friends to help you, who will promote this together with you. And now live well, and remember me by the Lord. From the desert, on the day after the Nativity of the Virgin Mary [September 9, 1521]. Yours, Martin Luther.

No. 77.

(Wartburg.)

July 15, 1521.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther feels relieved by medicine; disapproves of the prevention of the disputation from confession; dislikes the fact that his whereabouts are betrayed, and wants to go to Erfurt because of his illness.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 340 b; in De Wette, Vol. II, p. 29 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 199.

His in the Lord, Mr. Georg Spalatin, court preacher of the Duke of Saxony, his friend and master.

JEsus.

1st Hail! I have at last received everything, my dear Spalatin, and have tried the pill medicine, according to prescription, and have soon had opening and a bowel movement without blood and constraint, but it does not yet stand well with the flesh, which is bruised and sore from the former tearing; indeed, I have not wavy pain suffered because either the vehemence of the pills or I do not know what kind of accident drove out the anus. I want to wait again.

I like everything you write about Wittenberg, 2) and thanks be to Christ, who has awakened others for me, so that I realize that I am no longer needed, only that Philip, who gives in too much to his emotions, bears the cross with greater impatience than befits a disciple, let alone such a great master of such great people. You see to it that you take care of him, that the most illustrious prince does not let him suffer any lack in his hall being. I am displeased that the disputation was prevented by the confession, for it would have been a useful example against the raging of the papists, so that they would know in what fear the Wittenbergers would have fallen through my absence, since they dared such things without me.

Amsdorf writes that a certain scribe of Duke John wrote to a woman in Torgau that I was in the castle at Wartburg (Wartpergae), therefore a rumor had arisen, indeed, had been spread everywhere. This rumor will be believed because it came from the court, may the latter have really known it or only suspected it, so that we have kept this matter hidden in vain with such great luck. This is how Satan, who has been chasing us, betrays the matter.

4 But I hear from my landlord that this is all too firmly asserted everywhere, so that the matter can now no longer be concealed, although we are still bravely keeping it secret, unwilling that our faithful and happy effort should be so carelessly thwarted. By the way, I am well in body and quite lively in spirit, so that Philip is vainly dreaming up dreams about me. If the illness does not subside, I will go to Erfurt to use doctors.

5. that Carl is attacked with wars, 3)

2) Spalatin came to Wittenberg with the Elector of Coburg and stayed there for about ten days, until July 4. During this time, reforms were made at the university.

3) Luther means the uprising of the Comuneros in Spain and the war with Francis I of France.

1) "Lucas" is Cranach; "Christian" is Döring.

is not to be wondered at; he will never have anything that goes out to him happily, and he will have to suffer the punishment of foreign ungodliness, the unhappy youth, because at Worms, when he had wicked counselors, he thrust truth so back in his face, and he will also involve Germany in his misfortune, because she consented to his ungodliness; but the Lord will know his own [2 Tim. 2:19.]

(6) I have seen the decree of the Parisian sophists with Philip's protective writing, and I rejoice with all my heart. For Christ would not have blinded them so much if he had not decided to advise them and begin to put an end to the tyranny of those people. I have previously sent the writing against Latomus 1) to the press. I have nothing else to write, I am finally a true hermit, so be well. On the day of the division of the apostles [July 15] 1521.

Martin Luther.

No. 78.

Wartburg.

July 31, 1521.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther wants to use a trick to deceive his adversaries about his hidden whereabouts.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 342; in De Wette, Vol. II, p. 32 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 203.

To the Lord George Spalatin, Christ's disciple, his most holy in the Lord.

Jesus.

Hail! The plague has prevented me from going to Erfurt in the meantime, my dear Spalatin. And I do not see what danger there would be if there were an opportunity for me to stay there for a while. For this reason, I would not leave Wittenberg; indeed, if I taught elsewhere, it would be the same as if I taught at Wittenberg, since Christ is everywhere, although I am not looking for a chair or a pulpit, nor will I go anywhere with the intention, unless I have been strongly called to do so. For I know that the teacher is not of God, who comes of his own free will. Until now I have fled the office of teaching; no one expects me to be otherwise minded; I will always flee it. For if I had sought it, I would never have consented to go into this solitude.

Jonas 2) writes that he has good hope with regard to the papal decrees; you see that the spirit can accomplish it by using your cooperation. But it is beyond my powers what you desire, that I alone should prescribe the establishment of the Christian school of learning 3); this matter requires the advice and judgment of many people. You have an abundance of people in Wittenberg who can do this.

It would be best if the entire papal law were completely excluded, then that the princes finally took heart and completely abolished this jurisdiction and the church punishments (censuras) in their countries. For something must be dared if we are to do something great and salutary. For if this divinely predatory jurisdiction is not abolished and lies low, who can then exclude the right of the papal poison? Thus my host has begun in the best way by forbidding the church punishments. 4) If the princes do not want to do this in their own name, they should see through their fingers that this is done by their princes and judges, so that it may gradually arise throughout the world that no one can be punished according to the rights of the pope, but that everything is settled according to the customs and traditions of the countries.

4. my health is such that I have had a lighter opening, driven by the strong and powerful medicines, but the nature of the digestion does not change, and the soreness persists, which I suspect will turn into an even greater malady.

2) Jonas, who had now moved to Wittenberg, had already asked the Elector on June 19 to release him from the obligation to read canon law (Kawerau, Jonasbriefe, No. 54 ff.). He was allowed to hire Johann Schwertfeger for himself.

3) It was about the reform of the university.

4) By resisting the execution of the ban against Luther.

1) See St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 36.

I will be smitten by the Lord according to his truth.

You will see to it that what I send here as the remainder of the postilla is added to the previous one and printed in Wittenberg before anything else. For I will hurry so that we can send out the whole ten Gospels as one book; I will postpone four Sundays and add the rest. I do this so that a book that is too large will not scare off readers and buyers, and at the same time so that in the meantime one has something to learn. Fare well in Christ and pray for me. From the desert, on the day before Peter's chain celebration [July 31] 1521.

Martin Luther.

No. 79.

Wartburg.

May 26, 1521.

Luther to Melanchthon.

News about Luther's works, especially about the writing against Latomus. Statements about events in Wittenberg, especially Feldkirch's marriage. Reassurances and exhortations. Request for news, orders, greetings 2c. Luther sends the interpretation of the 68th Psalm.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 329 d; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 8 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 162.

To Philipp Melanchthon, the theologian, teacher of the church in Wittenberg, his exceedingly dear brother in Christ.

Jesus.

Hail! What I wrote in this already sealed letter 1) I have forgotten, my dear Philip, but I wanted to answer your letter anew. I do not like to reply to the writing of Jacob Latomus, because I have now turned my mind to quiet studies, and I see that it is necessary for me to reply myself; in addition, there is the annoyance of reading his writing, which is so rambling and badly written. I had decided to translate the interpretations of the epistles and gospels into German, but you did not send me the postils printed there.

I send the psalm, 2) which is in these

1) Perhaps the fragment No. 584 in this volume (De Wette).

2) This is the 68th Psalm, St. Louis edition, vol. V, 656. See the note there.

Holidays has been sung. You can have it printed, if you want, and the presses have nothing to do, and attribute it to whom you want, because I have edited it, because I had nothing to do and was without books. But if it seems good to you otherwise, you can share it with your friends and give it to Christian Aurifaber 3) to read, or give it to Amsdorf.

I begrudge D. Lupinus, 4) that he has had a happy outcome from this life; after all, God did not want us to live in the same. So great is the wrath of God, which I contemplate more and more every day, since I have nothing to do, that I doubt whether He will protect any adult, apart from the children, from this kingdom of Satan; our God has even abandoned us. But I was not a little moved by his departure, because I looked at the word of Isaiah [Cap. 57, 1.]: "The righteous perishes, and there is no one to take it to heart, and holy men are raised up, and no one pays attention to it."

I would like to know who that Franciscus Faber Silesius 5) is, the heroic head. For the play about the Emser's goat 6) sufficiently shows its original authors. I like the Passional 7) in picture and image quite extraordinarily. I see that Johann Schwertfeger helped you with this work. Our Oecolampad has preceded the Sermon of Confession 8) by publishing the very frank Book 9) of the Ease of Confession, which will also be a new plague to the Antichrist and his fighters. If I had not hoped that it had been sent to you by Spalatin, or that it should be sent to you, I would have sent it to you together.

3) Christian Döring, goldsmith and publisher.

4) Actually Peter Wolf von Radheim, Doctor of Philosophy and Theology, canon in Wittenberg, died on May 1, 1521.

5) He is inscribed under the above name in 1520 as poeta in Anis in Leipzig. Later he was a town clerk in Breslau. He wrote: Silva de incendio Luthorianorum ludorum. 1520. 4.

6) Lucius in Oapruin Lmsorianuin, 1 sheet in quarto, published at Wittenberg 1521. In it a conversation between Oapor and Linpusa and various poems on Emser.

7) St. Louis edition, vol. XIV, 186 ff.

8) St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 814.

9) Huod non sit onorosa odristianis eonkossio, Paradoxon doannis Ooeolamxadii. Lasii. 1521.

with Hutten's letter, which he addressed to the Wiedehopfe with bishop's caps and cardinal's hats at Worms, 1) have themselves sent to you. But I will myself, if I can, also add something about the same [the confession] in German.

The new husband at Kemberg 2) is wonderful to me, since he fears nothing and has hastened even in this turbulent time. May the Lord rule him and mix his pleasures with his bitter salts [2 Mos. 12, 8.], which will also happen without my prayer. I am displeased that your Methodus 3) has not come together as far as it is printed. I wish to know who rules my pulpit. Whether Amsdorf still snores and is idle. May the Lord preserve and increase what you write about the good progress of the studies, amen.

I do not want you to be in the least distressed on my account. If you look at my person, everything is fine, except that the complaint of the mind has not yet disappeared, and that the former weakness of spirit and faith still persists; but my life in seclusion (xxxxxxx) is nothing at all, and since I have never dealt with the action of the Word according to my will, I am now excluded from it to the great satisfaction of my heart. And so it stands as far as I am concerned.

6 By the way, for the honor of the word and the mutual strengthening of others and myself, I would rather burn under living coals than rot alone half-dead and, God grant, not dead. But who knows whether Christ does not want to do more through this counsel, not only in this matter, but also in all matters?

We have often spoken of faith and the hope of things not seen [Heb 11:1]. Well, let us at least try out this doctrine in something, since this happens to us through God's calling, not through our temptation. Even if I perish, nothing will be lost to the gospel.

In this you will far surpass me and follow Elijah as an Elisha with a twofold spirit, which may the Lord Jesus graciously bestow upon you, amen.

8. therefore see that ye be not grieved, but sing the song which the LORD hath commanded by night [Ps. 42:9, Vulg]; I also will sing; let us only be anxious for the word. Whoever is ignorant, let him be ignorant; whoever is lost, let him be lost, if only they cannot complain that they lacked our ministry. Let the Leipzigers boast, for this is their hour [Luc. 22, 53.]; we must go out from our country, from our friendship, from our father's house, and separate from one another for a time, going sund to a land which we do not know [4 Mos. 12, 1.]. Meanwhile, those may worship and praise their N. N. 4). Jacob, the Fleming, 5) it is enough that he sees you, and don't you want 6) him to be overjoyed by seeing everything he would like.

I have not given up hope of returning to you, but in such a way that God will do what is good in His eyes. When the pope will attack all those who stand with me, Germany will not be without unrest, and the sooner he will undertake this, the sooner he himself and also his own will perish, and I will return. GOD awakens the spirit of many, and even the hearts of the common people, so that it is not likely to me that this thing can be subdued by force, or if one starts to subdue it, it will become ten times greater. Germany has many Karsthansen. 7)

10. murner is silent; 8) what that goat will do

4) Duke George.

5) Jakob Probst.

-Flamelands.

6) In all editions vis ne; we have assumed visus. De bet conjicit: vide n6.

7) Karsthansen - peasants. Here it is used with reference to a satirical writing "Karsthans" published in 1520, which was directed against Murner's book to the German nobility. In it Karsthans appears as a representative of all enemies of the clergy. Hütten is considered to be the author.

8) After the writing to the nobility he had let hear nothing more from him, although he had threatened with many writings.-The "Bock" is Emser. - "Ortwin" is the main hero in the Bröfen of the Dark Men; actually Ortwinus Gratius (de Graes), Reuchlin's opponent.

1) No. 566 in this volume.

2) Bartholomäus Bernhards von Feldkirch, provost at Kemberg.

3) The Locieominunes.

I don't know, maybe he will become a second Orwin. There is one thing I do not believe, namely that you write that you are astray without a shepherd. For that would be the most grievous and bitter thing you could hear. Because as long as you, Amsdorf and others are there, you are not without shepherds. Do not talk like that, lest God be angry and we be found ungrateful. Oh, God would that all churches, at least collegiate churches, 1) had the fourth part in the Word and ministers of the Word that you have. Give thanks to the Lord, who has enlightened you. Behold, I have made many words.

11) The Cardinal of Mainz 2) is said to have 1800 sworn enemies against him, and D. Schifer 3) is said to be suffering from a severe fever; others say that he died. A certain bishop 4) has fallen, that is, he has perished at Worms, who was extraordinarily hostile to Luther. I have nothing more [to write], since I am a hermit, a hermit and in truth a monk (monachus - living alone), but without plate and cap; you would see a knight and hardly recognize me.

12) Tell Amsdorf that the pastor at Hersfeld, 5) a very good man, as the rumor goes, has also married, so that you do not have your newly married provost alone; then that he suffers that the one in Peter Lupinus' place was preferred to him. Oh about the children of Adam! But it is good that his righteous and free spirit has been the cause of such great harm to him, while another spirit has been the cause of such great gain to him. Our merits are hidden, but allotted. The reward finally reveals the counsel of the heart. For the provost of Kemberg, I fear that he will be may be driven out and then suffer want with a twofold body and as many bodies as may still come from it. But if he keeps faith, the Lord lives, the shepherd of all, who also does not let a bird go hungry.

(13) You will greet him and cheer him, and I want you to rejoice and boast with all of them. I cannot tell how great a favor you will do me and also please God, but do Satan and Satan's scales the burned sorrow. Your sadness is the greatest evil for me, your joy is also mine. And so be at ease in the Lord, whom I confidently hope you will command me, and I too, as much as I can, am not unmindful of you. Protect the church of the Lord, in which the Holy Spirit has made you bishops [Acts 20:28], not bishops' larvae.

14. greet all in my name, for you are many (the M. Eisleben greet not, nor the "fat Flemmichen", for to these I write): Johann Schwertfeger, Peter Suaven 6) and your whole household, Heinrich von Zütphen, 7) and all brothers; to the prior I have written; Master Lucas and Christian, D. Eschhausen 8) and all who appear to you. Look at the shameful paper that I had to take out of necessity. Again, be well. Among the birds that sing sweetly from the branches and praise God day and night with all their might. On the Sunday of Trinity [May 26] 1521.

Your Martinus.

1) Churches that have a chapter or collegium of canons (canons, canons).

2) Archbishop Albrecht of Mainz had received the cardinal dignity at the Imperial Diet in Augsburg in 1518. See No. 175 in this volume.

3) Guillermo of Croy, Duke of Sora, Lord of Chevres, the imperial minister, died on May 27.

4) Aloisius Marlianus, bishop of Tuy in Spain, died at Worms in early May.

5) According to Hassenkamp, Hessian Reformation History, Heinrich Fuchs.

6) Luther's companion to the Leipzig Disputation and to Worms, a disciple of Mosellan; then reforming in Stolpen in Pomerania in 1522, imprisoned by Duke Boguslaf in 1523, but soon released; then professor in Greisswald, finally secretary and councillor of Frederick I of Denmark, who often used him for confidential missions to France.

7) He had been deprived of his priory at the beginning of 1520 at the instigation of the Dordrecht authorities because of a popular outpouring directed against the Dominicans and sent to the Augustinian monastery in Antwerp, from where, however, he went in November to Cologne and then to Wittenberg to complete his studies.

8) D. Theodor Eschhaus or Eschhausen was a professor of medicine; on Nov. 18, 1524, Luther recommended him to replace the departing Stagmann; in 1527 he was still Luther's family physician; in 1528 Agricola (Sprüchwörter, p. 6) calls him a man of 90 years.

No. 80.

(Wartburg.)

November 11, 1521.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther is unwilling that the court wants to prevent him from writing against the Archbishop of Mainz because of the renewed indulgences in Halle, declares his firm will not to be hindered, and sends the finished writing. He refuses the request to write a new consolation writing and announces his writing against the monastic vows.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 364; in De Wette, Vol. II, p. 94 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 246.

To the Lord George Spalatin, the disciple of Christ, his friend in the faith.

JESUS.

Hail! I have hardly read a more unpleasant letter than this last one of yours, so that I had not only postponed it, but also decided not to answer you. First of all, I will not tolerate what you say, that the prince will not suffer it to be written against the Mainzer, nor what could disturb the public peace: I would rather lose you, yes, also the prince and all creatures. For if I have resisted his creator, the pope, why should I yield to his creature?

Do you think that the public peace must not be disturbed, and do you want to suffer that the eternal peace of God will be disturbed by the ungodly and god-robbing effects that this man carries out? Not so, Spalatin, not so, Prince, but for the sake of Christ's sheep, one must with all one's strength resist this exceedingly atrocious wolf, as an example to others. Therefore, I am sending the booklet against him, which was already finished when your letter arrived, by which I was not moved to change anything, although I had left it to Philip's judgment that he might change what he thought good. Be careful, therefore, that you do not withhold the book from Philip or dissuade him from it; it is certain that you will not be heard.

(3) But that we with our own have to suffer evil talk, either from the adversaries or from people who are too worldly wise in divine things, you should not be moved by this, since you know that Christ and the apostles have not pleased the people. For I do not yet hear that ours are accused of any shameful deed, but only of contempt for ungodliness and shameful teachings; although I do not like the unrest of the young people who have received the messenger of Antony badly; 1) but who can put a rein on everyone in every place and at every time?

4 Do they never commit evil? The disciples also had to bear the disgrace of Judas Iscariot, and the wicked are borne daily in the communities. But we are the ones who are asked not to mock even a dog. I beg you, do not expect us to apologize against all individuals who do not like Wittenberg, because what would be more impossible?

5 For this reason the gospel will not fall away if some of us fall short of moral conduct; but those who turn away from the word for this cause have not clung to the word, but to the glory of the word. He who clings to the word for the word's sake, even if the gates of hell tear him away, will not be torn away from it; he who is turned away, let him be turned away after all. Why does he not look at what is better and stronger among us? why does he look at what is worse and weaker? are Philip and his people accused of this offense? Why do they condemn all for the sake of one part? It is a lesser sin to hiss out an ungodly preacher than to faithfully accept his teaching; this sin is praised, that one is highly exalted as in vain. And these judges, this equity do you fear, that you think the gospel will fall away because of this smoke?

6) I confirm the abbatial Mass by this book, 2) which I am sending. I have not been able to write the consolation, nor do I see that it is necessary, since I have written the same counterpart.

1) When on October 5 and 6 the Antonian court at Lichtenberg sent the so-called Antonius messenger to Wittenberg to collect alms, the students mocked him, threw dung and stones at him, and he could not carry out his mission.

2) St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 1068.

Why do you not give it to him to read? Or why do you not rather inculcate in him the Evangelia and the Passion of Christ, which is the most powerful consolation of all? Should I write a new book of consolation for every single case? What would the adversaries say? At the same time I hope that the consolation of Philip 2) will be sufficient, since I assume that in the meantime the affliction of his mind has subsided, so that my consolation writing comes too slowly and is already useless, and also there is no danger of ungodliness, so that it would not be safe to postpone it or leave it undone; but here there is present danger and ruin of souls in the subject on which I am working.

For now I intend to attack also the monastic vows 3) and to free the young people from the hell of the celibate life, which is most impure and damnable by rut and rivers. Partly I write this as a challenged one, partly as an indignant one; you will interpret it for the best. For it is not One Satan with me, or rather against me, that I am alone, but at times not alone. Farewell, therefore, and greet all of us. I had previously written the last letter to Gerbel and everything was locked up and sealed. On the day of St. Martin's [November 11, 1521. Yours, Martin Luther.

No. 81.

Wartburg.

[July 13]⁴) 1521.

Luther to Amsdorf.

Luther wishes Amsdorf luck in increasing his income and indicates to him that he wants to leave solitude because of illness. He instructs him how to answer the Emser.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 338 b; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 26 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 195.

Jesus.

I wish you luck that your income has been increased by the priesthood at Schmölln 5), my dear Licentiate, and may you prosper. But that that scribe has started the rumor that I am at Wartburg (in Wartperg), let that go. For the princes themselves do not know where I am, much less that scribe. By the way, I will be in Erfurt soon, and perhaps before this letter comes to you, for the sake of my illness. There I will appear in public, if they will tolerate me at least for a while.

Philip has written that you will answer Emser, 6) if it suits me; but I fear that he is not worthy to have you as an answerer. Again, I fear, since he is full of Satan, that he would laugh and mock if one of the young people answered him. For the spirit that rages within him does nothing but seek words to mock at, while he sets aside the matter itself. Whatever happens, when you answer him, be on your guard, so that you know that you are talking to a completely unworthy spirit, not to a human being. For he himself understands nothing of what he speaks, but the spirit that drives him to rage through a long disease of spite, and he speaks everything only to provoke and mock.

3. Therefore it is necessary to write against him in the most simple way, and to fortify everything in advance with caution, so that Satan may not get hold of words or an occasion, so that, even if not he himself (of which one must despair), nevertheless everyone, no matter how unlearned, may see that he has spoken nothing to the matter, since he proves by sayings of the fathers that there are priests, 7) while I had brought forward the Scripture, namely, that he is babbling in vain: "Step forward, you holy one" 2c. For I have in my little book

1) Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. X, 1816.

2) In the second half of September, Spalatin had asked Melancthon to write a consolation text for the Elector (Oorx. I Lsk. I, No. 135), but the latter rejected it and referred him to Luther.

3) In the writing "of the spiritual and monastic vows," St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 1500.

4) This letter was probably written and sent at the same time as the one in No. 75 in this appendix, because Luther, as the end of that letter shows, had written it earlier, but dated it only when he sent it.

5) near Altenburg.

6) This did not happen, but Luther himself had to answer by the scripture: "Widerspruch seines Irrthum" 2c. St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 1352.

7) Emser had sought to prove the difference of the priests and the laity from the Fathers.

claims that from the fathers the kind of people are called priests, which he tries to point out in vain. 1)

Therefore the passage of Peter [1 Ep. 2, 6-10], likewise Revelation 5 [v. 9 f.] and 20 [v. 6] must be treated with the foregoing and the circumstances] 2) and made a mockery of the devil, that he brings forward a passage of Scripture in which it is proved that they are called priests, as I also mocked before in the same book. Then this must be ridiculed, that he wants the priests to be proved by the word [Matth. 5,13.]: "You are the salt of the earth", 3) as if salt and priests were the same thing, which is known by the children in the schools who read the Vocabularium Ex quo 4). Next, that the prestige of the fathers is clearly nullified by the apostle [1 Thess. 5,21.]: "Test everything"; likewise by Augustine, dist. IX, c. Noli; likewise by the word of Jerome on Matth. 23: "What is not valid from Scripture is as easily despised as it is put forward. But that 5) you should not believe the fathers further than they themselves wanted to be believed, that is, only the passages of Scripture that they have cited.

5 Therefore the foolish mind does not even understand the subject of his book, since it is argued, not what the fathers said, but why they said it, so that the reader may know that it is something else "to say" and something else "to believe"; and that we do not argue from the saying, but from the believing of what the fathers have said: so far be this blasphemous mouth from its own aim (scopo).

6. other things ye shall see; only doubt not that the evil spirit speaketh out of him as out of his buttocks, which he hath rightly possessed, who alone dealeth by departing from the matter, and multiplying his blasphemies by many books. It is clear the evil spirit, but this one thing is lacking in his wickedness, that he possesses and occupies a stupid, dull and unlearned vessel, although he likewise, as unworthy as he is, by his raging impetuosity sufficiently demonstrates how he is decided by the Scriptures and has nothing that he can duly bring forward for his kingdom in the parishioners. And that hurts this Satan.

(7) I say this so that you may write against him with a contemptuous and calm mind, and not be provoked as against a man. For by this contempt (but in such a way that you provoke him by mockery and convict him of foolishness) you will provoke and torment the hope of the exceedingly proud spirit in an unbelievable way, so that he will spew out much more blasphemies and give himself away.

If I had known sooner that he was possessed by an evil spirit, I would have cast out the devil quite nicely, even though I have plagued him enough so unawares. But if he should write in Latin, as he promises, then I will do what I have not yet done. It seemed to me that Peter Suaven was suitable for this, but because he had already been dragged around by the Leipzigers before, it seems to me that one should not give the devil an opportunity for the old rage against him, because the sneering devil would certainly bring up this example against him again.

(9) Praise be to God, who has not only given us this battle against the evil spirits, but has also revealed to us that it is not flesh or blood by which we are attacked in this matter. Therefore be of good cheer and rejoice. He who threw out the prince of this world does not fear the one who was thrown out, whom he despised when he was to be thrown out. He reigns and will

1) For understanding, compare the beginning of Luther's writing, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 1354.

2) Set by us instead of a gap. Aurifaber has on the side: Ossunt MLsdLM verka.

3) See Luther's "Contradiction" 2c. St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 1356 f.

4) The Vocabularium Lx yuo is a much-used textbook at the time, an excerpt from des 4obauui8 6s 4auua (John Balbi of Genoa c. 1286), orckiuils praockieatoruii, 8ururua, yuas vocatur Oatbolicou. MoZunt. 1460. it takes its name from the opening words of the preface: üx yuo vocabularü varü autontici etc.. The content is lappish, e.g. to sal it says: „8a1 saltz. Lt äicitur a salio, quia galtst in iZns. 8al iä 6kt gaxisntia Weyßheyt. unäs aeeips 8al 8apisntis." To gaesräog: „8ae6räo8 ^uagi gaera "lang vsl (ioeeng, huia larZug äsdst esse a priest, aaesr<loti88a uxor 6jug." 5) Aurifaber: quo<Z. De Wette and after him the Erlanger Briefwechsel: quo.

reign in us sinners and his fools, while Satan rages in the wise and his righteous.

10. I now desire to be a disciple in Hebrew 1) but also of Philip in Colossians. Thanks be to Christ who has made us so rich through the unspeakable gift of his word. I rejoice so much in your abundance that I can easily bear my absence. For I see that I am not in need of you, but that I am in need of you. Farewell and pray for me. An unpleasant and distressing rumor has come to us about Günther Staupitz 2), but I hope that there is nothing to it. May the Lord avert such evil from this house, amen. From my desert, 1521.

Martin Luther.

No. 82.

Wartburg.

December 18, 1521.

Luther to Joh. Lang.

Luther wants to translate the New Testament. Lang is already busy with it, and Luther encourages him to continue.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 295 d (with the wrong year: 1520); in De Wette, vol. II, p. 115 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 256.

To his extremely dear Johann Lang, Augustinian friar, Christian ecclesiastical priest at Erfurt, Martin Luther. 3)

I do not approve of this noisy departure 4); they could have parted from each other peacefully and in friendship. You will be at the meeting 5); see to it that you do not

1) Aurogallus taught Hebrew at that time.

2) Compare No. 44 of this appendix, § 7.

3) Here, Aurifaber also omits the usual caption: "JEsus", which De Wette and the Erlangen edition, from their second volume on, have omitted in order to save space. Soon after the beginning of the year 1523, Aurifaber also leaves it out.

4) It is meant the departure of the monks from the Augustinian monastery. Kolde, Augustinercongregation, p. 375, note 3.

5) Around Epiphany 1522, a convention of Augustinians from Saxony, Thuringia and Meissen met in Wittenberg under the presidency of Link, at which the vows were declared no longer binding and the resignation from the monastery was made optional. The resolutions of the convention are found in Corpus Reformatorum, Vol. I, p. 456 (but find to be set only at the end of Decembers). .

You favor and defend the party of the gospel. I will remain hidden here until Easter. In the meantime, I will compile the postils and translate the New Testament into German, which I hear you are also engaged in. 6) Continue as you have begun. If only God would have every single city have its interpreter, and only this book would dwell in everyone's mouth, hand, eyes, ears and heart. You will hear other things from the Wittenbergers. I am well in body and well provided for, but I am plagued by sins and also by temptations. Pray for me and live well. From the desert, Wednesday after Lucia [18 December] 1521.

Your Martin Luther.

No. 83.

Wittenberg.

March 30, 1522.

Luther to Spalatin in Lochau.

Luther is working with Melanchthon to polish the translation of the New Testament that he made, and asks Spalatin's help, especially for the names of the gems. He has the writing "to take of both forms of the Sacrament" under his hands.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 55; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 176 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 324.

To Georg Spalatin, evangelist at Lochau.

JEsus.

1st Hail! Here you have the letter you wanted, my dear Spalatin. But what I wrote to Duke John Frederick, 7) I do not fully remember, only that I am certain that I taught that he would not make innovations in anything, unless this could be done without the annoyance of the weak, so that he would prefer love to all things. I have also written the same teaching to Duke Carl 8).

2. I had not only the Gospel of John, but the whole New Testament.

6) Longitudinal translation of Matthew had already appeared in June, but Luther had not heard anything about it.

7) In the letter Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. X, 2226.

8) Duke Carl von Münsterberg. Compare No. 662 in this volume.

in my Patmos, but now we, Philip and I, have begun to polish everything, and it will (God willing) become a worthy work; but we also want to use your help from time to time to put the words in a suitable way. Therefore, be ready, but in such a way that you give us simple, not castle and court words, for this book wants to be made bright through simplicity. And, to begin, see that you give us both the names and the colors of the precious stones of Revelation 21, and, God grant it, give us the sight of them from the court or wherever you are able.

The work of evangelical communion 1) is in my hands. But if this matter should cause me much trouble, I fear nothing; Christ lives, and for His sake one must not only become a good smell, to some to death and to others to life [2 Cor. 2:16], but also be killed [Rom. 8:36]. Farewell and greet all at court. From Wittenberg, Sunday Lätare [March 30] 1522.

Martin Luther.

No. 84.

(Wittenberg.)

May 10, 1522.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther sends a sample of the Bible translation, awaits the sending of the gems, and asks to use them because of a domestic matter of the monastery.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 63; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 195 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 358.

To the learned and godly man, Georg Spalatin, ducal evangelist, his [friend] in Christ.

Jesus.

Hail! I am sending you the sample of our new Bible, 2) but in such a way that you keep it so that it will not be spread. I am waiting for the gems 3); they are to be faithfully preserved and sent back. By the way, I ask that you will

1) The writing "to take of both forms of the Sacrament" 2c., St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 62.

2) The first sheets of the so-called September edition of "Das Neue Testament. Deutzsch. Vuittemberg".

3) See No. 83 of this appendix, § 2.

Bernhard Hirschfeld that he intercede for me with the most illustrious prince for some malt (I do not know how much) which our prior owes, and for which I have become guarantor, that he may not collect it before we can pay, because the interest is not given to us, and we, having given up begging, have now become poorer by 300 florins annually. "There is nothing left here but love and friendship." We live on the future, on the future we will die. 4) Fare well and respond well. On the Saturday after Misericordias Domini [May 10] 1522.

Martin Luther.

No. 85.

(Wartburg.)

January 13, 1522.

Luther to Amsdorf.

Luther expresses his opinion about the sleep of souls and about purgatory, which he still accepts in a certain way. He is pleased about Carlstadt's wedding, announces his Bible translation, and, in order to finish the Old Testament, wants to stay in hiding in Wittenberg. Last of the Zwickau prophets.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 44 d; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 122 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 269.

To the reverend Nicolaus Amsdorf, licentiate of sacred theology and canon of Wittenberg 2c.

Jesus.

I have nothing reliable to answer you about your souls. I am inclined to agree with your opinion that the souls of the righteous sleep and do not know where they are until the day of judgment. To this opinion I am drawn by the word of Scripture: "They sleep with their fathers" [2 Sam. 7, 12.]. And the dead, who were raised by Christ and the apostles, testify to the same thing, since they woke up from sleep and did not know where they had been. In addition to this, there are the raptures of many saints. And I have nothing, with which I could overturn this opinion. But whether this is generally valid for all souls, I do not dare to claim, because of the rapture of Paul, Elijah and Moses, who in any case did not appear on Mount Thabor for appearances. For who knows how God deals with the departed souls? Can He not let them sleep in turn, or as long as He wants, just as He puts those living in the flesh to sleep? Now the passage Luc. 16, 19. ff., about Abraham and Lazarus, although it does not enforce [a feeling] in general, nevertheless attributes a feeling to Abraham and Lazarus, and it is clumsy to interpret this to the day of judgment.

4) Due to defaulting debtors, namely Günther von Staupitz at Dabrun and Christoph von Bressen in Mutterwitz, the economic conditions of the monastery were often very bad.

(2) I think the same of the damned: that some can feel the punishments immediately after death, but some remain secluded until that day. For the reprobate [Luc. 16, 24.] confesses his torment, and the Psalm [Ps. 140, 12. Vulg.] says: "The unrighteous man shall be seized with evil in his doom"; unless you also want to draw this to the day of judgment or to the temporary frights of bodily death. Therefore my opinion is that this is uncertain, probably however that with few exceptions all sleep insensibly. Now see who the spirits in prison were, to whom, as Peter [1 Ep. 3, 19] writes, they were preached by Christ, whether they too were not able to sleep until that day. Jude [v. 7], however, says of the sodomites: "They suffer the eternal fire," speaking of the present.

(3) But of purgatory this is my opinion, not that I think it is a certain place, as the sophists invent, or that I think that all who remain outside of heaven and hell are in purgatory, for who could say that? since they can sleep between heaven, earth, hell, purgatory and all, as happens to the living in deep sleep, but that I hold that it is the torment called the foretaste of hell, which Christ, Moses, Abraham, David, Jacob, Job, Hezekiah and many others suffered. For since this is similar to hell, but temporal, it may now be called hell apart from

If it takes place in the body or in the body, then it is a purgatory for me, because we attach such a chastisement to purgatory. But since it is admitted in the body and is certain, it cannot be denied outside the body, although it cannot be proved, so that you will not be mistaken, whatever you may believe here. For even if you deny purgatory, you are not a heretic for this reason, because you do not deny that this pain is felt in the body and can be felt outside the body, but you deny that it [purgatory] is a certain place and that it is certain that it [pain] is felt outside the body. This I also deny; for those who feel it in the body are already not in the body at all, as far as life itself is concerned, for they are dead. Therefore it cannot be that you deny that this punishment is in this way outside the body. I have that much; if you have anything more, teach me.

4 Carlstadt's marriage pleases me greatly, I know the girl. May the Lord strengthen him as a good example to resist and reduce papal fornication, amen. I will deliver my small gift myself at his time after Easter. In the meantime, I will translate the Bible, although I have taken upon myself a burden beyond my strength. I see now what interpreting is and why it has not been attacked so far by anyone who confessed his name in it. But I will not be able to reach the Old Testament if you are not there and cooperate. Yes, if it could happen that I could have a secret room with any of you, I would come as soon as possible and with your help translate the whole thing from the beginning, so that it would become a worthy translation that would be read by the Christians; for I hope that we will give our Germany a better one than the Latins have. It is a great and worthy work, which we would all like to work on, since it is a public one, and should be dedicated to the common welfare. Answer about this what hope there is. I do not wish to be completely and totally hidden, since this is impossible, but to be known to want to be hidden, or not to know that I am to show myself [publicly]. For I believe that in this way both the fearful and the wicked will be satisfied when they realize that I want to be hidden.

The prophets of Zwickau 1) do not let yourselves be moved soon. You have the holy scriptures, Deut. 13 and 1 John 4,²) 1. which make you sure that you will not sin if you put them off and first test the spirits to see if they are of God. In the meantime, the Lord will tell you what to do. Of course, at first sight it is very suspicious to me that they boast of having conversations with the Majesty [of God]. More about this to Philip. Fare well and pray for me. On the eighth day after Epiphany [i.e. on the Octave, January 13] 1522. Yours, Martin Luther.

No. 86.

(Wittenberg.)

(After May 16, 1522.) 3)

Luther to Spalatin.

This letter contains, besides some small matters, the answer to several exegetical questions.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed by Aurifaber, Vol. II, p. 108; by De Wette, Vol. II, p. 273 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 365.

Seinein [Friends] in Christo, Georg Spalatin, Evangelists at Court.

JESus.

Grace and peace in the Lord! The petition of the pastor at Segren, which I have newly-

1) See about the same St. Louis edition, vol. XX, introduction, p. 10 d f.

2) In the Latin text: 1 Ioliumi. 5) That I John 4 is meant, however, is certain from the letter written to Melanchthon on the same day, No. 103 in this appendix, § 2.

3) On May 15, the requested gems from the Electoral Treasury had not yet arrived (De Wette II, 197 at the end of the letter). Here, at the beginning of the letter, the assumption is expressed that they had already arrived there again. Therefore, there must be at least several days between the two letters. De Wette has placed our letter "at the end of the year 1522", but it is not likely that the gems should have remained in Wittenberg from May to December. That this letter belongs to the time indicated by us is confirmed by the mention of the wounded forester and by the treatment of the passages from the Evangelio Johannis, which are mentioned in the above-mentioned letter. De Wette has erroneously placed the postscript to the same in the year 1523. Cf. SeidemmannDe Wette, vol. VI, p. 621; Burkhardt, p. 68.

I have forgotten, I send now. Of that wounded man in Resen, your locksmith has been told. The gems have also either come back, or Lucas, who has them, will bring them back.

About the questions:

a) 4) "To ask in Christ's name" [John 16:26.], is not to ask through ourselves, but through Christ as the Mediator. For thus Paul always asks urgently δι' αὐτοῦ [through Him, for His sake], for he excludes presumption on our merit. Then everything must be asked, and everything is granted, because every request includes the first three requests in the Lord's Prayer. Therefore, there can be neither asking nor giving where the name, the kingdom, the will of God is not preferred. Then, where it is doubtful whether it is according to His name, kingdom and will, our answer must be placed in the hands of His wisdom. Incidentally, where first of all one asks for his name, kingdom and will, it is impossible that all that is asked will not be heard for the sake of Christ.

2. b) "Do not touch me", writes John [Cap. 20, 17], who likes to deal with secret things, while others [Matth. 28, 9. Luc. 24, 39] write that she touched him. But Christ is touched in faith alone; because Magdalene was not yet touched with this, he does not suffer to be touched, as a sign of this unbelief. This is what he himself says: "For I have not yet ascended," that is, just as I have not yet ascended, so you do not yet believe that I am now living in a life different from the previous one. But elsewhere, where this mystery is not acted upon, he suffers to be touched.

3. c) The time when he does not speak in proverbs and when they will ask [Joh. 16, 25. 24.] is the time after the coming of the spirit. If you pay attention to the purpose (scopum), you will easily be able to answer many such things yourself. But this is the purpose, that the disciples before the suffering both asked and believed, and experienced all that they did afterwards, but the faith of the ascend-.

4) Here we have been forced to use letters instead of numbers in the original.

They have not yet had the first resurrection and have only known the mortal Christ. You see, this is how it is in my case. Many have believed, since I alone handled the indulgence, and did not know that I would handle the papacy, the celibate state and everything that followed; therefore, many have resented the whole thing. If I could have predicted the future to them, I would have done what Christ does in this whole sermon of their future faith, prayer, knowledge and work 2c. He speaks of the faith to be perfected and the perfect faith and its works, that is, not of the milk (which they had before), but of the solid food.

4. d) The flight on the Sabbath and in the winter [Matth. 24, 20.], we think, is spoken literally, that is, that they do not want to flee at an inopportune time, as the flight was not permitted to them on the Sabbath [2 Mos. 16, 29.], and in the winter it is not appropriate.

5. e) This also resolves the fact that the disciples believe before the suffering that He came forth from the Father [Joh. 16, 30.], namely with the milk faith, but the glory of the resurrection they do not believe yet.

6. f. "To go forth from the Father," that is, for the Son to become man and appear in the world.

7. g) That "signs follow those who believe" (Marc. 16, 17) is certain when it is necessary. For even the apostles did not do signs everywhere and presumptuously, but in the need to establish the gospel, and even now, if we truly believe, we have the power to do signs. For that text alone implies that signs may be done, but does not command that they be done.

8. h) So also they received the Holy Spirit before the suffering and after the resurrection; as I said above about faith and prayer, I also answered about this matter before.

9. i) "Preach the gospel to all creatures" Marc. 16,15.), is to preach publicly to the whole world. See my postillon in the first epistle on Christmas Day. 1)

Fare well, for I am very swamped with business. Martin Luther.

I ask you to help what this Wenceslaus asks, that in Grimma the licentiousness of our bad Christians be controlled, who only want to be Christians by despising superstition.

No. 87.

(Wittenberg.) (About the beginning of June 1522.) 2)

Luther to Spalatin.

After several matters have been mentioned, he moves on to answering exegetical questions.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 135b; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 279 (set too late: "Probably in January 1523") and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 390.

To the Lord Georg Spalatin, evangelist and servant of Christ, his [friend] in the Lord.

Grace and peace in the Lord! Regarding the payment of the malt, 3) our prior and I ask that you give thanks to the most noble prince for us, but in such a way that he still has a place left for the heavenly recompense, although this is also given for free, and we owe everything for free.

I want you to know that the gems have been returned to Lucas, the painter, from whom I received them. 4)

2. to the questions: a) 5) "I have yet many things to say unto you" 2c. [Joh.16,12.) that he spoke only a few things to the disciples afterwards, this is the reason that they could not bear it. But after that he spoke through the Holy Spirit in their hearts what he had told them when he had

2) This letter is to be put approximately in this time. For firstly, thanks are expressed here for the payment of the malt, because of which Luther had turned to Spalatin in the letter of May 10 (No. 84 in this appendix). Secondly, Luther comes back again to the gems, of which he had written in No. 86 of this appendix, that they had been handed over to Lucas Cranach for return. Third. This letter, like the previous one, is one of those in which Luther answers questions about the Gospel of John. The letter of Kronberg will be the one of April 14, 1522, No. 508 in this volume.

3) Instead of drasii Aurifaber and after him De Wette offers: Brävü.

4) According to this sentence, it is also permissible that this letter is placed before No. 86 of this appendix.

5) Again, we have put letters instead of numbers in the original.

himself was present did not say, because they could not carry it at that time.

d) And it is fulfilled: "The Holy Spirit will declare to you the things that are to come" [Joh. 16, 13.], since the apostles preached about the last times, and about the judgment and about eternal life, as you see it in the letters of Paul and Peter. For there is no doubt that they said more than is written, as 2 Thess. 2:5 indicates, where it says, "Remember ye not that I told you these things, when I was with you?" But what Peter and Paul said, no doubt all the others also said.

c) Although Christ said the same then, as afterwards, the apostles, before the spirit came, did not understand it at all, but, as he says [Joh. 14, 26.]: "He will remind you of all that I have said to you"; and again: "He will transfigure me" 2c. For they were ignorant, that they thought his kingdom would be a temporal one, Apost. 1, 6. and Lucae 24, 21. otherwise they would not have been so vexed at his suffering and would not have been so dismayed. "For they did not yet know the Scriptures," says John Cap. 20:9, but he said these things beforehand, that they might remember them afterward, and believe more firmly and assuredly, seeing that the same things were taught by the Spirit, which he had taught, as he saith, These things have I spoken, that, when they were come to pass, ye might believe. 1) So then, what Christ said briefly and obscurely, the Spirit afterwards taught clearly and extensively, just as a spiritual man also taught Moses and the prophets obscurely at first, but then clearly.

3. ä) "It is good for you that I go" 2c. [For the carnal and crude opinion of the kingdom of Christ could not be removed, nor could the faith of Christ become omnipotent, if he did not go to the right hand of the Father, that he might fulfill all things, and that he might be known to save in all things. For those at that time wanted the kingdom of Israel to be preserved by the sword and in the flesh alone, according to the example of the kings of old, which would have been of no use for salvation. But now he reigns and sustains forever through his spirit and his flesh.

4. e) So also the word: No one asked him about this entrance, where he was going [Joh. 16, 5.], because they did not understand it. But they asked in an incomprehensible way where he was going, because they thought that he wanted to go somewhere in the world bodily through Oerter, where they wanted to follow as they measured themselves [Joh. 14, 5].

5. f) That He blew on them [Joh. 20, 22.] also belongs to the promise that He would give the Spirit, which they did not yet understand until the Spirit came, as we said above in the third question about the words, so that they were certain and firm that this was the Spirit, which Christ also promised and offered at that time by a visible sign.

6. g) Through this, after the resurrection, they finally received the full knowledge of the Spirit and all things, of which they had only received a dark knowledge before the resurrection through word and sign and promise. And it was necessary that right at the beginning of the church the spirit be given by a manifest sign and a great miracle, since so many things had to be done in the law, so many innovations had to be made in the whole world, so that it would be believed that the thing was not led by human but by divine power. Now that this innovation has been established, and the gospel is the same as it was then, and no innovation will occur before the judgment, we stand still at that first bodily revelation of the Spirit, and there is no need for such a revelation, which will continue throughout the ages. This I have been able to offer you among very many transactions, you will judge about it.

I have not yet looked for Kronberg's letter among my papers. But you will get it printed from Strasbourg, which he himself wrote to me at the same time. Farewell and pray for me. Martin Luther.

No. 88

(Wittenberg.)

(After May 29, 1522.) 2)

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther insists on his recommendation of Gabriel Zwilling, sends the whole Matthew in German translation and interprets the passage Is. 11, 2.

1) Compare John 16:4.

2) That this letter is to be placed in the period indicated, but not with De Wette in March, is shown by Luther's

The original is in the Oo6. dotkau. 122, toi. 19. printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 50; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 170 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 381.

To the learned and godly man, Mr. Georg Spalatin, evangelical ecclesiastics, his [friend] in the Lord.

JEsus.

Grace and peace in Christ! I have the same opinion of Gabriel as before, my dear Spalatin, and I am not in the least moved by your reason, which asserts that no one should hope that a fallen brother can be improved, or if he falls again, cannot rise again. Christ judges differently than you, since he forgives the brother seven times seventy times [Matth. 18, 22.], and also you could not suffer that you are judged in this way by God.

I hope that you have received the whole German Matthew, 1) with the other things, because it seemed good to us to honor you alone in this way, because we presume that the prince will also be shown such things. A copy will also be sent to Duke John; apart from him, no one will be allowed to see even one sheet, not even those who work in the printing house. I wish to know how this work is liked.

2. Isaiah 11, 2. is written according to the Hebrew: "The spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and strength, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of the Lord. Therefore it is clear that the seventh (namely pietatis, et replebit eum spiritus) 2) has been added. Setting aside the antics or the serious things of all [Aus- leger], I hold that the life of a godly man is to be divided into three pieces:

3. that the first to the life of the soul

Zwilling's emphatic defense against the objections that Spalatin had made against Luther's recommendations in the letter of May 29 (in this appendix, no. 109). Second, that the translation of Matthew is printed, while Luther, on March 30 (No. 83, § 2 of this appendix), only set to work with Melanchthon to polish the translation he had made.

1) Not as a special book, but as the first arc of the New Testament.

2) The last part of the saying in the Vulgate is called thus: Spiritus soioutins et Metatrs st6Anr spr-. turuoris Domini.

3) wisdom and understanding; wisdom, because through faith it knows God and what is God's; understanding, through which day by day it investigates more and more what belongs to wisdom, so that understanding is, for example, the custom, the practice, the investigation, the increase, the strength, the growth of wisdom, or whatever else you want to call it. For in Hebrew $\delta\iota\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{o}\upsilon$ [XXX], that is, understanding, is actually keen and careful observation and (as it is called) inventive and investigative knowledge, and expresses more a movement of the mind (affectum) than an activity of the mind (mentem), as Daniel 8, 15. [4] "He will not pay attention to women and to some God" (non intelliget--he will not direct his understanding), that is, he will not make an effort to recognize and know.

The second is: since the understanding and wise man possesses wisdom and understanding, he now begins to testify to this outwardly, thus living, speaking and teaching; then persecution and the cross begin, because the world does not suffer faith and the words of wisdom and understanding. Here the spirit of counsel and strength reigns, that a man may be wise in what he does, and may excel in tribulations, which also flow from wisdom and understanding as from a fountain. Furthermore, strength or power belongs to the disposition of the heart (ad affectum), that a man may endure and overcome in persecutions. Therefore, like wisdom, you must also relate counsel to the activity of the mind (mentem); like understanding, you must also relate strength to the attitude of the heart.

5) The third is the outward contact with people; here the knowledge prevails.

3) Inserted by us according to the analogy of the second" and third piece, where roZnat is set.

4) De Wette and the Erlanger Briefwechsel make the remark to Daniel 8: "Not Dan. 8, but II, 37. stands the attracted passage." Although this is correct, we believe that Luther also wanted to quote Dan. 8,15, because there NP2 is found, which is to be understood as the face of Daniel's wish and desire; Luther only omitted to insert the passage which we have completed, where not the noun, but the verb is found.

and the fear of the Lord; the knowledge that man knows that everything is free, and it serves against hypocrisy and superstition in food and drink, clothing and everything that either men set or that nature devises for itself. And it deals only with taming and governing the body freely, yet with moderation, that is, with discernment. The fear of the Lord governs the attitude of the heart, so that the strong do not hope against the weak, and do not turn freedom either into an opportunity for the flesh or into an annoyance for the brother, but use freedom in the fear of the Lord, modestly and in a wholesome way. These meanings of the words can be proved with many testimonies, which you may consider yourself when reading, and (I know) you will approve this opinion of ours. Flee, therefore, the dreams of those who have dealt, nay, torn, this passage exceedingly inconsistent from the gifts of the Spirit. Send, I pray thee, these little books into the kingdom of the birds, to him whom thou knowest. 1)

Now farewell. Greet the court in the Lord. Your Martin Luther.

No. 89.

Wittenberg.

August 11, 1522.

Luther to Spalatin in Nuremberg.

Luther sends to Spalatin things from the Netherlands, and says his opinion about the good works.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 64b; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 182 (with the incorrectly resolved date: April 14) and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 440.

To Georg Spalatin, at the court of the Duke, Elector of Saxony, in Nuremberg, his [friend] in the Lord. Grace and peace in the Lord! I send here what was brought from the Netherlands by Jacob, the prior of Antwerp, who was freed by God's miracles, 2)

1) Hans von Berlepsch at the Wartburg..

2) He was freed from prison by a Franciscan, who then escaped with him. See Kolde, A. "sleda, p. 41, where line 2 reads: liberstus instead of: literatur.

and is now here with us. I believe that the New Testament is leached to you up to the last bow (ternionem) 3) of John, and others. Likewise, I also think that Amsdorf 4) has answered your question about good works. For that saying alone is sufficient: "An evil tree cannot bring forth good fruit." Therefore, just as fruit never makes a tree, so works never make a good man. But conversely, when the tree has become, the fruits necessarily follow; so, after a good man has first become, the good works follow; not that they make him good, but that they testify that he is good. Therefore, everything that is said in Scripture about good works must be understood in such a way that through them a man does not become good, but is judged, recognized, proven, and testified that he is already good. Therefore, in the judgment, Christ will also put on the good works, because through them he can prove that they were and are good. Be well and pray for me.

Here is nothing new, but the book of the chancellor of Baden, 5) which was published against me, because he had been rebuked in a certain book because of the false report about my opinion to the bishop of Trier, as you know. Wittenberg, 1522, on the day of St. Tiburtius 6) [August 11].

Martin Luther.

3) A ternio consists of three interleaved folios. Cf. no. 92 of this appendix.

4) Amsdorf, since May 1 Rector, had put disputirsätze about the good works.

5) The chancellor of Baden, Hieronymus Vehus, had published a writing in which he apologized widely for his reviled behavior at the Reichstag. Until now, no printed copy of it has been found, but Seidemann published it from the original in the Zeitschrift für historische Theologie 1851, p. 83. The book, against which Vehus turns in his writing, is the document No. 592 in this volume, namely 8 47.

6) the 8th Diburtii cannot be 6th Didurtii, Valsriani st Maximi (April 14), but it is ä. Diburtii 6t 8usanuu6 mart, the 1t. August. This is proven by the fact that Probst, present in Wittenberg at the time, escaped from prison only in June. Furthermore, Spalatin stayed in Nuremberg from July 2 to September 3 (nine weeks, Kolde, ^nsl66ta, p. 40) in the entourage of the Elector, who had gone there for the imperial regiment.

No. 90.

Wittenberg.

August 20, 1522.

Luther to Spalatin in Nuremberg.

Luther is busy explaining the parable of the unjust steward and intends to publish some foreign writings.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 69; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 242 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 446.

To his brother in the Lord, Georg Spalatin, the faithful evangelist, Privy Councillor 1) of the Prince of Saxony, his best friend. At Nuremberg.

JEsus.

Grace and peace in the Lord! I have done to this man 2) everything that you have requested, my dear Spalatin, as I was able, but he requested some work which I have not been able to finish; however, I have decided to send it either to you or to him, because I am so busy. For I am working on the postillon on the unrighteous steward, 3) where it is necessary to overturn the reasons of the adversaries, because this passage causes considerable trouble with regard to the works, the reward and the service of the saints. There I will also deal with your questions, at the same time about good works and how to help the dead, which is desired by many every day. I liked the defense writing of Gallus 4).

1) We assume that ad aure is a title formed by Luther according to the analogy of a l1dri8 (librarian), a 8aeri8 (court preacher), a 6on8ilU8 (council), a 86eret8 (secretary): "who has the ear of the prince", thus his Geheimrath.

2) According to letter No. 93 in this appendix, last paragraph, it is a bookseller. Seidemann-De Wette, Vol. VI, p. 671 assumes Gabriel Kanz von Altenburg.

3) It will be the sermon which Luther preached on August 17, 1522, Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XI, 1446.

4) Gallus Korn from Nuremberg, a Dominican, preached in the Dominican monastery on Friday after Ascension Day 1522 against papal abuses, especially against monasticism, and repeated the sermon on the following Sunday in the Catharine Church. His prior now forbade him to preach. On the day of Pentecost he read in the monastery library the interpretations of Cyprian and Ambrose on 2 Thess. 3.6. and made the decision to leave the monastery, in which he was encouraged by Johann von Schwarzenberg on the same day. Already on

If it is possible, it will be issued. Yes, also the general resolution of the Carthusians pleases me, that it should be free to resign and leave the monastic life, and will be published, so that by the example of such a great order our cause and our resolutions will be supported. Remember that you have a double copy of the New Testament, up to [the signature] O and P, one for you and the other for the prince. We also wish to see the new coin of our prince, which is praised and received with such great acclaim. Please, send one to me. Farewell and pray for me. Wittenberg, 1522, on Wednesday after the Assumption [August 20].

Martin Luther

No. 91.

Wittenberg.

July 4, 1522.

Luther to Spalatin in Nuremberg.

Luther indicates to him that he is obliged to answer the King of England, Henry VIII. About his negotiation with the Picards or Bohemian brothers. He wishes that Melancthon be relieved of grammatical instruction.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 78 d; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 216 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 426.

To Georg Spalatin, court preacher to the Duke of Saxony, his [friend] in Christ.

JEsus.

Grace and peace in Christ! I hope, my dear Spalatin, that the Gospel of Marci and the Epistle to the Romans have come into your hands, with the letters of the friends; now the Gospel of Luke will be finished soon and the two letters to the Corinthians. I am compelled to give the extremely poisonous Lee 5)

Thursday of the same week, June 12, he had completed his "Apology". It went out under the title: "A plot, how it went to a preacher Munch at Nurmberg with his brethren of because of the evangelical truth." "Given on June 12 in our elmden hostel, 1522." He found refuge with Schwarzenberg and was still with him in 1524.

5) In the original l.so; in Aurifaber and De Wette: leoni. But Luther gives the name "lee" in Latin: l*6U8, i.

who has transformed himself into the King of England. The ignorance in this book is worthy of the king, but the toxicity and deceitfulness belong to none other than Lee. 1) How Satan rages! But I also want to provoke him more and more every day and have started this in the booklet against the bishop's larvae. 2)

The Picards have had emissaries with me 3) to seek counsel about their faith; I have found almost everything sound, except that they use dark and strange language instead of the language of Scripture. Next, what moves me is that they claim that the baptism of infants has no faith and no fruit, and yet they run and rebaptize those who come to them from among us, then also set seven sacraments. For the celibate state of the priests with them pleases me, since they do not make it a necessary one, but leave it free. Nowhere else in the world is the purity of the Gospel like this. Whether they have a sound opinion of faith and works is not yet clear to me, for I doubt it very much. With regard to the Lord's Supper I see nothing wrong, unless they deceive with words; so also not of baptism. Farewell and pray for me.

How I would like you to finally see to it that Philip is relieved of the grammatical lesson, so that he would be free for the theological one; for it is quite unreasonable that he (as I have written before) earns a hundred guilders for grammar, while in the meantime he can give two theological lectures of immense value. We have enough teachers who can teach grammar just as well as Philip, and for his sake must be idle. God destroy that Bethaven, 4) so that the income that the screaming priests have usurped may be turned to the use of those who are who teach well, amen. Wittenberg, 1522, Friday after the Visitation of the Virgin Mary [July 4]. I commend this Nuremberg Prior 5) to you. Martin Luther

No. 92.

July 26, 1522.

Wittenberg.

Luther to Spalatin [in Nuremberg].

About Gabriel Zwilling's removal from Altenburg; Luther's apology for his harsh writing against his opponents. He sends a part of the New Testament and gives news about the completion of the whole.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 88; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 235 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 435.

To Magister Georg Spalatin, ecclesiastics and servant of Christ, his [friend] in the Lord.

Jesus.

Grace and peace in the Lord! Ludwig Dietz, 6) secretary [of the king] in Poland, was a very pleasant guest and was received by us according to our ability. But I am glad that Christ is still reigning in so many places: everywhere people are thirsting for the gospel, from everywhere people are demanding evangelists from us. It is quite bad that Gabriel 7) has been removed from Altenburg, because Wenceslaus 8) has written for the second time and praised man in such a way that I cannot believe it to be true.

5) Wolfgang Vollpracht (as Seidemann writes him in De Wette, Vol. VI, p. 701; "Volpracht" the Erlangen correspondence; "Volprecht" Kolde, p. 40), who is who had stayed in Wittenberg for three weeks in matters of the order, must have been the bearer of this letter to Spalatin in Nuremberg. See the last note to No. 89 of this appendix, which is also found in Erl. Briefw., Vol. III, p. 441. The information, which the Erl. Briefw. here, p. 427, note 1: "Spalatin had now returned to Lochau", will be based on an error.

6) 10ä06U8 Imäövieu8 Deei8, Dietz, from Weißenburg in Alsace, is the well-known historian who was secretary at Siegmund's court in Krakow for a long time. - Misled by the wrong reading I)u6i8 instead of I)eeiu8, reports Seckendorf, Hi8t. ImtU., lib. I, p. 241, K139, that Margrave George of Brandenburg sent his secretary from Poland to Luther in matters of religion (reU8ioLi8! oau8").

7) Gemini.

8) Link.

1) Compare St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIX, Introduction, p. 3d.

2) "Wider den falschgenannten geistlichen Stand des Pabsts und der Bischöfe," St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIX, 668.

3) Johann Roh and Michael Weiß.

4) The monastery at Wittenberg. Compare St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIX, Introduction, p. 5lf.

if it was not written by such a great man, for I myself did not know that Gabriel was such a one as this one, this one and that one praise him. You therefore see to it, as much as is in you, that those people are not deprived of his service. For I do not think that Wenceslaus will be there long.

I have deliberately wanted my booklet attacking the bishops' larvae 1) to be so harsh, but I will not be milder against the King of England either. I see that I humble myself in vain, soften, plead and try all ways that can serve peace, therefore I will be harder against the angry people and those who daily put on their horns more and more, and let out my horns on them to irritate Satan until he, after his forces and attacks are exhausted, collapses in on himself. Therefore, do not fear, but do not hope that I will spare those people. If they should also suffer troubles and innovations, they will not suffer them through us as the originators, but through the instigation of their tyranny, as fate so wills it.

So far I have sent you a copy of the New Testament piecemeal up to the Gospel of Luke and the letter to the Corinthians; now I am sending the rest; if it should not have come to you, then ask where it must be asked, or write again if it is lost, so that I do not continue also to waste the following sheets (terniones) 2). In addition, I send another, complete copy, as far as it is printed, what I have received from them for the prince; for this reason they conscientiously preserve the impressions (chartas). The work progresses slowly. For now you have only half, there are still eighteen other sheets (terniones) left. It will not be finished before Michaelmas, even though they print ten thousand pages 3) every day under three presses with enormous

Work and diligence. Fare well and pray for me. Wittenberg, Saturday after Jacobi [July 26] 1522.
Martin Luther.

No. 93.

September 4, 1522.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther intercedes for a prisoner, he gives thanks for a booklet sent to him by Hirschfeld, in which he finds a reference to the King of England. In the postscript of the Anabaptist Claus Storch and some news.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed by Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 91 d and 92 (he made a special letter out of the postscript); by De Wette, vol. II, p. 244 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. IV, p. 1. Walch, who followed Aurifaber, also has the postscript as no. 106 of this appendix. We have transferred it here.

To the learned and godly man, Mr.

Georg Spalatin, preacher of the Word (a verbo) to the Elector of Saxony, his [friend] in the Lord.

Jesus.

Grace and peace! I knew that whatever I wrote against the King of England, the tasteless and poisonous Thomist, would annoy many. But I liked it that way, and it was necessary for many reasons. What I do, one does not know now, but will find out later.

Only one thing I bring forward, namely that I wish to know, indeed I ask, that you procure, if it can in any way be obtained from the prince, for that poor man, the Bohemian, who has now been imprisoned with us for sixteen weeks in a vile and filthy dungeon, that he be taken out and kept in the upper vault, with kaories, page. Now two pages are produced by one print at the same time, e.g. with A1 at the same time the page A 6d opposite to it; with A1d at the same time A 6a 2c., so that thus a ternio was finished in six prints, but the single sheet of two sheets or four pages in two prints. The "ten thousand pages" thus represent five thousand impressions. This will also be the opinion of the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 436, note 5. - Köstlin, Martin Luther (3), vol. I, p. 808 aa. p. 600 says: that the above words are unclear; "because in reality, according to the judgment of experts at that time, could not be printed so quickly".

1) St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 668.

2) A tkruio consists of three mutually laid folio sheets, which are provided with the same signature, usually only on the first page of the first three sheets, because then, if they were correctly laid from each other, the signature for the three following sheets of itself.

3) Thus edartarum will have to be taken here; not, as it is usually taken, as "bow," but as.

I want him to be kept in the strongest and safest way possible, bound in iron and chains, as he can only ever be, so that he can have a little air and light. I am very sorry for the man, and they drag the matter out, so that it is quite unreasonable that he should be tortured so cruelly for such a small fault. Do it, therefore, if you are able, and answer. The castles dare nothing without the prince's command, nor do they want to.

By the way, I thank Hirschfeld for the booklet he sent us, which elicited a laugh from many of us. But they criticized that the first king, who carries the coat of arms of the red heart, is missing. This I point to the foolishly confident king who boldly attacked me, and behold, he does not appear, and is made nothing by the pomposity and arrogance of his heart, according to the words [Luc. 1, 51]: "He scatters those who are confident in their hearts." Now there is no need for you to send me any more of the new coins; Lucas has brought me one as a gift from the prince. Fare well in the Lord. The New Testament will be finished on the day of Matthew [September 21]. Wittenberg, the fourth day of September.

Martin Luther.

There has been with us the prince of the prophets, Claus Storck, 1) who went along in the manner and dress of the men of war, whom we call "Lanzknecht", and had another with him in a long skirt and the Doctor Gerhard 2) of Cologne. And the man disagrees almost in all things with Marcus 3) and Thomas, and has dealt with nothing but infant baptism, and he seems to be driven by a reckless spirit, which does not even greatly esteem what he holds. Thus Satan has his game in men.

Count Georg von Wertheim 4) asks me for an evangelical preacher (evangelistam), 1) See St. Louis edition, vol. XX, introduction, p. 10b f.

2) Gerhard Westerburg. He remained a raving enthusiast even later. See Brismann's letter to Luther of Nov. 29, 1542, in Krafft's "Briefe und Documente," p. 84 f.

3) "Marcus" is Stübner; "Thomas" is Münzer.

4) He had been a member of the commission at the Diet of Worms, which demanded Luther. See Document No. 591 in this volume, Z3.

to whom he wants to give a hundred gold florins and feed him at his table. A very good example!

Gabriel, 5) who had put on his cap again in Neustadt, has now taken it off again and is staying in Düben.

To Philip was born one Hannah 6), a beautiful girl. Johann Pomeranu's engagement has been canceled; 7) now he looks for another.

Let this sermon be given to the man whom you recommended to me the other day, the bookseller, namely to the one who delivered to me from you the Defence of Gallus, because I promised him at your request to give him this. Farewell.

No. 94.

Wittenberg.

November 3, 1522.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther's sermons in Weimar and Eisenach, one of which he intends to publish; the translation of the Old Testament, of which the books of Moses are to appear at the beginning of the new year.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 94; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 254 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. IV, p. 22.

Georg Spalatin, the servant of Christ and evangelist at the court, who is highly esteemed by the Lord.

Jesus.

Grace and peace! I have nothing of the sermons preached in Weimar and Erfurt, nor is it necessary; you already know and have everything beforehand, since I have taught nothing but faith and love everywhere; only once in Weimar I spoke of the kingdom of Christ and temporal power, and have been asked to publish this, which I have also been eager and anxious to publish for a long time.

5) Zwilling had gone from Altenburg to Neustadt an der Orla to the Augustinian monastery, and from there he went to Düben, where he had stayed before.

6) Anna Melanchthon married Georg Sabinus on November 6, 1536 and died on February 26, 1547 in Königsberg.

7) The Dominican Peter Anspach, Catholic court preacher in Dessau, gives us the reason for this: "because the maiden resented the purchase, because she did not want to be a priest's wife."

go under the name of Prince John the Elder, 1)

The passage of Hosea, Cap. 2, 19: "I will betroth myself to you" 2c., means nothing else than this: that we will not become brides by works, but by faith in the merciful, pitying, forgiving, justifying God under the kingdom of Christ through the gospel.

With regard to Stagmann 2) and Pomeranus we will do what has to be done.

In the translation of the Old Testament I am now at the third book of Moses, because it is unbelievable how letters, business, companies and many other things have prevented me so far. But now I have decided to lock myself up at home and hurry, so that Moses can be sent among the press by January. For this we shall publish especially, then the Histories, and last of all the Prophets. For the size and price of the books require us to divide them up and publish them one after the other. Fare well in the Lord and pray for me. Wittenberg, 1522, Monday after All Saints' Day [Nov. 3].

Martin Luther.

No. 95.

Wittenberg.

December 19, 1522.

Luther to Wenceslaus Link in Altenburg.

All sorts of news; of Heinrich von Zütphen's deliverance and reception of the gospel in northern Germany; of the determined response which the

1) Luther reworked the third and fourth sermon held in Weimar at the castle on October 24 and 25 into the writing: "Von weltlicher Obrigkeit, wie weit man ihr Gehorsam schuldig sei," which appeared with a dedication to Duke John of Saxony on New Year's Day 1523. This writing is found in Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. X, 374, the introduction to it there in the "Preface of Walch". Col. 52 ff. - The sermon held in Erfurt on October 21, the day of the eleven thousand virgins, is found in the St. Louis edition, vol. XII, 1500, and reworked, expanded and moved to the day of Catharina (25. The sermon delivered on October 22, St. Severus' Day, at Erfurt is found in Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. X, 1766. The two Erfurt sermons were published in 1522 from postscripts.

2) Stagmann was, as we see from the letter to Spalatin (Walch, old edition, vol. XXI, 816; De Wette, vol. II, p. 257), a physician who wished to take the place of Doctor Augustinus Schürf. - Bugenhagen had received an invitation to come to Erfurt at that time (Oorx. Lok. I, 581).

Grand Master in Prussia to the Papal Legate; of the bad performance of a monk in Wittenberg, and of the translation of the Old and New Testaments.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 98; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 265 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. IV, p. 39.

JESUS.

Mercy and peace! I send the promised dog, so that the stick of my driver becomes superfluous, but it is necessary that you clean it daily or every other day with the comb. I do not understand Staupitzen's letter, only that I see that it is completely empty in spirit, and he does not write as he used to; may the Lord make him right again.

I believe that you know what happened in Antwerp, how the women freed Henry by force. The brothers have been expelled from the monastery, some are imprisoned in other places, others have been let go after denying Christ, but those who are city children have been put into the Beghards' house. All the equipment of the monastery has been sold, and the church together with the monastery has been closed and locked, and is finally to be destroyed. The sacrament has been transferred with great pomp to the church of the Holy Virgin as from a heretical place, and received with honor by the Lady Margaret 3). Some citizens and women were martyred and punished. Henry himself, who wanted to come here, arrived in Bremen, where he stayed and taught the word at the request of the people; the council approved, but the bishop did not want to suffer it. The people are moved by an extraordinary desire and longing [for God's Word], indeed, recently some have deputized their own bookman to bring to them books from Wittenberg. Heinrich requested a letter of obedience 4) from you, but we could not reach you so soon. Therefore we have given him one in your name, under the seal of our prior. If you want, you can confirm our actions. The Hamburgers also seek the word of God, after the Official is expelled with his own, who had tempted,

3) The Governor of the Netherlands.

4) litrās obsclisittiales, written permission for monks to travel or go to another monastery.

to prevent this, and Friesland also desires servants of the Word. Thus Christ is sought among the heathen, while it is condemned among us Jews. Franz Sickingen has declared war on the Palatine, which will be a very bad thing. Duke George is doing what is worthy of his folly and foolishness, along with his Merseburg idol. 1)

2. it repents me that I have made" [Gen. 6, 7], has also Philip interpreted in such a way that it has the meaning "to change"; it repents me, that is, I will change what I have made before. However, I do not reject the view that the Scriptures speak of God in the way the godless or the godly think of Him according to the emotions of their hearts, so that it is said that He is angry when we feel anger, and repentant when we feel that we are changed by His action.

What we write of the answer of the princes to the papal legate was done by the Grand Master in Prussia, Margrave Frederick 2). For he had said that he would gladly assist the Church, but that this was not the way to help the Church, that one condemns the revealed truth and burns books, and it is said that he is not ill-disposed toward the Gospel. May God grant that your glorious vicariate may leave you, but it will soon leave you, as Mr. Spangenberg thinks of it and also opposes it. 3)

Johannes P. escaped from here after he had committed a great shameful deed, to the disgrace of us all. He has been found by the licitoribus in a whorehouse, very drunk and in lay clothes, and also wounded in some part, as I have heard; but I have learned this only belatedly.

1) On November 7, 1522, "Duke George of Saxony's mandate to hand over the New Testament translated by Luther" (St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIX, 488) had appeared, and by order of Bishop Adolf of Merseburg, the Rector of the University of Leipzig had to forbid the reading of Luther's books and the New Testament, also the going out to the preachers of neighboring places, in a public display, under penalty of life and limb. (Seidemann, Beiträge zur Reformationgeschichte, p. 59.)

2) This name is erroneous. Frederick had died in 1510 and Albrecht, his successor, had been won for the gospel in that year at Nuremberg by Osiander and Spengler.

3) Spangenberg became vicar when Link resigned the vicariate, but also resigned around 1530.

after his escape. Of course, I had announced to him beforehand that if he committed something again after that misdeed in Zerbst, he should not come before my eyes again; he kept his promise. But pray for the wretched man, of whom you know how miserable he is after his evil deeds, so that he will not despair and do even worse things. We sit in shame. All of us greet you and ask that you finally visit us.

5 Be at ease in the Lord and pray for me. I have finished the translation of Moses. Another edition of the New Testament is finished, now they will tackle Moses. It is astonishing how much one needs yours here in the German language. Whether your bookseller has paid, I do not know. He certainly gave me nothing, and I instructed him to give it to Lotther; whether he gave it to him, I cannot find out, because he does not know either. You should know that the letter was given to Mauser 4). Wittenberg, on Friday before Thomas [19 December] 1522.

Your Martin Luther.

No. 96.

12 December [?] 5) 1522.

Wittenberg.

Luther to Spalatin.

By Franz Lambert (Lsrranus). Luther does not want to answer all of the questions posed to Herr von Schwarzenberg. In the postscript, Luther asks for the translation of the Old Testament because of several animal names.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 170d; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 263 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. IV, p. 37.

For the attention of his [friend] in the Lord, Georg Spalatin, court preacher at Lochall.

1. grace and peace! John Serranus 6) seems to be a good man, but

4) A Sebastian Mauser from Wrnberg was inscribed in the summer of 1522. (*Idum, p. 112.)

5) This letter will be written on the same day as the one to Count Joh. Heinr. von Schwarzburg, Walch, old edition, Vol. XXI. 29.

6) See St. Louis edition, vol. XIV, 260 s., note.

My advice is not necessary. He may not know the prince's ways, so it seems to me that he should be left in Eisenach or where he can be, so that he can teach those he can. For it is not necessary for him, any more than for us, that he be given a so-called safe conduct. May God defend him, as well as us, but may he not be chased or driven away.

It is not possible for me to answer everything in detail to Mr. von Schwarzenberg 1). It is a very large book, as I have previously written to him as well as to Philipp von Feilitzsch, then a large part of his questions have been answered in books that have been published in the meantime. Only the question of the power of the sword remains, which, when Moses is finished, Christ willing, I will treat in a sermon 2). Meanwhile, you will send what I answer to the Counts of Schwarzburg to Anshelm von Tettau. Farewell.

[Postscript.]

I ask you to help us by describing these animals and naming them according to their species:

From birds of prey: Of wild, huntable animals:
"Harrier" V /goats I "chamois" <
"Vulture" / And what "ibex" "forest goat" or
"Goshawk" > belongs to their silvestris hircus -
"Sparrowhawk" gender, for k" t "Sprinz" / example.

Of crawling animals:

/Whether Ltellio correctly
! "A newt" is called, s Eidechses / lüwara
>"A toad".

With the Hebrews and the Latins and the Greeks, all this is quite confused, so that from

1) In the original, by confusion of the ram, here 8e1i^art2dnrA, whereas in the following we read: Oorutidus LetivartMdurMnsiduz. But it is clear from the letters Walch, old edition, vol. XXI, 26 and 29, that here Schwarzenberg, but in second place Schwarzburg must stand.
2) This was already done on New Year's Day 1523 by the writing: "Von weltlicher Obrigkeit" 2c. Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. X, 374.

Therefore, I would like to know the names, species and nature of all birds of prey, all huntable wild animals and all harmful creeping animals, if I could. And, to show what I have of noxious creeping animals, they are these:

"Weasel" Thisand counts
"Mouse" she calls even brazenly
"toad" 1 our s Crocodylon 1 under the "toad" > slatei-< Mygalon > creeping "newt") nical (Chamaeleon) animals.
"Audex" 3) Over-- 3 Mos. 11,
"Snail" setter^29 . f.
"Mole" / "Cule"
Now so many t "night raven" names of<
"eagle owl"
Night owls: / "Stick owl" s "Käuzlein" (Küzle).

Of game I have: Of birds I have: "deer" vultures " i although I have "Deer" "Consecration " 1 their appearance
"chamois", which gives "hawk" j not exactly our translator "sparrowhawk" (know.
Bubuluw.

Because that he dreams that I Tragelaphum don't
Mos. 14, 5.] I Pygargum are among the edible j know.
Orygem baren wild i. Camelopardum 4) animals

And would God that you would take this piece upon yourself, consult the Hebrew Bible, and by careful research of all things see to it that something certain is brought out here. I do not have so much time. Be well and pray for me.

Martin Luther.

3) Instead Aurifaber and De Wette have: "Eidechs", which will probably be correct. We assume that also here has been read: Audex instead of: Aidex; as in the following: NvMloi and Ludulum instead of: [after the Hebrew a large, strong species of lizard] and BubuluiD [buffalo) in the Vulgate. - The parenthesis goes from "weasel" to "audex" in the original, but the remark refers only to the three words we have bracketed.
4) These are: The buck deer, the antelope, the gazelle and the giraffe.

No. 97.

(Wartburg.)

September 9, 1521.

Luther to Amsdorf.

Luther speaks out about his theses from the vows he sends along; he rebukes Carlstadt and expresses the wish that Melanchthon explain the Bible in public German.

Handwritten in Ooä. L. 24. n, k. 182. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p.358; in De Wette, vol. II, p.52 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, 232.

JEsus.

(1) I am sending the sentences of the vows. 1) Although there is nothing new in them that you seek, yet when they come out they will be new and terrifying to the adversaries. Philip relies on the fact that a vow should be annulled because of the impossibility. I have not dealt with this, nor do I believe that it can be dealt with now, as something on which consciences could confidently and safely rest, for that is what we have in mind.

(2) I have here treated the cause which is reliable and sufficient to make consciences secure and free from the vow, namely, ungodliness and godliness. I will also send other sentences in which there is a more extensive discussion about lawful and godly vows, how far they are to be kept, but which are derived from the same cause of godliness and ungodliness.

3) I suffer because of Carlstadt. 2) Although he can be easily resisted, our adversaries will be given cause to boast because of our internal disunity, to the great annoyance of the weak.

4 I have written to Spalatin that he should make it possible for our Philip to recite the Gospel in German to the common people in some place, such as a lecture hall (collegio), on feast days, so that you will gradually return to the old way of reciting the Gospel.

1) This is the writing: "Luthers kurze Schlußreden von den Gelübden und geistlichen Leben der Klöster", St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 1480. The other sentences promised in the following paragraph can be found there Col. 1490.

2) namely because of the poor substantiation of his theses.

to preach the gospel. You have a beautiful reply if someone wanted to prevent a layman from speaking the gospel in the corner, namely, that he does so in the place of the university and on his own authority. Then who can forbid that he speak German and that the common man and the women hear him? Who could prevent the whole city from hearing his lectures if they understood Latin or if he read German?

I would not want this advice to be despised, especially since there is no hope for my return to you. 3) Who knows what God wants to do through me? Fare well and pray for me. I give thanks for the song. On Monday after [the] Nativity of Mary [September 9] 1521. Yours, Martin Luther, D.

No. 98.

Wittenberg. Approximately between December 5 and 8, 1521.

Luther to Spalatin.

This letter appears twice in Walch's old edition, namely in the 19th volume and here. Since we have already included it in the 19th volume of our edition, Col. 560, we leave it out here. In addition to the locations given there, we can add the Erlanger Briefwechsel Bd. III, p. 252, which has been published in the meantime, and which places our letter between December 4 and 9, 1521. Luther's writing, which we indicated in the last note, can be found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. X, 360.

No. 99.

(Wartburg.)

1. August 1521.

Luther to Melanchthon.

(Fragment.)

Luther's opinion on the vows of chastity of the clergy and monks; he wants the former to be abolished, about the latter he is still uncertain. On the consumption of the Lord's Supper in both forms.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 343, with the remark that this fragment was found in Spalatin's library; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 34 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 205. In the latter two there is incorrect proof of Walch, namely XV, appendix CCIX instead of XOIX.

3) The remark that the Erlangen correspondence makes about this passage: "Our passage contradicts the statement in the letter addressed to Melanchthon on the same day" (St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 1794) is invalid. There it is about a short secret meeting to discuss a theological question, but here it is about Luther's permanent return to the administration of his preaching ministry.

JEsus.

1) "Namely, that you must know and can solve only those sins which are confessed to you; but which are not confessed to you, you must neither know nor solve; that is too high, dear sirs."

You cannot yet persuade me that the same is true of the vows of priests and monks. For I am very much moved by the fact that the priesthood is instituted by God as a free one, but not that of the monks, who have voluntarily chosen the state and offered themselves to God, although I would almost like to conclude that those who are before the years of manhood or in the same, and have entered this maw, can leave without any qualms of conscience, only that the judgment of those who have already grown old and have spent a long time in this state still holds me back.

2 Incidentally, since Paul speaks quite freely about the priests [1 Tim. 4, 1. ff.] that their marriage is forbidden by the devils, and the voice of Paul is a voice of the divine majesty, I do not doubt that they must rely on him to such an extent that, even if they had consented to this prohibition of the devil when they were admitted, now that they have recognized the matter with whom they made this contract, they can quite confidently cancel this contract.

This prohibition of the devil, which is clearly shown by the word of God, is very urgent to me and compels me to approve the actions of the bishop of Kemberg 2). For God is not deceiving nor lying when He says that this is a prohibition of the devil. But if a contract has been made with the devil, it must not stand, since it was made in ungodly error against God, and since God rejects and condemns it. For he expressly says [1 Tim. 4, 1. Vulg.] that those spirits are of error who are the authors of the prohibitions.

1) These words may go to the first eight theses of Carlstadt's disputation of July 19, which dealt with sin and repentance. The second eight theses concerned the Lord's Supper, which may be referred to below. In total, there were 24 theses. Cf. Jäger, "Carlstadt," p. 202.

2) The marriage of the provost of Kemberg, Bartholomäus Bernhardt von Feldkirch.

4 Why are you afraid to join this divine judgment even against the gates of hell? This is not the case with the oath of the children of Israel, which was taken by the Gibeonites [Jos. 9:15], for they keep in their commandments that they should offer peace and, if it were offered to them, they should accept it, and then they should also accept the proselytes and those who would join their customs. All this was done among the Gibeonites. Nothing was done against the Lord or on the advice of the spirits of error. For though they murmured at the beginning, yet afterwards they approved it.

(5) Add to this that the celibate state is a mere human statute, which a man who has established it can abolish again; therefore any Christian can also do this. This I say, even if it were not ordered by the devils, but by a pious man. Since I do not have such a saying of God about the monks, it is not safe to say the same about them. For I would not dare to follow, therefore not even to advise a monk to follow. Would to God that we could do this, so that no one would become a monk or retire in the years of lust. For one must avoid aversions where there is not a revealed scripture for us, however much they may be permissible things.

6) That also the good man Carlstadt quotes from Paul [1 Tim. 5, 9. 11.]: 3) one should let the younger widows go and choose one of sixty years, - God would that this would be proving. For someone will easily be able to say that the apostle has ordered this with respect to the future, while with respect to the past he says [v. 12] that they are condemned because they have transgressed the first faith. And so that saying is nullified, and cannot be a reliable rock for consciences. For this we seek. Further, this reason, that it is better to be free than to suffer rutting [1 Cor. 7:9], or, that the sin of fornication may be avoided [1 Cor. 7:2], to enter into marriage in the sin of the broken faith [1 Cor. 7:9].

3) In his writing "Von Gelübden," Jäger, "Carlstadt," p. 195.

1) What is this but pure reason? We want the Scriptures and the testimony of the divine will. Who knows whether he who burns today will burn tomorrow?

(7) For I would not have given marriage to the priests for the sake of burning alone, if Paul had not called the prohibition an erroneous and devilish and hypocritical one, and condemned by God, so that even without burning he compelled them to leave this celibate state for the sake of the fear of God alone; but it will be useful to discuss these things in more detail. For I, too, would like to help the monks and nuns beyond measure. I lament so much for the wretched people, the young men and girls who are plagued with stains and burns.

(8) Regarding both forms of the Lord's Supper, I do not prove it with an example, but with the words of Christ. For he [Carlstadt] does not prove that those who receive one form have sinned or have not sinned, but I am moved by the fact that Christ did not require either, just as he does not necessarily require baptism if a tyrant or the world should resist the water. So also the violence of persecutions separates the man and the woman, whom God forbids to be separated, because they do not agree to be separated either. Nor do godly hearts consent to be deprived of the one form, but those who consent and approve, who will deny that they are papists, but not Christians, and sin?

(9) Since He does not require it by necessity, and here the tyrant presses, I do not see how those who receive only one form can sin. For who can take something away by force if the tyrant does not want it? Therefore, there is nothing here but reason, which asserts that the institution of Christ is not kept; but the Scripture does not establish anything, without which we cannot declare it to be sin. It is the institution of Christ, but left free, and cannot be imprisoned, either in whole or in part.

(10) For what would become of it if what happened to the martyr Donatus happened, that since the cup was broken or [the wine] spilled, some could not partake, and that no other wine was at hand, and many similar cases? In short, because Scripture does not enforce that there is sin here, I claim no sin.

11 But it pleases me very much that you restore the institution of Christ. For that was what I intended to do above all things when I returned to you. For we now have the knowledge of this tyranny and can resist it, so that we are not forced to receive only one form.

12 But I will not hold a private mass anymore in eternity. Rather, we want to ask God to hasten to give us his spirit more abundantly. For I suspect that the Lord will soon punish Germany as her unbelief deserves, her godlessness and her hatred of the gospel. But this punishment will then be given to us, because we as heretics would have provoked God to it, and we will be a mockery of the people and contempt of the people. But those will take excuses in their sins and justify themselves, so that He may prove that the hardened do not become pious either by kindness or by anger, and many will be angered. Let it be done, let the will of the Lord be done, amen.

(13) If you are a preacher of grace, preach not a fictitious grace, but the true grace. If grace is true, you must also bear true sin, not fictitious sin. God does not make blessed those who are sinners only in a fictitious way. Be a sinner and have strong sins, 2) but trust even stronger and rejoice in Christ, who is the victor over sin, death and the world. We must sin as long as we are here; this life is not a dwelling place of righteousness, but we are waiting, says Peter [2 Ep. 3:13], for a new heaven and a new earth in which righteousness will be established.

2) This is indisputably the opinion of Luther with the words: pecca fortiter, which needs no further proof for a Christian; but the papists make a reproach out of it against Luther.

1) Carlstadt says: "It is true that one does wrong when one breaks the law. Jäger, l. o. p. 195.

dwells. It is enough that through the riches of God's glory we have known the Lamb who bears the sin of the world; from whom no sin can tear us away, even if we hurl or kill a thousand, thousand times in one day. Do you think it is a small price and a small payment for our sin given by such and such a great Lamb?

Pray strongly, for you are an exceedingly strong sinner. On the day [of the chain celebration] of Peter the Apostle 1) [August 1] 1521.

No. 100

(Wartburg.)

3. August 1521.

Luther to Melanchthon.

Luther speaks out about Carlstadt's writing on celibacy, and finds some things to reprove. He is not yet of the opinion that monastic vows should be abandoned per se.

The original is in the Rhediaer collection at the Wrocław City Library. Printed by Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 346 (incomplete); by De Wette, Vol. II, p. 37 (also incomplete and according to Aurifaber's poor text); completed and improved according to the variants and additions given in Kolde, ^valeeta, p. 33 ff, in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 210.

JESus.

Hail! I have read the two quatrains of our Carlstadt about the celibate state 2) which have been delivered to me at this hour, and although I wish that the passage about the seed sacrificed to Moloch [3 Mos. 18, 21. 20, 2.] had not been twisted on the flow of nature (for the adversaries will laugh at the twisting of this passage, since it is clearer than light that it was said of the sons and daughters burned and sacrificed to the idol), nevertheless I like his effort and diligence very much. 3) [The matter is proved by the fact that he compares the sissies to Onan, the son of Judah, since the latter did not sacrifice the seed out of suffering-.

1) Not on the day of Peter and Paul, as Veesenmeyer, Luthers Briefsammlung, p. 158, assumes. For this letter presupposes the disputation held on July 19.

2) Carlstadt's writing 1)6 enSlidatu, naouadratu 6t Vi6uitat6 lid6r, with which he explained his theses of June 20 (p08triäi6 66rva8ii is not June 19, as Jäger, "Carlstadt," p. 176, and the Erlangen correspondence has).

3) The following words enclosed in brackets are in the margin in the original.

but out of malice, and it is not yet certain whether softness is something greater or lesser than fornication or adultery].

(2) At the same time, I am also annoyed that Paul's passage to Timothy is too obscure, so that it seems that it does not command anything about the celibate state, as well as about the feeding of widows from the alms of the church. He says [1 Tim. 5:16]: "Let the church not be burdened," and it is truly shameful if they want to be free afterwards, after they have become horny while standing in the alms of the church. From this he would not want it to be inferred that he had expelled the younger ones from the marriageless state. For he speaks only of widows, and excludes them from the alms of the church if they are young and horny.

(3) Again, what I wrote in the previous letter (4) leads to the opposite opinion, that Paul seems to warn against future things, but does not invalidate the past, so that this passage about virginity and dishonorable status proves nothing at all. For it is another thing for a widow, after her husband has died and she has been abandoned by all others, to be accepted for common maintenance, and it is another thing for virginity and the marriageless state to be accepted. I say this because I do not want anything to come from you that is based on dark and doubtful scriptures, since light is required from us that is brighter than that of the sun and all the stars, and even then they hardly see.

(4) Who then will enforce that the word [1 Tim. 5:14 Vulg.), "I will that the younger should be free," should apply to widows, and not rather to a general exhortation of all young women, except those rejected widows, as he had also admitted the younger [women] as sisters 2c. [1 Tim. 5:2]. For he did not say, I will that the younger widows be free, since he rejected those who wished to be free.

5. this drives me very much into a corner, that he says [v. 12.), these younger widows are ver-.

4) In the previous number of this Annex, § 6.

morsen, because they have committed the faith; how this could be interpreted correctly, is doubtful to me. It certainly follows that the younger ones have pledged this faith (fidem ligasse - to keep faith), however young they may be immensely, if they are rejected for the sake of it. Again, this is also something, that this was such a kind of widow, chosen not by a personal vow, but by the common vote of the church. For he says [v. 9.], "Let no widow be chosen," and here the power to reject has a place in whom it seemed good, but those chosen have no liberty to resign.

(6) But the extremely strict testimonies of the old law about the payment of vows do not move me at all, since it is impossible that they can be understood from or applied to this vow of chastity, since everyone knows that they were given to the people who were not allowed to live chastely, much less to vow [chastity], under the most severe penalty of curse and disgrace.

(7) And this I have fully established for myself, that it is not proved from Scripture, either by law or by example, that chastity falls under a vow. It only remains that this is left in the will of man according to 1 Cor. 7, then that it cannot be decreed by laws and statutes of men, unless by inspiration of Satan. This is certain with me, let it follow what it can. It is therefore a dangerous thing to vow chastity; but who can say that it [the vow of chastity] is not valid for its own sake, since he could also have lived chastely in a free way, based on the counsel and examples of Scripture?

(8) However, by thinking of many things, I see that Peter Apost. 15, 10. In the freedom of the spirit Peter also threw off the unbearable burden of the law, to which he was subject, and claimed nothing but its impossibility, and the whole church agreed with him, and he himself ate with the Gentiles afterwards. But again, this is opposed by the fact that he did not come from his own

He had the commandment from heaven [Acts 10:15] and should not consider anything unclean, that is, the law was not necessary for the Gentiles. But this he concluded without a revelation, that it was not necessary either for him or for the Jews, by attaching this freedom also to himself, who was burdened with the law, according to the example of the Gentiles.

9 Again I think of Christ, who made the daughter of Abraham, who had been bound [by Satan] for eighteen 1) years [Luc. 13, 11. 16.], well on the Sabbath: how, if they had also here been taken by Satan, and at least a large part of the pledgers, in that, since the spirit had not yet been tested, they had made the vow out of their or Satan's devotion?

(10) I am entirely of the opinion that there is some very easy solution to all these things, but it is not yet apparent to us. For if Christ were present, I have no doubt that he would dissolve these bonds and cast off all vows, and let no one be oppressed by the compulsory yoke of vows, since he is the Savior and bishop of souls, so that it almost seems to me that the freedom of the spirit must be used here and torn through everything that stands in the way of the salvation of souls.

For he himself has not yet shown by any revelation, by any sign, by any testimony that this vow, made of his own will, is pleasing to him, and it would be a very dangerous thing to follow him, of whom it is not certain that he approves it in any way, especially since we see that so many souls are lost against their will and with necessity, who otherwise could have been advised very well, if it were not for this vow, the merit of which is uncertain. Doesn't that mean running into the unknown? Isn't that making air pranks? Yes, that is why we take up the matter [the race] again. 2) And I

1) In the original: "80"; in Aurifaber and De Wette: "60".

2) After these words: Huin rtzvooamus eursuru, the editions have a question mark. The old translator offers: "Do we not run back in such a way?" Whether the word or^snnr belongs in the text is not clear to us.

I would like us to deal with these things later in conversations with each other, namely, verbally; perhaps Christ would like to give us more spirit and knowledge, then also more freedom. But I ask that in the meantime a richer spirit enlighten you.

(12) To this I add another strong reason, namely, that even among men this vow has never been approved if it was made under fourteen years of age, so that, of course, a vow for the whole life is forbidden. But who makes us certain that the vow after fourteen years is ever valid for the whole life? God is silent, man does not know. We wretched people, who are thus led to uncertain things and follow them as certain ones, so that it seems sacrilegious and displeasing to God, who is a God of counsel and knowledge, not a God of audacity and ignorance or uncertainty. You see by how great emotions I am moved, and yet I cannot yet determine anything in these matters in a fruitful way, only that I very much wish to come to the aid of your effort.

13 Furthermore, I have sometimes taken the vows that were made up to the age of twenty without any qualms of conscience, and I would still take them, because everyone can see that they were made without counsel and knowledge. But I have done this only with the vows of those who had not yet changed their status or dress. But with regard to those who have already become chasubles in the monasteries, I have not yet done anything, even if they had vowed twenty years ago. I don't know what cloud of this pomp and human delusion plagues me here.

The Lord Jesus instructs and frees us by his mercy to our freedom. Surely we are the people on whom no law should be laid, especially for the whole life, but everything should be left free. It is to be feared that what happens otherwise, not out of a good spirit. Enough of that.

¹⁾ Spalatin writes for the second time that in the sermon on confession I interpret the word of John [Cap.20,23.] more broadly: "Whom you keep them, to them they are kept." ²⁾ If it has not been interpreted by me, I wonder about it, since I had impressed it on my memory, that this is to be treated mainly for the sake of the adversaries, if he is not moved by what moves you, that this is dark. But now it will be difficult for me, since I do not see the preceding and the following, to send you a piece to be inserted on the off chance, but I will try it, if it should be necessary, so that you may insert it, where it can be, in a suitable place, after what must be changed has been changed. He also complains against me about your slowness in printing; therefore I chastise you, yes, I rebuke you in time and out of time. Behold, what more can I do? I am told that you have six presses, and I alone, as I calculate, employ four, the textbook ³⁾ three, and Carlstadt two. I am surprised, however, that my Magnificat ⁴⁾ is not yet finished. However, I would like the Postillen to be printed with good and correct typesetting.

I do not want you to be distressed about my health, or if I find out that you are distressed, I will confess nothing more to you. Who knows if this will not be the end of my ministry? Have I not caused enough trouble for some people? I have not lived in vain; God would have wanted me to live to please God! I see that your spirit increases so much that my spirit seems to decrease. I am also full of praise for this, and yet God wanted me to become nothing, but you to become everything. Only pray for me that my trust in the Lord will not fall away. Answer me, I ask, whether it is advisable to

1) The following up to the end of the letter is missing in the older editions, but according to Kolde it is added to the Erlanger Briefwechsel.

2) Luther complied with this wish. See No. 73, § 7 in this appendix.

3) Liktkoaeus -Melanchthon's I^ooei.

4) St. Louis edition, Vol. VII, 1372. Compare in this appendix No. 74, Zl and No. 73,815.

that I answer the oaks and the Belgötzen (Belis) of the Sorbonne 1). For this matter concerns me, that my name also makes an attack against them, whether with the truth a more extensive defense must be given. For I see that I have to get advice from your spirit.

Spalatin has also written to me about the establishment of the Christian school of learning, but I have answered that this exceeds my powers, as I am a unifier. 2) See to it that you give the man enough; you can give him this letter to read, if you want. 3) Be well. On the day [of the invention] 4) of the first martyr Stephen [August 3] 1521.

Your Martin Luther.

No. 101.

Wittenberg.

March 28, 1522.

Luther to Johann Lang.

Luther disapproves of Längs' departure from the monastery, and in general of the too quick use that many make of Christian freedom. He announces the publication of a missive to the Erfurt congregation and recommends the life of the Elector to Längs' intercession.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 54; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 175 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 323.

To Johann Lang, theologian and evangelist of the church at Erfurt.

JEsus.

Hail! Of course, I believe that your leaving the monastery was not without cause.

1) There were mainly three men who had brought about the Paris verdict of condemnation (St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 932 ff.), namely Li. Noel Beda, syndic of the theological faculty there, Wilhelm a Hukreu or Oucchlnk (of the oak) and a certain Christophorus. As we can see from a letter of Glarean to Zwingli, July 4, 1521 from Paris (2^{vi}Lkll opp. VII, 176), the mocking names Lelna, Ltkreus and Okristoinus were attached to them.

2) No. 78, ?? in this appendix.

3) This that Melanchthon, as we know from Oorp. Rec. I, 448.

4) There are three St. Stephen's days, namely the actual St. Stephen's day, on December 26 (this has Kolde 1.6. erroneously assumed), KtsMani translatio, on May 7, and Ltkplavi invkntio, on August 3. That the latter is to be placed here is beyond doubt according to the contents of the letter.

but I would rather that you had been above all causes; not that I should throw away the freedom to go out, but that I should want the opportunity to be cut off from the adversaries, just as Paul cut off the opportunity from the false apostles, since he preached the gospel in Achaia without pay, 5) and had put apostolic law, freedom and power in the back of his mind. But now I will strive for this too late and in vain. If I have time, I will write a letter to the church at Erfurt 6), although I see that both you and ours have grown beyond my measure in the knowledge of the word, and everywhere the word is fulfilled [John 3:30]: They must grow, but I must decrease.

But the power of the word is either still hidden or all too ringing in all of us, about which I am very surprised. For we are the same as before: hard, unreasonable, impatient, reckless, drunken, lustful, devout: in short, that characteristic and the glorious love of Christians nowhere comes to the fore, and it becomes the opposite of Paul's words [1 Cor. 4:20]: We have the kingdom of God in words, not in power.

I must not come to you, for it is not right that one should tempt God and seek danger of one's own free will, since I have to expect dangers enough here, as one who is excluded by papal and imperial ban and completely exposed to all men to be beaten to death, safe by no other protection than the heavenly. I see that many of our monks leave for no other reason than that for which they entered, that is, for the sake of the belly and carnal freedom, through which Satan will raise a great stink against the good odor of our word. But what shall we do? They are idle people and they seek their own, so it is better that they sin and perish apart from than in the cap, lest they perish twice when they are punished in this life. Greet all of ours, because I do not know which ones are

5) In the editions: "sine S." This has De Wette resolved by sulario according to 2 Cor. 11:9. In the Vulgate the preceding verse reads ^stapsuckinn.

6) St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 962.

may now endure with you, and be at ease in the Lord, amen. I ask you to command in your prayers our cause GOtte, also the life of Duke Frederick. If we do not restrain him by our prayers, I fear that he will not remain with us long. And when this head is taken away, then also the salvation will be taken away, which God has given and still gives to our Syria [2 Kings 5:1]. Wittenberg, Friday after Oculi [March 28] 1522.

Your Martin Luther.

No. 102.

(Wittenberg.)

July 11, 1523.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther answers an exegetical question, expresses his displeasure about the monks leaving, as well as about the publication of his letters without his consent. He completed the writing "Wider die Verkehrer und Fälscher des kaiserlichen Edicts" and was working on the interpretation of the 7th chapter of the first letter to the Corinthians.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 139 b; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 356 and in Erlanger Briefw., vol. IV, p. 177.

To the Lord Georg Spalatin, servant of Christ, evangelist at Hese, his [friend] in the HERN.

1. grace and peace! It is a long time since I answered you to the passage of John [Cap. 14, 31]: 1) "Arise, and let us depart"; I am surprised that you did not receive it. I do not think much of secret interpretations, but it seems to me to mean the exit from the constraint of the law into the freedom of grace, just as the dining room was in a closed house and a closed city, but the garden under the open sky. But this freedom brings persecution, and Christ suffers because of the word of freedom.

I know no monk from Zelle except Thomas, the apothecary, 2) who has long since left for Eisenach. I do not see why they should flee if they rightly offer themselves, as I do; moreover, if they want to snatch those or me away by force, then ge-

May the will of the Lord be done. It is indeed very troublesome to me that runaway monks fly here in such large numbers, and what is even more annoying to me is that they soon marry, although they are a kind of people who are quite unfit to acquire anything. I am thinking daily about a council to put a measure on this matter.

My letters written in German have gone out of print through no fault of my own. I wanted to send them closed and sealed, but D. Hieronymus has published one, namely the one to the virgins 3), the other one Amsdorf. Indeed, I wish nothing so much as to publish nothing, for I am tired of writing such things. But the press of Lucas 4) needs money, so I have explained the mandate of the emperor 5) and now I am editing the 7th chapter of the Corinthians. -I have become a servant of foreign profit or even of greed; how gladly I do this, since I am so busy, you can easily believe. I have not yet published anything at all, nor will I publish anything, unless I am looked over by others, so that I keep the order.

I send Hadrian's bull 6) against Prince Frederick, but send it back immediately. It is thought to be Hadrian's own style and wisdom, but it has been withheld because of the Cardinals' threats and meanwhile secretly left out. Farewell and greet all of ours. In haste, on Saturday after Ciliano [July 11] 1523. Martin Luther.

No. 103.

(Wartburg.)

January 13, 1522.

Luther to Melanchthon.

Luther is not satisfied with the answer of the Archbishop of Mainz and with Capito's letter; he wants to answer the latter. He speaks at length about the Zwickau prophets and defends the infant baptism they rejected.

3) The letter published by D. Hieronymus Schürf is found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. X, 1930; the other one is found there, Col. 706.

4) Lucas Cranach and Döring jointly owned a print shop.

5) In this volume no. 733. - The interpretation of the 7th chapter of the first letter to the Corinthians is found in the St. Louis edition, vol. VIII, 1026. It was published by Lucas Cranach and Döring.

6) The bull of Hadrian VI is found in this volume No. 716, the answer of the Elector to it No. 717.

1) This letter is missing.

2) There was a pharmacy in the Alten-Zelle monastery.

Handwritten in the Ood. Kolter zu Dresden, O. 351, Bl. 36; in the old royal library at Copenhagen, HL". 1393, x>. 53 (orthographically very faulty) and in the Ood. den. d. 14. Printed by Aurifaber, vol. II, bl. 41; by De Wette, vol. II, p. 124; by Seoksuäorl, lib. I, s 118, x>. 192d the U 2 and 3 (according to Aurifaber, but under the date: the ^utonii 86U 17.1) dun.) and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 272.

To Philip Melanchthon, Christ's faithful servant and steward, my brother.

JEsus.

1. Hail! If the letter of Mainz 2) had been alone, he would have won, but now that that of Fabricius has been added, they show their deceitfulness and falsehood, which I dislike extraordinarily in Fabricius. I wanted an end to ungodliness, and that orator leads the cause of ungodliness by teaching the bishop to confess his personal sins, and thinks that in this way Luther is well deceived. I will also keep to myself that I do not treat man as he deserves in the first letter, but I will give an indication, so that he knows that man has breath in his nose [Is. 2, 22].

(2) I come to the prophets, (3) and first of all, I do not approve of your timidity, since you have both a greater spirit and greater learning than I do. And first, since they bear witness to themselves, they need not be heard immediately, but according to the counsel of John [1 Ep. 4, 1] the spirits are to be tested. If you cannot test them, then you have Gamaliel's advice [Acts 5:38] to postpone it; for I do not yet hear that anything is said or done by them that Satan could not also do or imitate. But you may inquire for me whether they can prove their profession. For God has never sent anyone unless he is either called by a man or proven by signs, even the

1) On January 17, Luther answered Capito's letter. Seckendorf's error may be due to a confusion of the date of this letter with that of the next one (No. 104), which is written on the same day and deals with the same matter.

2) St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 552; Luther's reply to Wolfgang Fabricius Capito's letter ibid. there, Col. 554.

3) namely the Zwickau prophets.

Son. The prophets had the right from the law and the prophethood in former times, as we have the right now through men. I do not want them to be accepted if they claim that they were called by a mere revelation, since God did not even want to speak to Samuel, unless Eli gave him the order to do so and knew it [1 Sam, 3, 4. ff.]. This belongs first to the public exercise of teaching.

(3) Now, in order to find out their special (privatum) spirit, ask them if they have experienced spiritual afflictions, divine birth, death and hell. If you hear that everything is pleasant, calm, devout (as they call it) and spiritual (religiosa), you should not approve of them, even if they say that they have been raptured into the third heaven, because the sign of the Son of Man is missing, who is the proving stone, the certain tester of Christians and the certain discernor of spirits. Do you want to know the place, the time, the manner of the conversations with God? Hear: like a lion he hath broken all my bones [Isa. 38, 13.], and [Ps. 31, 23.], "I am cast out of thine eyes," and [Ps. 88, 4.], "My soul is full of woe, and my life is nigh unto hell." The Majesty (as they call it) does not speak so directly that man sees it, rather [Ex. 33:20.], "No man shall live that seeth me." Nature cannot bear even a little glimmer (stellam) of his speech. For this is why he speaks through men, because when he speaks, we all cannot bear it. For the angel also frightened the virgin [Luc. 1, 29.], so also Daniel [Dan. 8, 17.]. So also Jeremiah laments [Cap. 10, 24.], "Chasten me with measures," and [Cap. 17, 17.], "Only be thou not terrible unto me." And what shall I make many words? as if the Majesty could speak confidentially with the old man, and need not first kill him and dry him up, lest the exceeding evil odors of the same should offend, since He is a consuming fire [Deut. 4, 24.]. The dreams and visions of the saints are also terrifying, at least after they are understood. Therefore, do not even hear the glorified Jesus, because you have seen him crucified before.

You will say: What is the point of this? For this is to refute others, not to prove ours. But how can I speak of it, being absent, not knowing what they plead? If they assert nothing else than this [Marc. 16, 16.]: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," and that the little children cannot believe for themselves, this does not move me at all. For how will they prove that they do not believe? Because they do not speak and do not show their faith? How nice! If this reason is valid, how many hours will we Christians spend sleeping and doing other things? Can't God in the same way keep faith in them during the whole time of childhood, as in a constant sleep? Quite well, you will say, this refutes the adversaries with respect to the faith already infused. But this is enough for the time being, that they are found to be such people who prove nothing, and are driven by a false spirit. But what do you say about the faith that is to be infused? There is absolutely nothing left but the foreign faith. If we cannot receive it, there is nothing left to argue about, but the baptism of little children must simply be rejected.

You say that the examples of the foreign faith are exceedingly weak. I say that nothing is firmer. Let them show, or all the devils, that an example of the foreign faith is weak. For that you say that Samuel prayed for Saul is nothing. He suffered for Saul [1 Sam. 15, 35.], he did not pray; or if he prayed, he did not pray in faith, that is, he did not believe that what he asked could be obtained, but put it in doubt and in the will of God, as David did when he asked for his babe [2 Sam. 12, 16.], and many for many others. For if he had thought it certain that he would receive it, he would have obtained it in any case. For the promise of Christ must be certain, Matth. 21, 22.: "All things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive them", and Matth. 18, 19.: "Where two of you shall become one on earth" 2c. It must therefore be unshakably certain that it is impossible for this not to be the case.

Otherwise the whole doctrine of faith will be shaken, and even one's own faith will be worthless, since it is based on the promises of the same. Yes, the faith of another is our own, but it is alien to another; nevertheless, it is necessary that what he believes should be done to another. All the examples of the Gospel belong to this category. For Christ also never rejected even one who was brought to him through alien faith, but accepted all. And what more can I say? The testimonies and examples of the whole Scripture are on the side of foreign faith, that is, on the side of one's own faith, which obtains faith for the other and all that he wants.

6 Now there remains the question whether the church believes that the faith is poured into the little children. For perhaps this question is raised with reference to the church, not with reference to the foreign faith or its efficacy. What the foreign faith is able to do cannot be disputed, since everything is possible to him who believes. But this question is of fact, not of right. For we cannot dispute whether the church must believe that faith is infused into infants, since she has the power not to baptize infants at all, and there is no passage of Scripture that could compel her to believe this, as they [Scripture passages] are there for other articles. Now what shall we do here? We do not prove the right. Who sees the faith? Therefore we must go to confession, since confession is made with the mouth for salvation. Now what does the church profess to believe in this article? Is it not this, that the children also are partakers of the benefits and promises of Christ? But it is objected: How if Augustine and those whom you call the church, or even think that they are, have erred in this article? Who will make us certain, since we cannot prove that they must believe so? But this objection may be thus rejected: If not the law, yet the fact is there that [this] is actually believed in the church. For who can be sure that Augustine does not believe the three-

What is the truth that he believed in unity when his confession is not believed? I am certain that his confession agrees with Scripture, but that he believes as he confesses, I am uncertain. But I see that by a strange miracle of God it has happened that this article alone, that even little children must be baptized, has never been denied, not even by the heretics: so that no confession of anyone 1) is against it, but on the contrary the constant and unanimous confession of the whole world for the present cause. But if one denies that this is the confession of the true and right church, then I consider this to be an exceedingly great impiety. For this seems to me to be the same as denying the church, for if this were not so, that church would doubtless at times have made the opposite confession, since the faith of the church has never ceased, and it has never been without confession of what it believes. You, as a man of understanding, will be able to deduce more from this.

(7) Since bringing a child to baptism is nothing else than bringing him to Christ, who is present on earth and opens the hands of grace, and since he has shown by all examples that he accepts what is brought to him, why do we doubt here? At least this we have taken from these prophets, that they cannot prove their own, since they lack an example and testimony, but we have examples and testimonies, so that even their testimony does not contradict us. For who can conclude thus? One must believe and baptize, so the children are not to be baptized. For they cannot draw this conclusion from this passage, since it does not prove that the children do not believe. They presuppose this, and must prove it elsewhere, but cannot. Now what is not contrary to Scripture is for Scripture, and Scripture for the same. With the same subtlety they could also annul circumcision and say: The little children do not have the faith of Abraham, therefore they must not have the sign of the same faith, while it is certain for us, that circumcision had the same power as baptism. Therefore, I do not see why infants should not be baptized according to the word of God and according to this example; only that baptism is free, not forced, like circumcision. Therefore, it did not have to be restricted to certain times, ages, ages and other external things, since it is completely free in itself. What was then said to one people for the eighth day is now said to all people of every age: "He who believes" 2c.

1) We have assumed ullius with the Copenhagen manuscript instead of illius in the Aisgaben.

8 But more orally. I have always expected Satan to touch this boil, but he has not done so through the papists. Among ourselves and among ours he undertakes this exceedingly severe division, but Christ will tread him under our feet in a little while [Rom. 16:20]. I would also like to know how you take the word 1 Cor. 7, 14. "Otherwise your children would be unclean, but now they are holy," whether you want this to be understood of adults alone or of the holiness of the flesh? For I would like this to prove that the little children were baptized according to apostolic custom and in the time of the apostles. Although I see what can be said about this sanctification, I would also like to hear your judgment about it. For why should he speak of infants alone, since all things are holy to the saints, and all things are pure to the pure?

9) Keep the booklet against the bishop of Mainz, 2) so that it can go out and serve as a general punishment, if others should be nonsensical. Prepare an inn for me, because the translation [of the Bible] will require me to return to you, and ask the Lord that it be done with his will. But I wish to be hidden as much as possible; meanwhile I will continue with what I have undertaken. Farewell. On Octave Epiphany [January 13] 1522.

Your Martin Luther.

2) For this, compare St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIX, Introduction, p. 27.

No. 104.

Wartburg. January

17, 1522.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther counsels leniency against the Zwickau prophets. He is determined to return to Wittenberg, and wishes that the Elector may be calm about those enthusiasts. Similarly, with respect to Duke George, who assailed the Dukes of Saxony with complaints about the Wittenberg innovations (Seckendorf, nist. iMtü., 11b. I, §130, p.217).

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 40b; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 135 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 286.

To Georg Spalatin, Saxon secretary (ab epistolis), his most trusted friend in the Lord.

JEsus.

Hail! I have received everything, my dear Spalatin, even the sack, although later than the other. Of course, I do not come because of the Zwickau prophets, nor do I change, for they have no influence on me. But I would not like them to be thrown into bonds, especially by those who praise ours. The people of Eilenburg 1) have innovations either imposed on them or imputed to them in regard to the use of the sacrament. In the past I was disturbed by rumors, so that I went to Wittenberg myself and watched, 2) but now I hear greater things every day. I will certainly return in a short time, God willing, and, if not to Wittenberg, certainly elsewhere either remain or stay as a stranger. For that is what the matter requires. I do not want the prince to be concerned about me, although I would like him to have my faith or I his power. I do not doubt that without bloodshed and sword we would laugh at these two smoking fires [Is. 7, 4]. The most unfortunate Duke George does in this matter what he has decided to do about him, who is terrifying in his advice about the children of men [Ps. 66, 5. Vulg.]. This is the hatred that he has long had for

He does not see that this is hatred. The Lord look at him, if he should be worth it; I cannot do anything else. You also see to it that our prince does not stain his hands with the blood of those new Zwickau prophets. Farewell and pray for me.

Neither the bishop's [of Mainz] nor Capito's letter 3) pleases me, because of the unfortunate and all-too-revealing falsehood. I have answered Fabricius, not the bishop, until I recognize his spirit. From the desert, 1522, on St. Anthony's Day [January 17].

Martin Luther.

The Bible I await with impatience, 4) because my word has been committed to it.

No. 105.Wittenberg¹²

. April 1522.

Luther to Joh. Lang in Erfurt.

Luther warns against violent innovations in Erfurt and urges vigilance and steadfastness. He complains about the apostasy of some of his followers.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 59; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 180 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p.330.

JEsus.

Hail! Above all, beware that the people of Erfurt do not imitate the tempestuous nature of ours in the removal of images, masses, one figure, and all other things. Only through the Word must all the aversions be removed, so that they fall away of their own accord and are destroyed without hand, just as the idols were removed by the apostles. They should also teach and insist on faith and love; the rest is known by itself. I do not have time to write to your preachers. If you take offense at the private mass, why do you not abstain from it? For what need is there to keep it? Can you not take the word of the mass without the form of the sacrament? or communicate somewhere?

1) In Eilenburg, the Augustinian monk Gabriel Zwilling, who had come there from Wittenberg, reformed in a stormy manner around New Year's Day 1522. Compare Seidemann, "Erläuterungen," p. 35 ff.

2) See St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 560.

3) See St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 661 and 663.

4) The Erl. Briefw. reads excepto, whereas the other editions read exopto; the former is probably a typographical error, since no variant is given for it; also not in Burkhardt, p.43.

with your comrades. But my book, 1) which is already under the press, will expose my opinion more widely to the whole world.

You have my opinion of the widows' faith in the apostle in the booklet of the vows; I have nothing else. You ask me for notes on Isaiah, thinking that I, like you, would have good leisure and rest all day, while I should ask such from you. Why you should not go to chapter 2) I do not see, especially since you are called, since you can also do this safely and it is held among friends; why do you fear where there is nothing to fear?

By the way, I ask you to pray diligently for me and this matter. Satan attacks us with the highest, yes, from all forces. The enemies boast in a published booklet of the "recantation of two Lutherans," 3) our Jacob and a certain Hermann. Melchior Mirisch did not recant, but writes that he acted wisely to gain their favor, that is, he worshipped Satan and pretended to know Christ, 4) the fine boaster! Many others have been forced to sign Jacob's recantation. I have seen Mirisch's handwriting to Spalatin, which tells in many words the lamentable and terrible story of Jacob's recantation. Command also all of yours this matter and tell them in my name that they should pray humbly with constant prayer before God. They are to teach humbly and quietly among men, and then also to be courageous and steadfast against Satan. The matter is no longer a joke or a game, but will become serious and demand life and blood. The Lord Jesus, who has once again

1) "Luther's Opinion of Both Forms" 2c. St. Louis edition, vol. XX 62.

2) which was to be held at Grimma on Pentecost.

3) Namely Jakob Probst, the former Augustinian prior in Antwerp, and Hermann Garrits (Geradäus), a Utrecht and sub-priest at the Jacobi church there, who had to recant on January 13 in the Cecilia church.

4) Melchior Mirisch, von der Heyde, Augustinian prior in Dresden, preached the Gospel in Magdeburg. See Seidemann, "Erläuterungen," p. 148; Seckendorf, List. Luth. lib. I, 240 b and 246 a.

let his gospel shine, strengthen the hearts of all of us to the praise of his grace. Amen.

Of the evil that God does, why do you argue about it? I see that you are idle, with such great disturbances of Satan. He has no need of a work, nor is it a work about which you dispute, but it is an omission of a work on the part of God. For this is why we do evil, because he ceases to work in us and lets nature in its wickedness do what it does. Otherwise, when he works, nothing but good follows. And this omission of God is called "hardening" in Scripture. For evil cannot be done by God], since it is nothing, but therefore it happens when good does not happen or is hindered. But underneath be well. Wittenberg, given on the day before Palmarum [April 12] 1522.

Martin Luther.

The prophet Marcus 5) together with the Zwickau prophets were punished and reminded by me; unwillingly they left. One of them was completely angry, so that I have never seen a more angry person. So impatient was this spirit against a friendly and brotherly admonition. But Satan we met quite obviously.

No. 106.

Luther to Spalatin.

This number at Walch is not a special letter, but the postscript to No. 93 of this appendix, which we have transferred there.

No. 107.

Wittenberg.

March 19, 1522.

Luther to Wenc. Link.

Luther informs Link of his return to Wittenberg, rebukes Carlstadt's and Zwilling's violent proceedings. He praises the resolutions of the Augustinian Convention; he is full of courage against his enemies, especially Duke George, but fears that they will incite the people to revolt by their foolish actions.

5) Marcus Thomä from Elsterberg was also called Stübner, because his father had a bathhouse in Elsterberg. He was inscribed in Wittenberg on May 26, 1518. About him see St. Louis edition, vol. XX, introduction, p. 10 df, Ibid. Vol. XXII, 1010 f., 1822, No. 125.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 9 (with the wrong year: 1521); in De Wette, vol. II, p. 156 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 315. In Seckendorf, Hist. lmtl., lib. I, p. 177d is an excerpt (§§ 3 and 4) with the wrong date: "a. 27. l'sdr."

JESUS.

Hail! In order that you may know that I am at Wittenberg, my venerable Father in Christ, I have written this to you with my hand. Satan has made an incursion into this hurdle of mine, and has taught to make the liberty of the spirit an occasion for the flesh, and, setting aside the ministration of love, to confound all things by the most obstinate robberies. Carlstadt and Gabriel were the authors of these abominations. Gabriel recognizes himself and has changed to another man, but what he will be and do I do not know. It is decided to forbid him the pulpit, which he has climbed out of his own presumption, without profession, against the will of God and men. Therefore, as he did not come from God, so he did not teach from God; and the fruit itself proves whose word he spoke and whose honor he sought. He whom God sent speaks the words of God [John 3:34], again, he who seeks the glory of Him who sent him is true [John 7:18]. This cause has forced me to return, so that, if Christ wills, I may destroy this game of Satan.

The statement of your assembly 1) has pleased me extraordinarily. For the Holy Spirit never seems to have been on the assemblies of the monks, except on this one. I hope that the Lord has begun to ridicule and mock Satan and his servants. Certainly, Satan is defeated, the pope with his abominations is also defeated, his last and least power must be overcome (as I see), namely the wrath of the water bubbles, which are perfectly inflated among you. We believe that Christ, the Son of God, is the Lord of life and death: who therefore should we fear? We have the firstfruits of victory and triumph over the papal tyranny.

1) At Wittenberg at the beginning of the year. There, it was decided to abjure the corner masses and the freedom to leave the monastery.

rannet, which before oppressed kings and princes; how much more shall we overcome and despise the princes themselves! He is not lying who said [Ps. 8:7], "Thou hast put all things under his feet." That he said: "all things", does he not understand in this also the anger of this water bubble at Dresden 2) and of all who have now been to Nuremberg? They may certainly try it and continue to push Christ down; in the meantime we will surely see that the Father can keep the Son at His right hand before the face and the tail of this smoking fire.

I am very much afraid, however, that if the princes should continue to listen to the foolish brain of Duke George, there would be an uproar that would corrupt the princes and authorities in all of Germany, and at the same time the entire clergy would also be affected; for this is how this matter appears to me. The people are agitated everywhere and have eyes; they do not want to be oppressed by force, nor can they be. The Lord is the one who does this, and he hides these threats and imminent dangers from the eyes of the princes, yes, through their blindness and violence he will accomplish this, so that I think I see Germany swimming in blood. Therefore, for the sake of Christ's mercy, my dear Wenceslaus, I ask you to pray with us, together with your own, and we will stand as a wall against God for the people on this day of His great wrath. The matter at hand is serious, and that foolish head in Dresden does not care about the people's cause if he can only exercise his nonsense and ingrained hatred.

4. then, if you are able to do something, make an effort that through your councilors the princes will be moved to make and act decrees modestly and without violence; they should consider that the people are no longer such as they were before; they should know that the sword in their own house (domesticum) is certainly near their necks. They are going about to destroy Luther, but Luther is certainly going about it so that they may be preserved; not Luther, but they are facing destruction, which is they intend, so much is missing that I should fear them. I certainly believe that I speak this in the spirit. If then wrath is determined in heaven, so that it cannot be prevented either by prayer or by good counsel, we want to obtain it so that our Josiah 1) may fall asleep in peace, and the world be left to its own Babylon.

2) Duke George. - "Die zu Nürnberg" is the Reichsregiment to which Duke Georg belonged.

What Christ remembers I do not know, but this I do know, that I have never had so stout and proud a spirit in this matter as I have just now. And although I am exposed at every hour to the danger of death in the midst of the enemy, without all human protection, I have never in my life despised anything so much as these foolish threats of Duke George and his kind. And this spirit (do not doubt it) will be master over Duke George and all who are of the same foolishness. I write this soberly and early in the day, in full confidence of a godly heart. My Christ lives and reigns, and I shall live and reign. Farewell, dearest Wenceslaus. Wednesday after Reminiscere [March 19] 1522.

Your Martin Luther.

No. 108. Luther to Caspar Güttel.

This letter is duplicated in the 15th volume of Walch's old edition, namely No. 663 and here. Because we have already included it there, we leave it out here.

No. 109.

(Wittenberg.)

May 29, 1522.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther refutes the Anabaptist teachings of Thomas Münzer. Then about the employment of Zwilling in Altenburg.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 67; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 201 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 377.

His friend in the Lord, Georg Spalatin, ecclesiastics at the court of Saxony.

JEsus.

1. grace and peace in Christ! That the doctrine of Thomas (Muenzer) of the infant-

1) The Elector Frederick died in peace (on May 5, 1525), like Josiah [2 Kings 22:20], at the beginning of the Peasants' War. The battle of Frankenhausen was on May 15.

I know that baptism has driven its roots very deep, and yet one does not take care that it is torn out of all hearts, because there has been no ungodliness or error that has not finally adhered to the greater part all the more stubbornly. Would to God that it could be torn out of the hearts of some! But their reasons of proof do not force anything.

First of all the one of Marcus 2) [Marc. 16, 16.]: "Whoever believes and is baptized" 2c. How do they want to prove that the little children do not believe? By the fact that they do not show their faith? But according to this way 3) we would not be believers either, while we sleep, eat, work, or do something else than believe. What sleep is for us, we consider childlike age for them, and that Satan is summoned by the word of God with the prayer of the church, we believe, because the word of God does not go out of his mouth in vain, as Isaiah testifies, Cap. 55, 11. With me it makes no difference whether an adult or a child is converted by the word; indeed, with an adult there is more opposition to the word, namely reason, wisdom, experience 2c. But to be baptized with fire and with the Holy Spirit is the same thing, that is, that the Holy Spirit be given to believers, so that by him all sins be drowned, and if any remain, they be accounted sunk for his sake. Read Philip's loci communes of water baptisms. John by his baptism only gave a sign and signified the teaching of the law. Christ gives both the sign and the thing, which is the grace of the Holy Spirit imparted by the doctrine of the Evangelii; therefore we say that as the children believe, so they are baptized with fire.

But the fact that the children of Israel were circumcised on the eighth day contradicts them. This circumcision was the sign of faith in the future Christ who was in Abraham. Therefore, when they also say here

2) Marcus Thomä Stübner.

3) In the Erlanger Briefwechsel oratione, in the other editions: ratiatus. The former seems to us to be a printing error.

If they would say that the children did not believe, so they were circumcised in vain, then Christ will meet them Matth. 19, 14. When little children were brought to him, that he touched them and prayed for them, and the disciples resisted them, he said: "Let the little children come to me, for such is the kingdom of heaven. Here Christ does not have to lie or speak figuratively, since he speaks of these little children brought to him, and the kingdom of heaven can only belong to those who believe.

Baptism, then, is the sign of faith in Christ who reigns at the present time; therefore the infants who receive it must be held equal to those who were circumcised. If circumcision gave them the kingdom of heaven, why not also baptism? Especially since here sanctification is added through the word and prayer and through the faith of the church, which brings these infants to Christ and asks that he lay his hands on them and intercede for them. But we will do this more widely when they begin to press us publicly.

I am sending here the petition of the Altenburgers, who request me to write for them, so that they may obtain Gabriel; but I have already written about him before, and I fully believe that the letter has been handed over to the prince. I am of the opinion that Gabriel is called there, and have therefore commanded him not to leave until the prince has sent another there and thus expels him by force, and he should not leave there either on my advice or with my help, for he will be forced. I know what the prince fears; I also know that we are still in the flesh and fear many things where there is nothing to fear. In short, the prince and the court may do what they want in this matter; I will not resist the Holy Spirit, they may watch for themselves. My opinion is that I do not approve, nor do I agree, that Gabriel should be removed from there; again, I do not intend to recommend him further, or to protect him in that place against force; you may see. Fare well in the Lord. Hurry, on the day of the Ascension [May 29]. 1)

No. 110.

(Wittenberg.)

July 10, 1522.

Luther to Gabriel Zwilling in Altenburg.

Luther writes to him that he is now free to leave Altenburg after the Elector has appointed someone else to take his place. Expert opinion in two cases of betrothal.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 80; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 219 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 428.

JESUS.

Grace and peace! Since the prince has thus, according to God's will, put another in your place, you are free to go away and return either to us or to your former place; 2) therefore do what pleases you until you are called elsewhere, and in the meantime, like Elijah, be guided by your will [1 Kings 19:3].

In these betrothals, freedom must be used according to the parents' determination, so the former betrothal may be null and void if the parents so wish and consent, even though they sin, one against the other, 3) with lies and deceit. This is also my opinion in the second betrothal case, after the mother has absolved the young man and the girl has finally consented. But they are to be punished because of their recklessness, inconstancy and lies. Fare well in the Lord. 1522, Thursday after Ulrich [July 10].

Your Martin Luther.

No. 111.

(Wittenberg.)

April 21, 1822.

Luther to Spalatin.

Intercession for a poor man for employment. Carlstadt's plan to have Wider Luther printed. _____

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 60d; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 186 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 343.

2) Ellenburg.

3) In the editions there is a comma between alteri alter, which does not seem right to us. Consequently, the old translator offers: "although the others sin, since one part lies and deceives".

To the Lord George Spalatin, the court (aulico), that is, a wonderful evangelist.

JEsus.

Hail! Send these little books to my host in the kingdom of the birds, I beg you, my dear Spalatin; I did not have time to write a letter now. There is also Mattis Buchbinder, whom I promised to intercede for, if he could perhaps become bridge master in Wittenberg, since this office is done. For he is poor and suffers from lack; but if a more suitable man is available, I would not insist on it, but that he be helped in some other way; do what you can and must. I will send back Mirisch's letter.

I privately asked Carlstadt today that he would not publish anything against me, otherwise I would be forced, although unwillingly, to put on my horns against him and to fight with him. But the man almost sacredly prays that he will not write anything against me, even though the sextons speak quite differently, who are already under the hand of the Rector 1) and the judges. It is certain that I will not suffer what he has written, after he has scorned the offense. 2) But they deal with it, that he either recants or suppresses the booklet, which I do not insist on. For I do not fear Satan himself, nor an angel from heaven, much less Carlstadt. Fare well and pray for the glory of the Gospel. May Christ keep our prince for a while longer, for I pray for this daily. Again, be well. On the second day of Easter [April 21] 1522, Martin Luther.

No. 112.

Wittenberg.

January 2, 1523.

Luther to Spalatin.

About the abatement of the ailments in the monastery at Wittenberg. Request for venison for a doctor's feast and for a salary for Bugenhagen, who was forced to take payment for his lectures.

1) The Rector was M. Joh. Hessus (Eisenmann, Llantarns) from October 18, 1521.

2) On this matter, see St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, Introduction, p. 17 b f.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. III; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 283 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. IV, p. 53.

To the learned and pious man, Georg Spalatin, evangelist at the court of Saxony, his brother in Christ.

Grace and peace! How our Bethaven 3) can be changed without annoying the neighbors and causing offense to the living, who can easily say that, my dear Spalatin? especially if you want to call it an annoyance or an offense, which annoys the papists and the godless. If you do not know it yet: the priests, almost all of them, not only act ungodly there, but also fornicate almost every night with hardened hearts as despisers of God and man, and say mass early with an insolent and hardened brow. Even Amsdorf witnesses that, with the exception of perhaps three, all of them are public fornicators. Now consider what this abomination deserves from God for the prince and his people, at whose expense it is obtained. Who knows whether our gospel does not prosper less because of this, since we not only tolerate ungodly people, but also that publicly wicked people serve the divine holy acts, which are to be administered with timidity, only for the sake of shameful gain? I have preached, of course, that even if they should be left in their ungodly ways, it is the office of the authorities to prevent their fornication or to force them to marry. For even if no one is to be forced to godliness and faith, public deeds of shame must be stopped. Would God that the prince would at least stop the masses that he maintains out of the salary of the chamber, so that some start would be made in the renewal of things. But I will talk more about this matter with Amsdorf.

By the way, when I wrote the other day for Johann Pommer because of Wildprets for his wedding, you feared that the prince would be accused of publicly showing favor to the priests who had been prayed over, and you gave me the same thing. Now something else is before the

3) The monastery at Wittenberg; compare St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, introduction, p. 51 b.

Hand. Two very good fathers with us, Johann Westermann and Gottselig von Hervord, 1) will receive the papal doctorate in theology within a month, and will glorify the last part (caudam) of this prerogative, if you will be an intercessor for us with the prince because of Wildpret. For although they know the matter very well, they yield to their superiors and become fools; who knows to what fruit finally for wisdom? Therefore, there is no danger here now, if the prince gives it, yes, an opportunity for hypocrisy, by which he can lift the former suspicion. Therefore, do this service of love here and serve this foolishness with us.

Nor do I want this to be hidden from you, that up to now it was a praise for our high school that through the generosity of the prince the lectures could be heard for free. But now, Pomeranus has diminished this fame through his lecture 2) out of an unavoidable necessity, namely, because he cannot teach for free, and yet the audience complains to buy what

1) Johann Westermann from Münster, Augustinian at Lippstadt, had already studied in Wittenberg in 1510, but was sent there again by his convent in 1521. He graduated pro l'issnsia on Oct. 31, 1522, and as a doctor on Feb. 3, 1523. In 1524 he returned to his monastery in Lippstadt and was active there for the Reformation. As a result, he was attacked by the Archbishop of Cologne, Duke John of Eleve and Count Simon of Lippe. In 1526, the Cologne theologians sent the heretic D. Joh. Host de RomberZ there; however, he refused to debate with Westermann in Lippstadt, while Westermann refused to debate in Cologne; because Host 'condemned his doctrine before the people here, he also wanted to defend it here. When the Latin mass was abolished in 1531, the princes demanded his expulsion, but could only force the citizens to let him go in 1533 by cutting off the supply of food. From Münster, where he had gone, he had to give way to the Anabaptists already in January 1534. Then, on the recommendation of Antonius Corvinus to Landgrave Philip, he came to Geismar as pastor, where he died at an advanced age. - "Gottselig von Hervord" is after the Wittenberg ^ldnm, p. 108: l'satsrl Ootsstalsns Orop. l'sstsr ^UsoloAias in the Augustinian monastery at Hervord, inscribed on October 4, 1521. He graduated pro l'assncua November 28, 1522, and as Doctor of Theology February 3, 1523. He went to Eimbeck in 1525, where he introduced the Reformation with other Augustinians. He was expelled by the local canons and council in 1526, but was soon called back and became pastor of the Neustadt church. He died in 1540.

2) about the Psalms.

They do not want to do without them, while those who have salaries either do not read or cannot be compared with Pomeranus in any respect. They therefore do not grumble against Pomeranus, to whom, as they know, the salaries of those sows belong, but because they do not have free lectures. In this hope, those who have fewer means have come here. Therefore, if you can, give this to the prince; it might please him that these things are also advised. Although the lectures of Philip and Carlstadt, as they are very good, may be plentiful enough, I would not like that those of Pomeranus were missing, because those of Carlstadt take place irregularly (sit⁹ incerti temporis). This for you in confidence. Farewell and pray for me. I ask you to answer about the game pretis, so that we know what they can do. Wittenberg, on the Octave of Stephanus [2 January] 1523.

Martin Luther.

No. 113.

April 8, 1523.

(Wittenberg.)

Lucher to W. Link in Altenburg.

Luther reports that he will come to Link's wedding with several Wittenberg friends, and that nine nuns who had left in Wittenberg had arrived.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 130d; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 318 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. IV, p. 126.

Grace and peace! I, Philip, the provost [Jonas], D. Hieronymus [Schurf], Pommer, our prior [Brisger] and Jakob [Provost], and Joachim [Camerarius] will certainly come, if the Lord does not make it in special way, which we did not want to do. 1) Carlstadt is not at home. Then Hieronymus Krappe 2) and Master Lucas [Cranach]. Then there is whether the wives of the provost and Jerome will come along at the same time, about which no decision has yet been made. Yesterday I received nine nuns from the convent at Nimpschen 3) from captivity, among them the two Zeschaus and the Staupitzin. Fare well with your bride in the Lord. On Easter Wednesday [April 8] 1523. Yours, Martin Luther.

3) It seems to us that instead of sit we should read: sint, referring to l'sstions. - This sentence, according to the original, reads thus: ^naniHnain ktilippi 6t Oarlstaci! l'sstions, ut 8unt optiwas, ita st abnnusnt, tarnen st kornsrani noli adssss, ynoü Oarlstaüii sit insrti tsinporis. Aurifaber and De Wette read kornsrano. After that, the old translator offers: "Obgleichi Philippi und Carlstadts Lectiones sind sehr gut, und viel haben, so wollte sich] doch auch nicht, dass Pomeranus das miste, was etwa Carlstadt auf ungewissse Zeit haben möchte." Jäger, "Carlstadt", p. 299, summarizes the words: ita st adnnusnt so: Luther only regrets that Carlstadt does not hold the lectures regularly, "since they are very well attended".

No. 114.

Wittenberg.
1522. 4)

Towards the end of Luther to Christoph Hofmann.

Luther warns Hofmann, who had presented certain questions to Carlstadt, against such opinions as the Zwickau prophets had harbored, which even Carlstadt had not yet sufficiently resisted.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 308; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 276 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. IV, p. 50.

Grace and peace be with you! From the friends who are well-disposed toward you, best Christoph, I have learned of your questions, which you submitted to Doctor Andreas Carlstadt, about the

1) Link married a daughter of the Altenburg advocate Suicerus on April 14 and 15. Luther married him in the Bartholomew Church and preached a sermon in praise of marriage. For fear of the canons, armed citizens escorted the bride and groom home from the church (Seckendorf, Nist. l'utU., lid. I, p. 214d).

2) Melanchthon's father-in-law and his brother-in-law had the same name.

3) The Cistercian nunnery in Nimpschen near Grimma was founded in 1251 by the landgrave Heinrich the Illustrious of Thuringia. Among the nuns who escaped was Catharina von Bora. She could not return to her family, because her father was subject to Duke George because of his property Hirschfeld, and remained until her marriage with Luther in the house of the town clerk, later mayor, in Wittenberg, M. Philipp Reichenbach. For similar reasons, the other nuns did not return to their home, but to Wittenberg.

4) This letter has the obviously wrong date of 1525 in Aurifaber. It belongs to the year 1522, which is clear from the fact that Carlstadt is still mentioned in a friendly way, also Luther's conversation with the Zwickau prophets is remembered. Jäger, "Carlstadt", p. 298 f., places it "towards the end of the year 1522". - Hofmann was later a pastor in Jena. Cf. St. Louis edition, vol. XX, introduction, p. 18 n.

^personal] Assurance of election, on the fall and rising again of the righteous, on alien faith, on infant baptism, on the persistence of the Spirit in the saints 2c. They have also demanded that I, though an unknown to an unknown, should indicate my opinion to you in one word, and I cannot and must not refuse them anything. Therefore, I ask that you also accept my efforts for the best. But I ask you for Christ's sake to beware of these new teachings, for they belong to the prophets who were interrogated from Zwickau in my presence, 5) who are not like themselves in anything and are completely without scripture, speaking from their spirit alone. If I had not seen them myself, I too, moved by the pompous pretensions of others, would have thought that they were something significant. Even Mr. Carlstadt does not yet resist them bravely, either out of guilelessness or good-naturedness. My opinion is this: that we must trust in the grace of God, but remain uncertain about our and other people's future perseverance or providence, as he says [1 Cor. 10:12]: "He who stands there may well see that he does not fall," although there is no doubt that the apostles were certain about their salvation. But, I pray you, how often David fears and cries that he may not be rejected from the presence of God! Finally, we have many examples and passages of Scripture that testify to the fact that it is certain that the faith of others cannot cause me to be blessed through this same faith of others, for each one believes for himself or does not believe; nevertheless, he makes and obtains that I also believe with my own faith. For otherwise what would be the prayers of the believers for the unbelievers, that the name of God may be sanctified, that His kingdom may come? Thus we hold that the infants are given their own faith in baptism, while the foreign faith of the church obtains it and prays for the infant in Christ's Spirit. So we hold that the righteous [Proverbs 24:16] fall seven times and get up again, as long as their mistake is hidden from them. And what shall I speak many things to you? You yourself, since the occasion is given to you, will take more from it. Then the friends wanted only my opinion to be written to you, and I have done so. But Christ keep thy heart and thy mind in the simplicity of Christ, amen. Pray for me. Wittenberg.

5) Compare in this appendix the postscript to No. 105 (of April 12, 1522) and the postscript to No. 93 (of September 4, 1522).

No. 115.

Wittenberg.

January 14, 1524.

Luther to Spalatin in Nuremberg.

Luther expects German hymns written by Spalatin; reports that Carlstadt is publishing books in a new printing house in Jena. From one of Eck's writings. An envoy of Ferdinand had visited him in Wittenberg.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 180 b; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 460 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. IV, p. 277.

To Magister Georg Spalatin, evangelist at the court, his most trusted friend in the Lord.

Grace and peace! I have nothing new to write, my dear Spalatin, only that I await your German poems 1) of which I wrote to you the other day.

Carlstadt, after his fashion, does not stop; in a newly established printing house at Jena he has published books and, it is said, will publish eighteen more. 2) Eck seems to all, not only to me, not worthy of being answered; 3) it is believed that the sophist, full of wine, 4) and drunk, is making this slobber among the lapiths.

1) Spiritual songs, of which the letter Walch, old edition, vol. XXI, 920 is about. In De Wette, it is without date and placed at the end of the year 1524, vol. II, p. 590.

2) Carlstadt's printer in Jena was Michael Buchführer. For the writings that Carlstadt had printed in Jena in December 1523 and later, see Jäger, "Carlstadt," p. 301 and pp. 369, 381 and 393. See also St. Louiser Ausgabe, Vol. XX, Einleitung, p. 19 ff.

3) He had a protective writing for the book of the King of England against Luther go out, which had been printed in Rome in May 1523.

4) Cf. Ovid. iVstaworxU. 12, 120.

have spat. The King of England, the defender of the church, is worthy of this defender, and he in turn is worthy of Emser's 5) as defender, therefore they may defend themselves.

I send the seal 6) of the provost Justus Jonas.

Ferdinand's legate, or something else, came to me to see what kind of person I was and what I was doing. He said that I had been rumored by his lord to go armed and surrounded by a guard, to spend my time with whores, playing dice and in taverns, and to shine with I don't know what other honors at the same court. But I am sufficiently used to lies. Farewell in the Lord and pray for me. Wittenberg, Thursday after Octave Epiphaniä [January 14] 1524.

Martin Luther.

No. 116.

Wittenberg.

March 14, 1524.

Luther to Spalatin.

The first part of the book is a description of Carlstadt's writings and undertakings at Orlamünde, and of the error of those who claimed the validity of the Mosaic rights for the Christians.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 185; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 488 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. IV, p. 305.

To the venerable man, Magister Georg Spalatin, servant of the Gospel at the Court of Saxony, his [friend] in the Lord.

1. grace and peace! Lucas has brought the packages of your letters, my dear Spalatin, from which I have learned everything I wanted in abundance. Incidentally, I have heard with sadness the monstrosities of Carlstadt 7).

5) Emser had translated Henry VIII's book into German. Emser had translated Henry VIII's book into German. See St. Louis edition, Vol. XIX, 134, note.

6) Probably the song: "Wo GOtt der HErr nicht bei uns hält", No. 438 in our hymnal, about the 124th Psalm.

7) This will refer to the violent innovations that Carlstadt intends to put into practice (in the letter to Hausmann under the same date it says: wovstruund executed in April, not to Writings).

But God resisted the Jews for a long time, so that they would not kill His Son; at last, since they would not desist, He gave Him up, so that they would not only kill Him, but also condemn Him to the most ignominious death, and thus, after the iniquity of the Amorites was fulfilled [Gen. 15:16], wrath would be executed upon them. And through us Christ has long resisted Carlstadt, but he does not desist, and continues to bring upon himself a swift destruction, and I fear that by compelling us to pray against him also, he will at last merit to be permitted to do harm to his destruction. May Christ prevent him from doing so by his grace, amen. Thus man is inflamed by the unrestrained desire for honor and great name. Pray also, I beseech you, for them. By the way, in the name of the university, we will first call him away from the place where he is not called to the service of the word that he owes here in Wittenberg; finally, if he should not come, we will sue him 1) before the prince. Perhaps I will also admonish him by letter. But this is also another part of the cross and the right destiny of the word, that he who ate his bread should lift his foot above Christ; but Christ lives, who is also the master of Satan.

Those who exalt the administration of justice of Moses must be despised. We have our civil rights under which we live. Thus neither Naaman the Syrian, nor Job, nor Joseph, nor Daniel, nor any other Jews kept their laws outside their country, but those of the nations among whom they were. The laws of Moses alone bound the Jewish people in the place which he had chosen; now they [the laws] are free; otherwise if the judicial things must be kept, there is no reason why we should not also be circumcised and keep all ceremonial ordinances. Fare well and pray for me. Wittenberg, Monday after Judica [March 14] 1524.

Martin Luther.

No. 117.

Wittenberg.

October 27, 1524.

Luther to Amsdorf in Magdeburg. 2)

Luther apologizes for his late writing. Says that he did not handle translating Melanchthon's Loci. He reports that Reinhard in Jena published the events in Orlamünde to Carlstadt's honor and Luther's disgrace. Of Carlstadt's letter to Orlamünde after he had been expelled from there. About Egranus, about the pastor of Kahla, and Reinhard's dismissal.

Handwritten in 60ä. L. 24. Printed by Auri faber, vol. II, p. 237; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 55V and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. V, p. 38.

Grace and peace! I am answering late, my dear Amsdorf, because there is a lack of messengers. Now tell Johann Lohr 3) and his wife that they need not worry about any danger from me. I have nothing wavier in mind than that I want to translate Melanchthon's Loci. Although this was requested of me a year ago and accepted by me, I have dropped everything that has to do with this work because I was overwhelmed with other work, since I can hardly do enough for our presses by daily and continuous work.

Martin Reinhard, preacher at Jena, has published the prelims in Orlamünde in an unworthy manner to my disgrace and to Carlstadt's honor. Therefore, I do not answer, so that I do not seek my own and strive to take away his glory, since nothing of the matter is dealt with there. Carlstadt meanwhile wrote to the Orlamünders, and it was also especially the signature added: Andreas Bodenstein "Unheard and unconquered, driven out by" Martin Luther. You see, since I, who should have become a martyr, have reached the point of making martyrs myself. Egranus also boasts of martyrdom, writing that he was "persecuted" by both the papists and the Lutherans.

2) The Magdeburgers had requested Amsdorf from the Elector of Saxony, initially for one year, as a preacher. Around September 24, he entered as a preacher at the Ulrichskirche.

3) Hans Lohr was a city councilor and the only important bookseller in Magdeburg, and was at that time the city's envoy to the Imperial Regiment in Esslingen to defend the city against the charge of introducing the Reformation.

1) Compare St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, Introduction, p. 19 f. expelled. 1) You can hardly believe how far Carlstadt's teaching on the Sacrament has already spread. The priest at Kahla has turned back and asks for mercy, since he had also been commanded to leave the country; I have written for him, but do not know whether I will obtain it. Martin of Jena has received the order to leave the country; weeping, he has said goodbye in the pulpit, and since he asked for mercy, he has received five florins as an answer; after that he has begged through the whole city and received twenty-five pennies. I believe that this is for the good of all preachers, so that at the same time their spirit may be tried and they may learn to preach and act with fear. Farewell and pray for me. Wittenberg, Thursday after Crispinus [27 October] 1524.

Martin Luther.

No. 118.

(Wittenberg.)

October 30, 1524.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther sends letters from Araula von Staufen, recommends a certain Frau Mocha, whom a churfürstlicher Schösser was harassing, and mentions Carlstadt's departure from Orlamünde.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 235d; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 558 and in Erlanger Briefw., vol. V, p. 42.

To the Lord Georg Spalatin, Christ's servant at the Court of Saxony, his godly and faithful, in the Lord most trusted [friend].

Grace and peace in the Lord! See, there you have the letters of Argula, 2) which she wrote to me and to Philip. She remembers some answer which she gave against the Ingolstadters, 3) but I have not read them.

1) Johann von Schwarzenberg, together with his colleague Vogler, prevented a supporter of Carlstadt, Sylvius Egranus, from receiving the pastorate in Culmbach. At the beginning of 1525 he had already completely left Luther's party.

2) Argula von Staufen.

3) Argula had been attacked by an Ingolstadt student with a crude mocking poem because she had stood up for Arsacius Seehofer in Munich. Against this she published: "Eyn Antwort in gedichtis weiß, ainem auß d' hohen Schul zu Ingolstat, auff amen spruch, nemlich vö jm außgagen.... Anno M.D.XLiii." This writing may be meant here.

not yet seen. Incidentally, the other day I had instructed Lucas that he should intercede with the prince on behalf of poor Mochin 4), who is being harassed by the shepherd because of ten bushels of wheat that she borrowed from the prince's storehouse, four of which she has returned, but which he denies, and urges her to return them all, although she can prove that they have been returned. Then she promises to return the remaining six in the next year, since she cannot do it this year. It is also known to him that, since the Elbe has raged so much, also her seeds have perished this year: unless he wants her to be completely deprived of bread and seeds also for the future year. She is a good and righteous woman, but a wretched woman, who is joined (as you know) to a man who is of no use. Therefore, you will do right if you do this thing for her instead of the wicked Lucas.

Carlstadt wrote letters to Orlamünde, one to the men, the other to the women, which, after the people were called together by the bells, were read out publicly while everyone wept with each other. But the signature was this: "Andres Bodensteyn unheard unconquered by Martinum Luther expelled." So much the Rector C[aspar] Glatz 6) from Orlamünde writes to me. Farewell. On the Sunday after Simonis and Judä [October 30] 1524.

Martin Luther.

No. 11S.

Wittenberg.

December 29, 1524.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther asks for a book by Urban Rhegius and reports that Carlstadt has written to him about a meeting and settlement.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 299; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 586 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. V, p. 89.

4) Perhaps the wife of the miller Mocha in Segrebn (Walch, old ed., vol. XXI, 148).

5) Instead of 6i8, which seems to us to be either a typo or a reading error, we have assumed ei.

6) The Rector of the University of Wittenberg, D. Glatz (Olstius) was sent to Orlamünde; later he was pastor there (Köstlin, Martin Luther, Vol. I, p. 729 and p. 763).

To the noble (optimo) man, Mr. Georg Spalatin, the servant of Christ at his gospel at the court of Saxony.

Grace and peace in the Lord! In any case, send me the booklet of Urban Rhegius, 1) my dear Spalatin, so that I may see what others assert against such a spirit. I do not trust Martin Reinhard's letter, nor the man himself at all; I did not want him to be at Nuremberg either. 2) I will serve Jodocus Kern 3) as best I can. I will report news about Carlstadt when he arrives, which I expect. I have written to him 4) in the hope that we will meet and negotiate peace, if Christ wills. He is (as I suspect) pressed by the banishment, or rather by the evil consciousness, that he has offended the good name of the princes of Saxony. There are people who have told us this from his mouth. Christ do what is good. Fare well and pray for me. Wittenberg, 1524, 5) Thursday after Christmas [Dec. 29].

Martin Luther.

No. 120.

Wittenberg.

March 23, 1525.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther approves of the fact that Carlstadt's escort was refused and complains about his behavior. About the inability of D. Glatz in Orlamünde to raise the income for the canons in Wittenberg. From Luther's council regarding the preceptor at Lichtenberg, Wolfgang Reußenbusch, marriage.

1) "Wider den neue irrsal Doctor Andreas Carlstadt, des Sacraments halb, Warnung. D. Vrbani Regii." At the end: "M.D.XXiiij."

2) After being expelled from Jena, Reinhard had turned to Nuremberg, but was soon expelled from the city with his wife and child "because he was an all-city fanatic."

3) He had married a nun in Nuremberg who had left the convent, but she did not accompany him to Saxony right away, but wanted to follow him after he had found a place to live there. In the meantime, her former prioress made her conscientious objections, so that when Kern became Münzer's successor in office in Allstädt, she only followed him at the urging of her relatives when he came to fetch her. The marriage was and remained an unhappy one and was finally separated.

4) This letter does not exist.

5) In the original "1525" after the way to start the new year with Christmas.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 277 d (with the wrong date: feria 2.); in De Wette (with the wrong date: March 20), vol. II, p. 634 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. V, p. 140.

To Georg Spalatin, evangelist at the Saxon court, his brother in the Lord.

Mercy and peace! It pleases me that the Prince has refused the escort for Carlstadt; therefore, I will send your letter to him 6) so that I may be freed from this miserably lost person. You read and hear wonderful, yes, wonderful things from D. Glatz, so that I am sorry that I have had any dealings with this man, who does everything with deceit and trickery. And when will I finally become wise, who by my simplicity present myself to everyone for play, laughter, trickery, deceit and mockery? but they do not deceive me, but themselves. You will stand by D. Glatz, because in truth he cannot pay the interest in this new time, which was set at another time. The new time certainly requires new laws and new customs; if those who owe it to do so do not establish them with diligence, those who do not deserve it will introduce them by force. But why should I not advise the preceptor 7) that, when he has married, he should by no means leave the house of Antony and his position, because he will be expelled, or another position will call him away? For he will not live anywhere more properly or better. Farewell and pray for me. Wittenberg, Thursday after Oculi [March 23] 1525. Martin Luther.

6) Spalatin's answer of March 20 (Burkhardt, p. 81) to Luther's letter of March 4 (Document No. 692 in this volume).

7) Wolfgang Reußenbusch, preceptor of the Antonite monastery in Lichtenberg. As early as March 27, 1525, Luther addressed to him an admonition to marry in spite of the vows of the order. Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. X, 674. (This writing was originally written in German, therefore not in the Latin Jena edition, and translated into Latin by Obsopoeus. According to this, the preface, vol. X, 73 is to be corrected). On April 25, he became engaged to Hanna Herzog, the daughter of a poor tailor's widow in Torgau, and married her the day after. He remained in his position as preceptor and administrator of the Antonite estates under the electoral name, but was also used as electoral councillor.

No. 121.

(Wittenberg.)

October 27, 1527.

Luther to Melancthon in Jena.

Of Melancthon's illness, Carlstadt's removal, a passage in the visitation order, Luther's melancholy, Erasmus's rebuttal 2c.

Handwritten in the Zwickau Rathsschulbibliothek, vol. XXXIV. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 355 b; in De Wette, vol. III, p. 215 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. VI, p. 109. A part of this letter, namely the last two paragraphs, without indication of the recipient, is found in German in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 238 b. (here still a piece, concerning Melancthon's condition and Carlstadt, is placed between the two paragraphs mentioned); in the Altenburg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 238 b. (here still a piece, concerning Melancthon's condition and Carlstadt, is placed between the two paragraphs mentioned). 238 b (here, a piece of the first paragraph, concerning Melancthon's condition and Carlstadt, is placed between the two paragraphs mentioned); in the Altenburger, vol. III, p. 795 and then in Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. X, 1720; however, the editors there have pointed out that the letter is complete in the appendix of the 15th volume.

Grace and peace in the Lord! For lack of a messenger, this letter has remained hidden from me, my dear Philip, until it could be brought to you through this gentleman George 1). I am sorry that you are so afflicted with colic, and I pray to Christ, as much as I can, to make you well and keep you well. For that you survive me, I wish very much in such great turmoil of the church, so that against the unspeakable raging of Satan there may be some left, who in this day of the wrath of the Lord, who (as befits) punishes our ingratitude, will stand as walls for Halls Israel. O Christ, what times will these be in the future, which have such a terrible beginning! Carlstadt has been absent from his place for several weeks; he has traveled to his people, and it is believed that he is looking for a nest. 2) He is going to his place after all, because he cannot be set right by any labor of love.

2. you write that you are being scourged by a conscience 3) because in your visitation.

1) Seidemann-De Wette, Vol. VI, p. 678 leaves it undecided whether D. Gregorius here was D. Georg Major or a "Mr. Georg".

2) Melancthon wrote (about the beginning of November 1527, 6orp. Rsk. I, No. 519) that Carlstadt had secretly left Saxony for Silesia, and expressed his fear that he would cause a new tragedy. In Silesia, Krautwald and Schwenkfeld were Carlstadt's kindred spirits. But for the time being, he still returned to Kemberg. Cf. St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, Introduction, p. 25 b ff.

3) Perhaps Caspar Aquila in Salfeld.

you have taught that repentance sucks with the fear of God. Almost the same thing was written by Magister Eisleben, but I do not respect this dispute about words very much, especially among the common man. For how the fear of punishment and the fear of God differ, is more easily said with syllables and letters, than it is recognized according to the matter and heart position (affectu). All the wicked may fear punishment and hell; God will help His own to fear God with punishment at the same time. And it is impossible for the fear of God to be without the fear of punishment in this life, just as the spirit cannot be without the flesh, although the fear of punishment is useless without the fear of God. Therefore, if one teaches the fear of God, I believe, one causes the same thing that one causes by teaching the freedom of the spirit, namely that some draw it to the security of the flesh, but others draw it to despair or the fear of punishment. But who can resist these? Christ hears us and graciously softens our plague. We will take care that when your visitation is sent to us for printing, we will do what you remember.

Pray for me, a wretched and despised worm, who is plagued by the spirit of sadness, according to the good will of the Father of mercy; to Him be glory even in my misery! My honor is only this, that I have taught the word of God purely, and have not distorted it because of any desire for honor or riches. I hope that He who began it will also show Himself merciful to the end, since I seek or thirst for nothing more arid than a merciful God as He presents Himself, and demands that He be so received even by His despisers and enemies. Greet all brothers and command us to their prayers. Christ, who taught us to teach his gospel against the raging Satan, give us through his certain and joyful Spirit to believe and persistently confess this very thing in the midst of this wicked and perverse generation.

4. I believe that Zwingli is exceedingly worthy of a sacred tribute, since he was so impudent and acts unworthily with the holy word of God. I have not yet read the Hyperaspistes 1); and what should I read, since I, the weak one of Christ, am hardly alive, let alone able to do or write anything? Does not God thus let all His floods pass over me? And those who should have mercy even kill the martyred one. May God have mercy on them and convert them, amen. On Sunday, the day before Simonis and Jude [October 27], 1527. Yours, Martin Luther.

No. 122.

Torgau.

November 28, 1527.

Luther to Brenz in Schwäbisch-Hall.

Luther praises Brenz, the author of the Swabian Syngramma, for his faithfulness to right doctrine.

Handwritten in Heilbronn, manuscript of the KarlsGymnasium; in the Ooä. Uut26nb.; in the Ooä. Isn. L. 24. n. I. 160. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 361; in De Wette, vol. III, p. 230 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. VI, p. 124.

To his exceedingly dear brother and Lord in Christ, Johann Brenz, Christ's sincere disciple and faithful preacher of the city of Hall.

Grace and peace in Christ our Lord! My very dear Spalatin showed me your letter addressed to him, which I read with great joy, my dear Brenz, because I see the grace of God dwelling in you through Christ, His Son, and that you so constantly and loudly preserve and teach the word of Christ in the midst of this wicked and perverse generation. Praise be to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who allows me, among so many evil things that surround me, to see at least some brothers as the true and right seed of Israel; otherwise there are nothing but monsters raging and raging everywhere. Until now, we have lovingly nurtured Carlstadt in our bosom, in the good hope that he would return to the right path, but the wretched man hardens himself more and more every day, and is forced by his pusillanimity to remain silent.

1) Erasmus's rebuttal to Luther. See St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 67.

He also still holds on to his Tuto, even though it has been rejected by his own. So great is the wrath, if someone once considers the word of God. I pray to Christ to keep you and your brothers with us in his purity and simplicity until the day of his glory, amen.

Your Spalatin wrested this letter from me (although I did it gladly and willingly), so that I might bring about your friendship by writing the letter, while we are already united in spirit and unity (by God's grace). Pray with your brothers that Christ may make this joy in us complete and constant. Greetings from Pommer, my only comrade, since the others are absent for fear of the plague. Command us, especially me, a wretched sinner, to your church, for Satan has let loose against me and is trying to snatch Christ from me secretly (privately) with his attacks, after he sees that he can snatch nothing from me publicly and in the confession of the Word. I wonder what kind of man Zwingli may be, who is so unlearned in grammar and dialectics, to say nothing of other arts, and yet dares to boast of victories; this honor is too much of a disgrace. Thou, my exceeding joy and my crown [Phil. 4, 1.], be at ease in Christ, our! Master and Lord, with all the brethren. Torgau by Spalatin, 2) 1527, November 28.

With all your heart, your brother Martin Luther.

No. 123.

Wittenberg.

September 19, 1523.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther sends a letter to Weimar; he expresses his displeasure about the marriage of the court preacher there with a rich old woman.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 156; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 409 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. IV, p. 232.

2) Luther was in Torgau on November 27 and 28, by order of the Elector, to settle the disputes between Agricola and Melancthon. See St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, Introduction, p. 47.

To the learned and godly man, Georg Spalatin, Christ's servant.

Grace and peace! I take advantage of your courtesy and service, my dear Spalatin, namely that you have this letter to Greffendorf 1) delivered soon. For it concerns a matter that is important to me. I hope, however, that messengers are to be had from this court to that either always or frequently, while I have none.

I dislike Wolfgang's marriage, 2) which you indicate, to the old and rich Vettel. It is a disgrace to the gospel to seek mammon and to despise offspring; I would have approved if he had married a girl in the hope of offspring, but now the teacher of faith is making an evil name for himself and us by the example of unbelief. Farewell and pray for me. Wittenberg, Saturday after Lamberti [September 19] 1523, Martin Luther.

No. 124.

Schweinitz.

March 8, 1523.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther writes from Schweinitz, where he was with Jonas and his wife. From the answer given at Nuremberg by the imperial estates to the Pope's envoys (Document No. 720).

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 127; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 310 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. IV, p. 96 (with the postscript from Burkhardt, p. 55).

To the Lord Georg Spalatin, ecclesiastics and evangelist at court and with the prince, his [friend] in the Lord.

Mercy and peace! I could not help but write to you, since I was so close to you that I even saw Lochau, so that you would know that I was or had been here, my dear Spalatin. But I have been here and have seen a new cousin baptized who was born of Bernhard 3) and Christ. We have also with Isaiah [Cap. 5, 1.]

1) Hans von Greffendorf was chamberlain to Duke Johann von Sachsen.

2) M. Wolfgang Stein, court preacher at Weimar.

3) Bernhard was a baptized Jew who married Carlstadt's maid in July 1522.

the song of the cousin and in a fat place sang to our dear. Of course, we drank good and pure wine from the princely cellar, and we would be quite evangelical if the gospel fattened us like that.

We have at Wittenberg the resolutions which are delivered by the great men of the empire at Nuremberg to the embassies of the pope, 4) which are extraordinarily free and quite pleasing to us; but we have them, printed in Latin and German; these will be sent to you if you do not also have them. Maurus, 5) that cantor at Worms, whom you know, has come to us with a certain other learned canon, Frederick, to lie with us for a time on the sacred Scriptures. You know that he is a very good man. Farewell and apologize to the prince that we have sipped so much Grüneberg 6) (Gornbergici) wine. Jonas greets you with his wife, who are godfather and godmother with me, and there stood [as godparents] these three virgins, 7) certainly at least Jonas, who is called a virgin with us, because he begets nothing. From Schweinitz 8) on Sunday Oculi [March 8].

Martin Luther.

I recommend this priest of Cranach 9) to you, first of all, that you only hear this man's cause, then, if you can, help him. For it seems to me that he does not desire entirely unreasonable things from the prince, although, if it cannot happen, the prince himself will know best. But I believe that in him a service to the Gospel is being done.

4) No. 720 in this volume.

5) M. Nicolaus Maurus from Goarshausen, later pastor at St. Catharinen in Frankfurt a. M. in 1536, later superintendent at Groß-Gerau, died before 1553.

6) According to Seidemann-De Wette, vol. VI, p. 655 s. v. Cornbergicuru.

7) namely Luther, Jonas and his wife.

8) Schweinitz is a town located 3^{1/2} German miles from Wittenberg, in which there was a churfürstliches Schloß, in which Churfürst Johann died on August 10, 1532. - Lochau (now called Annaburg) is about half a German mile from Schweinitz.

9) Johannes Grau or Cassius was pastor at Kronach (Cronach also Cranach, hence the famous painter Lucas Sünders, born here in 1472, called himself Cranach) in Upper Franconia, was expelled by Bishop Wigand at Bamberg, who became bishop in 1522. He came to Wittenberg, where Luther first recommended him for pastor to Oelsnitz and later brought him to Weimar, where he died as the first pastor and superintendent in 1539.

No. 125.

(Wittenberg.)

3. August 1523.

Luther to Spalatin.

Luther has not yet decided to write against Hadrian's breve (Document No. 716). About the Leimbach affair; about the appointment of Crotus to the monastery in Wittenberg; about a petition by Franz Lambert; about the persecution of Heinrich von Zütphen and the activities of Münzer in Allstädt.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 151 b; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 378 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. IV, p. 200. In Schütze, vol. II, p. 48, only the last piece is listed as a special letter, dated Stephau (December 26).

To the Lord Georg Spalatin, Magister, servant of Christ, his [friend] in Christo.

Grace and peace! I have not yet decided on a writing against the breve of Master Hadrian. If it comes to my mind, I will write in such a way that I alone lead my cause.

I see that Leimbach's matter is entangled, 1)

1) In a letter, which is printed in Walch, old edition, Vol. XXI, 848 ff, is found in the Ood. Ootk. zV 122, f. 23 a list of Leimbach's debt claims to the Elector, which is first printed by Burkhardt, p. 58 and then in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. IV, p. 154 ff; we make the corrections to the latter, because without them the account is completely incomprehensible. P. 155, line 22 instead of: "ufs 110 old Schock" read: ufs-100 ten old Schock. Ibid. p. 39 instead of: "the 19 year 530 florins" read: the 19 year 570 florins. For every year there were three markets in Leipzig, and for each one Leimbach charged himself ten florins for provisions. Ibid. Z.43 instead of: "Summa Summarum 30,798 Gulden" read: Summa Summarum 33,798 Gulden [12 Gr]. That this is correct will be shown immediately. In earlier years, the Elector had made two different loans of 6000 florins each, on which no interest had been paid for quite some time, nor had the principal sum been repaid. Now Leimbach made the following calculation: for the one 6000 gulden he would have had to receive 3300 gulden in 11 years in interest, calculated "five to a hundred", but in order to continue his trade he would have had to borrow at 10 per cent and pay 6285 gulden 15 groschen *) in interest; for the other 6000 he would have received 2700 gulden in 9 years, but would have had to pay 5142 gulden and 18 groschen in interest. His "earned wages" for 19 years (G 200 florins) and "Zehrung" at the annual three Leipzig markets (@ 10 fl.) amounted to 4370 florins. The main sum was 12,000 florins. For this the Leimbach calculated in interest 5A, in damage watch 10 H and in labor management fees 3'A (for the year thus 18zA), in sum 21,798 florins 12 Gr" with the main sum of 12,000 florins thus 33,798 florins fund 12 Gr.j.

*) This payment had to be made in gold. The sum comes up like this: for each borrowed florin of si groschen (or in gold exactly so^ groschen), which was called an old shock, had to be paid back after 6 months one gold florin or SS groschen, which makes about 5 A for the half year, so 10 A for the year.

therefore it is of little concern to me, only that I could not refuse the intercession. Certainly, the copy of the manuscript that you recently sent me is such that I would not want it to have been accepted by the prince, since it seems to me that a certain force or violence can be felt in it. Again, I know that it is a matter concerning unjust mammon; I am easily persuaded that either party is of such a nature that it is not entirely washed of its dirt. I will not concern myself with these matters, they may watch for themselves; but if they should answer anything, I will send it.

It has been requested of me that I may ask you, since our prince in our Bethaven 2) does not allow a married man to be accepted, that you may propose the Crotus for appointment, who would be suitable for such a custos, who could wisely renew and promote things; so it has appeared to Philip and me and some others. For I hope that these abominations will not be perpetual, but that when suitable men are appointed, both the doings and the salaries will be turned to a better use.

Franz Lambert 3) asks through me that you pay him an allowance from the prince, may you call what he now receives a gift or a salary. He complains about the ingratitude of the listeners that they do not pay anything; therefore, he is forced to ask that he receive 10 [florins], while he receives six from the prince. You understand well enough what he wants. He is poor and good, then from foreign lands, and will not stay here long, as they say.

The Dutch Baalites 4) have brought it about with their Jezebel that she should demand the brother Henry as a prisoner of the emperor from the Bremen. We do not yet know what the Bremeners will do.

2) the Wittenberg Abbey

3) See St. Louis edition, vol. XIV, 260 ff, note.

4) The "Baalites" are the heretics; "Jezebel" the governor Margaretha; "Brother Heinrich" Heinrich von Zütphen. The Bremen City Council refused to surrender them.

While he was with me, I warned the Allstädt foreman 1) that he was putting away the spirit of the prophet Thomas; whether anything has happened in the meantime, I do not know. I cannot stand this spirit, whoever he may be, at all. He praises what is mine (as Thomas himself writes), 2) and yet he despises it and seeks other, greater things. Furthermore, he speaks with such inconsistent and unusual words and ways of speaking, which are not according to Scripture, that one would think he was insane or drunk. He flees us and does not want to get into a fight, and yet he boasts extraordinarily. Therefore, I have asked the locksmith to urge the man to discuss his doctrine with us; I do not know whether he will do so. Our spirit is not one that should fear to be heard and discussed with all, even evil and good spirits. Farewell and pray for me. On the day of the invention of St. Stephen [August 3] 1523.

Martin Luther.

No. 126.

Wittenberg.

April 11, 1525.

Luther to Amsdorf in Magdeburg.

Because there are many printers to be employed in Wittenberg, Luther cannot give anything to those in Magdeburg. News about Carlstadt and Münzer. The Landgrave of Hesse also tries to win Duke George for the Gospel.

According to Burkhardt, p. 82, the original was in Dessau, so it should now be in the Anhaltisches GesamtArchiv, where D. Enders did not find it. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 280d; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 644 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. V, p. 155.

Grace and peace! You know, my dear Amsdorf, that I cannot do enough for our presses, and now almost everyone is looking for this kind of acquisition, and there are almost innumerable (sexcenti) printers here, so that I cannot give anything [to print] to that place 3) now, as much as I would like to

1) Hans Zeis, Münzer's patron and friend from the beginning.
2) In a letter to Luther of July 9, 1523, in Seidemann, "Münzer," p. 109, supplement 10.

3) namely Magdeburg. Aurifaber and after him DeWette and Walch refer it to a scripture passage that Luther could not interpret now.

also wanted. But I will make a note of it and take the greatest pains to see whether I am able to do something. I have not been able to obtain an escort for Carlstadt, so he will spew his nonsense against me. He has his being at Rothenburg an der Tauber, 4) in that he rages against the images in his own way. Münzer is king and ruler at Mühlhausen, not only teacher. The Hessian, 5) who is won for Christ, glows for the Gospel, and also bravely calls Duke Georg to it. Thus writes our younger duke, 6) who spoke with him at Kreuzburg. Would God that your Magdeburgers would take care against the violence of the siege, 7) of which the rumor says. Fare well and pray for me. Wittenberg, Tuesday after Palmarum [April 11] 1525.

Martin Luther.

No. 127.

(Wittenberg.)

June 21, 1525.

Luther to Amsdorf in Magdeburg.

Luther announces his marriage and invites Amsdorf to the wedding feast. He gives all kinds of news about the Peasants' War.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 295; in De Wette, vol. III, p. 12 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. V, p. 204. German in the Wittenberg edition (1559), vol. IX, p. 228b and in Walch.

Grace and peace in the Lord! Already a messenger was snatched for me who would bring this letter to you, my dear Amsdorf, and behold, yours is brought to me. Well, the rumor is true that I have been married to Catharina quickly, before I would be forced to listen to evil mouths rushing at me, as it is wont to happen. For I hope that I will still live a short time, and I did not want to refuse this last obedience to my father, who demanded this, in the hope of offspring, and at the same time also so that I would confirm by deed what I

4) See St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, Introduction, p. 23a.

5) Landgrave Philip of Hesse.

6) Duke John Frederick of Saxony.

7) The Magdeburg canons had called on the imperial regiment to intervene against the Reformation, and the city prepared to resist.

I find so many fainthearted people in such great light of the Gospel. This is how God has willed and made it. For I do not have carnal love nor rut, but have pleasure in a wife. Therefore, on the next Tuesday I will give a banquet as a testimony to my marriage, and my parents will be present. Therefore, I have wanted you to be there in any case; therefore, as I have decided to invite you, so I invite you now and ask you not to be absent if you can somehow.

The rumor about the Elector is false, but Meiningen, Mellrichstadt, Neustadt, Münnerstadt 1) with other ten towns have surrendered to the Elector's mercy, and he now has to work there so that everything is settled peacefully. It is a foregone conclusion that in Franconia eleven thousand peasants, who were divided in three places, have been slain, 61 good guns taken, the castle of Würzburg sacked. The margrave Casimir rages very much against his own, 2) because they have twice broken loyalty. In the Duchy of Württemberg, 6000 were killed, elsewhere in Swabia 10,000 in various places. It is said that the Duke of Lorraine killed 20,000 in Alsace. Thus the poor peasants are slain everywhere. What the Bambergers now suffer is to be expected. Nevertheless, they continue to riot in Breisgau and in the county of Tyrol, so that from Innsbruck to Trento everything is in an uproar, and the bishops of Brixen and Trento are expelled. The Duke George will have a meeting with the Margrave and your Bishop of Mainz next Monday in Dessau. There is a rumor that he will have me demanded from Wittenberg, since he is puffed up by his success; he believes that I am like Muenzer in doctrine. But Christ will give grace. See to it that he does not attack Magdeburg. Farewell and pray for me. Wednesday after the Feast of Corpus Christi [June 21] 1525.

1) In the text: Marstatenses. In Spalatin N^rstaä; in the Wittenberg: "Mörstadt"; in Baumann, "Rothenburg": Alunrstat. - Spalatin in bleueren still names Hof, Haßfurt, Seßlach and Ebern.
2) Compare St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, Introduction, p. 23 d.

No. 128.

(Wittenberg.)

March 27, 1526.

Luther to Spalatin in Altenburg.

Luther sends letters from King Christiern of Denmark and comments on Duke George and the Sacramentirans.

Handwritten in Ooä. a. k. 266. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 313; in De Wette, vol. III, p. 97 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. V, p. 328.

To his most worthy in Christ, Georg Spalatin, the most faithful servant of Christ in Altenburg.

Grace and peace in Christ! It is true, dearest Spalatin, that your letters to us and ours to you are very rare. 3) But what cause you have, you may see; we have a very well-founded one. Do we want to disturb the joys of a young husband 4) prematurely, and not rather allow the time of the wedding to pass completely, especially since what could be written there is very little cheerful? But, joking aside, the bearers of the letters are rare, otherwise I would have sent long ago this exceedingly sad letter of the king Christiern, a man who is now exceedingly miserable and lives in a miraculous way alone Christo, together with the one he sent to me, at the same time with the quite miserable message sent over by letter. Perhaps God wants to call a king and a queen to heaven, as they say, and such a king of whom human reasoning would have least expected it, so that He may be miraculous and mock our judgment. You can hardly believe how great things Satan intends to do through Duke George and the bishops; I will give you a foretaste of this worthlessness shortly through the booklet that is already under the press. 6) If the Lord

3) Luther's last letter was dated December 9, 1525. 4) Spalatin's wedding took place on Nov. 19, 1525.

5) According to the proverb: A prince is game in heaven. St. Louis Edition, Vol. V, 874, § 183.

6) This is Luther's intended rebuttal to the so-called Mainz Rathsschlag, of which only the beginning was printed, but further printing was prevented by the Elector because he feared entanglements with Duke George. A short excerpt from the first sheet of this writing is found in Walch, Vol. XVI, No. 826. New-you will have to say that the revolt and the beating to death of the peasants was only a prelude to the destruction of Germany. Therefore I earnestly entreat you to pray with all your might to the Father of mercies that he may prevent these treacheries and break the fury, especially by accusing Duke George, a man (as I fear) for whom there is no hope and who is lost, that he may either convert him or, if he is not worthy of it, take him away; otherwise that beast will not rest, since he is almost Satan himself, not only through his own fury but also through the agitation of the bishops. But the fact that Luther is not killed torments man so much that it is to be feared that he might be consumed by this agony of his heart alone; he cannot sleep nor wake. Dear God! How much our prince has to endure, not only from him, but also from some of his exceedingly unworthy great ones through their treacheries and shameful counsel. I would have much to tell you that I am not allowed to entrust to letters. Moreover, that irritated adder, Erasmus of Rotterdam, again writes against me. 1) How will this quite vain creature of ambition strain his eloquence to put Luther down! Furthermore, I believe that you have read the writing of the exceedingly learned scientific men against Oecolampad; it is extraordinary how I like the book 2). Willibald Pirckheimer 3) has written against him with greater courage and zeal than I would have expected from such a great man, since I believed he was too busy with other things. But again, others stand up, and it has this sacramentirer Secte now, if I am not mistaken, has produced six heads in one year: a strange spirit that is so at odds with itself. Carlstadt's Tuto was one [opinion] that has fallen; Zwingli's is the second that will fall; Oecolampad's figurative speech (Figuratum) will fall; also the fourth has fallen to Carlstad 4) who, namely, since he became angry, put the words thus: What is given for you is my body. The fifth now rises and stands in Silesia, brought up by Valentin Krautwald and Caspar Schwenkfeld, who turn the words this way: My body, which is given for you, is this, namely a spiritual food. These plague us extraordinarily with writings, and are very importunate (molestissimi) and garrulous. I wish them our stone, 5) since they think themselves strong. The sixth is at Cologne that of Peter Florus, which Philip has; I have not yet seen it, but only the letter. O woe! how he rejects Luther! I know, he says, that Luther is forsaken by the Lord. All these different spirits argue among themselves with sophistical reasons, all boast of the revelations they have obtained through prayers and tears, and yet in the main they agree. Good to us through

4) De Wette has the annotation: "60ä.3sn.: 60 (Here is a gap in the manuscript)." Aurifaber and De Wette have Carolstaäin in the text, while according to the manuscript Carolstaäio would be read. Of this, the Erlanger Briefwechsel judges: "which is certainly wrong", and justifies this judgment with the fact that Billican wrote to Oecolampad on 16 Jan. 1526 about a Ks^{ss}sius who reverses the order completely in the manner indicated. Then the Erlangen correspondence continues: "This Reyß or Reuß seems to be Mart. Cellarius, who, according to an opinion of Mel. to Philip of Hesse, June II, 1530 (6. R. II, 93), wrote about the Lord's Supper. Luther, however, could also have heard his view orally during his presence, in Wittenberg, where the Lord's Supper came up." The transformation of Ks^{ss}sius into Cellarius is probably too strong to be admitted. On the other hand, it can be assumed that Aurifaber had an un mutilated copy in which he could decipher Carlstadt's name. Based on this, we claim for Carlstadt what is attributed above to Cellarius, namely, that Luther during Carlstadt's long hidden stay in Lucher's house had several conversations with him about the Lord's Supper, in which, as the text says, Carlstadt became angry, and changed the words in the manner indicated. Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XX, introduction, p. 24, note 4.

5) Luther suffered from stone complaints until June.

However, Seidemann has published from handwritten sources what is still available of this writing. Reprinted in the Erlangen edition, vol. 65, p. 23 ff. We will make use of it in the 16th volume, No. 826.

1) His book II^{psm}spistss sto. (see St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, introduction, p. 67). On April 7, Duke Georg sent it to the Landgrave of Hesse, and on April 10 it was in Melancthon's hands (6orp. Rsk. I, No.376ff.).

2) Meant is the Syngamma Susvisum, St. Louiser See also the introduction, pp. 31 ff.

3) Lilib. Lirktsimsri de vsra Oftristi surns st vsro sjus sunAuius aa 3. Ossolampaaium rsspensio. Xorsrud. ax". 3o. ksbrsjuru. 1526. octav.

Christ, who sets those in battle for us among ourselves, immediately from the beginning. Behold, how should I have written these more distressing things to you? He who increases his knowledge also increases his suffering [Eccl. 1, 18. Vulg.], but I wanted to make up for the long silence by rambling on. Fare well with your rib. Tuesday after Palmarum [March 27] 1526.

Your Martin Luther.

No. 129.

(Wittenberg.)

March 11, 1525.

Luther to Spalatin.

First of private affairs, then of the capture of the King of France 2c.

The original is in the Anhaltisches Gesamt-Archiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 273b; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 632 and in Erlanger Briefw., vol. V, p. 136.

To Georg Spalatin, the servant of Christ at the court of Saxony, his most trusted friend in the Lord.

Mercy and peace! Regarding the marriage case, Pommer will answer as you requested, my dear Spalatin. I will finally write to the preceptor Reißbusch, 1) although I am surprised that this letter is necessary for him, since he can read and learn these things more abundantly from so many books. I am not pleased that the king of the French has been defeated and captured (may this be flesh or something else). That he is defeated, one could still suffer, but that he is captured, that is certainly something monstrous. But what is there in these works of God, if one does not pay attention to the works of God, who raises up the kingdoms to overthrow them? Perhaps the hour of the kingdom of the French has come, and as that 2) one said of Troy: There is the last day and the inevitable destiny. So that one captured the Duke of Milan 3) before, now he himself is captured. The emperor trium-

1) Compare Letter No. 120 in this appendix, especially the last note.

2) VII-A. lik. II, V. 324. Instead of tornpus, Luther has put katum.

3) Lodovico Sforza (ü Moros, who was captured at Novara in 1500. Louis XII of France kept him in captivity until his death in 1510.

The fact that kings and princes are being overthrown in this way in our time seems to me to be one of the signs that the world will fall on Judgment Day. These are greater signs than anyone may believe. And as now the princes let the common people become insolent, so it will happen that in such a way still more will fall. Perhaps this is how fate wills it. One thing pleases me that the plot of the Antichrist, who had begun to rely on the King of France, has been thwarted, so that God would show that He wants to destroy all the counsels of even this tyrant of souls and turn them to His ultimate purpose.

I feel sorry for the marshal, 4) who has suffered so much damage, and wish him luck that he is gifted with such a great spirit and faith; greet him and everyone warmly. Wittenberg, on the Saturday after Invocavit [March 11] 1525. Martin Luther.

No. 130.

(Wittenberg.) (Nov. 11, 1527 or shortly thereafter.) 5)

Luther to Justus Jonas in Nordhausen.

Luther complains about the hostility of the Sacramentarians and Erasmus and other temptations. He gives news about his wife, his son's illness, the hoped-for near end of the plague in Wittenberg, and other things.

Printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 343; in De Wette, vol. III, p. 220 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. VI, p. 116.

Grace and peace in the Lord Jesus, the Savior! I thank you for both praying for us and writing to us from time to time, my dear Jonas. I believe, however, that the letter which I sent yesterday has meanwhile reached your hands. I have not yet read Erasmus and the Sacramentarians, except for almost three quatrains of Zwingli. They do right when they trample me poor man under the feet, so that they fulfill Judas' example, and also compel me to lament with Christ.

4) Johann von Dolzig.

5) Since Luther says in this letter that he had read almost three quatrains of Zwingli's writing, which he received, as he says in the great Confession of the Lord's Supper (St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 894), on November 11, this letter is to be placed on November 11 or shortly thereafter.

[Ps. 109, 16.]: "He hath persecuted the wretched and the poor, and the afflicted to slay him." For I bear the wrath of God, because I have sinned against him; the pope and the emperor, the princes, the bishops and the whole world hate me and seek after me, and even this is not enough: my brothers also have to torment me; yes, also my sins, death, Satan with his angels rage against me without end. And what could sustain and comfort me, if Christ should also leave me, for the sake of the best, those who hurry me? But he will not leave the exceedingly wretched sinner to the end, for I consider that I am the least of all men [1 Cor. 4:9]. O, would to God, and again, would to God, that Erasmus and the Sacramentans could experience my heartache even for a quarter of an hour: how surely I would pronounce that they would be quite sincerely converted and made whole! Now they, my enemies, are strong and living, yea, heaping sorrow upon sorrow, and persecuting him whom GOD hath smitten (Ps. 69:5, 27.). But this is enough, lest I be full of complaints and impatient against the rod of God, who smites and heals, kills and makes alive. Praise be to Him in His holy, pleasing and perfect will. It is impossible that he whom the world and its ruler so hate should not be pleasing to Christ; if we were of the world, the world would love ours. I am also anxious because of the birth of my wife, so the example of the wife of the Capellan 1) has made me fearful; but he who is mighty has done great things for me; great things are also required of me, which I am to bear. My Christ, whom I have purely taught and confessed, be my rock and my strength, amen.

My little Hans does not greet you now because of his illness, but he wishes your prayers for him. Today it is twelve days that he has not eaten anything; only by drinking has he been nourished to some extent; now he is beginning to eat a little. It is wonderful how the little child, after his manner, would like to be cheerful and strong; but he cannot be afraid of too-great weakness. Margaretha von Mochau's ulcer 2) was cut yesterday and after the harmful pus was removed, she is beginning to feel better. I have locked her up in our usual winter chamber; we are staying in the large anteroom in front. Hansen is in my room; Augustin's wife 3) in his; we hope that the plague will have an end. Farewell and kiss your daughter and embrace her mother, and remember us in your prayers.

And, to write something new, I have seen the letter which that young man, the brother of the wife of Christian Goldschmidt, 4) has written, in which he confesses that he has promised himself to a firm and right marriage with Dorothea Fäkin 5) if the relatives on both sides would allow it, and he asks his sister and Christian for advice and help. What may happen, I do not know; this you can tell her sister for sure. I would not like Rome to be burned, because that would be a great monstrosity. Would God that we could dwell together again, and give up the preacher Solomon before we die. 6) I commend myself to your prayers. Christian [Döring], with his house, had wandered to Berlin, but Margrave Joachim ordered him on the same day to depart from all his territory, citing the danger of the plague. Behold the wickedness of Satan and of men! Thus we Wittenbergers are to all to hate, to disgust, to fear, as the Psalm says [Ps. 22, 7.]: "a mockery of men and contempt of the people", but a joy and crown (as we hope) of the angels and the saints, Amen.

Martin Luther, Christi lutum [Koth].

2) from Segrehn, probably a sister of Carlstadt's wife.

3) The wife of Professor of Medicine Augustin Schürf, Hanna, née Muschwitz.

4) Christian Döring, also called Goldschmidt or ^urikadr. Christianae Ooltsokrait is the wife of Christian Döring; her name was Barbara and she was the daughter of the late Berlin mayor Thomas Blankenfeld, a sister of Cath. Hornung.

5) a relative of Jonas' wife.

6) Luther's lectures on Ecclesiastes were completed in November 1526, but not published until 1532. See St. Louis edition, Vol. V, 1372.

1) Georg Rörer.

End of the fifteenth part.